King Janak felt exhilarated upon seeing the two brothers. Then he came forward and caught hold of the lotus-like feet of the sage (Vishwamitra) (to welcome him at the venue and also to pay his respects to the great sage)<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The entire assembly was closely watching Lord Ram and Laxman. The attention of each single man and woman was fixed on them. Remember: All the citizens had rushed to the venue just to see Lord Ram and Laxman (refer: Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 240). They were not concerned with and interested in the wonderful spectacle that unfolded by the presence of countless kings and princes from every corner of earth.

<sup>2</sup>The king holding the feet of sage Vishwamitra has another connotation also. He subtly and silently begged, pleaded and implored with the mighty sage, who had great mystical powers and could turn the course of events if he so wished, to use his spiritual powers to somehow steer the course of developments to favour Lord Ram.

Another reason for Janak holding the feet of sage Vishwamitra was to ask the sage to forgive him for organising a ceremony wherein Lord Shiva's bow would be broken. This was done by the king because the sage was a worshipper of Lord Shiva, and the sage had to be kept in good humour and pleased for fear of punishment and curse at the temerity and the audacity of blatantly summoning all kings to publicly break Lord Shiva's bow. So the king held the sage's feet to pre-empt such an eventuality.

He wished to convey to the sage that he had no intention to insult or undermine Lord Shiva's divinity and supreme stature as the Great God of creation; perish even the thought of it. The only motivating factor was just to find the strongest and the most able husband for his daughter Sita.]

करि बिनती निज कथा सुनाई । रंग अवनि सब मुनिहि देखाई ॥ ५ ॥

जहँ जहँ जाहिं कुअँर बर दोऊ । तहँ तहँ चकित चितव सबु कोऊ ॥ ६ ॥

kari binatī nija kathā sunā'ī. raṅga avani saba munihi dēkhā'ī. 5.

jaham' jaham' jāhiṁ ku'amīra bara dō'ū. taham' taham' cakita citava sabu kō'ū. 6.

The king prayed to the sage most politely and told him his own story (i.e. the reason behind organising the bow-breaking ceremony). Then he took (escorted) the sage around the arena to show him the place and the arrangements<sup>1</sup>. (5)

Wherever the two wonderful princes went (along with sage Vishwamitra who was being escorted around the arena by king Janak), everyone there stared at them, fascinated with wonder and awe at their sight<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The king told the sage that he has organised the bow-breaking ceremony to identify the most strong, able and valiant warrior to whom Sita would be married. The bow was not an ordinary one; it was Lord Shiva's bow and therefore it was not a joke to lift it. Only someone who has mighty powers and upon whom Lord Shiva is pleased would be able to achieve success. This ensured that Sita would be in safe and able hands; her security and safety was certain with such a husband.

Now, let us read the story of the great and formidable 'Bow'. It is described in Valmiki's Ramayana, in its Baal Kand, Canto 66, verse nos. 7-13. Briefly the story is as follows—In the dynasty of king Nimi (ancestor of Janak), there was an ancient king named Devraat. This bow was received by him for safe-keeping. The story goes that when Prajapati Daksha had organised a fire sacrifice, he had invited all the gods but neglected Shiva due to some past ill-will. The selfish gods partook of the offerings made during the fire sacrifice without bothering that their chief, Lord Shiva, was not invited.

This enraged Shiva, and he had strung this bow to destroy the fire sacrifice of Daksha as punishment. After that, he scolded the gods and threatened them that he would cut off their heads with the help of that bow for the insult inflicted upon him by them collectively. They should have refused to participate in the fire sacrifice when Shiva was not invited, and should not have partaken of the offerings.

The terrified gods somehow managed to placate Shiva. Then he gave this bow to them to keep it safely somewhere. The gods then kept the bow with king Devraat for safe-keeping.

This story also appears in the Kurma Puran.

In Valmiki's Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 75, verse nos. 11-21, the story pertaining to the bow is as follows:--Sage Parashuram had told Lord Ram that Vishwakarma, the craftsman and builder of the gods, had meticulously constructed two bows. Out of them, the gods gave one, the bow that was broken by Lord Ram, to Shiva who used it to slay the demon named Tripuraasur. The other bow was given by the gods to Lord Vishnu.

At that time the gods enquired from Brahma (creator) who was stronger—Vishnu or Shiva. To determine this, Brahma created a situation wherein some misunderstanding was created between Vishnu and Shiva, as a result of which a formidable battle raged between them. Shiva's bow could not match the might and abilities of Vishnu's bow, and Shiva himself was vexed when Vishnu grunted ferociously. The decision was obvious—Vishnu was superior. Since this battle was devised to test them, and the result was obvious now, the gods and sages came to beg with Vishnu and Shiva to calm down. Lord Shiva was frustrated and angry at his bow that it had let him down in the confrontation. So he wanted to discard it. He gave the bow along with its arrow to king Devraat.

In Veda Vyas' Adhyatma Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 6, verse nos. 68-70, king Janak has said that after slaying the demon Tripuraasur, Lord Shiva had kept this bow with his grandfather, king Devraat. Since this bow was very destructive and feared by all, Janak decided to get rid of it by getting it broken during the marriage ceremony of his daughter Sita.

Kavitawali of Tulsidas also endorses this story that Lord Shiva had got this bow made with the specific aim of killing the demon Tripuraasur. Refer: Kavitawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 10, stanza no. 1.

The same story also appears in Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 80.

The fact that this bow was employed to slay Tripuraa has been hinted in the present book Ram Charit Manas also—refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 250; and Doha no. 271.

King Janak further told sage Vishwamitra, while narrating his story, that once he was ploughing a field when the tip of his ploughshare got stuck in the ground. Upon investigation it was discovered that it was pot in which infant Sita was found. Janak brought her home and brought her up as his own daughter.

In Adhyatma Ramayan of Veda Vyas, Baal Kand, Canto 6, verse nos. 61-68, it is narrated that one day when king Janak was sitting alone, sage Narad had come to visit him. The sage informed him that Lord Vishnu has come down to this earth in the form of Lord Ram and his three brothers, and that the Lord's cosmic Maya has come to his household as Sita. Lord Ram and Sita have an eternal union. So the sage advised him to devise a way to re-establish this union at the worldly plane because it would provide him great merit and welfare. The king had been thinking of some way to make this happen. Then he realised that Shiva's old and rusty bow should be used as a means to test who among the kings and princes on earth was a manifestation of Lord Vishnu because only he would have the guts and the strength to break Lord Shiva's mighty bow. Hence, the king had organised this ceremony.

There is a traditional story that says that one day Sita's mother was busy in some household work and she asked Sita to clean the platform where the bow was kept. Sita lifted the bow easily in order to clean the platform below it. This was a stunningly miraculous act as the bow was extremely heavy and mighty. So, Sita's parents decided that the correct match for her would be someone who could lift the bow and string it.

<sup>2</sup>Everyone was equally eager to have a close-up view of Lord Ram and Laxman. So the creator arranged to motivate king Janak to escort sage Vishwamitra around the arena to show him the place and the arrangements which were lavish to the extreme.

Remember: The venue was circular like a huge stadium. At the center of it was the raised platform where the Bow was kept, and all round it were the seats for the invited guest, the competitors, and the citizens. King Janak has made special arrangements for sage Vishwamitra and the two brothers, Lord Ram and Laxman (refer: Doha no. 244 below. So those near this place could have a good view, but those on the opposite side of the stadium could not see them so distinctly.

When Lord Ram and Laxman went around the circular venue, all the assembled people had an equal opportunity to see their beloved Lord up close. So, they craned their necks and gleefully had their eyes-full view of the wonderful sight of the two brothers walking past them majestically. Indeed, all of them must have thanked their good luck as well as king Janak to make their dream come true.

The king was well aware of the overwhelming and warmest of receptions that the two brothers had got when they had gone sight-seeing inside the city of Janakpur the evening of their arrival; the entire city had poured out to see them. Once again, Janak watched in amusement as the entire gentry of the city poured in as soon as the news spread that Lord Ram and Laxman are arriving at the bow-breaking venue. So, being a king, he felt that it was his duty and responsibility towards his subjects that he gives them equal opportunity to see the two brothers. The only way to do it was to take them around the venue, but it would be impolite not to take sage Vishwamitra also for the round. Hence, king Janak escorted all the three—sage Vishwamitra, Lord Ram and Laxman—round the venue.

There was another reason why king Janak took them around the altar where the Bow was kept. It is a well-established tradition that when one wants to pay respect or homage to some revered entity, such as a worshipped deity in a temple, he goes around it in a circle, a process called 'doing Parikrama' or circumambulation of the entity worshipped. This is a standard practice in all temples where a corridor is specially constructed around the sanctum sanctorum where the worshipped deity's idol is installed so that the worshipper can do this circumambulation.

Now, the Bow was Lord Shiva's, and hence it was worthy of greatest respect and honour. Going around it would help to reiterate that Janak has not the remotest intention to dishonour the mighty Bow of Lord Shiva by getting it broken. As we have read in the note to verse no. 5 above, this Bow was despised by all as it was a reminder of destruction unleashed when Shiva used it to vanquish Tripuraasur, his threatening to slay all the gods with it as they had insulted him by participating in Daksha Prajapat's fire sacrifice and accepting offerings when Shiva was neglected by the host, and more importantly as a sad reminder of Shiva's defeat in the confrontation with Lord Vishnu. So, no one liked the Bow; even Lord Shiva had despised it.

Therefore, no one would take offence when it is broken. It was old, decrepit, rusty and ugly to look at, and its reputation was mired by negativity throughout its existence. But inspite of all this, it was in Lord Shiva's hand once, and therefore it deserved respect. Hence, by going around it on the excuse of showing sage Vishwamitra the whole place, king Janak had indirectly paid his respects to the Bow, and in the process had made the sage, Lord Ram and Laxman pay this respect too. It's so wise of Janak.]

निज निज रुख रामहि सबु देखा । कोउ न जान कछु मरमु बिसेषा ॥ ७ ॥
भलि रचना मुनि नृप सन कहेऊ । राजाँ मुदित महासुख लहेऊ ॥ ८ ॥

nija nija rukha rāmahī sabu dēkhā. kō'u na jāna kachu maramu bisēṣā. 7.
bhali racanā muni nr̥pa sana kahē'ū. rājām̐ mudita mahāsukha lahē'ū. 8.

Everyone saw Lord Ram according to the conception he or she had of him. No one could realize the mystery of this miracle (as to how the same person can appear differently in countless forms to different people)<sup>1</sup>. (7)

The sage (Vishwamitra) expressed his satisfaction at the arrangements and appreciation for the king when he told the latter that the arena was indeed really well-planned and constructed. When the king learnt that the sage was pleased, he felt very happy and delighted<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This fact has already been described above from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 241—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 242.

Now, as far as the 'miracle of the Lord assuming so many forms simultaneously' is concerned, we shall read later on that when Lord Ram returned to Ayodhya from his forest exile after victory in the war of Lanka, all the citizens of Ayodhya were eager to personally embrace and welcome the Lord. There were not only hundreds or thousands of them, but many hundred-thousands of them wanting to express their love and affection to the Lord. At that time the same miracle happened—Lord Ram assumed as many forms as there were people. Each embraced him personally, thinking that he was the only person personally meeting the Lord. No one had realized then also the mystery of this magical phenomenon. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede Doha no. 6.

Well, the mystery is solved when we realize that Lord Ram was no ordinary human being but an incarnation or manifestation of Lord Vishnu, the supreme Lord of the world. The Lord has 'Maya', the power to create delusions, as one of his countless powers. And it was this Maya that was employed by the Lord to create the delusion that he is present in countless forms, meeting each individual separately.

The same thing has happened here. Lord Ram had employed his power of Maya to make the people see countless forms of his self according to the way they perceived him.

From the spiritual point of view this means that every devotee and worshipper sees the supreme Lord in the way he likes to see him, and the Lord obliges all of them by making himself available to them in the way they would like to adore and worship him. For instance, some see in him their Lord, others see him as their friend, still others as their Father and Mother or parent, and some as perceive the Lord as their Guru. The Lord obliges them all. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 130 where sage Valmiki lists them as their heart is the habitat of the Lord.

Besides this, Lord Ram is actually the Viraat Purush, the all-encompassing and cosmic form of the Supreme Being. Every single entity of creation, all living beings known as the Jiva, are his form. This cosmic conception of the Lord envisages that he has thousands of hands, legs, heads, eyes and mouths. Refer the note appended to Chaupai line nos. 1 and 4 that precede Doha no. 242. Hence it is no wonder that every onlooker saw the same image of the Lord differently according to his personal preference and conception.

Refer also to “Geetawali Ramayan” of Tulsidas, verse no. 64, stanza no. 4.

<sup>2</sup>The king felt delighted and happy because the sage had not shown any sort of resentment or anger at Janak for first having the temerity of organizing the breaking of Shiva’s Bow, and then having the audacity to take the sage around the arena to show-off his wealth and pomp. The sage was very wise and a practical man, and so he realized that the king has taken him around the venue as a token of welcome and respect as the host always takes his special guests around the venue of any great ceremony to show him the place personally.

The sage was happy that this walk also informed all those present, the citizens as well as the invited guests and the competing kings and princes that the real hero, Lord Ram, has come. Remember: Sage Vishwamitra was not an inconsequential sage or seer, for his greatness and mystical powers were world-famous. This was one of the other primary reasons for Janak taking the sage around the venue—so that all those present on the occasion could have a ‘Darshan’ or divine view of such a great sage. It would be a rare privilege for everyone present there. This privilege would be raised to new heights when the people would have the golden opportunity to see the two majestic princes, Lord Ram and Laxman, with him, fulfilling their wishes.]

दो०. सब मंचन्ह तें मंचु एक सुंदर बिसद बिसाल ।

मुनि समेत दोउ बंधु तहँ बैठारे महिपाल ॥ २४४ ॥

dōhā.

saba mañcanha tērṁ mañcu ēka sundara bisada bisāla.

muni samēta dō'u bandhu taham̐ baiṭhārē mahipāla. 244.

Of all the elevated seats constructed to seat invited guest, the king and princes along with their family members and ministers, one was specially high and magnificent to look at. The ‘Mahipaal’ (‘Mahi’ = land, earth; ‘Paal’ = its lord or caretaker; i.e. king Janak) seated the two brothers (Lord Ram and Laxman) alongside the sage (Vishwamitra) on this special seat. (Doha no. 244)

[Note—The seats were arranged in tiers, at greater height at the back and lower at the front so that everyone would have a clear view of the Bow. Now, the wise king knew that kings and princes do not come alone but are invariably accompanied by their ministers and courtiers. So, small raised platforms were constructed, each having a number of seats, so that a particular guest’s attendants and friends could sit alongside him.

A special seat was prepared for the sage and the two brothers. After doing the round of the venue, king Janak took them there and respectfully seated them.

Remember: The only exalted sage to attend the ceremony was sage Vishwamitra. So, the king had to show him special treatment to honour his exalted stature.]

चौ०. प्रभुहि देखि सब नृप हियँ हारे । जनु राकेस उदय भएँ तारे ॥ १ ॥
 असि प्रतीति सब के मन माहीं । राम चाप तोरब सक नाहीं ॥ २ ॥
 बिनु भंजेहुँ भव धनुषु बिसाला । मेलिहि सीय राम उर माला ॥ ३ ॥
 अस बिचारि गवनहु घर भाई । जसु प्रतापु बलु तेजु गवाई ॥ ४ ॥

caupāī.

prabhuhi dēkhi saba nrpa hiyam̐ hārē. janu rākēsa udaya bha'ēm̐ tārē. 1.
 asi pratīti saba kē mana māhīm. rāma cāpa tōraba saka nāhīm. 2.
 binu bhanjēhum̐ bhava dhanuṣu bisālā. mēlihi sīya rāma ura mālā. 3.
 asa bicāri gavanahu ghara bhā'ī. jasu pratāpu balu tēju gavām̐. 4.

When the kings who had arrived to participate in the competition to lift the Bow saw the Lord (Sri Ram), they lost their enthusiasm, became sad because they lost all hopes of victory, and as a consequence they felt crestfallen and became lack-lustre just like the stars look inconsequential when the full moon rises in the sky<sup>1</sup>. (1)

All of them (the competing kings and princes) were convinced in their Mana (heart and mind) that Lord Ram would definitely break the Bow; there is no doubt in it. (2).

But in the eventuality that Lord Ram desists from breaking the Bow (because he may not like to touch it out of reverence as it was Lord Shiva's Bow), then also Sita would put the victory garland around his neck (to declare her clear intentions of choosing him as her groom). (3)

(So they discussed the matter amongst themselves and advised each other, saying—) 'So brothers, it is better to go home (and avoid sure public humiliation) before it is too late and we lose our dignity, prestige and self-respect, before our famed strength, valour and glories are decimated, and we are subjected to immense public embarrassment and humiliation.<sup>2</sup>' (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 80, stanza no. 5 also. This idea has already been expressed by Laxman earlier in Baal Kand, Doha no. 238, albeit by referring to the sun instead of the full moon.

Again, this same idea is expressed by the narrator Tulsidas in Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 241 while describing the scene at the venue when Lord Ram had arrived there. See relevant notes appended to these verses.

<sup>2</sup>A pall of gloom had descended upon all the the kings and princes who had come to break the bow; they were dejected and hopeless. The aura of mystical powers, authority and invincibility that surrounded Lord Ram together with the fact that he was blessed, protected and patronized by the mighty sage Vishwamitra and was shown special attention by the host, king Janak, convinced all the kings and their attendants that it is useless and senseless to attempt to break the bow, and it would be wiser and prudent to desist from proving a fool of themselves.

They had already watched how the citizens of Janakpur were bowled-over and enthralled by the two brothers. So they deduced that if Sita wishes to put the garland around Lord Ram's neck to symbolize her decision to marry him, she would not only be supported by her father Janak but also by the entire citizenry of Janakpur. So in that case, if these kings tried to resist and raise an objection, they would be cornered and king Janak may order his huge army to imprison them. Remember: These invited kings and princes had not brought their armies along with them; they had not come prepared for a battle.

So, the wiser ones amongst them advised their friends that it is better to maintain their self-respect and dignity before it is too late to preserve it. It is better to return home and make an excuse, something like saying—‘We have come just to oblige king Janak who had sent us an invitation. We came here to witness this great event when his daughter is to be married. This is a polite and courteous call to thank king Janak for sending us an invitation to attend his daughter's marriage. We had no intention at all to participate in the competition to break the bow. We respect Lord Shiva, and would never imagine of ever attempting to break the Lord's Bow.’

This formula will help them to save their faces from sure disgrace, humiliation and infamy. This is the right time to back-out.

In Tulsidas' book “Janki Mangal”, verse no. 57 it is said that the kings lost hope because they felt that king Janak would break his own vow and choose Lord Ram as the groom for his daughter Sita. In verse no. 58 it is said that the good kings amongst the group said that it would be alright if Janak does so, as Lord Ram is the appropriate groom for Sita.

In Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 256 we find that Sita's mother has lamented at the decision of sage Vishwamitra at ordering Lord Ram to go and break the Bow. She tells her companion—“Will anyone advise the Guru (sage Vishwamitra) that it is highly unwise to allow the tender prince to try his hand at the bow because he is still a boy and not a fully grown adult. Why, even the formidable king of demons, Ravana, and another mighty demon named Banasur (pronounced as “Bānāsūr”) had not dared to touch the bow out of fear of certain defeat. All other kings too got defeated even though they had all boasted that they would break it like it was a lotus stem. Why then does the sage allow this boy of a delicate frame (body) to do something that is bound to humiliate him? Can a young swan ever lift the mighty mountain known as Mt. Mandara? What has happened to the wisdom of the king (Janak); has his mind taken leave of him? ”

This means that the queen would have preferred that since no other competitor has been able to lift and break the bow, let Sita be now married to the prince of her choice. After all, no king or prince could raise an objection now because equal opportunity was given to all of them, but they all failed the test. Now, Janak is morally free to marry Sita in the way he thinks fit for her future happiness.

Remember: The citizens have also been thinking on this line already. This fact is stated in Tulsidas' book “Geetawali Ramayan” in its Baal Kand, verse nos. 70.]

बिहसे अपर भूप सुनि बानी । जे अबिबेक अंध अभिमानी ॥ ५ ॥

तोरेहुँ धनुषु ब्याहु अवगाहा । बिनु तोरें को कुअँरि बिआहा ॥ ६ ॥

एक बार कालउ किन होऊ । सिय हित समर जितब हम सोऊ ॥ ७ ॥

यह सुनि अवर महिप मुसुकाने । धरमसील हरिभगत सयाने ॥ ८ ॥

bihasē apara bhūpa suni bānī. jē abibēka andha abhimānī. 5.
tōrēhum dhanuṣu byāhu avagāhā. binu tōrēm kō ku'amri bi'āhā. 6.
ēka bāra kāla'u kina hō'ū. siya hita samara jītaba hama sō'ū. 7.
yaha suni avara mahipa musukānē. dharamasīla haribhagata sayānē. 8.

But not all kings were wise and prudent. Some were exceptionally foolish, being blinded by arrogance and a false sense of pride and ego. They laughed derisively and rebuked those who had advised them to desist from attempting to break the bow. Such haughty kings said arrogantly—(5)

—‘Marriage is a distant dream because first the bow has to be broken. How can anyone even dream of marrying the princess without breaking the bow? (6)

Even if Kaal (the god of death) comes to interfere and we have to fight with him, then we will defeat him and obtain victory in order to marry Sita.<sup>1</sup> (7)

Hearing the rant and the arrogant words of irreverent and haughty kings, the wise kings who believed in following the laws of Dharma (probity and propriety; good conduct and thinking; taking any action after duly considering all the pros and cons)*, and who were devotees of Lord Hari (Vishnu), were dismayed even as they smiled sarcastically and wryly at them (at the stupidity of these belligerent and haughty kings, and the way they are voluntarily inviting sure ridicule upon themselves)<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The haughty kings were answering the wise king’s advice. The latter had said that Sita would put the victory garland around Lord Ram’s neck even if he does not break the bow. Refer: Chaupai line no. 3 just above these present Chaupais.

These arrogant kings took this as an affront to their ego and dignity. They decided that if they drew back it would be tantamount to accepting defeat even without a chance to try their might and luck, something which was unpalatable for their inflated ego. They were livid at the suggestion that they should give up their claim, which was like accepting defeat even without a fight.

They declared in one voice that they were ready to fight it out and wage a war if they are prevented from lifting and breaking the bow, and if any attempt is made to marry Sita to Lord Ram by circumventing this condition that she would be married to anyone who breaks the bow then what to talk of human beings, they would defeat the ‘god of death’ known as Kaal himself in a battle that is sure to ensue. In fact, we read a little later that when the kings had failed to move the bow and it was finally broken by Lord Ram, all these envious kings, driven by jealousy and hate, rose up in revolt, threatening to wage a war and capturing the two brothers, and even king Janak if he tried to protect them: Refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precedes Doha no. 266.

These verses show the delicate and sensitive nature of the situation. And this also shows how impractical it was for Janak to marry Sita to Lord Ram at this late juncture. There was full certainty of a revolt by the invited kings and princes, and even if Janak succeeded in subduing them as they were within his realm and lacked the support of a full-fledged army, the repercussions would be horrific. When these kings returned home with a sullen face and angry at being denied an opportunity to break the bow and marry Sita, there were fair chances they all of them would team together to jointly collect a huge army to attack and plunder Janakpur, inviting unimaginable horrors for its innocent citizens.

Remember: Janakpur was a prosperous kingdom, and it would be laid to waste by attacking armies of angry kings who would be smarting from insult and humiliation meted out to them by Janak if he clandestinely somehow managed to prevent them from making their attempt to break the bow and marry Sita. Hence, in spite of his internal wish to make this union happen, he could not do it.

<sup>2</sup>The wise kings had guessed that if the two brothers were accompanied by the exalted sage Vishwamitra, who by all accounts was showing extra affection for them, then they are sure to be of noble birth and followers of Dharma, the laws of good conduct and manners.

Then when they saw Sita they observed that she was very young, and not at all suitable for kings or princes much older in age than her. The only candidate that matched her age was Lord Ram. Though Laxman too fit the bill, but these wise kings were intelligent enough to deduce that out of the two brothers, Lord Ram was elder. This is because they observed that Lord Ram was always a step ahead of Laxman who was always behind him as the two brothers accompanied sage Vishwamitra while he was being shown around the venue by king Janak. The law of proper conduct and thinking says that one must not marry a girl too young in age as compared to oneself as this would be a misfit match and unethical. If one insists on this marriage then he is sure to be a lustful, greedy and selfish man as he has no bother to respect the girl's wishes and only wants to satisfy his own passions and gratify his sensual urges.

We have already read earlier that devotees of Lord Hari had seen their Lord in the form of the two brothers—refer: Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 242. Some of the invited kings were devotees of Lord Hari. So, amongst the assembled kings there were many who worshipped Lord Hari as their patron deity, and when they observed that they had a vision of Hari in the form of the two brothers the immediately decided that there was some mystery in this vision and it would be best for them to act prudently and avoid taking any step that would directly or indirectly cause offense to their Lord Hari. These were the kings this present verse is referring to.

There is one very important reason to delineate the 'good kings' from the others. These 'good kings' are honoured as being observers of the law of Dharma, while the rest as being reckless, egoist and selfish. We shall read in Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 251 below that when individual kings failed to move the bow, ten thousand kings proceeded to lift the bow together! Imagine the horrible consequences for Sita if they had managed to lift and break the bow. She would have to become a 'wife of ten thousand husbands', an absurd proposition and most ridiculous. These mad kings did not think even twice before deciding to lift the bow together in such huge numbers, violating all norms of decency and ethics. That is why all the kings who attempted to lift the bow and who had arrogantly said that no one can marry Sita without breaking the bow, are deemed to be against the laws of Dharma.

*Let us now examine the qualities of these three groups of kings carefully.

(i) The first group consisted of those kings who preferred to abstain from lifting the bow as they guessed that Janak, the host and the father of Sita, has already decided to marry her to Lord Ram and therefore it is wiser and prudent not to enter into any confrontation on a foreign soil for the sake of a girl. A wise king is one who knows when to make a strategic retreat and when to fight; he is able to judge the prevailing condition correctly and decide what is good and what is not for his future welfare and self-respect. In other words, such kings are not pretentious, egoist, arrogant, blinded by recklessness and driven by greed.

Further, they had also heard that Sita was of a very young age, much younger than them. So it would be unethical and immoral to marry a girl who was of an age that their daughters would have been.

This group of kings (described in Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 245) were the wise kings and dominated by the 'Raja Guna' as they could think intelligently and wisely as what to do and what not to. The word 'king' translates into 'Raja' in Hindi, and the word 'Guna' means the inherent qualities of an entity (a person or thing) that is most characteristic of it. Hence, this common noun 'Raja' perfectly suits such kings.

(ii) The second group of kings (described in Chaupai line nos. 5-7 that precede Doha no. 245) was driven by negative qualities of ego, pride, arrogance, vanity and haughtiness. These are dark qualities in a man which eclipses his intelligence and wisdom. Such a man becomes blind to realities and is driven by greed and lust. These qualities are known as 'Tama Guna' or dark qualities. Hence, those kings who were arrogant and determined to have Sita even if this means blood-shed were Tama Guna dominated kings. Such people always face ignominy and degradation.

(iii) Finally, the third category of kings (described from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 245—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 246) was one which worshipped Lord Hari, was god-fearing and ethical. The kings of this group decided that it would be extremely immoral to marry a girl who is of an age that their daughters would be, and when they saw Lord Ram as an image of Lord Hari they decided that Sita was none else but the divine consort of the Lord, known as the Mother Goddess or 'Jagdambika'. They have made this observation abundantly clear below in Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 246.

Hence, this group was both "Dharamsheel" (followers of laws of Dharma) as well as "Hari-bhakta" (devotees of Lord Hari or Lord Vishnu). These kings had the 'Sata Guna' as the dominant characteristic.]

सो०. सीय बिआहबि राम गरब दूरि करि नृपन्ह के ।

जीति को सक संग्राम दसरथ के रन बाँकुरे ॥ २४५ ॥

sōraṭhā.

sīya bi'āhabī rāma garaba dūri kari nṛpanha kē.

jīti kō saka saṅgrāma dasaratha kē rana bām'kurē. 245.

[The wise amongst the assembled kings thought themselves inwardly as follows as they tried their best to persuade the defiant kings and princes so that they can come to their senses and see the light of reason in these words—]

'Lord Ram would definitely marry Sita and thereby vanquish the haughtiness and arrogance of these (foolish) kings. Say, who can defeat the invincible and valiant sons of king Dasrath in a battle? (Doha no. 245)

[Note—Well, the "battle" here is 'who manages to break the bow and marry Sita'. All the kings were pitted against each other in this 'royal battle'; every one of them was vying to break the bow first and push the competitor behind because the first person to break the bow would be able to marry Sita. If the chance is lost, it is lost for good.

These kings had a false sense of strength and invincibility. So the wise kings decided that their ego and arrogance would be trounced the moment Lord Ram breaks the bow and marries Sita. In this battle for breaking the bow and acquiring Sita as the trophy, who would stand a chance, individually or collectively, against Lord Ram?

Remember: Lord Ram belonged to a family of kings who were so powerful that they provided support to even Indra, the king of gods—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 25. Therefore these ordinary kings and princes stood no chance of winning any battle for Sita if the things come to such a pass that a battle has to be actually fought for her. This talk that “we will defeat even Kaal” is merely big-mouthed boast.

There was a very important development round this time which convinced the good and wise kings that it is “certain that Lord Ram would be the one who would finally win and marry Sita”. What was this development, and how did these kings get a clear hint of things to come? Well, a little later we shall read that “the gods who had assembled in the sky to watch the spectacle, and they showered flowers on Lord Ram and Laxman” exclusively in the large gathering of kings and princes. If the gods showered flowers on Lord Ram to the exclusion of others it was a clear signal that they all favoured the Lord over the rest of the competitors. And anyone whom the gods favour is sure to win and succeed in any enterprise. The showering of flowers was very clear to all those present, but only the wise kings could decipher its implications on the outcome of the competition. The showering of the flowers by the gods settled the matter for good—that the victorious competitor would be Lord Ram. Refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 246 that appears below.]

चौ०. व्यर्थ मरहु जनि गाल बजाई । मन मोदकन्हि कि भूख बुताई ॥ १ ॥

सिख हमारी सुनि परम पुनीता । जगदंबा जानहु जियँ सीता ॥ २ ॥

जगत पिता रघुपतिहि बिचारी । भरि लोचन छबि लेहु निहारी ॥ ३ ॥

caupāī.

byartha marahu jani gāla bajāī. mana mōdakanhi ki bhūkha butāī. 1.

sikha hamāri suni parama punītā. jagadambā jānahu jiyam̐ sītā. 2.

jagata pitā raghupatihi bicārī. bhari lōcana chabi lēhu nihārī. 3.

[Presently, the good and reasonable kings spoke to their peers in a last ditch attempt to persuade them to abandon their recklessness and foolish attitude as follows—]

‘Do not unnecessarily brag arrogantly and die (i.e. be defeated, face ignominy and humiliation as well as ridicule) for a cause that makes no sense at all. Say, can anyone’s hunger be satiated with imaginary sweets?’<sup>1</sup> (1)

Listen to our advice (‘sikha’) which is impartial, based on purity of thought and emotions, and is judicious, prudent and uncorrupted by any personal vested interest (‘punītā’). [That is, don’t misunderstand us when we try to dissuade you from trying to lift and break the bow in the belief that we are taking sides with Janak or have been somehow under his influence, or that we have devised some cunning device by which we would first deter you from tackling the bow and then Janak will find some excuse to let us marry Sita. Perish the evil thought; there is no such cunning and conceit in our mind. What we advise you is in good faith and in all honesty of opinion.]

Regard Sita in your heart as being none else but the Mother of the world (‘jagadambā’) herself personified. (2)

Similarly, treat Lord Ram as the Father of the world (‘jagata pitā’). [In other words, they are divine couples whose union is eternal. They are eternally united with each other as Lord Ram is a manifestation of the Supreme Lord of creation, and Sita is the Lord’s divine consort known as Mother Goddess.]

Hence, you must all enjoy this moment and make the most out of this rare and golden opportunity to fill your eyes with this divine and holy sight that is most magnificent and beautiful to behold (instead of being foolish, and not only missing this once-in-a-lifetime opportunity but also proving yourselves stupid and ridiculous by attempting to act smart and interfering with something that is inevitable in the scheme of things predestined by the Creator)<sup>2</sup>. (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The honourable and god-fearing kings tried their best to prevail upon the arrogant kings to see reason and not create a piquant situation from which there was no going back without losing dignity and self-respect. By comparing their determination to marry Sita with trying to satisfy one’s hunger by eating imaginary sweets these noble and virtuous Sata Guna kings advised their Tama Guna dominated compatriots that they should not be stupid and make a joke of themselves, that they should act wisely as their chances of breaking the bow and marrying Sita was no better than an attempt to fill one’s stomach with imaginary food.

This talk that they would fight and kill Kaal (god of death) to marry Sita if he interfered (Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 245) was nothing but mere boast as Kaal does not spare even the gods all of whom would have to die one day at the end of one cycle of creation, though their life-span is huge when compared to the life of ordinary mortals on earth.

Refer also to “Janki Mangal”, verse no. 60 wherein the good kings had ridiculed those who were arrogant by saying—“Aren’t you all ashamed of yourselves; you fellows don’t have the guts to look up directly eye-to-eye at Lord Ram, and inspite of it you boast so much. You already feel so inferior, so why do you plan to subject yourselves to further humiliation and ridicule, inviting shame and proving yourselves utterly stupid?”

<sup>2</sup>The wise kings reprimanded the pervert kings: “Oh you utter fools! Say, why don’t you all enjoy, rejoice in and delight at the wonderful, the most fascinating, the beguiling and appealing sight of the two lovely brothers sitting on either side of the sage, a scene that you will never see again not only in this life but also in thousands of lives in your future? Wouldn’t you feel ashamed of yourselves and regret later on if you let this chance slip by from your hands out of pretentious sense of false greatness, majesty and superiority arising out of your ignorance and arrogance.”]

सुंदर सुखद सकल गुन रासी । ए दोउ बंधु संभु उर बासी ॥ ४ ॥

सुधा समुद्र समीप बिहाई । मृगजलु निरखि मरहु कत धाई ॥ ५ ॥

sundara sukhada sakala guna rāsī. ē dō'u bandhu sambhu ura bāsī. 4.
sudhā samudra samīpa bihāī. mṛgajalu nirakhi marahu kata dhāī. 5.

These two handsome and charming brothers are embodiments of magnificent virtues and bestowers of bliss and happiness. They live in the heart of Lord Shiva<sup>1</sup>. (4)

Why would anyone (be stupid enough to) discard an ocean of nectar ('Sudhaa Samudra') which is very near, and instead run behind a mirage (seen in the hot desert) in search of water (to quench his thirst)<sup>2</sup>? (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>How do we know that they (Lord Ram and Laxman) live in the heart of Shiva? Well, it is Shiva himself who requests the Lord to live in his heart—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chanda stanza no. 4, line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 115. This is the occasion when Lord Shiva has come to offer his prayers to Lord Ram after the victory at Lanka over the demon king Ravana. Lord Shiva requested Lord Ram—"Oh Lord, my request is that you should live in my heart along with your younger brother (Laxman) and Janki (Sita)."

This verse has a profound implication. Since "the two divine brothers, Lord Ram and Laxman, live in the heart of Lord Shiva", it implies that they are very dear to Shiva, and also that they know the internal wish and thoughts of Shiva. This translates into practical terms to mean that Shiva will never oppose Lord Ram's wish to break his bow. Remember: Lord Shiva is also not very happy with this bow as it reminds him of a past incident when it let him (Shiva) down during a confrontation with Vishnu. So, Shiva would want that this constant reminder of his inferiority to Vishnu is destroyed forever, and if this makes his beloved Lord Ram happy and serves the latter's purpose, nothing can be better. Both Lord Shiva and Lord Ram would be equally happy!

Therefore, when Lord Ram decided to go and break the bow he was not, in any way at all, either confronting Shiva or insulting the latter. There was a subtle mutual understanding between them that it should be done. This is also the reason why sage Parashuram, who had come angrily to punish anyone who had dared to break Lord Shiva's bow as the Lord was his patron deity, could not harm Lord Ram in spite of all his jumping around madly, and his angry words threatening to kill the person who had dared to break the bow came to a naught.

<sup>2</sup>This verse is a sort of rebuke for the unwise kings. Why should they run around trying to find happiness and joy in life in a distant and illusive future when the same happiness and joy is available right now? Do they think that by merely marrying Sita they would get happiness? It is absolutely uncertain, and in fact it proved otherwise for Lord Ram too.

Remember: It was Sita's abduction by Ravana that led to so much misery for Lord Ram in the forest, making him wonder in the dense forest in her search, collecting a motley army of monkeys and bears to launch an assault on her captors which culminated in the destructive war of Lanka and a lot of bloodshed. Even after returning to Ayodhya and being crowned its king, a time came when, due to certain events, the Lord had to abandon Sita himself and be separated from her till the end of his life on earth. Both Sita and Lord Ram had suffered in the end of their lives on this earth, and it was never a story of a happy ending which read something like "---and they lived happily ever after".

In other words, the view that if these kings managed to marry Sita they would find happiness is just a pipe dream like attempting to quench thirst by pursuing the mirage in search of water. Instead, why don't they enjoy the present?]

करहु जाइ जा कहूँ जोइ भावा । हम तौ आजु जनम फलु पावा ॥ ६ ॥
 अस कहि भले भूप अनुरागे । रूप अनूप बिलोकन लागे ॥ ७ ॥
 देखहिं सुर नभ चढ़े बिमाना । बरषहिं सुमन करहिं कल गाना ॥ ८ ॥ karahu jā'i jā kahum̐ jō'i bhāvā. hama tau āju janama phalu pāvā. 6.

 asa kahi bhalē bhūpa anurāgē. rūpa anūpa bilōkana lāgē. 7.
 dēkhahim̐ sura nabha caṛhē bimānā. baraṣahim̐ sumana karahim̐ kala gānā.
 8.

Do whatever you like. As far as we<sup>1</sup> are concerned, we feel that today we have been given the fruit (reward) of taking birth in this life. [In other words, we feel very glad that we were invited to Janakpur to witness this divine marriage between Lord Ram and Sita in front of our eyes. We would have missed this golden chance otherwise.]<sup>2</sup>
 (6)

Saying this, the honourable and good kings were filled with affection (for their beloved Lord) and took great pleasure in watching the magnificent beauty of the image of the two brothers (as well as the spectacle that unfolded before their eyes). (7)

The gods rode their air-planes and watched the proceedings from the sky. They showered flowers and sang melodious songs (to celebrate the occasion)<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word “we” refers to the third category of honourable and wise kings who are trying to make the unwise and arrogant kings see reason.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 68, stanza no. 12; and verse no. 84, stanza no. 5 also.

<sup>3</sup>The gods have showered flowers now when Lord Ram and Laxman arrived and took their seats at the venue. The gods would shower flowers once again when Sita arrives at the scene—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 248.

Remember: Showering of flowers is a gesture showing extreme happiness and a warm welcome. Flowers are showered on auspicious occasions. Thus, the gods were exhibiting their happiness at the occasion when their Lord Vishnu, who has assumed the form of a human being as Lord Ram to fulfill their wish to come down to earth and kill their tormentor Ravana, the king of demons, is getting married to goddess Laxmi, the eternal consort of the Lord, who has manifested herself as Sita.

Refer note to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 245 heretofore.]

दो०. जानि सुअवसरु सीय तब पठई जनक बोलाइ । चतुर सखीं सुंदर सकल सादर चलीं लवाइ ॥ २४६ ॥

dōhā.

jāni su'avasarū sīya taba paṭha'ī janaka bōlā'i.

catura sakhīm sundara sakala sādara calīm lavā'i. 246.

Finding that the time was appropriate, Janak sent a message to call Sita to the venue. Sita's friends or companions who were wise and accomplished as well as wonderful to look at escorted her gracefully to the venue. (Doha no. 246)

[Note—The companions of Sita have invariably been depicted as being clever, wise and intelligent as they were mature enough to guide her and give her moral support during this crucial phase of her life. These companions knew how to deal with sticky situations should they arise, and how to guard Sita from any pitfalls in which she might fall or errors she might commit due to nervousness or mere ignorance and lack of experience.

Refer also to: (a) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 228 when Sita was brought to the temple of Parvati in the royal garden to offer prayers; and (ii) Doha no. 263 when Sita was escorted by clever companions to the spot where Lord Ram stood after breaking the bow to help Sita put the victory garland around the neck of the Lord.

(b) Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 84, stanza no. 6.

(c) Janaki Mangal, Chanda 10 and verse nos. 81-82.]

चौ०. सिय सोभा नहिं जाइ बखानी । जगदंबिका रूप गुन खानी ॥ १ ॥

उपमा सकल मोहि लघु लागीं । प्राकृत नारि अंग अनुरागीं ॥ २ ॥

सिय बरनिअ तेइ उपमा देई । कुकबि कहाइ अजसु को लेई ॥ ३ ॥

caupā'ī.

siya sōbhā nahīm jā'i bakhānī. jagadambikā rūpa guna khānī. 1.

upamā sakala mōhi laghu lāgīm. prākṛta nāri aṅga anurāgīm. 2.

siya barani'a tē'i upamā dē'ī. kukabi kahā'i ajasu kō lē'ī. 3.

[Tulsidas says—] The lovely sight of Sita was so fabulous and enthralling that it cannot be described in words. She was none other than 'Jagdambika', the Mother of the world, and a living embodiment of beauty and charm, as well as all the good virtues and manners that exist<sup>1</sup>. (1)

All metaphors and comparisons (that can be employed to describe Sita's divine and sublime beauty) look inapt or unfit to me (and if I dare to do it then it would undermine the dignity and honour of the Mother of the world, and would be tantamount to committing a moral sin).

All such worldly comparisons and metaphors may apply to and suit women of the mortal world (but surely not to Jagdambika, the Mother Goddess of the world). (2)

Say therefore, who will take this grave risk of attempting to employ metaphors and similes to describe Sita's beauty and charm indirectly, and acquiring the ignominy and infamy of being an incompetent poet (or a bad and incompetent narrator of events)?<sup>2</sup> (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: (i) Kavitawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 15; and (ii) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 246 and its accompanying note.

Remember: It is against decency and proper conduct to describe in graphic detail the physical beauty and features of a woman, and if she is a young girl just about to be married and deemed to be a goddess in a personified form than this restriction is all the more important to observe. This is clearly stated by Tulsidas in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 103 where it is said about Lord Shiva and his divine consort Parvati “Shambhu (Shiva) and Bhavaani (Parvati) are the Father and Mother of this creation (world, universe); I will not say anything (i.e. keep silent) about their physical beauty and attractiveness or the way they dressed and behaved to charm each other”.

But this strict restriction applies only to the physical description of females and not so much to males subject to the condition that certain basic principles of etiquette and decency are maintained. This is the reason why Tulsidas has described the physical beauty of the images of Lord Ram and Laxman as they entered the venue of the bow ceremony in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 243—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 244.

So Tulsidas suffices by saying that “Sita’s beauty was so great that it is not possible to describe it”. A similar idea is expressed in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 100 in the context of goddess Parvati where it is said “the beauty of the Mother of the world was so immense that even with countless bodies (persons) attempting to describe it simultaneously, it would not be possible to do so”.

<sup>2</sup>These two verses, nos. 2 and 3, answer the possible query that may rise in the mind of the reader that though it’s alright not to directly describe the physical features of a lady, but indirect means such as metaphors and comparisons can be employed to give an idea of how wonderful she looked.

So, Tulsidas answers it: nothing that is known or even imagined in one’s dream is as charming, beautiful and magnificent as the image of Sita. So it would be absolutely wrong and utterly incompetent for an honest narrator to cite similes and metaphors that do not fit in perfectly, or at least close enough with the actual scene. Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 238 where even Lord Ram has surmised that it would be incorrect and wrong to compare the beauty of Sita’s face with the moon which is normally and universally used by even established poets as a metaphor for beauty, charm and loveliness.

In the following verses, Tulsidas explains why he has himself desisted from describing Sita’s beauty and charm by using comparison with other known entities.]

जौं पटतरिअ तीय सम सीया । जग असि जुबति कहाँ कमनीया ॥ ४ ॥

गिरा मुखर तन अरध भवानी । रति अति दुखित अतनु पति जानी ॥ ५ ॥

jauṁ paṭatari'a tīya sama sīyā. jaga asi jubati kahām'kamanīyā. 4.

girā mukhara tana aradha bhavānī. rati ati dukhita atanu pati jānī. 5.

If I compare Sita with other women of this mortal world (overlooking for a moment the fact that she is no one else but the Mother of the world known as 'Jagdambika'), then say, where is a woman who is as beguilingly beautiful, charming and lovely as Sita in this world? [Hence, it would be a wrong comparison, and I don't want to invite ridicule by doing it.]<sup>1</sup> (4)

Goddess Saraswati speaks too much (as she is the patron goddess of speech and knowledge which needs someone to speak to spread this knowledge). [Comparing Sita with Saraswati would be wrong because Sita keeps quiet most of the time as opposed to Saraswati who is very talkative.]<sup>2</sup>

Bhavaani (goddess Parvati, the divine consort of Lord Shiva) is also not an appropriate comparison as she has only a half-body. [Lord Shiva is depicted in the Purans as being an "Ardha-Narishwar" or half male and half female. In this dual form of the Lord, the right side of the body is that of a male symbolizing Lord Shiva, and the left side is like a female and it represents goddess Parvati.]<sup>3</sup>

Rati (the wife of Kamdeo or cupid)) remains perpetually in grief as her husband has lost his physical body ("Atanu") (and had to live in an invisible form as the emotions of love, desires and passions that have their seats in a living being's heart). [Thus, Rati is deprived of the pleasure and comfort that a married woman gets by in the physical company of her beloved husband.]<sup>4</sup> (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>After declaring that it is not possible to compare Sita with any female of the mortal world, Tulsidas now cites some well-known goddesses in the heaven and then concludes that none of them is a proper comparison for Sita because of their shortcomings.

<sup>2</sup>Goddess Saraswati is the obvious first choice as she is the wisest amongst the gods and the goddesses in heaven. But she has a drawback: being the patron goddess of speech and knowledge she has to speak continuously in myriad languages and uncountable dialects. In this world, someone or the other is always speaking round the clock, and this is attributed to Saraswati because it is she that enables any living being to utter any sound or word.

Though she is the presiding deity for knowledge and wisdom which requires the spoken word to be spread in the world at large and made known to others, but being the goddess of speech she is equally responsible for good words that are spoken as well as for evil and uncouth words, polite words as well as boasts, and so on. So, she is corrupted and not free from taints.

On the contrary, Sita speaks little, politely and softly. She never uses cuss words and never swears or shouts at anyone angrily. Therefore this comparison would be absolutely wrong.

<sup>3</sup>Parvati and Shiva have been depicted together as "Ardha-Narishwar", meaning the Lord whose form consists of half male and half female. Metaphysically this refers to the supreme Brahm, the Supreme Being who is deemed the primary Male, and his Shakti, his dynamic cosmic powers that is deemed the primary Female. They are inseparable from one another; one is incomplete without the other. In order to create, Brahm needed his Shakti, his dynamic powers to create, and hence these two aspects of creation—the Creator and his powers to create that are integral to him—are depicted iconographically in the form of the "Ardha-Narishwar".

In Hinduism, a wife occupies the left side of her husband. Hence, Parvati is the ‘left half’ of Lord Shiva—meaning that: (i) if one were to worship either of them then the other half is deemed included in this worship; (ii) one must not distinguish between Shiva representing Brahm, and Parvati representing Shakti of Brahm; and that (iii) Brahm without his Shakti and vice versa are as meaningless as a body that is sawn from the middle into two halves.

Now, an interesting question arises—when did they separate? Well, when Brahm decided to actually start the process of creation, he had to use his Shakti that was an inseparable and integral part of his own ‘self’. So Brahm conceived of Maya or delusions that would give the impression that Brahm and his creation are separate entities as he wanted to make the forthcoming creation self-sustaining after the initial phase of creation. This means that the world should be given powers to keep itself replicating and moving forward on its own with the thought that ‘it can do this and that on its own’. Hence, ‘Brahm used his power of creating delusions, or ‘Maya’, to give the impression that ‘Shakti’, which is otherwise Brahm’s integral part, is separate from him. It is this ‘Shakti’ of Brahm that acts as the hidden dynamo that powers the world and keeps it rolling perpetually.

So we see clearly that at the point of time in the distant past when the process of creation was first initiated by the Supreme Being, this Shakti appeared to separate itself from Brahm under the influence of Brahm’s own Maya.

Coming to our present context of the mortal world, it is incongruous and ridiculous to even imagine of a person who is half male and half female. Even the gods and goddesses in the developed heaven do not have such an odd and irregular body. Though goddess Parvati as we know her and whose form is worshipped in temples has an independent body, but primarily in her ancient and original form she had a ‘half body’, the other being that of Shiva. But this form is not meant for the viewers of the mortal world who see Lord Shiva and Parvati as separate divine Beings. Sita lives in this world, but her primary form is that of Laxmi, the divine consort of Lord Vishnu. Laxmi is depicted in the Purans as having a well-built and attractive form as she is the patron goddess of wealth and prosperity.

Therefore, no comparison can be made between Sita whose primary form is goddess Laxmi, and Parvati whose primary form is the left half of Ardha-Narishwar.

<sup>4</sup>The story of how Kamdeo (cupid) lost his physical body, and on the plea of his wife Rati was converted into an invisible form as the emotions of love, passions, desires and lust that lives in the heart of all living beings is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 82—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 88.

Briefly it is this: Kamdeo was sent by the gods to disturb the meditation of Lord Shiva so that he can be married to Parvati and beget a son who would kill the demon Taarakaasur. When Kamdeo managed to break Shiva’s meditative trance, the latter opened his third eye located in the center of his forehead. Fire spewed out from it, and in his anger Shiva burnt Kamdeo to ashes for disturbing him. Rati, the wife of Kamdeo, was crestfallen, dismayed and aggrieved as Kamdeo had no personal animosity with Shiva due to which he would disturb the latter, but had done so at the request of the gods. So the punishment of burning him to ashes was misplaced and miscarriage of justice. So she came lamenting and grieving to Shiva and pleaded with the Lord to restore her husband. The merciful Shiva’s anger meanwhile vanished, and he realized that Kamdeo was actually not at fault. So the Lord blessed Rati that henceforth her husband will become eternal in the sense that he will live perpetually in the heart of all living beings of this creation, and that included not only the mortal creatures but the gods too, in a subtle form in their hearts as 'Kaam' or the virtue of desire, love, passion and wants.

Rati wasn't satisfied. She wished to have the company of her husband in physical form. So Shiva blessed her that in the next era of the celestial cycle, known as the 'Dwapar Yuga', her husband would become the son of Lord Krishna, an incarnation of Lord Vishnu that followed that of Lord Ram who was on earth in the previous era known as Treta Yuga, and then she would be married to him to regain her husband once again in physical form.

But our story relates to the 'Treta Yuga', because the 'Dwapar Yuga' was far away in the future. Therefore, at the present point of time Rati was suffering from the agony of separation from her husband Kamdeo (cupid). This is the story that is being referred to in this comparison of Rati with Sita. Sita's husband would have a physical form and live in her close proximity during her life, but Rati has lost physical contact with her husband Kamdeo who lives in an invisible form in the heart as the emotions collectively known as 'Kaam'.

Hence, this comparison is also not apt.]

बिष बारुनी बंधु प्रिय जेही । कहिअ रमासम किमि बैदेही ॥ ६ ॥
जौं छबि सुधा पयोनिधि होई । परम रूपमय कच्छपु सोई ॥ ७ ॥
सोभा रजु मंदरु सिंगारू । मथै पानि पंकज निज मारू ॥ ८ ॥

biṣa bārunī bandhu priya jēhī. kahi'a ramāsama kimi baidēhī. 6.

jaum̐ chabi sudhā payōnidhi hōī. parama rūpamaya kacchapu sōī. 7.

sōbhā raju mandaru siṅgārū. mathai pāni paṅkaja nija mārū. 8.

How can one dare to compare Vaidehi (Sita) with Rama (goddess Laxmi) who loves to have 'Visha' (poison) and 'Baaruni' (wine; an intoxicating drink) as her brothers<sup>1</sup>. (6)

[After having said that 'Rama' or Laxmi who was produced by churning the sour ocean is not an apt comparison with Sita, Tulsidas now goes on to say which 'Rama' would be more suitable for this comparison.

Verse nos. 7-8 and Doha no. 247 that follow them are to be read together to make sense of what is being said here.]

Supposing there is an ocean of nectar in which the virtues of beauty and magnificence are dissolved (instead of salt and other corroding elements in the ocean that was churned by the gods and the demons to produce Rama earlier), and in it is present a tortoise who is a living embodiment of magnificent beauty and charm (instead of the ugly tortoise that supported the Mandrachal from sinking into the nether world in the earlier case when the ocean was churned by the gods and demons). (7)

The rope used to churn this ocean is made of the virtues of attractiveness, charm, splendour and radiance, and the churning rod itself is the sentiments of love and glamour condensed in the form of a mountain representing Mt. Mandrachal. The churning in this case is done by Kamdeo (cupid), the patron deity of love, beauty and charm who is the most attractive and bewitching god in this creation (instead of the inferior gods and the ugly demons earlier). (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Rama is another name for goddess Laxmi, the patron deity of wealth and material prosperity. Though she has all other good virtues but there is a problem with her—and it is that she has two siblings who are her brothers, and like any sister she loves them. These two brothers are ‘poison’ and ‘wine or any sort of intoxicating drink’. How did this happen?

The story goes that when the gods and the demons had churned the celestial ocean in search of Amrit (nectar of eternity and bliss), many things were produced besides Amrit. The worst thing that was produced was an exceptionally corrosive liquid known as the ‘Halaal’ which was the strongest poison known.

‘Baaruni’, literally the liquid that is like water but is extremely intoxicating like distilled spirit (liquor), was another thing that was produced during the churning.

Amongst the other products that were ‘Dhanwantari’, the medicine man of the gods, the ‘Kaamdheni’ cow, a horse, the conch known as ‘Shankha’, the elephant known as the ‘Gaja’, the gem known as the ‘Mani’, the evergreen tree that gives anything desired and known as the ‘Kalpataru’, the celestial voluptuous nymph named ‘Rambhaa’ who was personified beauty and aroused lust by her mere presence, ‘Rama’ who had the pot of gold and a lotus in her hand who would be the future patron deity of wealth and prosperity, and ‘Amrit’, the elixir of eternity and bliss.

Rama’s association with all, except Amrit, by the virtue of their birth from the same source and at the same time made her tainted in some way or the other. For instance, to have a killer drink known as Halaal poison is not something laudable, as is to be closely related to something that is intoxicating such as Baaruni. These were the worst produce of the ocean, and hence Tulsidas has cited only these two. But if we go a little further we find that none of the siblings of Rama are worthy of praise. Let us see how.

Dhanwantari is the medicine man, and a person needs a doctor only when he is sick. That means, this medicine man brings with him sickness and disease that he will need to cure.

Kaamdheni and Kalpataru oblige all who make a wish, and not all those who make a wish ask for spiritual rewards. Hence, they oblige even those who may be sinful or have sinful intentions. Hence they are also tainted.

The horse never stays calm; it is always moving and fidgety. This means that a person who is compared with a horse is fickle minded and unsteady; he would run as fast as the wind but only to serve others and does not decide his destiny out of his own wisdom.

The conch (Shankha) is hollow inside but makes a lot of loud noise—i.e. it has no substance but is boastful and loud-mouthed.

The elephant (Gaja) is arrogant and reckless, and has an ugly body with a nose that appears to be a fifth leg, eyes disproportionately small as compared to its large rounded head, and teeth that protrude out of its mouth like horns. It tramples underfoot the lower forms of life such as small creatures and plants; it even uproots huge trees for no fault of theirs.

The Mani (gem) creates a lot of fear of robbers and worry over its security. More often than not it leads to animosity and jealousy. It usually is acquired by wrongful means. Hence, its inherent character is impure.

And the Rambha creates a lot of heartburn for those who cannot have access to her, and may lead to a lot of hatred, jealousy and even strife. She arouses lust and sensuality which cannot be regarded as honourable emotions.

Therefore, none of the so-called siblings of Rama (Laxmi) can be said to be above board, and hence they do not suit for any comparison with Sita.

A very interesting point is to be noted here. Tulidas has cited women from all the three levels of the existing world—the terrestrial world (Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 247), the heavenly world (Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 247), and the subterranean world (the present Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 247)—to essentially assert that Sita is unique and unmatched; she cannot be and should not be compared with any other female.

The heavenly world is represented by goddess Saraswati, Parvati and Rati, the terrestrial world by ordinary women who live on earth, and the underworld by Rama as she was produced from the bottom of the salty ocean during the latter's churning by the gods and demons using the body of the legendary snake known as Seshnath as the rope, and Mt. Mandrachal as the churning rod.]

दो०. एहि बिधि उपजै लच्छि जब सुंदरता सुख मूल ।

तदपि सकोच समेत कबि कहहिं सीय समतूल ॥ २४७ ॥

dōhā.

ēhi bidhi upajai lacchi jaba sundaratā sukha mūla.

tadapi sakōca samēta kabi kahahim sīya samatūla. 247.

[This Doha is in continuation of Chaupai line nos. 7-8 herein above.] On this wise, even if the best of the virtues of beauty, comeliness, magnificence, glamour and charm (sundaratā), as well as the best of roots of all happiness, joy and cheerfulness (sukha mūla) emerge (upajai) and collect themselves at one place to show themselves to the beholder (lacchi jaba), a wise and erudite poet would still hesitate to compare them with (tadapi sakōca samēta kabi kahahim) similar virtues of Sita because the former are no match for the gladness and joy that one gets by beholding the beauty and charm as well as learning of the immensity of the glory and majesty of Sita (sīya samatūla) (Doha no. 247).

[Note—In Chaupai nos. 1-8 that precede this Doha, Tulsidas is describing the beauty and charm of Sita. He essentially says that Sita's comeliness and loveliness, her charm and magnificence, her dignity and glory are beyond compare. Even if all the goodness and majesties of the world are collected and a learned poet is asked to judge them vis-à-vis Sita's virtues, he will unequivocally declare that there is no comparison. Only things that have some semblance of similarity should be compared, but the difference between Sita's virtues and other worldly virtues are like the difference between the earth and the sky.

The poet here is Tulsidas himself. So he says in essence that "I (Tulsidas) would hesitate to compare Sita with even goddess Laxmi, the patron goddess of all worldly charms and joys. I doubt if goddess Laxmi would even come near to any criterion that one would apply in comparing her with Sita. Laxmi isn't qualified enough to be remotely comparable with Sita."

These lines clear any sort of misgivings that may arise when Rama is deemed to be imperfect and therefore an unfit comparison for Sita as described in Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 247 herein above.

Tulsidas asserts that even if Rama had all the best of virtues and the best of origin, he would not like to compare Sita with her. Why so? Well, the answer is found in Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 246, and in Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 247 both of which declare that “Sita is none else but Jagdambika, the Mother of the world, the Mother Goddess”. And therefore she is incomparable to any goddess or any other female who are all junior to her.

Besides this, it will be highly inappropriate to narrate the physical beauty of one’s mother, and if she happens to be the ‘mother of the entire world’, it will be the gravest sin one can ever commit. So, Tulsidas asserts that he won’t dare describe Sita, even indirectly by means of comparison with any known entity.]

चौ०. चलीं संग लै सखीं सयानी । गावत गीत मनोहर बानी ॥ १ ॥
 सोह नवल तनु सुंदर सारी । जगत जननि अतुलित छबि भारी ॥ २ ॥
 भूषन सकल सुदेस सुहाए । अंग अंग रचि सखिन्ह बनाए ॥ ३ ॥
 caupāī.

calīm saṅga lai sakhīm sayānī. gāvata gīta manōhara bānī. 1.
 sōha navala tanu sundara sārī. jagata janani atulita chabi bhārī. 2.
 bhūṣana sakala sudēsa suhā'ē. aṅga aṅga raci sakhinha banā'ē. 3.

Clever friends escorted Sita to the arena (of the bow breaking ceremony). All the while they sang melodious songs befitting the occasion in sweet voices<sup>1</sup>. (1)

A beautiful Sari (a long piece of coloured and decorated cloth that is wrapped around so as to cover the whole body of a woman) adorned Sita’s youthful body. The Mother of the world looked most glamorous and presented a sight that was most fabulous and incomparable with anything in this world. (2)

Her friends had decorated every part of her body (such as the head, the ears, the nose, the forehead, the hairs, the neck, the hands, the waist, the legs, the feet etc.) very carefully and most diligently with suitable ornaments befitting that particular part. [For instance, ear-rings for the ear, a tiara for the head, a hair-pin and flowers for the hairs, a nose-ring for the nose, a necklace or garland for the neck, bracelets, armbands and finger-rings for the hands, waist-band for the waist, anklets and toe-rings for the feet, and so on.]<sup>2</sup> (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When Sita had earlier gone to the royal garden to offer her prayers at the temple of goddess Parvati, she was in the lead and walked confidently in the front of the group of her friends because at that time the girls were alone and there were no gazing eyes looking at them, but now she is feeling very shy and bashful as thousands of eyes are riveted on her. Besides this, the earlier occasion was an informal one and she was dressed in a casual manner, but now the situation was different. Now was a formal occasion, and she was heavily bejeweled and attired in glamorous clothes that were thickly embroidered with gems and pearls as well as threads of precious metals such as gold and silver.

Therefore, in the earlier case when Sita had gone to the garden to offer prayers it is said that “the clever friends of hers sang songs as they accompanied her (Sita) to the garden”, i.e. the friends had followed Sita from behind and sideways in an informal way like a group of friends going to a garden, talking amongst themselves and singing songs that were more like prayers instead of songs sung during marriage. They had no tension on their minds, and they were alone with no one paying any attention to them—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 228.

But now it was a very different condition altogether. Thousands of people were watching each step she took, and so it was natural for her to become nervous and fidgety. She was formally adorned with heavy ornaments and clothes, and had to be exceptionally careful with every step she took in order to maintain decorum, dignity and solemnity of the occasion. Even an ordinary bride is escorted by her friends when she walks down the aisle upto the altar to take her marriage vows. In this case the would-be bride, Sita, was a princess, and therefore it is natural that she would be honourably escorted to the designated place with the greatest of care, decorum and dignity. Sita had her eyes low, and she walked slowly. She was surrounded by her friends who guided her along.

In the garden Sita could look wherever she wished, she was free and informal, but now she had to keep her eyes low and not look beyond, say, a few feet ahead.

Sita’s group of escorts was surely selected carefully by her mother, the queen. These girls were expert in such matters. They knew how to walk with dignity and respect, how to sing melodious songs, and how to tackle emergency or some tricky situation should they arise, such as Sita inadvertently tripping over or slipping due to some unforeseen reason, or she becoming exhausted and wishing to drink some water or take rest while the competition for breaking the bow was underway, or giving her protection should some sort of fight amongst the kings erupted during the ceremony. There were many unforeseen things that had to be handled, and so Sita’s companions had to be intelligent and wise—or ‘clever’— so that they can take proper decisions and act most prudently on their own.

<sup>2</sup>Great care has been taken by the author, Goswami Tulsidas, while describing the decorations or beauty of the body of Sita.

Remember: He has always treated Sita as the Mother of the world and a divine goddess, and so he is always careful in using words while describing her, in any context whatsoever, that can never be regarded as being vulgar, indecent or undignified.

A similar idea is expressed in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 11 Ka. Here the occasion is Lord Ram’s return to his capital Ayodhya from exile and victory at Lanka. On this occasion, the mothers of Lord Ram had got Sita bathed and decorated with ornaments and royal robes. It is said here that “the mothers-in-law respectfully got Sita to take a bath to clean herself, and then decorated every part of her body with wonderful ornaments and royal robes”.]

रंगभूमि जब सिय पगु धारी । देखि रूप मोहे नर नारी ॥ ४ ॥

हरषि सुरन्ह दुंदुभीं बजाई । बरषि प्रसून अपछरा गाई ॥ ५ ॥

raṅgabhūmi jaba siya pagu dhārī. dēkhi rūpa mōhē nara nārī. 4.
haraṣi suranha dundubhīm bajā'īm. baraṣi prasūna apacharā gā'īm. 5.

When Sita set her foot on the ground of the arena, all the men and women who saw her beauty became bewitched and enthralled by it<sup>1</sup>. (4)

In the heavens, the gods felt exhilarated; they sounded their musical instruments such as the kettle-drums and showered flowers (upon Sita), while the Apsaras (celestial nymphs) sang songs befitting the occasion<sup>2</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 84, stanza no. 6.

This line sums up the fascinating and enchanting sight of Sita's beauty as hinted in Chaupai line nos. 2-3 above. Sita presented such a marvelous sight of exceptional beauty that all those who saw her in the arena were bewitched by it. She captivated everyone's mind and heart by her beauty and majesty. In that arena, she was the center of all attention and attraction. This is the reason why she had felt shy and bashful as observed in a note of Chaupai line no. 1 above.

An interesting point is to be made here. When Lord Shiva got married to goddess Parvati, it has been said that “the assembled ‘gods’ were enthralled by the couple's majestic beauty and charm”—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 100.

But now it is said that ‘the men and women’ were enthralled when they saw Sita's magnificent beauty. Well, the reason is that Shiva's marriage was attended by gods, and Sita's marriage is attended by human beings, such as the citizens of Janakpur. The gods are present here also, but they have stationed themselves in the heaven from where they shower flowers and play their musical instruments to express their joy.

<sup>2</sup>As we have seen earlier, the gods had showered flowers upon Lord Ram and there was merry singing in the heaven when he had arrived and took his seat at the venue of the bow-breaking ceremony—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 246.

Now, the gods have once again showered flowers when Sita arrived. This was a clear sign that the gods showed their happiness and pleasure when Lord Ram and Sita arrived at the venue. This was also a clear sign that they were the favourites of the gods, and this meant that they were to be soon married because the very purpose of this gathering was to find a proper groom for Sita.]

पानि सरोज सोह जयमाला । अवचट चितए सकल भुआला ॥ ६ ॥

सीय चकित चित रामहि चाहा । भए मोहबस सब नरनाहा ॥ ७ ॥

मुनि समीप देखे दोउ भाई । लगे ललकि लोचन निधि पाई ॥ ८ ॥

pāni sarōja sōha jayamālā. avacaṭa cita'e sakala bhu'ālā. 6.

sīya cakita cita rāmahi cāhā. bha'e mōhabasa saba naranāhā. 7.

muni samīpa dēkhē dō'u bhā'ī. lagē lalaki lōcana nidhi pā'ī. 8.

Sita held a victory garland in her lotus-like hands<sup>1</sup>. As soon as she stepped into the ground of the arena with this garland, she cast a quick passing glance at all the kings and princes present there<sup>2</sup>. (6)

Sita wanted to see Lord Ram, and so her eager glances were searching for the Lord in the assembly. Therefore, she looked everywhere in the direction where all the competing kings and princes were seated (to see where Lord Ram was amongst them). But the deluded kings and princes ('naranāhā') were caught in an illusion, thinking that she was looking at them (or for them), and this created a fantasy in their minds that Sita was fascinated with them if her eyes fell on them even for a fraction of a second.<sup>3</sup> (7)

When Sita saw that the two brothers (Lord Ram and Laxman) were seated near the sage (Vishwamitra), she fixed her eyes on them and gazed at them with eagerness as if her eyes had found the treasure they were searching for.<sup>4</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The garland that Sita held was not an ordinary victory garland but one that stood for victory over the world. This is because it would be put around the neck of anyone who broke the bow that was not an ordinary bow, but belonged to Lord Shiva, and was the one with which the Lord had slayed the invincible demon Tripura and had burnt the three formidably well-protected cities over which he ruled. Therefore it implied that only someone who is stronger than or at least equal to Shiva would be able to lift it and break it. And this is not a joke or a child's play.

Hence, breaking this formidable bow of Lord Shiva would clearly and indisputably establish the person who breaks it as the greatest warrior of all times, not only in the terrestrial world but also in the heaven and the nether world. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 264.

Here it is not mentioned what sort of a garland it was—whether of gold or silver threads and having pearls and other precious gems as beads, or one that was made of flowers, and if the latter is the case then what flowers were used in it. But usually in such cases the lotus flower is used as it is considered the purest of all the flowers and is used to as an offering to deities.

In the book "Janki Mangal" of Tulsidas which deals exclusively with the divine marriage of Lord Ram with Sita. In its verse no. 109 it is explicitly stated that the garland that Sita put around the neck of Lord Ram was made of 'lotus flowers'.

However, in Adhyatma Ramayan of Veda Vyas, Baal Kand, Sarga no. 6, verse no. 29 it is said that the garland was made of gold. It is also mentioned in this verse that the complexion of Sita was like that of gold.

In Srimad Bhagwat Puran, Skandha (chapter) 8, Canto (section) 8, verse no. 24, a garland of white lotus flowers is mentioned in the hands of Laxmi, the goddess of prosperity and material wealth, when she emerged from the Kshirsagar (the celestial ocean) when it was churned by the gods and the demons in search of Amrit, the nectar of eternal life and blissfulness. She would subsequently put this garland around the neck of Lord Vishnu to marry her. Since Sita is an incarnation of Laxmi, and she is to soon marry Lord Ram who is a human form of Lord Vishnu, we can certainly guess with confidence that this 'victory garland' was made of lotus flowers.

A similar idea is expressed in the book "Geetawali Ramayan" of Tulsidas. In its Baal Kand, verse no. 96, stanza no. 4 it says that "the victory garland put around the neck of Lord Ram by Sita looked so wonderful and fabulous as if a row of swans (who are white in colour), who have flown out of the lake known as Mansarovar, have alighted and comfortably settled down on a Tamaal tree (the black catechu plant, referring the dark-complexioned body of Lord Ram)". It is very clear in this metaphor that the garland was made of white lotus flowers because its flowers are likened to the bird 'swan' which is white in colour, and the flower that grows in the Mansarovar lake is 'white lotus'. The 'row of swans' is the chain of lotus flowers that have been threaded together to form the victory garland.

<sup>2</sup>This was natural and instinctive behaviour for Sita. When she came into the arena, she raised her eyes and quickly looked around. This was the first chance she had got to see the venue, and out of general curiosity she looked around to see the huge assembly that was extremely fascinating.

Everyone had waited eagerly with baited breath for her arrival, and there must have been pin-drop silence at the venue. There was an atmosphere of tense uncertainty and expectation all around—no one knew what would happen that day. Sita was all the more worried and anxious because her entire future life hinged on the events of the next few hours. Internally in her mind and heart though she had surrendered herself to Lord Ram, but that was something personal and secret.

She was already nervous about her future, and when she stepped in the arena she could feel the stiffness of the atmosphere and the hushed tension that prevailed everywhere. She could feel that all eyes were hawkishly looking at her, and it was a very natural and instinctive reaction on her part to raise her eyes and have a quick look around.

Though she had mentally decided that if she was to marry someone then he has to be Lord Ram, and goddess Parvati had already blessed her that it would be so when she had prayed to the goddess in the garden temple (refer—Baal Kand, Chand line nos. 1-2 and Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 236 above), yet she instinctively glanced at all the kings and princes who had come to try their luck at marrying her to get an idea of what sort of people they were, the first impression that her mind and heart makes of them, and to see if they fitted in her imagination of who should be her future husband by any remote chance should her dreams of marrying Lord Ram crumble to pieces.

Her condition at that time was almost like a person who has been put on the block for auction, and this person nervously, anxiously, eagerly, but disgustingly, looks around with annoyance to have a quick look at the people who are examining the object of auction for which they have to bid with penetrating eyes, and getting ready to be the first one to grab the auctioned object!

As has been noted above, she had no real desire to see the kings and princes who had gathered there to make a quick assessment of who would suit her as she had already chosen Lord Ram as her groom at the emotional level. So obviously this glance around the arena was in a general sort of way, just to see things in a general way out of curiosity and fascination.

Another reason for Sita looking around is made clear in the next verse nos. 7-8 that follow below. We will observe that the real reason for Sita looking around was to see if Lord Ram is present in the assembly or not, but the deluded kings and princes thought that she was looking at them even if her glance fell on them for a fleeting moment as it moved quickly from one person to another in search of Lord Ram.

We can imagine the pain and anxiety that dominated not only Sita's nervous heart but also of all the citizens of Janakpur who had assembled there to witness the ceremony.

<sup>3</sup>Refer note appended to verse no. 6 herein above.

Sita had already heard that the two brothers have come with sage Vishwamitra to attend the marriage ceremony. So she was certain that they must be seated somewhere, but was not sure where. She could not ask her friends to point them out for her as it would be very indecent and improper. So she decided to look for them herself. Her roving eyes moved quickly around the circular arena, seeing each king or prince if he was her beloved, Lord Ram. She had seen Lord Ram and Laxman in the garden previously, and so would have no difficulty in recognizing them. But the pervert kings who were eyeing her greedily were so overcome with passions that even if her eyes fell on them for a fraction of a second to see whether a particular was not either of the two brothers (Lord Ram and Laxman), the concerned king thought that she was searching for him, and had taken a liking for him.

Finally, Sita saw that the two brothers were seated alongside the sage on a specially erected seat. As soon as she saw the two brothers she stopped looking anywhere, so the kings and princes upon whom she had not yet cast her glance became jealous with those who were the fortunate ones whom Sita had quickly seen a while ago. The latter category of kings became excited and this aroused animosity with the kings sitting on the other side. The former group of kings thought that Sita had stopped looking elsewhere because she has selected one of them, and that is why she did not bother to look at others. They became enthusiastic and were literally jumping with joy, while the other group sitting on the other side felt neglected and became angry.

This mutual jealousy and the delusion of acceptance or rejection was so profound that when finally Lord Ram had broken the bow and the victory garland was put around his neck by Sita and she stood calmly before the Lord with lowered eyes, the entire assembly of defeated kings and princes—except of course the ‘good ones’ who had sat quietly and had not participated in the bow-breaking competition—stood up in revolt, and there was all likelihood of an all-out war. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 266—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 267.

<sup>4</sup>As soon as Sita saw the two brothers, Lord Ram and Laxman, she became happy as if her eyes had found what they were searching for. She could immediately recognize her beloved Lord. A similar idea is expressed earlier when Sita saw them in the royal garden where she had gone to offer worship to goddess Parvati—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 232. But upon close examination we find a fine difference in the two instances of Sita seeing Lord Ram. In the garden where she first saw the Lord it is said that she ‘recognised’ him, and in this current verse it is said that she ‘found’ him.

Well, it’s easy to understand this difference. We must remember that Lord Ram and Sita are respective human forms of Lord Vishnu and his divine consort goddess Laxmi. Ever since Lord Vishnu had to come down to earth as a human being in the body of Lord Ram (for a number of reasons, one of them being to keep his promise made to the gods and mother earth that he would become a human to kill the demons who were tormenting them), he was separated from Laxmi who took birth as Sita. So, as soon as Sita saw the Lord she immediately ‘recognised’ that the prince standing before her eyes was no one else but Lord Vishnu. In this case all she had to do was to decide whether or not this prince was her eternal Lord, Vishnu. And she at once ‘recognized’ him, that he indeed was Vishnu. And that settled the question once and for all.

In the garden, Lord Ram and Laxman were alone, but in the marriage arena however, the situation was different as there were thousands of kings and princes of all demoniations, and all of them were in their finest of royal garbs, robes, ornaments, crowns and other paraphernalia. So Sita (Laxmi) had to search for her beloved Lord, Sri Ram (Vishnu) in this crowd. That is why she rapidly moved her eyes from king to king. And soon she ‘found’ him in this crowded arena, sitting alongside sage Vishwamitra with his brother Laxman.

Let us take a simple example to understand this. Suppose a husband is separated from his wife in the melee of an overcrowded marketplace. The wife is wise and she maintains her poise, approaches the police station and gives a brief description of her husband’s features. The police make an announcement that any person who fits this description should report to them. As soon as the husband arrives and the couple stands fact to face, the police ask her to ‘recognise’ who this gentleman is. It is obvious that both of them, the wife and the husband, would ‘recognise’ each other. Any other person who may resemble the description of the lost husband and turns up at the police station on the basis of the announcement would naturally be turned away by the wife as she knows who her husband really is, and can easily recognize that this person is not him. This is what happened in the garden. Laxmi, in her human form as Sita, could immediately ‘recognise’ her Lord Vishnu in the form of Lord Ram as soon as she saw him.

Now suppose the wife and husband once again get separated, and instead of going to the police station the wife searches for him in the crowd. She will look in all directions, at every male face, and suddenly she sees that her beloved husband is standing in the corner of a shop with his friend, waiting for her. We say she ‘found’ him in the crowd. Here, she has not so much recognized her husband as being able to ‘find’ him in the crowd. In the police station however, she had to ‘recognise’ him. Perhaps all men of roughly the same description who turned up at the police station after the announcement are lined up, and the wife is asked to ‘recognise’ who among them is her husband.

This is the difference between the two instances when Sita had seen Lord Ram.]

दो०. गुरजन लाज समाजु बड़ देखि सीय सकुचानि ।

लागि बिलोकन सखिन्ह तन रघुबीरहि उर आनि ॥ २४८ ॥

dōhā.

gurajana lāja samāju baṛa dēkhi sīya sakucāni.

lāgi bilōkana sakhinha tana raghubīrahi ura āni. 248.

Sita felt shy and bashful (as she gazed at Lord Ram) because of the presence of elders of the community there, as well as due to the huge crowd whose attention was fixed on every move of hers.

So she calmly brought the image of Lord Ram into her heart (i.e. she enshrined the Lord quietly in her heart, fixing her mind not on the physical form sitting in the arena but on the subtle form that was enthroned inside her heart), turned her eyes away from him, and instead, started looking at her companions (i.e. friends) who were accompanying her. (Doha no. 248)

[Note—A similar thing had happened in the garden where Sita had gone to offer prayers to goddess Parvati earlier. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 4-7 that precede Doha no. 232, and (ii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 234.

But there is situational difference between Sita seeing Lord Ram in the garden and her looking at him here in the arena. Sita realized in the arena that it is not good and decent for her reputation to look intently at a stranger-prince in a crowded assembly where her entire family, all the elders of the city as well as all the invited guests were present, and all of them had their eyes fixed on her, watching every move and gesture she made. Her looking fixedly at one place or at one individual would ignite a scandal, and give a bad name to her and her family. People would start gossiping that Sita has a loose character.

So prudently she turned her gaze away from Lord Ram, and pretended that she had not seen and recognized him at all, and that, if questioned, she can always say that she had seen in the direction of where Lord Ram was sitting in a causal manner just as she was glancing through the crowd of assembled kings and princes without any particular reason.

The situation in the garden was different. There she was alone with her close friends with whom she could share her internal and private feelings, unlike the situation in the arena which is crowded with eager onlookers scrutinizing each gesture and movement of hers. Some of these spectators are bound to be over-jealous who would jump to scandalous assumptions at the slightest excuse, at the drop of a hat so to say, to spread false gossip about her. So here she had to be extra cautious. In the garden she had been able to spend quite a bit of time looking at the two brothers, and even when she was forced to go away to finish her worship rituals as it was getting late, she managed to look back over her shoulders repeatedly on the excuse of seeing birds, trees and animals so that she can have one more glance of the adorable brothers before they vanished from sight—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 234 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 5-8.]

चौ०. राम रूपु अरु सिय छबि देखें । नर नारिन्ह परिहरीं निमेषें ॥ १ ॥
 सोचहिं सकल कहत सकुचाहीं । बिधि सन बिनय करहिं मन माहीं ॥ २ ॥
 हरु बिधि बेगि जनक जड़ताई । मति हमारि असि देहि सुहाई ॥ ३ ॥
 बिनु बिचार पनु तजि नरनाहू । सीय राम कर करै बिबाहू ॥ ४ ॥

caupāī.

rāma rūpu aru siya chabi dēkhēm. nara nārinha pariharīm nimēṣēm. 1.
 sōcahīm sakala kahata sakucāhīm. bidhi sana binaya karahīm mana māhīm. 2.
 haru bidhi bēgi janaka jaṛatāī. mati hamāri asi dēhi suhāī. 3.
 binu bicāra panu taji naranāhū. sīya rāma kara karai bibāhū. 4.

The assembled men and women at the venue were so enthralled by the bewitching beauty of Lord Ram and the fabulous charm of Sita's loveliness that their eyes stopped blinking<sup>1</sup>. (1)

All of them (men and women) were worried and anxious in their hearts, but were hesitant (reluctant, afraid) to speak out about their feelings openly in public. So they prayed to the creator Brahma earnestly and with a sense of urgency in their hearts—

(2)

‘Oh Creator (‘bidhi’)! Please quickly remove the stupidity that has eclipsed the wisdom of king Janak’s mind, and has stymied him, and instead give him right understanding like that of ours<sup>2</sup>. (3)

Inspire him so that he discards his senseless vow without any regrets, and marries Sita with Lord Ram without any apology any feeling of wrong-doing, or making any excuses for changing his decision (because Sita is his daughter, and hence he has the right to secure her future to the best of his ability and intellect)<sup>3</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When one is stunned by some sight and gazes at it with utter astonishment, the eyes stop blinking as an impulsive and natural reaction to the stupification of the brain.

Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 244 which also describes the same scene when the two brothers had entered the arena. It says that the “stunned men and women had their eyes riveted on the Lord and could not move their pupils (i.e. eyes) away from the two brothers even if they had wanted to do so”.

The marvelous charm of Sita and her literally out-of-the-world beauty had not only caught the attention of Lord Ram and Laxman but had captivated the imagination, the mind and the heart of the Lord so much that he had himself accepted this fact. This was the occasion when they had met in the garden where Sita had gone to offer worship to goddess Parvati. Refer: Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede Doha no. 230; (ii) Doha no. 231 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8; and (iii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 235.

A little earlier, the citizens of Janakpur were enchanted by the charming sight of Lord Ram and Laxman when the two had gone sightseeing in the city. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 220; (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 221; and (iii) Doha no. 223.

Remember: The Viraat Purush or the Supreme Being is the Lord who had created everything, including Mother Nature; the latter is another aspect or another half of the Viraat Purush and is therefore an integral part of the cosmic all-embracing form of the Lord. This ‘Mother Nature’ is also known as ‘Prakriti’, and it is astoundingly beautiful. It is so stupendously wonderful, fascinating and charming—and therefore beyond imagination and description by the limited abilities of the human mind—that legions of the greatest of poets and painters ever born on earth who had attempted to depict a fraction of its beauty, had surrendered themselves and had accepted without qualms that what they have presented to the world is just a glimpse of what to expect when one wishes to observe this miraculous creation of the Lord, known as ‘Mother Nature’ or ‘Prakriti’.

Now, it is the same Viraat Purush and Mother Nature, who are also known as Lord Vishnu and Laxmi at the cosmic level of creation, who have manifested themselves as Lord Ram and Sita respectively on earth. The virtues of beauty, magnificence and charm—or anything that is beautiful, magnificent and charming—are an integral part of the divine qualities of Lord Vishnu and goddess Laxmi at the cosmic level of creation, and therefore there is no wonder that their gross human forms as Lord Ram and Sita respectively are bound to reflect these qualities.

For instance, the sandalwood tree has a natural fragrance that is characteristic of it, and if any toy or pot is made out of its wood then the latter would emit a sweet scent reminiscent of their primary form as the ‘sandalwood tree’. They would not smell like articles made from wood of any other tree, such as the mango or the margosa tree. By merely holding an article made from the sandalwood tree one would immediately know about its origin. Similarly, the glorious and matchless divine virtues of Lord Ram and Sita were sufficient to make wise people realise about their divine origin and heritage as someone who were not ordinary human beings but Lord Vishnu and Laxmi themselves personified in their respective forms as Lord Ram and Sita—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 245—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 246.

<sup>2</sup>To wit, oh Creator, inspire Janak to discard his stubbornness and overcome his imaginary fears of bad name by disregarding his vows of marrying Sita to anyone who breaks the bow of Shiva. If he does remain adamant then it is sure he would have to repent and regret for his foolhardiness for the rest of his life. Oh Creator, please somehow influence his mind so that he becomes reasonable and changes course according to the changed situation. At the time he made his vows he hadn’t known of Lord Ram and so was excusable, but now he has no excuse of bartering the entire future of his own daughter just because he wishes to stick to his archaic vows which have become outdated by now. After all, being a father it is his obligatory moral duty to see what makes Sita happy in life, and at the same time he should take into consideration the views of his subjects as well because Sita is as dear to all of us, the subjects of his kingdom, as she is to him. Can’t he read the writing on the wall? We had always thought that our king was a very thoughtful and wise man, but today we feel that he is acting stupidly and most impractically for he is neglecting many important factors and the changed equation that prevails now.

<sup>3</sup>The same hope is expressed by the citizens earlier when Lord Ram and Laxman had gone to see Janakpur upon their arrival in the city two days back. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 222—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 223.

Refer also to (a) “Geetawali Ramayan” of Tulsidas, Baal Kand—(i) verse no. 70; (ii) verse no. 77, stanza no. 3; (iii) verse no. 78, stanza no. 3 which is explicit on this subject; and (b) “Janki Mangal”, verse no. 70 as well as Chanda no. 7.

The citizens were afraid to stand up and propose to king Janak that he should cancel the condition that anyone who breaks the bow would marry Sita, and instead go ahead and straight away marry Sita with Lord Ram. But it is easy said than done, for the king had to take into consideration so many factors before taking any impulsive step. For one, this would leave a permanent scar on his immaculate reputation as a king who never breaks his vow no matter what befalls him, and second there was a certainty of revolt by the assembled kings who would fight till death for being called and then insulted. Even if Janak managed to somehow calm them by reasoning or subdue them by force because it was his realm and he had a huge army at his disposal which the invited kings lacked, the repercussions would be horrendous. As soon as these kings and princes returned to their respective kingdoms, they would all join hands and launch an attack on Janakpur. It will lead to bloodshed and absolute destruction and ruin. No sensible king would ever allow this misery to be perpetrated upon his kingdom and its innocent citizens.

The king himself was in a grave dilemma—had he known about these two princes before making his declaration then he would have offered to marry Sita and all her other sisters directly with the four sons of king Dasrath, i.e. Lord Ram and his three brothers Laxman, Bharat and Shatrughan, which in fact Janak actually did later on when Lord Ram broke the bow and his marriage with Sita was sealed. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda stanza nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 325.

The above fact that Janak was so enchanted with Lord Ram that if he had the choice he would have certainly married his daughter Sita with the Lord is reiterated elsewhere also—e.g. in (a) “Geetawali Ramayan”, Baal Kand—(i) verse no. 61, stanza nos. 3-4; (ii) verse no. 64-66, and 69 which are very explicit on this aspect; (iii) verse no. 68, stanza no. 5-6, and 9; and in (b) “Janki Mangal”, verse nos. 41 and 48, as well as Chanda no. 6.

Another fact is that Janak was extremely enchanted by the two brothers; this is clear when he had first seen them. The occasion was the king’s going to welcome sage Vishwamitra when he had arrived at Janakpur along with Lord Ram and Laxman—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 215—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 217.]

जगु भल कहिहि भाव सब काहू । हठ कीन्हें अंतहुँ उर दाहू ॥ ५ ॥
एहिं लालसाँ मगन सब लोगू । बरु साँवरो जानकी जोगू ॥ ६ ॥

jagu bhala kahihi bhāva saba kāhū. haṭha kīnhēm antahum̐ ura dāhū. 5.
ēhim̐ lālasām̐ magana saba lōgū. baru sām̐varō jānakī jōgū. 6.

The whole world would approve of it (i.e. of Janak deciding to marry Sita with Lord Ram by circumventing the condition of breaking of the bow) because this is what the people want. [There will be no opposition or criticism of this decision of the king.]

On the other hand, being adamant and reluctant to adapt to change situation would only produce internal agony, restlessness and grief in the end.<sup>1</sup> (5)

Everyone was overwhelmed with this desire that Sita should be married with Lord Ram, and they were all convinced with the idea that the dark-complexioned prince (Lord Ram) was the most suitable groom for Janki (daughter of Janak; Sita). [All of them wanted that Sita should be married to Lord Ram.]<sup>2</sup> (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The citizens discussed the matter of Janak’s reluctance to break his vow that Sita would be married to anyone who broke the bow, and instead deciding to marry Sita with Lord Ram directly. They understood that Janak was afraid of a bad name and ignominy that would come to him for breaking his own vow.

So in this line they say that it is wrong to think this way. A good king is one who keeps in mind the views of his subjects when taking any decision. Now since the whole city is in favour of Sita marrying Lord Ram, king Janak must not feel guilty of breaking his vows. Should the need arise, the entire city was ready to back him and stand by his decision.

Remember: It is a king’s own people, the subjects of his kingdom, who are most affected by any of his actions and decisions, and therefore they are the ones who either praise him or criticise him. No one else outside the kingdom is much interested. Therefore, if the citizens want that Sita should be married to Lord Ram and if it necessitates the king breaking his vows, there should be no problem; the king would be assured of full support from his subjects. If the subjects of a king are happy and contented by his actions and decisions, it bids well for the king himself.

Just the opposite happens if the king takes any decision or action that is not liked by the people. There would be discontent and resistance amongst the masses. In the present case, no one wants that Sita should be married to anyone other than Lord Ram, and if the king goes ahead with his stubborn decision then it is obvious that the citizens would be displeased with him.

Besides the political ramifications it would have on the kingdom, the personal life of Sita would be thrown in a hell-fire of eternal grief and mental suffering because she would be forced into a marriage she does not approve of. This would cause immense grief for the entire royal family in the long run. So the citizens wonder why is the king being not reasonable and understanding; why is he not adopting himself to the changed circumstances.

Now the question arises, “what is this changed situation?” Well, the answer is clear and stark—at the time of making the vow and the declaration that Sita would be married to any warrior who would lift and break the bow, Janak was not aware of or acquainted with Lord Ram; the king had not seen him at that time. But now that he has personally seen Lord Ram and is also personally attracted to the Lord, then he must change his thinking to suit this new development. After all, a wise king is one who adapts himself to changed situations quickly, and adopts a line of action that best suits this new and changed situation. With such a suitable prince—who is obviously the best groom for Sita—being present right in front, it will be highly nonsensical for Janak to stick to some old-fashioned views and ridiculously stubborn vows that would jeopardise the future happiness of his own daughter Sita.

Therefore, the citizens argue, the king must change his way of thinking, abandon his vows and straight away marry Sita with Lord Ram. After all, Sita was his daughter and he had the full moral right to ensure her future happiness and well-being. This was no ordinary competition that was being held just to decide as to who was the greatest warrior in the world, but the future of an innocent girl was at stake. And as a father, it was the moral, social, ethical and religious duty and responsibility of Janak to see that the best option is chosen for her, the best future can be ensured for her, and she should be consulted before any final decision as it directly concerned her personal life.

Remember in this context that not only the citizens but Sita too had wanted to marry Lord Ram. Even her father, king Janak, had wanted in his heart that it would have been so nice if somehow things could be turned in favour of Sita marrying Lord Ram though he could not muster personal courage to supercede or circumvent his vows. Not only this, a big chunk of the invited kings too favoured Sita marrying Lord Ram. Hence, there would be no problem whatsoever if Janak changed his decision and declared that he has decided to marry his daughter Sita with Lord Ram.

<sup>2</sup>‘Everyone’ here includes the citizens of Jankpur (refer: Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 222; Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 223) as well as the good kings (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 245—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 246).]

तब बंदीजन जनक बोलाए । बिरिदावली कहत चलि आए ॥ ७ ॥

कह नृपु जाइ कहहु पन मोरा । चले भाट हियँ हरषु न थोरा ॥ ८ ॥

taba bandījana janaka bōlā'ē. biridāvalī kahata cali ā'ē. 7.

kaha nṛpu jā'i kahahu pana mōrā. calē bhāṭa hiyaṁ' haraṣu na thōrā. 8.

[Now, we come to the next phase of the story. After everyone was seated and Sita arrived, king Janak called in his royal heralds and ordered to them to make a formal declaration of his vow—that anyone who is able to break the formidable bow of Lord Shiva would marry Sita. This declaration would kick-start the actual competition.]

Then Janak summoned his royal criers and heralds, and they came in eulogizing his race and singing the praise of his ancestors (biridāvalī)<sup>1</sup>. (7)

The king ordered them—‘Go and declare my vow to the assembly.’

The heralds immediately went on stage to do as ordered, and their hearts were very happy and excited<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This was a normal practice with kings in olden days. When some function or celebration was organized, the royal heralds sang long adulatory verses, praising and eulogizing the great deeds done by all the kings of their master's royal lineage.

Refer also to: “Geetawali Ramayan”, Baal Kand—(i) verse no. 84, stanza no. 7; (ii) verse no. 89, stanza no. 1-3.

A similar thing—of heralds singing laudatory songs praising the members of the royal family and their great race—has happened later when they have praised the dynasty of the kings of Ayodhya, the family to which Lord Ram belonged, when he along with his brothers, his father king Dasrath and the rest of the royal family members arrived in a ceremonial marriage procession for the actual marriage rituals. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 316.

In Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, line no. 2 of Doha no. 105, it is said while describing the greatness of the holy pilgrim site of Prayag (also known as Triveni, the confluence of three holy rivers—the Ganges, the Yamuna and the Saraswati) that “its greatness and holiness, its immaculate virtues and astounding spiritual glories are sung by acclaimed ‘heralds’, the Vedas and the Purans (ancient scriptures)”. In this case however, the ‘heralds’ are wise men and elders who praise the spiritual benefits that this holy place bestows upon those who pay their respects to it.

Another place where such heralds have been employed as a metaphor for those who sing glories is when Lord Ram and his brother Laxman are wandering in the forest, appreciating its magnificent beauty and praising its lush green environment during the spring time when the entire forest seems to become vibrant, lively and colourful. Here the Lord observes the beauty of Nature at its best, and during the course of praising its fabulous charm he cites its various sounds that enthralled his mind and heart. Amongst these fascinating sounds that were unique to that dense forest was the sound of the bird known as Chatak who was singing away merrily. The Lord says that “this Chatak is like Nature's herald who is praising the magnificent beauty and glories of the place”. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 38.

<sup>2</sup>King Janak had so many court heralds, but only the expert ones among them were selected to make this presentation and declare the king's vows formally once again as a sign that the bow breaking competition has started.

Therefore, those who were selected for this purpose, those who took the stand at the podium to make this announcement, felt very honoured and privileged. That is why they felt very-very happy. They felt excited because their declaration would start a competition like the one the world had never seen before. At the instant when they stood on the stage to make this declaration, all eyes were upon them, and this made them feel proud and important.]

दो०. बोले बंदी बचन बर सुनहु सकल महिपाल ।

पन बिदेह कर कहहिं हम भुजा उठाइ बिसाल ॥ २४९ ॥

dōhā.

bōlē bandī bacana bara sunahu sakala mahipāla.

pana bidēha kara kahahim hama bhujā uṭhā'i bisāla. 249.

The royal criers and heralds announced the decision of king Janak as follows—‘Listen all the great kings who have assembled here. We raise our arms high to declare the great vow<sup>1</sup> that Videha (king Janak) has made. (Doha no. 249)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word “bisāla” technically means ‘big, huge, large, long, remarkable. In the present context however it means that the heralds raised their arms high and proclaimed in an unambiguous language the vows of king Janak. They affirmed that what they are saying is of profound importance and irrevocable, and so everyone present there should listen to them carefully. The challenge is formidable, and the reward for the winner is mighty great. This reward is described in forthcoming Chuapai line nos. 1-4 that follow this Doha below.

The word is an adjective, and its placement at the end of the 2nd line of this Doha is very strategic. It refers to the ‘dignified position of the heralds as representative of their king’ as well as to the ‘mighty vow of the king that is irrevocable, unique and remarkable’. So it simultaneously means—(i) that the declaration made by the heralds was done with absolute confidence, and that it was irrevocable and cannot be challenged, and (ii) it also means that the formidable vow which the king has made is also irrevocable and of immense importance. Why is it so? Because it would determine who is the strongest and the bravest warrior in the world. ‘Strongest’—because the bow was exceptionally heavy and stern, and only a person who can have the strength that matches that of Lord Shiva, to whom this bow originally belonged, would be able to lift it.

‘Bravest’—because its breaking meant challenging the might of Shiva, and it is no joke to stand up against the Lord’s wrath should he become angry on the person who dares to break the bow without his (Lord Shiva’s) permission.

And, ‘warrior’—because only someone who is an expert archer and an excellent warrior would know how to raise and string such a heavy and huge bow, and then pull its string so much back that it would snap from the middle. This feat requires astounding strength, courage, valour, skill, expertise and confidence.

Refer also to “Geetawali Ramayan”, Baal Kand, verse no. 84, stanza no. 7.

What would be the ‘unique reward’ for someone fulfilling this ‘unique vow’ of Janak? Well, it would be the hand of Sita, the daughter of Janak and the most beautiful girl of the time, in marriage.

The following Chaupai line nos. 3-4 herein below describe what this ‘great vow’ of king Janak was, as well as its equally ‘great reward’.]

चौ०. नृप भुजबलु बिधु सिवधनु राहू । गरुअ कठोर बिदित सब काहू ॥ १ ॥

रावनु बानु महाभट भारे । देखि सरासन गवँहि सिधारे ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

nṛpa bhujabalu bidhu sivadhanu rāhū. garu'a kaṭhōra bidita saba kāhū. 1.
rāvanu bānu mahābhaṭa bhārē. dēkhi sarāsana gavam̐hiṁ sidhārē. 2.

[The criers and the heralds continued with their proclamation—] ‘It is well known to everyone that Shiva’s bow was very heavy, sturdy, strong and stern. It was like the planet Rahu as far as the strength of the arms of all the kings and princes was concerned.

[To wit, just like the case of Rahu causing the eclipse of the moon, this bow would vanquish the pride of all the kings that they are very strong, able and powerful, that there is nothing impossible for them, that to break this old and rusty bow is like a child’s play for them. The bow would put all of them to shame. The shine of self-confidence, of majesty and authority, of power and pomp that is now radiating from their faces would be replaced by gloom and dejection. Soon, they would sit down with lowered heads and faces darkened by shame and loss of prestige.]<sup>1</sup> (1)

‘Ravana (pronounced “Raavana”) and Banasur (pronounced “Baanaasur”) are two great and formidable demons. They saw the bow and silently sneaked away (without even touching it)<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Rahu is a legendary mythological demon that devours the full moon once in a while, causing the latter’s eclipse. Refer note that has been appended to Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 238 above which tells the story of Rahu and why he devours the moon, causing the latter’s eclipse.

In the context of the present verse this metaphor means that the strongest, the most muscular, the most able and the bravest among the kings, who are proud of their strength and power and invincibility, would fail to lift and break the bow; they would be defeated by the bow. The bow would literally eclipse their glory, their reputation and fame as brave, strong and invincible warriors just like the Rahu who casts its dark shadow on the moon and eclipses the latter’s magnificent brightness, its wonderful beauty and its glories—in short, the Rahu tramples underfoot the pride and vanity of the moon that it is the most attractive, the most charming and brightest object in the night sky, that it is universally used as a metaphor for beauty, charm, magnificence, attractiveness, as well as a fount of bliss, peace and joy by all the poets and bards in this world.

The moon, when it is scared out of its wits by the overbearing presence of Rahu, appears dark and gloomy as if all its glory and charm have been trampled underfoot and crushed to pieces by its nemesis, the demon Rahu.

Similarly, the pride of the assembled kings that they are extremely strong and able, that there is nothing impossible for them, that this rusty and old bow is like a child’s play for them, that it would stand no chance against the might of their muscular arms—all such notions of strength, power, majesty and grandeur would be decimated and crushed the instant they go near the bow. The formidable bow of Lord Shiva would cast its dark, grim shadow of sternness and invincibility on the pride of the kings and princes, vanquishing their ego, haughtiness and arrogance, and casting a pall of gloom on all of them like the Rahu casting its dark shadow on the full moon, eclipsing it and trouncing the latter's pride of being the most wonderful entity in the whole of the night sky.

In other words, the kings are able to maintain their show of prestige, invincibility, majesty, grandeur and strength only till the time they do not touch the bow, because as soon as they touch it, the bow would suck out all their glories, the bow would crush their pride of being extremely strong and able when they fail to move it even a fraction of an inch. The kings' vanity and false pretensions of glory and majestic powers would crumble into dust. Their faces that are at present shining with pride and radiating with self-confidence would be veiled by a dark pall of gloom and dejection when all their prestige, self-respect and dignity would be crushed under the might of Lord Shiva's bow.

It is very important to note that all the kings have been compared to the 'moon' that is devoured by Rahu to cause the lunar eclipse, and no reference is made of the fact that the Rahu also causes the eclipse of the 'sun' when it devours the latter, or casts its shadow on the sun. The reason for this clever maneuvering with words by Tulsidas is that Lord Ram, who will ultimately break the bow, belongs to the 'solar race', the Sun dynasty.

Hence, no mention is made in this verse of the Rahu eclipsing the sun because the bow, which is compared to Rahu, would not be able to stand against the will and strength of Lord Ram, of the 'solar race', as the Lord would easily break it; the bow would not be able to resist Lord Ram as it did in the case of all other kings.

Unlike the other kings (compared to the 'moon') who were defeated by the bow (compared to 'Rahu') as it refused to be moved by them, Lord Ram (compared to the 'sun') was easily able to defeat the bow by lifting and breaking it. The 'lifting and breaking' of the bow by Lord Ram was tantamount to crushing the pride and ego of the bow that no one can stand against its might and powers.

It was a sort of punishment for the bow that it was being too arrogant and haughty. Through this breaking of the bow, Lord Ram gave a signal to the demons and all the other evil forces in this world that enough was enough, that though they could have their way till now, their evil game was soon going to come to an end as the Lord has arrived to eliminate them and neutralise their evil powers.

Ram was Lord Vishnu himself personified because Lord Shiva did not oppose nor felt angry when the Lord broke his (Shiva's) bow. This is because Shiva had already suffered defeat at the hands of Vishnu on an earlier occasion when both of them fought using their respective bows, Shiva using the bow that was to be broken today, and Vishnu using his famed bow known as Saarang. This fight was orchestrated by the creator Brahma at the behest of the gods who wanted to know which of the two great bows—one held by Vishnu and the other by Shiva—was better and the greatest. Both these bows were created by Vishwakarma, the engineer of the gods. When Shiva was defeated, he got so annoyed and disgusted with his bow that he discarded it as he did not want to have it with him in future, and so he gave it to an ancestor of king Janak. Shiva himself secretly wanted this bow destroyed as it was a symbol of his defeat. But who in this creation would ever gather courage to destroy a bow that was once held in the hands of the greatest of gods, the Great Lord known as Mahadeva or Shiva? This destroyer had to be Lord Vishnu because not only had he actually defeated Shiva during that confrontation and therefore there was no question of his insulting or undermining Shiva's dignity or greatness by breaking the latter's bow, but also because Lord Shiva himself was a great devotee of Lord Vishnu in his incarnation as Lord Ram. In fact, Lord Shiva always repeated the holy name of Lord Ram as his chosen Mantra (spiritual formula); Shiva had Lord Ram enshrined in his heart as his dearest Lord.

Hence, Lord Shiva would not feel affronted at all—but would rather feel happy and give his nod—when Lord Ram would break this bow, as it had been forsaken and discarded by Shiva himself. This bow was a constant source of irritation for Lord Shiva as it reminded him of this unfortunate incident when he was instigated to fight with his beloved and revered Lord Vishnu just because the selfish gods wished to determine which of the two bows constructed by Vishwakarma was stronger and better. Shiva wanted to erase this bitter memory, and he wanted to convey a message to Lord Vishnu, albeit in the latter's form as Lord Ram, that the earlier incident when they had fought was not out of Shiva's own wish or volition but due to some mischievous maneuvering by the gods. So, Lord Vishnu must forgive him (Shiva) and bury any kind of misunderstanding that he (Vishnu) might harbour against Shiva.

So we find that Lord Shiva had used this opportunity of breaking of his bow by Lord Vishnu in the form of Lord Ram to reiterate his (Shiva's) eternal love and respect for Lord Vishnu, and to tell the demons that it would be useless for them to seek any help from Shiva against Lord Ram.

Another significant connotation of breaking of this bow of Lord Shiva is this:—The demons were worshippers of Lord Shiva. Their king, Ravana of Lanka, was himself a great devotee of Shiva. In fact, he had offered his heads to the Lord ten times on some earlier occasion, and Shiva had been so pleased with this offering that he had blessed Ravana that all his ten heads would not only be restored but if anyone cuts any of these heads in the future they would grow back on his neck instantly. This is why Lord Ram had been unable to kill Ravana during the epic war at Lanka by merely cutting his heads repeatedly with his arrows. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 25; (ii) Doha no. 28; and (iii) Doha no. 92 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 10-14.

Ravana had also composed a sacred hymn in honour of Shiva, called the Ravana's Shiva-Tandav Stotra, which is said to be the most difficult of all hymns ever composed in honour of the Lord.

The might of Ravana's arms, his dare-devilry and his fearlessness from Lord Shiva can be judged by the fact that once he had effortlessly lifted or 'uprooted' Mt. Kailash, the mountain abode of Lord Shiva in the upper reaches of the Himalayas. This meant that Ravana had the strength and the guts to lift the entire weight of this lofty mountain along with Lord Shiva and his divine consort Parvati who permanently live there as it is their terrestrial abode. Refer: Ram Charit Manas—(a) Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precedes Doha no. 292; (b) Lanka Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 25; (ii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 28.

Both the above facts—i.e. offering of his own heads ten times, and lifting of Mt. Kailash—have been repeated by Ravana often to boast about his strength, fearlessness and powers. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 29.

Ravana's exploits are legendary and have been elaborately listed at many places in Ram Charit Manas—e.g. (i) in Baal Kand where the origin and establishment of the demon race is described (refer Baal Kand: from Doha no. 178—to Doha/Sortha no. 183); (ii) in Lanka Kand where Ravana and Angad—whom Lord

Ram had sent in an effort to persuade the demon king Ravana to give Sita back and avoid a ruinous war—had an acrimonious, no-holds-barred bitter verbal duel (refer Lanka Kand: Doha no. 25 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8; Doha no. 28 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 3-8); and (iii) in Lanka Kand when Ravana's wife Mandadori tried to persuade her husband to stop being pervert, abandon his stubborn recklessness, and become reasonable so that the demon race escapes annihilation (refer Lanka Kand: Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precedes Doha nos. 8).

But we find that the same mighty and virtually invincible Ravana had not dared to touch Shiva's bow though he was present in the arena. If he had stood up and went up the steps leading to the platform where the bow was kept, all other competing kings would have scrambled for cover to hide themselves as all of them feared this ferocious demon king and would not have certainly not dared to challenge Ravana. Therefore, the decision of Ravana to quietly make his escape and not attempt to break the bow shows that he harboured some secret fear of defeat and humiliation. These facts are mentioned in Ram Charit Manas at a number of places, viz. (i) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 250; (ii) Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 292; (iii) Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3 that precedes Doha no. 256; and (iv) Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 10 that precedes Doha no. 37.

The point is this—by breaking Lord Shiva's bow fearlessly and effortlessly, Lord Ram sent a strong signal to the entire demon race, and especially to Ravana, their king, that he (Lord Ram) was not an ordinary person but the Supreme Lord of the world who has come down to earth to control their (demons') cruelty and tyranny. The demons must realize that only someone more divine and powerful than Shiva would dare to break the latter's bow. Ravana must understand that someone who can easily lift and break Lord Shiva's formidable bow, which even he (Ravana) had not dared to touch, must be some Divine Being and not an ordinary human being.

We shall read later on in the story that Ravana—who was very wise and learned—got this hint; he could read this subtle message. This becomes clear at the time when he decides to abduct Sita so that Lord Ram would come to rescue her and kill him in the ensuing war, because he is convinced in his mind that this is the only way his sinful body of a demon can be eliminated, and his soul can find liberation and deliverance from this body's bondage. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precedes Doha no. 23.

Again we find that at the time of Sita's abduction, Ravana had first mentally bowed his head at the holy feet of Sita to pay his respects to her, felt exceptionally happy to have this golden opportunity to find a way for his and other demons' liberation, and then took her away—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 16 that precedes Doha no. 28.

<sup>2</sup>Refer an extensive note appended to Chaupai line no. 1 above.

Refer also to: (a) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 250; (b) Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 85, stanza no. 3.

These two demons had come to the place of the bow-breaking ceremony thinking that lifting and breaking an old rusty bow was not even worth thinking twice, and that they would lift and break it effortlessly. The trophy was a girl, Sita, who was considered the most beautiful in this world at that time. But when they actually saw the bow they realized that it was beyond their means to lift it and break it. So there was no sense in inviting ridicule and laughter in an assembly where all the great kings and princes of the time were present. All of them had heard of Ravana and Banasur, and if these two demon warriors, who were famed for their strength and valour, were unable to move the bow then there would be nothing more shameful and ignominious for them. So they quietly sneaked away to save their faces.

Out of so many famous demons mentioned in the Purans (ancient mythological histories of Hindus) whose might and strength were legendary and who even the gods feared, only Ravana and Banasur are mentioned here. Why is it so? The context here is the ‘lifting’ of a mighty and heavy bow. So, only those demon warriors who had proven track records of being so strong and powerful that they could very easily and effortlessly lift the mightiest of mountains were selected by the heralds to impress upon the assembly that it would be no joke to lift this bow.

‘Banasur’ had lifted Mt. Meru, the abode of gods—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 292; and ‘Ravana’ had lifted Mt. Kailash, the abode of Lord Shiva himself—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 292.

These two demons ran away because they realized that this bow was heavier than either of the two mountains, viz. Mt. Sumeru and Mt. Kailash. They did not dare even to touch the bow because they felt sure they won’t be able to move it. In other words, the bow was heavier than these two mighty mountains. Hence, the challenge which the kings faced was of stupendous nature, and therefore they must think many times over before showing-off any dare-devilry.

This warning was very crucial and practical as far as king Janak was concerned. In case no invited king or prince was able to lift the bow, then none of them would be able to accuse the king that he had deliberately wanted to insult all of them by not warning them or disclosing to them in advance the special features and unique characters of the bow, and instead instigating them to go and lift the bow with the bait that they would marry his daughter Sita while being certain throughout that all of them would fail to move the bow, what to talk of lifting and breaking it. That means the kings would surmise that Janak had the intent of humiliating all the great kings and princes of the time, and with this in mind he had organized this bow-breaking ceremony. This would lead to revolt and blood-shed.

Hence, as a precautionary measure it was prudent for Janak to disclose in advance the fact that the bow was exceptionally heavy and strong, and to drive home this point the heralds cited the instance of Ravana and Banasur who could not muster enough strength and courage to even attempt to lift the bow.

If we closely examine verse nos. 2-3 we deduce that Ravana and Banasur had already left the venue at the time the heralds made the announcement. It means that these two great demons had arrived at the arena, saw the bow, perhaps even went near it and consulted each other, and then decided that it was better to go away while still there was time to save face. The spies of king Janak were keeping a close watch on all the visitors, and this bit of information was passed on to the king by them, who then instructed his heralds to mention it.

The fact of Ravana having gone to the bow-breaking ceremony and not having the courage to lift the bow was known to his wife Mandodari as she has mentioned this fact while chiding him for abducting Sita to avenge his humiliation, but inviting a ruinous war on Lanka in the process because Lord Ram and his army had launched an assault to free Sita from his captivity—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 10-11 that precede Doha no. 36.

But another question now arises—the demons were well known in this world, and their external features of a ‘demon’ made them stand out from the rest of the living beings, such as the kings and princes in this case. So, why were the kings not able to recognize them? The answer is found in king Janak's statement in Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 251 where he says, while rebuking the kings when none of them were able to move the bow, that—"even the gods and demons have also come here in the form of human beings (kings)".

This fact is also endorsed elsewhere. For instance, in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 241, it is said that—"in that assembly, gods and demons were present in the guise of kings".

Remember: The demons were capable of assuming any form they wished—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, 2nd part of Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 75.

These observations clearly show that these two great demons, Ravana and Banasur, had indeed visited the site of the bow-breaking ceremony though they did not participate, but it was in the form of a king.]

सोइ पुरारि कोदंडु कठोरा । राज समाज आजु जोइ तोरा ॥ ३ ॥
त्रिभुवन जय समेत बैदेही । बिनहिं बिचार बरइ हठि तेही ॥ ४ ॥ sō'i purāri kōdaṇḍu kaṭhōrā. rāja samāja āju jō'i tōrā. 3.

tribhuvana jaya samēta baidēhī. binahim bicāra bara'i haṭhi tēhī. 4.

It is the same bow of Lord Shiva (that scared Ravana and Banasur out of their wits because they felt that their strength would fail in front of this bow, and to escape certain embarrassment and humiliation they simply slithered out of this arena silently!) that is the challenge for you all. In this majestic assembly of great and mighty kings from all corners of the world, anyone who breaks this formidable bow---
(3)

---would not only get the rare honour and an enviable prestige of conquering 'Tribhuvan' (i.e. the entire world consisting of three sections, viz. the heavens, the earth and the nether world or the subterranean world)<sup>1</sup> but would also get the hands of Vaidehi (the daughter of king Videha, Janak, i.e. Sita) in marriage. Vaidehi would marry him without any second thoughts.' (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word "Tribhuvan" has been cleverly used here. Its normal meaning is the world that has three divisions—viz. heaven, earth and nether or subterranean world. But it also indicates the three legendary cities ("Tri" = three; "Bhuvan" = world, habitat, home) of demon Tripura which were destroyed by Lord Shiva, along with the killing of this demon, by using this same bow. Hence, this bow represents the conquest of three invincible cities or worlds.

Therefore, anyone who breaks this bow, which had helped Lord Shiva to conquer Tripura and his three cities, would be deemed as the conqueror of the whole world.]

सुनि पन सकल भूप अभिलाषे । भटमानी अतिसय मन माखे ॥ ५ ॥

परिकर बाँधि उठे अकुलाई । चले इष्टदेवन्ह सिर नाई ॥ ६ ॥

sunī pana sakala bhūpa abhilāṣē. bhaṭamānī atisaya mana mākhē. 5.
parikara bām̐dhi uṭhē akulā'ī. calē iṣṭadēvanha sira nā'ī. 6.

Hearing this vow (of king Janak), all the kings became eager or greedy (to break the bow and get acclaim as being the strongest warrior in the whole world, as well as get Sita in marriage as a trophy for this victory). Those among them who were more egoist and proud of themselves became very angry or annoyed (at the words of the heralds that even Ravana and Banasur had not dared to touch the bow, and therefore they should be careful before attempting any misadventure).<sup>1</sup> (5)

They rose from their seats impatiently, girdled up their loin-cloths (i.e. tied the waistbands tightly around their waists to indicate that they are ready to face any challenge), and moved towards the bow eagerly after bowing their heads before their respective deities (gods) whom they worshipped.<sup>2</sup> (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>All the kings were waiting for this moment. They could not understand the subtle message which the announcement of the heralds contained—that they must think twice before attempting to lift the bow because even the famous demons Ravana and Banasur, who were well known for the might of their arms, had not dared to touch it, lest they would repent later on and blame their host, king Janak, of scheming to insult them en-masse.

The kings were in a quandary: if they did not rise to the occasion, if they kept sitting in the face of this open challenge, then it would be deemed that they have accepted defeat. No self-respecting king would like this humiliation to be heaped on him in this disrespectful way. After all, they had come to participate in the bow ceremony on their own volition and with the clear knowledge that a bow had to be broken. Now if they keep sitting, what would their subjects and companions think of them? It was a piquant situation for them, and when left with no choice between the devil and the deep sea, they decided to try their luck.

This was a normal reaction for competing kings who were invited for an open competition—it makes no sense for anyone in accepting defeat even without attempting to win. This was the first sort of kings who stood up to try their luck.

However, there were many among them who were full of vanity and excessively haughty, proud and egoist. They became angry and annoyed because the heralds had implied that if Ravana and Banasur could not lift the bow then no one can do it. They must have angrily snorted and said under their breaths—“How dare the heralds say so in our presence? Are they threatening us or challenging our self-respect and dignity? What if Ravana or Banasur did not touch the bow? It does not mean that if these two demons did not touch the bow that no one else would be able to move it or lift it? How dare king Janak challenge our strength and power and insult us in this manner. What nonsense is this? Come what may, we will now show these people (the hosts) that we are strong and powerful, and after breaking this rotten and god forsaken bow we will make Janak beg for forgiveness for making so outrightly an insinuating and taunting remark.”

<sup>2</sup>All the competing kings were eager to be the first ones to approach the bow and break it. Everyone was sure that he would break it, and therefore all wanted to be the first person to try his luck at the bow, because if anyone else does it before they get a chance then that person would win the competition, and with it he will get the accompanying fame as the greatest and the strongest king of the world as well as the hands of Sita in marriage.

Hence, all of them rose impatiently from their seats to go to the bow as quickly as possible because there was no time to be lost. In order to ensure victory, they invoked the respective deities they worshipped at home to seek the latter's blessings. As we shall find shortly, all of them failed to move the bow even for a fraction of an inch in spite of their invoking these deities.

What does it indicate in respect to these kings invoking their gods or deities but still failing; why did these deities fail to help their devotees; were these deities helpless or powerless? Well, there is a very important message hidden in this development—and it is this: a person must worship only the Supreme Lord, and not so many gods and goddesses as these kings did. Can a junior king or a knight defy the wishes of the Emperor under whose patronage or tutelage he survives? Can a junior king ever retain his kingdom or domain if he goes against the will of the Emperor?

The 'Emperor' or the 'Supreme Being' here is Lord Ram, as he is an incarnation of Lord Vishnu, the Viraat Purush and the Supreme Lord of the world. Even Lord Shiva, who himself is honoured by the epithet of a Great God, the 'Maha-Deva', could not or did not interfere with Lord Ram breaking the bow. The Mother Goddess, Parvati, had already blessed Sita that her wishes to marry Lord Ram would be fulfilled. (Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Sortha/Doha no. 236 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 5-8 and the Chanda that follows them.)

All other gods and goddesses are junior to Lord Shiva and Parvati respectively. These kings did not realize that even Lord Shiva himself worships Lord Ram and repeats the holy name of the Lord, i.e. "RAM", as his chosen Mantra (spiritual formula). For instance, refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 51; Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 52; Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 60 etc.

Parvati had herself bowed at the holy feet of Lord Ram on some previous occasion—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 55.

So in this situation, with Lord Ram himself present in the assembly, and that too in the company of the great sage Vishwamitra, it was an exercise in futility for these ignorant kings to boast of their strengths (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-7 that precede Doha no. 245) and then ask their respective deities to support them in their pretensions (as indicated in the present Chaupai no. 6).]

तमकि ताकि तकि सिवधनु धरहीं । उठइ न कोटि भाँति बलु करहीं ॥ ७ ॥
जिन्ह के कछु बिचारु मन माहीं । चाप समीप महीप न जाहीं ॥ ८ ॥

tamaki tāki taki sivadhanu dharahīm. uṭha'i na kōṭi bhāmṭi balu karahīm. 7.
jinha kē kachu bicāru mana māhīm. cāpa samīpa mahīpa na jāhīm. 8.

When the (haughty and adamant) kings approached the bow in a huff, they looked at it contemptuously, grabbed it angrily, grappled with it with all their strength and skill, but still the stubborn bow did not move a bit though they tried and tried repeatedly with all their might, applying the best of tactics that they were aware of<sup>1</sup>. (7)

But those kings who had some wisdom and common sense in them sensed that it is better not to make a fool out of themselves, and so they did not even go near the bow to try to move and lift it<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 89, stanza no. 4 also.

As we have observed in the note of the previous verse, all the kings who decided to break the bow did not waste any time because they wanted to get a first chance to lift it and break it lest someone else beats them to it and is declared victorious. In this situation, there was a virtual rush for the bow. The competing kings pushed and shoved each other, huffing and puffing, not bothering to maintain basic dignity and solemnity of the occasion. They all milled around the bow and jostled with each other.

So, as soon as the kings reached the bow, they grabbed it contemptuously, and when it did not budge from its position they naturally became angry and annoyed. Initially, in their first attempt, they may have thought that it is easy to lift this old and rusted bow. But soon they discovered to their dismay that this wretched bow is quite a bit of challenge for them. So they became alarmed and applied all the tricks of the warrior's profession as well as all the strength they possessed to make this stubborn bow move. No matter how hard and expertly they all tried, first one after another, and then jointly (refer: Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 251 below), the bow did not relent at all; it did not budge a fraction of an inch from its place.

Imagine the scene. There were thousands of kings and princes vying with each other to lift the bow. In the beginning, the more domineering ones amongst the kings elbowed in forcefully and pushed aside their competitors to be the first ones to touch the bow and lift it. When they showed signs of frustration, those who were waiting for their turn must have passed caustic or sarcastic comments at them, further irritating the kings who were at the bow. There must have been howls of cat-calls, smirks and smiles all around.

The kings waiting for their chance were closely observing those kings who were attempting to lift the bow; they observed the different maneuvers and moves the kings were making in their attempt to lift the bow. So, while waiting for their own chance, they must have been thinking of some newer tactics and planning better strategies to tackle the adamant bow. As more and more kings failed dismally and either returned to their seats or stood around planning better strategies, abject despondency was writ large on their faces. They were all crestfallen, had lowered heads heavy with shame, bore a haggard look of defeat and ignominy.

<sup>2</sup>Meanwhile, those kings who were waiting for their turn watched these defeated kings, creating alarm and fear of certain defeat and humiliation in their own minds. A lot many of the kings must have cursed themselves to come here at all because their confidence collapsed; they felt that they have but little chance to win. But now it was a sticky situation because it was too late to withdraw: to return without trying their hand at the bow would make them a laughing stock in the assembly. So they consulted amongst themselves and took the position that since it is too late to go back now, it's better to try to lift the bow. In case they succeed, well and good; and in case they failed, then also their shame would be less marked as there were hundreds of kings who had failed before them and had walked away with lowered heads. Hence they thought that by the time they return empty-handed, a pall of gloom would already have descended upon the assembly as one after another king returned defeated. So their own defeat would not attract as much attention as the case of those kings who were defeated in the beginning of the competition.

The first batch of defeated kings faced hooting and cat-calls, but gradually the atmosphere became sombre and grave. The latter round of defeats was expected, and therefore they invited little attention and raised fewer eye-brows as compared to the case with the initial round of defeats because the more strong and powerful amongst the kings were the ones who had pushed themselves ahead of the line to make the first attempt, and all of them had already failed. Therefore, those kings who were in the back of the queue, those who still had to try their luck, could see their fate coming, as did the crowd watching the competition from the stands. Hence, these waiting kings decided to hold fast and try to lift the bow nevertheless, instead of going back to their seats at this late stage, because they had nothing to lose.]

दो०. तमकि धरहिं धनु मूढ़ नृप उठइ न चलहिं लजाइ ।

मनहुँ पाइ भट बाहुबलु अधिकु अधिकु गरुआइ ॥ २५० ॥

dōhā.

tamaki dharahim dhanu mūr̥ha nr̥pa uṭha'i na calahim lajā'i.
manahum̐ pā'i bhaṭa bāhubalu adhiku adhiku garu'ā'i. 250.

The stupid kings indignantly tried to move the bow with all their might, but no matter how hard they strained the bow refused to be lifted. At last, all of them went away in shame, being overcome with a sense of abject despair and despondency.

It appeared that the bow mysteriously absorbed the strength of these kings, becoming heavier with each attempt they made<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 250)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This is a figure of speech employed by the poet Tulsidas to emphasise that the bow was so heavy that it surpassed the combined strength of all the kings. This fact will be clear when we read the next verse which says that it did not move even when all the kings—numbering ten thousand—applied their combined strength to make it move.

In practical terms the meaning is that the bow was very-very heavy on its own account from the beginning; it was so built. It hadn't actually absorbed any strength from any king; it's impossible for this to happen. But one after another each king thought that his predecessor was not as strong as he, and when he himself failed to move the bow it appeared to all those present that the bow was becoming heavier with each new attempt made by all subsequent kings who tried to move it.]

चौ०. भूप सहस दस एकहि बारा । लगे उठावन टरइ न टारा ॥ १ ॥

डगइ न संभु सरासनु कैसैं । कामी बचन सती मनु जैसैं ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

bhūpa sahasa dasa ēkahi bārā. lagē uṭhāvana ṭara'i na ṭārā. 1.
daga'i na sambhu sarāsanu kaisēm̐. kāmī bacana satī manu jaisēm̐. 2.

Ten thousand kings tried to move and lift the bow simultaneously, but to their utter dismay the bow did not move even a bit inspite of all their rigorous effort and straining that they made<sup>1</sup>. (1)

No matter how hard the kings tried, Lord Shiva's bow would not move even a bit just like the case of a Sati (a chaste and honourable woman who is loyal and faithful to her husband) who remains unmoved and unaffected by passionate and lustful words said by a lascivious and immoral man<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In the beginning the kings tried to move the bow individually. But when all of them failed they threw all caution and principles of morality to the wind by trying to lift the bow together. Did they give a thought that if all of them—ten thousand of them!—succeeded in lifting and breaking the bow then what would be the fate of Sita. It would be a most incredulous development to happen if they indeed succeeded in their attempt—because then Sita would be married to “ten thousand kings”! It is hilarious and incredibly ridiculous to even think of this, what to talk of this actually materialising.

This very thought that one girl would have to share “ten thousand husbands” is exceedingly immoral and against the basic norms of a civilised society; it's against the principles of ‘Dharma’—the principles of probity, propriety, ethics and proper conduct. Did these frustrated kings ever think of it? No—and this is the reason why such kings were called sinful, wicked and pervert, who had become blind in their vanity, passion and ego, in Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 245 earlier.

Now, if we read this verse along with its preceding verses we come to the conclusion that after being unable to move the bow individually, either the kings returned to their seats and kept a low profile to avoid further embarrassment, or they stood milling around the bow planning new strategies amongst themselves. Of course all of them were smarting from the insult, so when none could move the bow they made a clarion call: “Come all of you; we will not go back without lifting this wretched bow and allowing this lifeless rusty thing to humiliate us in this abject fashion. So let us all put our combined strength together to trounce this stubborn bow and regain our lost prestige and self-respect. This old and rusty piece of a nuisance, the wretched ‘bow’, won't be able to stand against our combined will and power. So brothers and friends, let us stand together to defeat this enemy that has put all of us to shame. We won't allow this to happen!”

One wonders how so many kings could find place to stand shoulder to shoulder and simultaneously touch the bow in order to move or push it. Well, the most plausible answer is that they must have tied a number of iron chains to the bow and pulled at it together. Or, since the verse says that the bow refused to be “lifted”, it may have been some sort of heavy-duty pulley that they used.

<sup>2</sup>A “Sati” pays no attention to lustful advances of a lascivious man who tries his best to lure her into having an affair with him.

The comparison of the bow with a Sati is significant. A Sati is devoted to her husband, and no matter how hard a pervert man tries to attract her attention, she neglects him. The Sati has a dominance of ‘Satvic Guna’ (virtuous qualities) in her, while the lascivious man has ‘Tama Guna’ (evil qualities) as his dominant character. Here, the bow is of a ‘Sata Guna’ because it belonged to Lord Shiva, and therefore it is like the Sati and held its ground against the efforts of the greedy kings who were like the lustful man because they had predominance of ‘Tama Guna’ in them. These kings were boastful as well as sinful as they had not bothered about the fate of innocent Sita should they succeed in breaking the bow in their “thousands”. Hence, the Sata Guna driven bow decided to teach these Tama Guna driven kings by not moving a bit.]

सब नृप भए जोगु उपहासी । जैसें बिनु बिराग संन्यासी ॥ ३ ॥ कीरति बिजय बीरता भारी । चले चाप कर बरबस हारी ॥ ४ ॥

saba nṛpa bha'e jōgu upahāsī. jaisēm binu birāga sann'yāsī. 3.
kīrati bijaya bīratā bhārī. calē cāpa kara barabasa hārī. 4.

All the vain kings made themselves objects of high ridicule, laughter and scorn just like a Sanyasi (a renunciate; a recluse) who lacks Vairagya (renunciation, detachment, dispassion etc.) (3)

All of them helplessly forfeited their claim of fame, glory, victory and bravery at the hands of the bow. (4)

[Note—Everyone laughed at the defeated king, especially those kings who had desisted from making an attempt themselves and had even advised these kings to avoid sure humiliation by not going near the bow because it was certain that Sita would be married to Lord Ram. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 1-4, and 8 that precede Doha no. 245—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 246.

But the haughty and impervious kings won't listen, and instead, they boasted that no one can marry Sita without breaking the bow as long as they were present—refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-7 that precede Doha no. 245.

Now such kings had no answer; all their vanity and haughtiness, all their loud-mouthed talk of valour and strength crumbled like ninepins and a house of cards.

The condition of the defeated kings was like a Sanyasi who remains attached to the attractions of the material world and harbours desires in his heart for gratification of the senses inspite of his taking the vows of renunciation and declaring his detachment from everything pertaining to the material world. People laugh at such persons; they are subjected to scorn and ridicule by everyone they meet; they are put to shame and invite ignominy. Then they repent that it would have been wiser and better if they hadn't become a Sanyasi in the first place. Likewise, the defeated kings now regretted and lamented that it would have been better for them if they had paid attention to warnings by wiser kings and had refrained from participating in the competition.

All their boast of strength, valour, power and majesty was reduced to dust against the formidable wall of the bow; they could not scale it (refer: the present Chaupai no. 4). All their hopes of being declared the “greatest warrior of all times, the most powerful and the strongest king in the entire world who has won the hands of Sita in marriage after being declared victorious in the once-in-a-lifetime competition (refer: Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 250)” crumbled like a clod of mud when it hits a wall.

The infamy and humiliation was more striking when they could not move the bow as compared to a defeat at the hands of a human enemy during a battle because in the latter case at least the enemy is alive, is active, and it is a duel where both parties try their best in a dynamic manner to subdue the other, but in the case of the bow the latter laid passively on its platform, it did not fight back like a human enemy, but still managed to defeat the kings by not moving a bit.]

श्रीहत भए हारि हियँ राजा । बैठे निज निज जाइ समाजा ॥ ५ ॥

नृपन्ह बिलोकि जनकु अकुलाने । बोले बचन रोष जनु साने ॥ ६ ॥

śrīhata bha'e hāri hiyaṁ rājā. baiṭhē nija nija jā'i samājā. 5.

nṛpanha bilōki janaku akulānē. bōlē bacana rōṣa janu sānē. 6.

Despondent, crestfallen, distraught, disheartened, embarrassed, forlorn, frustrated and humiliated (śrīhata bha'e), the defeated kings went to their seats and sat down with a low head in the company of those who had accompanied them to the venue (such as their ministers, courtiers, attendants etc.)<sup>1</sup>. (5)

Seeing the defeated kings who bore signs of abject despair and excess of shame writ large on their faces (and all of them had literally surrendered before the stubbornness of the 'bow' which had decided not to yield any ground and to inflict shame and humiliation on all the competing kings in one single master-stroke), king Janak became exceedingly peeved, impatient and worried (janaku akulānē).

[This was obviously because if none of the kings or princes could break the bow, his daughter would have to remain unmarried. This was an eventuality no father would want to happen. Janak was getting impatient as the time was passing away fast and in spite of all their efforts none of the warriors could move the bow an inch. He was worried about the fate that awaited his daughter, as well as the spectre of war that loomed large when he observed the belligerent mood of the competing kings who he guessed would raise their swords and begin a fight to hide their shame and defeat.]

Then he (stood up and) spoke words that had a clear tinge of anger in them.

[In other words, when all the kings failed to move the bow and returned to their seats defeated and crestfallen, king Janak stood up and rebuked all of them. He vented his frustration and rebuked all of them in angry words which follow below.]<sup>2</sup> (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 89, stanza no. 5 also.

After being humiliated en-masse by the adamant bow as described in Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 251 above, all the kings—remember, they were “ten thousand of them”—lost all shine on their faces, which now looked weary, haggard and ashamed. They dragged themselves somehow to their seats and slumped in them. Their friends and relatives tried to comfort them to the best of their abilities. They must have hidden their faces in their palms to avoid the glare of the assembly. They must have been wringing their hands and squirming in their seats in anger at being forced to accept defeat from such an inconsequential and lifeless thing as an old and rusty bow.

They were waiting for revenge, and the opportunity would soon come. We shall soon read that when Sita was putting the victory garland around the neck of Lord Ram, these kings rose in revolt and there was a sudden spectre of a looming war and mayhem. It was at this instant that sage Parashuram arrived angrily at the venue to punish anyone who had dared to break his revered Lord Shiva's bow. Seeing this angry sage, all the kings scrambled for cover and hid themselves wherever they could—because Parashuram had a reputation of killing members of the Kshatriya (kingly or warrior) race at the least provocation. It was so planned by the Creator that nothing would go wrong—because the arrival of Parashuram at the moment when the kings had drawn their weapons and were ready for a fight had prevented a battle which otherwise was sure to have taken place. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 266—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 268; and Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precedes Doha no. 269.

<sup>2</sup>Refer also: (a) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 292 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 4-8; and (b) Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 89, stanza no. 5.

King Janak was the most concerned man in the assembly because it was he who would have to bear with the ignominy and pain of being instrumental in ruining the future of his daughter by making such an incongruous vow that was impractical to implement. Now, what will he do; how will he show his face to the world; what would his own subjects say about him; how will he morally answer his daughter whose future was ruined by his stubbornness; wasn't he becoming a butt of laughter in the society?

Though his intention was good—that he must find the strongest and ablest warrior for his daughter, but he had not been practical and had not weighed the pros and cons of his decision of tying his daughter's future with a bow that belonged to Lord Shiva. He should have thought over the matter and consulted senior members of the society, such as Brahmins and others, before deciding to get this special bow that belonged to no one less than Lord Shiva himself broken for such a humdrum worldly routine affair as getting his daughter married. He repented now for his decision; he lamented that he had made a great mistake by annoying Shiva by putting the sanctity of the Lord's bow at stake—because getting it 'broken' could be interpreted as an insult to Lord Shiva. 'Why didn't I think of it?—the king must have regretted.

All the competing kings would go home and forget about this bitter incident over time, but what would Janak do? As long as he lives, this incident would keep biting at his conscience and make life hell for him.

But now it was too late. Janak was extremely perturbed and disheartened. His frustration manifested itself in the form of anger and rebuke for the kings.]

दीप दीप के भूपति नाना । आए सुनि हम जो पनु ठाना ॥ ७ ॥

देव दनुज धरि मनुज सरीरा । बिपुल बीर आए रनधीरा ॥ ८ ॥

dīpa dīpa kē bhūpati nānā. ā'ē suni hama jō panu ṭhānā. 7.
dēva danuja dhari manuja sarīrā. bipula bīra ā'ē ranadhīrā. 8.

#The king spoke in a stern voice with a tone marked by anger, rebuke and frustration—'Countless great kings from all the continents and islands on earth ("Deep, Deep"—i.e. from all corners of the earth) have come here after hearing of my vows (that they would have to participate in a competition where Lord Shiva's bow was to be lifted and broken, and anyone who succeeded in it would not only be gifted

my daughter Sita in marriage but would also be declared the most gallant and strong king in the entire world<sup>1</sup>). (7)

What to talk of human beings, even the gods and the great demons have come here in the guise of humans. There are innumerable warriors of all hues and denominations, warriors who pride themselves for their gallantry, strength, valour, courage and invincibility, who have assembled here. (8)

[Note—#King Janak’s angry words and expression of utter disgust and frustration as well as regret and feeling of sorrow at the fate of Sita has been narrated in Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 1/89, stanza nos. 6-7 also.

<sup>1</sup>Refer: The declaration of the heralds in Doha no. 249 and its following Chaupai line nos. 1-4.]

दो०. कुअँरि मनोहर बिजय बड़ि कीरति अति कमनीय । पावनिहार बिरंचि जनु रचेउ न धनु दमनीय ॥ २५१ ॥

dōhā.

ku'amṛi manōhara bijaya baḍi kīrati ati kamanīya.
pāvanihāra birañci janu racē'u na dhanu damanīya. 251.

Inspite of a beautiful princess as the prize to be won (in the form of marriage with her), along with a triumph that would have bestowed astounding fame and splendid glory of being the strongest and the most powerful warrior of the world, a glory and fame that would have been matchless, fabulous and awe-inspiring—it is so frustrating and dismaying to discover that it appears the Creator has not made anyone who could match this honour, who could get this credit by breaking the bow. It appears that the bow was made not to be broken by anyone created by the Creator! (Doha no. 251)

[Note—King Janak sternly rebuked the competing kings. All of them had boasting till now of their strength and valour and the greatness of the family they belonged to. Why then could they not break the bow? Is it because they did not put their heart and soul and best of efforts into lifting and breaking the bow as they thought it not worthwhile because the reward for being successful was not upto their expectations? And therefore, is this the reason why none could break the bow? This factor played heavily in the mind of Janak when he chided the kings with his observation about the uniqueness of the reward—viz. the hands of Sita, who was matchless in beauty and charm in this world, in marriage.

At the same time, it seems out of place for a father of king Janak’s stature to call his own daughter “a beautiful princess as the prize to be won” in a public place. It must be remembered here that Janak is overwhelmed by anger and frustration and worry about his daughter, and in this tumultuous state of mind which was under immense emotional stress he had forgotten about what to say and what not to.

Besides this aspect, the point that Janak wished to make was that if the kings and princes hadn’t known that his daughter Sita was exceptionally beautiful, they wouldn’t have rushed to try their luck in marrying her. Of course they also knew that this marriage was tied to the breaking of the bow, but in their eagerness and greed to grab Sita as their wife they had overlooked that this bow was not an ordinary one but belonged to Lord Shiva, a fact that should have rung alarm bells in their minds. They had become so greedy and passionate that they thought they would be able to break the bow by invoking the blessings of their personal deities, something they actually did—refer: Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 250. Then now, what has happened? Aren't they all ashamed of themselves? Shame to all of them!

In order to understand why the kings decided to participate in this competition inspite of knowing that the bow that was to be broken belonged to Lord Shiva and it would be a formidable obstacle in their realising their dream of marrying Sita, we must look at the natural character and mentality of kings. All these kings must have thought that it made sense to at least try their luck, for if they succeeded then the rewards were great. After all, kings are not averse to taking risks to enhance their reputation and expand their realms by conquest. They are accustomed in equal measure to defeat and victory; they take such things in their stride. The kings are, by nature and habit, impulsive, egoist and full of vanity; they want to grab everything on offer. Shying away from open challenge is demeaning and insulting for them. And for this they usually don't bother too much for the consequences of their actions, nor do they do too much of procrastination before acting—because they want to be the first one to grab the honour of being valiant and brave. If they defer decisions then someone else would grab the opportunity.

As for the stupendity of the fame and glory that would accompany the breaking of the bow, the heralds of Janak had already declared them in Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precedes Doha no. 250 above.]

चौ०. कहहु काहि यहु लाभु न भावा । काहुँ न संकर चाप चढ़ावा ॥ १ ॥

रहउ चढ़ाउब तोरब भाई । तिलु भरि भूमि न सके छड़ाई ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

kahahu kāhi yahu lābhu na bhāvā. kāhum'na saṅkara cāpa caṛhāvā. 1.
raha'u caṛhā'uba tōraba bhāī. tilu bhari bhūmi na sakē charāī. 2.

Say, who would not like to get this reward and honour? Say then, why couldn't anyone lift and string this bow of Lord Shiva? (1)

Forget about lifting and string it or breaking it, no one could as much as move it even a bit from the ground! [How shameful and ignominious it is; how disgusting and humiliating it is.] (2)

[Note—King Janak prodded the competing kings to come clean and to tell the assembly the actual reason for their not making an all-out effort to break the bow if the case is such. It is simply unbelievable that not a single person could as much as move an old rusty bow an inch from its place on the ground, though all those who tried their hands had prided themselves as great warriors of matchless reputation, as very strong and powerful kings. Where has all that boast gone now?

Why, if some amongst the kings thought that the challenge of breaking the bow was too small for them as it undermined their dignity and self-respect by trying to test their gallantry, valour, strength and prowess against an old and rusty thing, then they must remember that king Janak had no intention to insult them by making them lift an old and non-descript bow—because this challenge was most formidable as the bow was not an ordinary old and rusty one but that which belonged to Lord Shiva, and one which even two formidable demon kings, Ravana and Banasur, had dared not touch—refer: Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 250.

As for the matchless beauty and charm of Sita, she personified these virtues themselves—refer: Doha no. 247 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that have been narrated above.

Hence, the reward as well as the challenge was most appropriate for and befitting the stature of great kings. So, what was the problem?

Does it mean that no one could match the high standards of gallantry, valour, strength and power that Janak had envisioned in his mind to be the quality of the person who would be eligible as a groom for his beloved daughter Sita when he decided to hold this competition to find such a person? Well, as the things stood, it appears that this is the case, that it is the truth. The earth seems to lack ‘true warriors’; those who declare themselves as being strong and invincible are in fact pretentious and boastful, having nothing in substance. All of the kings are hollow balloons, and shame to them!!]

अब जनि कोउ माखै भट मानी । बीर बिहीन मही मैं जानी ॥ ३ ॥

तजहु आस निज निज गृह जाहू । लिखा न बिधि बैदेहि बिबाहू ॥ ४ ॥

सुकृत्तु जाइ जौं पनु परिहरऊँ । कुअँरि कुआरि रहउ का करऊँ ॥ ५ ॥

जौं जनतेउँ बिनु भट भुबि भाई । तौ पनु करि होतेउँ न हँसाई ॥ ६ ॥ aba jani kō'u mākhai bhaṭa mānī. bīra bihīna mahī mair̥m jānī. 3.

tajahu āsa nija nija gr̥ha jāhū. likhā na bidhi baidēhi bibāhū. 4.

sukṛtu jā'i jaum̐ panu parihara'um̐. ku'am̐ri ku'āri raha'u kā kara'um̐. 5.

jaum̐ janatē'um̐ binu bhaṭa bhubi bhā'ī. tau panu kari hōtē'um̐ na haṁsā'ī. 6.

Let no warrior show any signs of anger and a wish for revenge now at this stage (because equal opportunity was given to all, and the formidable nature of the bow was also disclosed in clear terms by my heralds)<sup>1</sup>.

Don't get angry when I say that now I have realized that the earth is devoid of a real gallant warrior who can be said to possess the grand qualities of strength, power and valour that are expected from him<sup>2</sup>. (3)

Abandon all hopes (of marrying Sita) now, and go back home. [I am not going to rescind on my vows. So don't think that I will contemplate upon any alternative arrangement to get my daughter married. It is unthinkable for me. Therefore, it is futile for all of you to wait here in my kingdom any longer in the hope of marrying Sita by other means. You better go back to your kingdoms as early as possible.]

It looks that Vidhi (Creator) had not written in the destiny of Vaidehi (Sita, the daughter of the king of Videha, king Janak) that she would be married. [In other words, it is Sita's destiny that she will remain unmarried for the rest of her life. The Creator hadn't wanted her to marry. So be it; I can't change her destiny.] (4)

If I abandon my vows and divert from it, then I will invite scorn, ignominy and infamy as a person who is not trustworthy and one who breaks his vows, for it is said in all sooth that the word of a noble king is his bond; it will ruin my immaculate reputation and honour. [An honourable king is expected to live up to his words no matter what happens. This is a noble character in all great kings; there is nothing more sinful and ignominious for a king than breaking his own word and going back on his declarations.]<sup>3</sup>

Therefore, I can't help it now if the princess (Sita) remains unmarried; I am helpless as I can't do anything at this stage. (5)

Oh brothers! Had I known that the earth is devoid of real warriors (i.e. 'warrior kings'), I wouldn't have made this vow (that Sita would be married to anyone who breaks Lord Shiva's bow) and become a butt of laughter and ridicule in this world.<sup>4</sup> (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 249—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 250.

Janak was a wise and elderly king; he had sensed the simmering signs of revenge by the demeanours of the defeated kings.

<sup>2</sup>Janak said, in effect, that inspite of the explicit warning that this bow belonged to Lord Shiva, and that Ravana and Banasur (the two demon warriors renowned the world over for their matchless strength and abilities as they had easily lifted two huge mountains known as Kailash and Meru which were the abodes of Lord Shiva and the gods respectively, a feat that is not a joke, had refrained from even touching the bow what to talk of attempting to lift it), all the kings paid no heed and boldly dared to lift the bow. Therefore, they have no moral ground to accuse Janak of employing any sort of deceit or subterfuge to insult and humiliate them in open court.

Janak also said that all of them were well aware of the nature of the competition and the reward that was to be given. They weren't ignorant of anything; nothing was hidden from them. They had known that it was Shiva's bow and that the reward would be marriage with Janak's daughter Sita when invitations were sent to all corners of the earth. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 251 with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 7-8.

So, the defeated kings and princes had no ground to vent their frustration for defeat by rising in revolt and creating an unsavoury scene now.

He was very angry for another reason also—he had watched with alarm, indignation and utter disgust when "ten thousand kings" had tried to move the bow simultaneously--refer: Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 251. How horrible, immoral and incredulous it was for a father to even imagine that in the unfortunate eventuality that they succeeded in moving and breaking the bow together, he would be forced to marry his daughter to all these mad and pervert men who were no less than personified greedy-and-lustful demons in the guise of kings.

So, Janak now sternly rebukes them without any reservation or mincing words. This made the defeated kings more ashamed of themselves. As we shall read a little later, they did rise in revolt to avenge their humiliation in Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 266 herein below.

<sup>3</sup>The same thing is said about king Dasrath of Ayodhya, the honourable father of Lord Ram, in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-6 that precede Doha no. 28. However, the context here is absolutely different. Queen Kaikeyi wanted to make her son Bharat, the younger brother of Lord Ram, as the king of Ayodhya instead of Ram who was the eldest of the four brothers and was planned to be anointed on the throne by his father, Dasrath, soon. So she threw tantrums and invoked two promises that her husband had made to her in some distant past but were still pending to be implemented. She had doubts that the king would not keep his vows, so she wanted an assurance or guarantee from him. It was at this time that Dasrath had said that “it is an established tradition amongst members of king Raghu’s dynasty to which he belonged that they would gladly lay their lives but not break their own words, that there is no greater sin than speaking a lie or denying the truth”.

The same idea is being expressed by Janak here. He would prefer to see his beloved daughter remain unmarried than going back on his words and inviting ridicule and infamy for all times to come.

<sup>4</sup>Janak literally said that all of you are impotent. A warrior who lacks strength and can’t even move an old rusty bow is no better than an impotent man.

After all the diatribe, Janak has used the affable term “brothers” (‘Bhaai’) to assuage ruffled feelings and soothen tempers amongst the kings when he scolded and rebuked them in stern words. “Brothers” is a polite mode of address, and Janak intended to convey the message that despite whatever that has happened he harbours no ill-will against any of the kings. They and he are brothers belonging to the same fraternity of great kings. So they should not harbour any animosity against him. They must understand the pain and grief in his heart as a father who has to face the bleak future of his daughter staring at his face.

This word “brother” has been used by Janak in his concluding sentence, implying that he has nothing more to speak.]

जनक बचन सुनि सब नर नारी । देखि जानकिहि भए दुखारी ॥ ७ ॥

माखे लखनु कुटिल भइँ भौंहे । रदपट फरकत नयन रिसौंहे ॥ ८ ॥

janaka bacana suni saba nara nārī. dēkhi jānakihi bha'e dukhārī. 7.
mākhē lakhanu kuṭila bha'im' bhaunhēm. radapaṭa pharakata nayana risaunhēm. 8.

Hearing these deeply agonized words of Janak lamenting the dark future of his daughter Sita, all the assembled men and women looked at her (Sita) and felt very sorry for her; they felt very sad and hurt for her in their hearts<sup>1</sup>. (7)

Laxman became incensed (by the words of Janak). His eyebrows narrowed and his forehead furrowed as his eyes spit fire and lips quivered in anger and indignation<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When the assembled citizens heard that Janak would not make an alternative arrangement to marry Sita as declared by him above, they were overwhelmed with gloom and sorrows. Initially they may have thought that in case none is able to break the bow, then in that eventuality Janak would implement some alternative arrangement that he must have had planned before hand in his mind. Any wise man would always have alternatives ready in case the main plan fails. But Janak was so confident that surely the Creator must have readied some suitable groom for Sita because he, the Creator, can’t be so cruel as to force a girl to remain unmarried for life. His (Janak’s) job was just to trace the designated groom decided for Sita by the Creator. He had no inkling of what was to come.

As we shall see soon, Janak was not wrong in this surmising. The Creator had indeed decided a groom for Sita, and that groom was Lord Ram. So obviously, how could the Creator let others break the bow and marry Sita? But being a human being after all, Janak was not aware of certain things, such as who would be Sita's groom as decided by the Creator.

We have a lesson to learn here. We accuse our destiny and our God for all the ills that befall us during the course of our lives. When we face some problem we lament that God is not listening to us or is stone-hearted. It is not that at all: we must have trust and faith in the Lord's overall intention of ensuring our welfare like a loving Father should. Times of misery and pain and grief in life are the tests of our faith and love and trust in the Lord our Father. Who would not like to pass in any test that he is subjected to? We do our best to pass this and that test in the world to qualify for this or that post, but we fail in the 'great test' of life when we lose our confidence, faith, love and devotion in our Lord, the Supreme Father! We can trust our worldly father for doing us well and helping us when we need him, but the great irony is we doubt our Supreme Father.

A very remarkable thing is to be observed here. While all the men and women, along with king Janak, his queen and the rest of his family (refer: Doha no. 255—to Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precedes Doha no. 256) were overcome with sorrows and grief, Sita, who should have been the one most distressed and grieving as she was directly affected, showed no emotions or signs of grief when none of the kings were able to break the bow. Why was this? The reason is that she hadn't wanted to marry any one of them in the first place. In fact, she must have given a sigh of relief that now she wouldn't be forced to marry any of the kings against her will.

From the very beginning she had a desire in her heart to marry Lord Ram, and this fact has been repeatedly said in many previous verses. [Refer: Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 248.] Therefore, she must have felt relieved when her father king Janak declared all the kings defeated. She knew that sage Vishwamitra, who was a great sage with tremendous mystical powers, would surely do something now because Lord Ram had yet not gone to the bow.

Further, besides this, she remembered the blessings of goddess Parvati in the garden temple when she had blessed her that she would get the groom of her choice. [Refer: Doha no. 236 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 6-8 and the accompanying Chanda.]

So, Sita stood assured that whatever has happened would be for her good. There was nothing to worry.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 89, stanza nos. 8-9 also.

Laxman got very angry because Janak had said that "the earth is devoid of true warrior kings". Why and how dare he utter such insulting words when they, he himself and his elder brother Ram who themselves belonged to a famous warrior family of Ayodhya, were personally present in the assembly? They hadn't been given a chance, and therefore such blanket condemnation of all kings as being impotent and lacking strength is uncalled for and unjustified. So, Laxman became furious as he took umbrage at the statement of Janak.]

दो०. कहि न सकत रघुबीर डर लगे बचन जनु बान ।

नाइ राम पद कमल सिरु बोले गिरा प्रमान ॥ २५२ ॥

dōhā.

kahi na sakata raghubīra ḍara lagē bacana janu bāna.
nā'i rāma pada kamala siru bōlē girā pramāna. 252.

He (Laxman) wanted to retort and rebuke Janak for making such insulting general statements without thinking. Though Janak's scathing words hit him like arrows, yet he could not speak out of fear of annoying Raghubir (Lord Ram, the brave warrior of the Raghu dynasty).

So, he first bowed at the lotus-like (holy) feet of Lord Ram (to seek his permission; to imply that he be forgiven for what he was about to say to defend the honour of their family). Then he spoke truthful words. [That is, whatever Laxman said was not boastful, but matter of fact.] (Doha no. 252.)

[Note—Laxman always showed the greatest of respect for his elder brother Lord Ram. Whenever any development happened which may, even remotely, be insulting for his revered Lord, Laxman stood up in arms to protect him and defend his dignity. We shall read about this nature of Laxman at many places in the story of Ramayan later on.

Meanwhile, Laxman hesitated to stand up and rebuke Janak because he was the latter was his host and a great respected king. Any father whose daughter faced the bleak future that Sita now purportedly faced would make him emotionally upset and lose his mental balance and calm. Laxman also observed that not all the invited kings had participated in the lifting of the bow; some had completely abstained—refer: Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 245—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 246. These kings had not objected to Janak's caustic outburst.

So, Laxman initially felt a little constrained and could not decide whether to speak or not, lest his anger may annoy Lord Ram. The Lord may get angry at him for speaking unnecessarily instead of keeping quiet in a dignified manner. It is not good manners to speak angrily against the host, especially when the latter is not at fault, is speaking in a general manner without targeting any individual in particular, and is a noble king no less great than their own father, king Dasrath of Ayodhya.

Wouldn't it be more decent if Laxman just stands up, raises his hand and seeks permission either for himself or his brother to go to the bow, lift it and break it, instead of spouting fire and brimstone?

So, Laxman politely sought permission from Lord Ram before he spoke.

One very significant observation can be made here—Laxman has sought permission from Lord Ram, but not from sage Vishwamitra. This is because he knew that if Lord Ram gives him permission then it is deemed that he must have taken prior approval from the sage. Orders are taken through a chain of command: the junior takes permission from his immediate superior, and the latter in turn takes permission from the person higher up in the hierarchy. Therefore, Laxman would seek permission from Lord Ram, and the latter would then ask sage Vishwamitra if he gives his consent.

And therefore, for all practical purposes, as far as Laxman was concerned, permission from Lord Ram meant permission from the great sage too, because Lord Ram would never give his consent for anything for which the sage does not approve. The fact that Laxman then spoke out his mind in the strongest of terms is a proof that both Lord Ram and sage Vishwamitra approved of it.

But we shall also read below that in his anger and zest to defend the honour and dignity of his race, and more importantly of his revered Lord Ram, sometimes he crossed the limits of dignity and politeness while pouring scorn at Janak. At those times Lord Ram had to intervene to restrain Laxman—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 254.

The reader is requested to see note appended to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 254 herein below which further explains this Doha in another context.]

चौ०. रघुबंसिन्ह महुँ जहँ कोउ होई । तेहिं समाज अस कहइ न कोई ॥ १ ॥
कही जनक जसि अनुचित बानी । बिद्यमान रघुकुल मनि जानी ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

raghubansinha mahum' jaham' kō'u hō'ī. tēhim samāja asa kaha'i na kō'ī. 1.
kahī janaka jasi anucita bānī. bidyamāna raghukula mani jānī. 2.

Laxman spoke in a scathing language, pouring fire and brimstone: ‘No one dares to speak in the way it has been spoken (by Janak) anywhere in an assembly where any member of the Raghu dynasty is present. (1)

It is totally unacceptable the way Janak has blatantly spoken unwarranted and insulting words inspite of being aware (knowing well) that the gem of the Raghu dynasty (i.e. Lord Ram, the best warrior of this line of kings) is present here (in the assembly). (2)

[Note—Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 89, stanza nos. 8-9 also which describe Laxman’s strong retort to Janak.

Laxman took exceptional offence of the unilateral declaration of Janak that “he has discovered that the earth is devoid of real warriors, that all the kings were impotent, and had he known of this he wouldn’t have made his vow (of marrying Sita to anyone who breaks the bow)”—refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3 and 6 that precede Doha no. 252.

The reason for Laxman getting angry is obvious—none of the two brothers were given a chance to try their hands at the bow. Self-respect and honour of the family were affected by this remark of Janak though the king had not meant to insult any particular king or prince and his family or race.

By saying “any member of the Raghu dynasty”, Laxman meant that even an ordinary member of this line of kings and princes was capable of tackling an old and rusty bow, what to talk of the better amongst them. In the present case, Lord Ram, who is a literal “gem of the Raghu dynasty”, was personally present in the assembly. So Janak was totally unjustified in making this undignified comment; it’s not acceptable.

Janak was fully aware of the stupendous abilities and astounding powers of Lord Ram because he was explicitly told by sage Vishwamitra about the Lord’s brave achievements and martial acumen when he had successfully killed the demoness Tadaka and the entire army of demons led by its chief Subhau while protecting the fire sacrifice of the sage. Janak was also fully aware that they were the sons of king Dasrath of Ayodhya who belonged to Raghu dynasty. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 216 along with the preceding Chaupai line no. 8.

So, Janak can't feign ignorance that he did not know Lord Ram was, and therefore he shouldn't have made the insulting comments without inviting the Lord to try his luck at the bow.]

सुनहु भानुकुल पंकज भानू । कहउँ सुभाउ न कछु अभिमानू ॥ ३ ॥
जौं तुझारि अनुसासन पावौं । कंदुक इव ब्रह्मांड उठावौं ॥ ४ ॥ काचे घट जिमि डारौं फोरी । सकउँ मेरु मूलक जिमि तोरी ॥ ५ ॥

sunahu bhānukula paṅkaja bhānū. kaha'um' subhā'u na kachu abhimānū. 3.
jaurṁ tumhāri anusāsana pāvaurṁ. kanduka iva brahmāṇḍa uṭhāvaurṁ. 4.
kācē ghaṭa jimi ḍāraurṁ phōrī. saka'um' mēru mūlaka jimi tōrī. 5.

[Then Laxman turned to Lord Ram and said--] Listen oh Lord who is like the sun for the lotus representing the Raghu dynasty<sup>1</sup>. I speak words without any trace of pride and ego in me<sup>2</sup>. (3)

If I get your (Lord Ram's) permission, I will lift the entire universe ("brahmāṇḍa") as if it was a mere ball [4], and then I will dash it and break it like a mud-pot that has not been baked properly. Not only this, I can uproot and break Mt. Meru (the abode of gods) as if it was the humble radish [5].<sup>3</sup> (4-5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Here, the Raghu dynasty is compared to the lotus flower, and Lord Ram to the sun. The lotus flower opens when the sun rises in the sky. This metaphor implies that Lord Ram gives honour and self-respect to all the members of his dynasty, he makes all of them feel happy and joyous by his presence, and they feel lucky to have him in their midst as a member of this dynasty.

In fact, this metaphor is most apt here because all the kings of the Raghu dynasty belonged to the 'Solar Race'; they descended from the Sun God.

<sup>2</sup>In other words Laxman says "I am not boasting, and what I am about to say are truthful words. I will actually do what I say, and I will turn this earth upside down to avenge this insult cast upon you by Janak." Read on and let's see in the following verses what Laxman would do.

<sup>3</sup>Laxman was indeed not boasting because he was an incarnation of 'Lord Seshnath', the celestial serpent with thousand hoods who is said to support the world from below aloft these hoods. He is also the serpent on whose coiled body Lord Vishnu reclines on the surface of the celestial ocean known as 'Kshir Sagar'. In this role, Seshnath protects Vishnu by spreading his thousand hoods on the head of the Lord.

This Seshnath had accompanied Lord Vishnu to help the latter to eliminate the evil demons and free the earth of their horrors. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 17; and (ii) Doha no. 197.

The universe is like a rounded ball or egg. It is especially compared to a "ball" here for the reason that it cannot be so easily broken just like the rubber ball which does not break no matter how hard one dashes it against the ground. But it can be easily lifted like the ball. So, when saying how he will break such a universe, Laxman cites the example of a half-baked mud or clay pot. The latter would crumble to pieces as soon as it dropped on the ground.

Therefore, Laxman meant that he would lift the entire universe as if it was a ball, and then break it as if it was a mud pot.

This example was to answer Janak's condition about "lifting" and "breaking" the bow of Lord Shiva which was supposed to be the heaviest and hardest thing in the whole world. It is clear in the declaration of the heralds that this bow was "very strong" and "heavy". Refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1 and 3 that precede Doha no. 250.

Laxman in effect says that "What to talk of the rusty old bow; I can lift and break the entire universe".

As for the metaphor of the "uprooting and breaking Mt. Meru like it was a piece of radish", Laxman was referring to Janak's comment that none of the kings could move the bow even a fraction of an inch what to talk of lifting it and breaking it. Refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 252.

Well, Laxman said in effect that "If he got a chance, he would pull the bow out of its platform like one pulls out radish from the ground, and then snap the bow in one sweeping move of the hand as easily as one breaks the radish".]

तव प्रताप महिमा भगवाना । को बापुरो पिनाक पुराना ॥ ६ ॥ नाथ जानि अस आयसु होऊ । कौतुकु करौं बिलोकिअ सोऊ ॥ ७ ॥
कमल नाल जिमि चाप चढ़ावौं । जोजन सत प्रमान लै धावौं ॥ ८ ॥ tava pratāpa mahimā bhagavānā. kō bāpurō pināka purānā. 6.

nātha jāni asa āyasu hō'ū. kautuku karaum bilōki'a sō'ū. 7.
kamala nāla jimi cāpa caṛhāvaurṁ. jōjana sata pramāna lai dhāvaurṁ. 8.

Oh Lord (Sri Ram)! What is this wretched old and rusty bow when it is compared to your immense glory and potentials! [To wit, if I invoke your divine glories and mystical powers and apply them on this petty bow, it won't stand even a trifle of a chance to oppose me, and would be splintered into smithereens like broken glass pieces.]<sup>1</sup> (6)

Oh Lord! Think this over, and treating it as an honest declaration on my part (to preserve the dignity of our race), please give me your permission and watch the fantastic spectacle that unfolds before you. (7)

[What would be this spectacle like? Well—] I will lift the bow and string it as easily as it was a soft and light stalk of the lotus flower, and then I will run gleefully with it for a distance of a thousand Yojan as a proof ("Pramaan") of the truth of my statements (all the while waving the bow triumphantly like one waves a flag of victory). [1 Yojan = approx. 8 miles on an average.]<sup>2</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Laxman has said in Chaupai line no. 3 that follows Doha no. 252 above that "he is not saying anything out of ego or false pride". In other words, Laxman is not concerned about his own honour, dignity and self-respect being rubbed the wrong way, but he is angry because his beloved brother and Lord, Sri Ram, has been insulted by the words of Janak. That is why he clarifies in this verse any misunderstanding that may rise in the mind of anyone present in the assembly—that “he is annoyed because the glory of Lord Ram is questioned; he is angry because an old bow is used as an excuse to undermine the greatness of Lord Ram as well as the rest of the kings of the famous Raghu dynasty which is renowned for brave and strong kings”.

<sup>2</sup>Laxman assured Lord Ram that once he is given a nod of approval, he will lift the bow, string it, and then go around the world waving it like a flag to triumphantly declare to everyone that he has conquered the bow, and through it in a symbolic manner the combined might of arms of all the great kings of the world who could not as much as move the same bow an inch despite their trying to do so together.

The imagery is excellent. When a team wins any competition, it runs round the stadium with the flag of the country it represents as a symbol of triumph. Laxman meant exactly this. The assembled kings and princes had come from all the corners of the world (apropos: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 251), but none of them had succeeded in moving the bow, either individually or together (apropos: Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 252). This is followed by Janak’s declaration that no one has succeeded in moving the bow, and that the earth is devoid of true warriors (apropos: Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 252).

Laxman wanted to tell the world that Janak’s declaration is wrong and false. In order to convince the world that it is indeed so, and that he has actually lifted the bow and stringed it, it was necessary for Laxman to “run around the world and declare his triumph by physically carrying the stringed bow with him so that the people can see it as a proof, and be convinced”. Otherwise, the world would think that Laxman was merely boasting because king Janak, who was renowned for his truthfulness, can’t speak a lie.]

दो०. तोरौं छत्रक दंड जिमि तव प्रताप बल नाथ ।

जौं न करौं प्रभु पद सपथ कर न धरौं धनु भाथ ॥ २५३ ॥

dōhā.

tōrauṁ chatraka daṇḍa jimi tava pratāpa bala nātha.

jauṁ na karaṁ prabhu pada sapatha kara na dharauṁ dhanu bhātha. 253.

Oh Lord, not only this. If I get your permission I would break this bow (effortlessly) like it was a stalk of a mushroom by relying on the strength of your glory and might<sup>1</sup>.

If, on the other hand, I fail to do so, then I swear (promise) in the name of your holy feet that I will not hold a bow and a quiver in my hands again (for the rest of my life)!’ (Doha no. 253)

[Note—Two things are important in this Doha. First is Laxman’s declaration that he can break the bow if Lord Ram permits. In other words, the Lord need not take this trouble and leave it to Laxman. Able ministers or army commanders would tell their Lord, the Emperor or the King, not to bother about small inconsequential things as they are capable to handle them on their own. The Emperor or the King should intervene when they fail.

Similarly, Laxman meant that this menial and inconsequential job of lifting and breaking a rusty old bow does not suit the stature of the majesty of Lord Ram that he should personally go and touch this dusty bow. The Lord should remain sitting and just instruct Laxman to carry out the job for him on his behalf. This is how great Kings and Emperors acted: they rarely intervened personally but left the mundane affairs of the kingdom or empire to their subordinate ministers or commanders.

Laxman deemed fit to make this statement to remove any traces of doubts in the mind of all that it was not that he can only “lift and string the bow” but won’t be able to actually “break it”.

The second point is that Laxman did not wish to undermine the greatness and authority of Lord Ram by overstepping him, and breaking the bow himself instead of the Lord. Laxman wished to make it clear that his breaking of the bow was not due to his own powers and strength but due to the powers and authority vested in him by Lord Ram. It is similar to the situation when ministers and commanders of a king or emperor carry out their duties independently, but they do it on behalf of their master, the king or the emperor. That is why the spoils of war were deemed to rightly belong to the king and not to the army commanders. Similarly, the credit for good governance went to the king and not to his ministers who were supposed to act anonymously on behalf of the king.

Since the marriage of Sita was hitched to the breaking of the bow, it was very imperative for Laxman to declare that “he is breaking the bow not by his own volition or strength but on the instructions of Lord Ram and by employing the latter’s mystical powers”. Therefore, the reward—marriage with Sita—would be Lord Ram’s and not Laxman’s!]

चौ०. लखन सकोप बचन जे बोले । डगमगानि महि दिग्गज डोले ॥ १ ॥
सकल लोग सब भूप डेराने । सिय हियँ हरषु जनकु सकुचाने ॥ २ ॥
caupāī.

lakhana sakōpa bacana jē bōlē. ḍagamagāni mahi diggaja ḍōlē. 1.
sakala lōga saba bhūpa ḍērānē. siya hiyaṁ haraṣu janaku sakucānē. 2.

When Laxman spoke words seething with anger, the earth shook and the Diggajs moved (shifted) from their places and tottered<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Everyone present there in the assembly, the citizens as well as the kings, became terrified. But Sita’s heart, on the other hand, felt happy and joyous (as this was the moment she was waiting for, because now either of the two brothers would be allowed to break the bow, and her dreams would not be crushed), while king Janak blushed (became red-faced) at this strong rejoinder<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>These two things—shaking of the earth and moving of the Diggajs—are figures of speech to mean that there was a huge turmoil in the world as if some catastrophe was about to happen.

Remember: Laxman is an incarnation of the Seshnath who supports the world on its ten thousand hoods (refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 17), and therefore if Laxman becomes angry and shakes his head violently the earth is bound to tremble as if there was an earthquake.

The ‘Diggajs’ are the eight strong elephants that support the earth in all the directions. Since there are eight directions, there are said to be eight ‘Diggajs’. These eight directions are as follows—north, north-east, east, south-east, south, south-west, west, and north-west. See also Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 260.

So, when Seshnath in the form of Laxman shook his head in anger, the earth as well as its supporting elephants too shook and trembled. This is a poetic way of saying that Laxman’s words were exceedingly scathing and he spoke at the top of his voice in a wrathful tone.

<sup>2</sup>Sita was earlier worried when her father, king Janak, had virtually declared the competition over when he said that since no one could break the bow he will now have to bear with the ignominy and pain of letting his daughter Sita unmarried—refer: Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precedes Doha no. 252.

She could not at all intervene and ask her father to let Lord Ram also try his hand at the bow—well, it would be absolutely ridiculous and incongruous for her to even think of personally speaking out. This is the irony of the situation as it prevailed in ancient tradition-bound society—the girl whose entire future was at stake did not get a chance to at least express her thoughts or voice her concern. It would be highly incongruous, very improper and certainly violative of established traditions and royal protocol if Sita did gather courage to speak out in public to request her father king Janak to ask Lord Ram to at least try his hand at lifting and breaking the bow because he had not been given a chance till now. She would have become a laughing stock everywhere in the world, and would not only invite utter scorn and infamy for her self but would also put her father to extreme shame.

Therefore, when Laxman angrily spoke that he is capable of lifting and breaking the bow if Lord Ram gives his permission to him to do so, and as a proof of his abilities there was a virtual earthquake, Sita felt very happy. She mentally blessed Laxman for rebuking her father because the latter had neglected Lord Ram before declaring that “no one could break the bow”, and the insulting general surmise that he made that “the earth was devoid of true warriors”. How could Janak use the phrase “no one” when Lord Ram or Laxman had yet not even gone to touch the bow?

Didn’t the king know that these two brothers too belonged to a royal family of great repute, and didn’t he personally like the two brothers that he wanted to avoid them, that he did not wish them to break the bow and marry Sita? Not at all—both these notions were wrong. For one, Janak was well aware who they were and how brave they were, as sage Vishwamitra had himself told him about them—refer: Doha no. 216 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 6-8. And secondly, Janak had himself taken a fascination for the two brothers and had been overwhelmed by their charm—refer: Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 216.

So, to neglect Lord Ram and Laxman before declaring the competition closed and sealing the fate of Sita to remain unmarried was something Janak shouldn’t have done, and naturally Sita was annoyed and angry with her father for it.

Perhaps the all-knowing and omniscient Lord Ram had sensed Sita’s predicament and grief as well as her suppressed anger, and he knew that Sita sincerely wished to marry him—refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 259. The fact that Lord Ram is all-knowing and omniscient is endorsed at other places also in Ram Charit Manas—e.g. (i) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 62; (ii) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 66; and (iii) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 18.

Therefore, Lord Ram must have subtly inspired Laxman to speak. Remember: If we examine Doha no. 252 of Baal Kand closely we discover that though Laxman did bow at the feet of Lord Ram to seek his permission before speaking, no explicit permission was given by the Lord. Lord Ram had neither said ‘don’t speak’, nor said ‘yes, go ahead’; the Lord had just kept quiet. This clearly implies that Laxman had his subtle, tacit support and approval. Laxman was very wise, and he was also privy to the developments in the garden when Lord Ram and Sita had met for the first time. The Lord had clearly expressed to Laxman his liking for and appreciation of Sita—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Doha no. 231 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8; and (ii) from Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 237—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 238.

The above observations are also the probable reason why Laxman did not think necessary to seek an independent permission from sage Vishwamitra before angrily snubbing king Janak in open court.

The above observations that both Lord Ram and sage Vishwamitra subtly approved Laxman’s actions will be clear below when we read Chaupai no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 254 that “both Lord Ram and Guru Vishwamitra, as well as the other junior sages who had accompanied Vishwamitra, felt exceptionally glad and happy in their hearts”. Had any one of them disapproved Laxman’s words and actions then surely Laxman would not have dared to stand up and speak the way he did.

Janak squirmed with a red-face because Laxman was indeed speaking the truth. Janak realised that he should have requested sage Vishwamitra to ask Lord Ram, being the elder of the two brothers, to lift the bow. But he hadn’t, and so when Laxman spoke angrily and the sage did not step-in to stop him, the king realised the gravity of the situation: he sensed that even sage Vishwamitra has not liked his declaring “the earth devoid of real warriors” and not even offering the chance to Lord Ram, especially when he knew that a mighty sage of Vishwamitra’s status is accompanying him and the sage has himself told the king about the valour and stupendous powers of the two brothers when the king had gone to welcome the sage on his arrival at Janakpur—refer Doha no. 216 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 6-8 earlier in this narration.

So Janak decided to bear this humiliation quietly. It was indeed a great humiliation for king Janak—who was one of the greatest kings of his time, was an aged man, and was the host of the event—to be publicly rebuked and taken to task by a young prince, in the front of the entire assembly full of kings and princes from all quarters of earth as well as by the entire citizenry of his own kingdom!

But so noble-hearted and broad-minded was the great king Janak that he did not feel offended or took any umbrage to Laxman’s diatribe against him as he realised that it was his own mistake. If there would have been some other king in place of Janak, it is certain that he must have angrily shot back and ordered his soldiers to imprison this prince who dared to insult him in open court, is it not? Not only tolerating Laxman’s public scorn, Janak was so forgiving by nature that he had later on married his own daughter, the sister of Sita, with Laxman—refer: Baal Kand, line nos. 1-2 of Chanda stanza no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 325.]

गुर रघुपति सब मुनि मन माहीं । मुदित भए पुनि पुनि पुलकाहीं ॥ ३ ॥

सयनहिं रघुपति लखनु नेवारे । प्रेम समेत निकट बैठारे ॥ ४ ॥

gura raghupati saba muni mana māhīm. mudita bha'ē puni puni pulakāhīm. 3.
sayanahīm raghupati lakhanu nēvārē. prēma samēta nikaṭa baiṭhārē. 4.

[At whatever Laxman said and as a result of this new development—] The Guru (i.e. sage Vishwamitra)*, Raghupati (Lord Ram, the Lord of the Raghu dynasty) as well as all other sages (who had accompanied Vishwamitra) felt exceedingly happy and exhilarated; their bodies showed signs of repeated thrill passing through them<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Raghupati (Lord Ram) politely signalled Laxman by a gesture of his eyes to stop now<sup>2</sup>. Then the Lord affectionately made him (or asked him to) sit near him<sup>3</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 1/89, stanza no. 10 also.

As we have noted earlier while discussing verse no. 2 just above, the persons who fully approved of Laxman's actions were the following—Sita, Lord Ram and sage Vishwamitra as well as the other sages who had accompanied Vishwamitra. As far as Laxman was concerned, this was enough; he didn't give a damn to anybody else.

One very important reason for all of them feeling glad in their hearts is this—even in his anger, Laxman had not undermined the majesty and dignity of Lord Ram. He had fully maintained the honour and respect of the Lord because he had clearly said that whatever he would actually do will be only “if Lord Ram gives his permission” (refer Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 253), and that “whatever he does would be by relying on the glory and powers of Lord Ram” so as to give the Lord full credit for his astounding feats (refer Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 253).

*If we re-visit the question ‘Why did Laxman not seek permission from sage Vishwamitra, though he sought so from Lord Ram before standing up and speaking angrily in the assembly’ as implied in Doha no. 252, and then we read here in the present verse that ‘the sage was happy at the developments’, an interesting thing emerges which shows how wise and long-thinking Laxman was. This interesting thing is this:—If Lord Ram gets the right to claim the reward of the breaking of the bow by Laxman, which in this case would be the marriage with Sita, because it was by relying upon Ram's powers and authority that Laxman had been able to break it, then the same right would also belong to sage Vishwamitra if Laxman had sought any permission from the sage and had invoked his blessings and mystical powers to actually break the bow.

What does it translate into practical terms? Well, in this eventuality, both Lord Ram and sage Vishwamitra would have had ‘equal right’ over Sita like the case we come across in the epic Mahabharat where a single woman named Draupadi was the wife of five Pandava brothers. Remember that it was not that the sages during the era of Lord Ram did not have wives—for instance, sage Vasistha, the royal priest of Ayodhya and the first guru of Lord Ram, had a wife named Arundhati (refer: Ayodhya Kand—Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 78: and Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 187), and sage Atri whom the Lord had met during his forest sojourn also had a wife named Anusuiya (refer: Aranya Kand—Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 3, and Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 5). So, sage Vishwamitra having a wife would, prima facie, be alright.

But it also must be remembered at the same time that the situation during the era when Lord Ram was on earth, i.e. the Hindu epoch known as the ‘Treta Yug’, was quite different than what prevailed during Krishna's period in 'Dwapar Yug'. In Treta Yug it was simply unimaginable and unthinkable for a woman to have more than one husband, let alone one of them being a king and the other a sage! It would be extremely hilarious, absurd, scandalous, sacrilegious, outrageous and immoral to even speak of this thing. It just couldn't be allowed to happen.

Therefore we find that Laxman was so wise that he did not want to create any embarrassing situation like the one described above, and so he decided to completely avoid the sage to prevent any sort of scandal getting a chance to find a root in any time in future. Hence he did not seek any permission from sage Vishwamitra and bypassed him altogether.

As the situation stood, if Laxman had indeed broken the bow, then he would have done so on behalf of Lord Ram because he was the only Authority from whom Laxman has sought permission. Hence, the reward of breaking of the bow, which was marriage with Sita, would go solely to Lord Ram, and the scandalous as well as the sacrilegious idea of sage Vishwamitra too having any right or claim to the reward would not arise at all!

The sage was extremely practical and wise, and having read into Laxman's mind he not only not take any offence at not being consulted and taken permission from by Laxman before he launched on his angry outpouring, but even felt very happy at the turn of events as is clear in the present verse we have read above.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 89, stanza no. 10 also.

<sup>3</sup>Lord Ram restrained Laxman by gesturing with his eyes as a sign of great dignity. Remember: Lord Ram had not, in the beginning, given any oral permission to Laxman to get up and defend their dignity. So here also he quietly, with the help of a gesture of the eye, asked him to stop saying anything further because the message has already been conveyed, and speaking unnecessarily and too much would undermine their own dignity and prestige. The first volley of angry words created the shock and awe that the Lord intended to create, but any more speaking would not only undo the effect of this initial shock but also may make the people start laughing and jeering at Laxman.

The Lord also feared that if he does not stop Laxman then he would continue pouring fire and brimstone, and in his zest may even take the Lord's silence as a subtle, tacit approval for Laxman's announcement that he would "lift the bow and run for a thousand Yojan with it", and "break it" (refer—Doha no. 253 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8). If this happens, then the situation would spin out of control for everyone. It would be undermining the dignity of Lord Ram and would be against established protocol of good behaviour, decency, manners and observance of traditions that his younger brother supercedes him even when he is personally present on the occasion.

So it was very necessary for Lord Ram to stop Laxman now, before he actually moves ahead and steps on the platform where the bow was kept. Should it happen, it would be extremely odd as well as humiliating for Laxman to be stopped at that late stage. Hence, it was prudent to stop Laxman now before any harm is done, and before it was too late.

The fact that Vishwamitra gave his tacit approval and support will be absolutely beyond doubt as we read the following verses herein below--]

बिस्वामित्र समय सुभ जानी । बोले अति सनेहमय बानी ॥ ५ ॥ उठहु राम भंजहु भवचापा । मेटहु तात जनक परितापा ॥ ६ ॥

bisvāmitra samaya subha jānī. bōlē ati sanēhamaya bānī. 5.
uṭhahu rāma bhañjahu bhavacāpā. mēṭahu tāta janaka paritāpā. 6.

Observing that the time was most appropriate (i.e. the time has come for him to step-in and break the impasse), sage Vishwamitra spoke (to Lord Ram) in very affectionate words.<sup>1</sup> (5)

‘Get up Ram and break the ‘bhavacāpā’<sup>2</sup> (the bow belonging to Lord Shiva, also known as “Bhava”) to remove (or eliminate) the torments and agony from which Janak is suffering.’ (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 89, stanza no. 11 also.

The situation had become extremely sensitive: Laxman has violated protocol by making caustic comments against Janak, and he had also challenged that he is indeed capable of breaking the bow only if Lord Ram gives his consent. Then Laxman was asked to sit down. The wise sage realized the gravity of the situation—if Lord Ram does not respond it will mean that Laxman had gone out of his head and that whatever he had said was totally boast and lie. The whole of the Raghu dynasty would be put to shame. What face would the sage show their father, king Dasrath, when this news reaches him and he feels so ashamed and angry at the sage that inspite of his presence he allowed such ignominy to come to the family. King Dasrath had sent his dear sons with the sage with full confidence that the sage is fully capable to protect them and would always act for their good and welfare. Why did the sage take the two brothers to Janakpur to be allowed to be humiliated in this way? The sage had only asked Dasrath to send the brothers with him to protect his fire sacrifice, and what right did he have to exceed his brief?

Forget about Dasrath; the entire world would laugh and sneer at Vishwamitra that he allowed shame and insult to be heaped on the two brothers who were under his care and protection inspite of the sage being fully able to make them victorious in the assembly as he possessed stupendous mystical powers? Is this the reward the sage intended to give the two brothers and king Dasrath, their father, for the sacrifices they had made and the trouble they had taken for the happiness and welfare of the sage? Well, the the king had allowed the two brothers to leave the comfort of the kingdom and go on foot to the forest to fight and kill ferocious demons so that the sage’s fire sacrifice is completed without any hitch, a duty the two brothers did diligently and successfully?

Why didn’t the sage ask Janak to at least let Lord Ram or Laxman make an attempt at breaking the bow, and why did he sat silently when Janak declared that there is no true warrior in the world because no one had been able to move the bow an inch?

The sage would get to more shame than anybody else when the world would ask him such questions. Sure enough, the world as well as the entire city of Ayodhya would blame him if he kept quiet and forced the two brothers to accept defeat even without trying. The situation has become all the more worse and delicate now as Laxman has angrily stood up and vented his suppressed emotions of disgust and annoyance. Couldn’t the sage understand that the two brothers have felt very angry and betrayed by the sage for not giving them permission to defend their honour as well as the honour of their dynasty by keeping quiet? Couldn't the sage intercede on their behalf with Janak to allow one of them to break the bow—because he was their Guru and guardian, and therefore it was his moral and practical responsibility to see that their honour, self-respect and dignity are maintained and upheld, especially when the sage was fully capable of doing so? Couldn't the sage appreciate that the two brothers were showing great restraint and respect for him by not walking to the bow without his consent, like all other invited kings and princes had done, and therefore it was now his turn to stand up on their behalf?

Countless such questions swirled in the mind of Vishwamitra. It was not that he wasn't aware of his responsibility, not at all. In fact, he was very much aware of it and conscientious about it. He was more capable in enhancing the glory of Lord Ram and Laxman than their own father Dasrath could imagine of being himself. Remember: Had the two brothers not accompanied the sage and had remained in Ayodhya, then the immense fame and glory that came to them when they killed the most formidable of demons who were famed for their ferocity and bloodthirstiness wouldn't have been theirs. Remember also that by liberating Ahilya by touching her with the dust of his holy feet, Lord Ram had established his divine healing and liberating powers beyond doubt.

The sage had showed them the love a father would show his dearest of sons. The two brothers had also treated him with the same affection as they would show their own father. The bond between them transcended the physical world for it had a spiritual dimension to it. Remember: After returning from the garden, Lord Ram had narrated the entire incident of his meeting with Sita to the sage (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 237). At that time, the sage, having realized that Lord Ram and Sita had developed liking for each other, had explicitly blessed the two brothers that their wishes would be fulfilled (refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 237). After making this promise or blessing, the sage took them to the arena of the bow breaking ceremony. The sage was not a child; he knew where he was taking the two brothers. The sage was 'Trikaalagya'—i.e. one who knew the events of the past, the future as well as the present. He wouldn't have either blessed them that "their wishes would be fulfilled" nor would he have taken them to the ceremony if he had known that Lord Ram would not break the bow.

Again, the sage wouldn't have felt happy when Laxman stood up to sternly rebuke king Janak (as narrated above in Doha no. 253 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8).

The sage was not so utterly selfish or devoid of common and moral sense that after getting his work of completing the fire sacrifice done he would bring the two honourable brothers, who had obliged him no end, to Janakpur to be humiliated and dishonoured in this way.

Hence, we come to the conclusion that the sage "was waiting for an opportune moment to make his announcement". And this moment came now after Laxman had declared their presence in strongly-worded terms.

Now, the next question is: Why was the sage waiting for so long? He wanted the whole assembly to focus its attention on Lord Ram and Laxman, he wanted to dramatise Lord Ram's appearance on the stage, he wanted to give the Lord the importance, the prominence and the dominance he deserved, he wished that the Lord is presented to the world as the saviour and the provider of solace and succour at times of utter despair and hopelessness, he did not want the Lord's presence and glory to get lost in the melee of over-jealous kings pushing and shoving each other and loudly boasting of their own strength by throwing all caution and decency to the wind, he did not, in short, want the dignity and honour of Lord Ram be compromised in anyway whatsoever.

Hence, when the sage quietly observed the restless, boastful, over-jealous and excited crowd of kings and princes vying with each other in the beginning of the competition, he decided to exercise restraint and let the storm pass. He did not wish to undermine Lord Ram's supreme stature, honour and dignity by allowing him to join an uncontrolled motely crowd of haughty and egoist kings and princes, sweating and swearing, jostling, pushing, shoving and cursing each other. In this scenario, even if Lord Ram had broken the bow, this singularly marvelous achievement and its significance would have been lost in the shouting and shoving, in the noise and clamour.

After all the kings failed to move the bow, a pall of gloom had descended on the arena. When Janak spoke, there was a complete grave-like silence of shame, defeat and humiliation. In this deathly gloom, Laxman's angry words struck like lightening, waking the entire assembly from the depth of numbness of the mind into which it had sunk. Everyone sat erect on their seats and craned their necks in the direction of the two brothers just like people look up at the sky when lightening streaks through it with a terrifying whiplash-of-a-sound against the background of dark foreboding clouds. And just after this thundering and lightening it is the time when the rain starts pouring down on the parched earth, quenching the thirst of its creatures.

So, metaphorically speaking, this was the time the wise sage selected to make his announcement that he is sending Lord Ram to remove the agony and grief in the heart of Janak, and by implication, of the rest of the citizens as well as of Sita by breaking the bow—just like the case of the rain-God, Indra, ordering the cloud to pour its soothing and cool rain-water upon the earth soon after the lightening alerts the world to be ready for this nectar which is about to be made available to them in a short time!

The moment that the sage selected was dramatic and effective in highlighting Lord Ram's astounding feat. It also effortlessly settled once and for all who actually broke the bow. Remember: At the time Lord Ram went on stage to the bow, the place was completely empty; there was not a single king or prince standing anywhere near the bow. The same place was over-crowded a while ago; there were "thousands of competing kings there"—refer: Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 251.

So, Lord Ram would be the undisputed victor. No one would ever dare to challenge his victory by saying that someone else had broken the bow and he is being given undue credit because it was not possible to determine in a huge crowd of jostling kings and princes who had 'actually' broken the bow. This question did not arise now when the stage was empty.

Another positive spin-off of this moment would be that all the citizens of Janakpur as well as the royal household would be thankful to the sage and obliged to Laxman to create a situation that enabled Lord Ram to go and break the bow to save the truthful king Janak from the agony and humiliation that he would have had to suffer otherwise for being steadfast to his vows. Janak has himself already declared that he "will have to bear with the infamy and agony of seeing his daughter remain unmarried because he does not wish to gain notoriety and sin by breaking his own vows" (refer: Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 252).

Therefore, in the event that Lord Ram breaks the bow now after the king has openly declared his pain and helplessness would make the king not only the happiest person on earth but also make him remain ever-obliged to the Lord as well as to the sage, and thankful to Laxman too, for saving him from the horrifying ignominy of being instrumental in forcing his innocent, hapless and helpless daughter to remain unmarried against her will because of his adamant vows and outlandish ideas.

The sage had wanted to declare to the world the glory of the Raghu dynasty as a token of thanksgiving to king Dasrath who had sent his beloved sons, Lord Ram and Laxman with the sage to help him complete his fire sacrifice. And for this purpose it was necessary to choose an appropriate moment. And the opportunity arrived when Janak declared that the “earth was devoid of real warriors”. This incensed Laxman. The wise sage was observing things closely, and when he saw signs of suppressed anger on Laxman’s face, he decided to give a silent go-ahead to him. So he inspired Laxman to get up and speak to defend the honour and glory of the Raghu dynasty. Remember: As has been made clear earlier in a note of Doha no. 252 and again in a note to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 254 above, that Laxman would not have spoken so angrily if he knew that the sage would not approve. This explains why Laxman had his way with his angry outburst which lauded the glory of the Raghu dynasty—refer: Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 253 above.

<sup>2</sup>The word “Bhava” has two broad meanings—one refers to ‘Lord Shiva’ because it is one of the many names of the Lord, and the other meaning refers to the agony one suffers in this mortal world of an endless cycle of birth and death, a world held under the spell of Maya (attachments and delusions).

The second word “Chaap” (cāpa) again has two meanings—one obviously refers to the ‘bow of Lord Shiva’, and the other meaning is ‘pressure or tension’ of this world which keeps the creature’s happiness and liberation suppressed under the overwhelming weight of pain and agony that are inherent and a natural part of existence.

So, at a very mundane and ordinary plane Lord Ram was asked by sage Vishwamitra to break the bow of Lord Shiva and remove the cause of agony of king Janak that his daughter would have to remain unmarried because of it.

At a higher spiritual plane, the sage asked the ‘Lord of the World’ to get up and ensure that all his devotees get happiness and bliss by singing his glories and divine deeds that he does in this world so that their spiritual miseries are taken care of.]

सुनि गुरु बचन चरन सिरु नावा । हरषु बिषादु न कछु उर आवा ॥ ७ ॥
ठाढ़े भए उठि सहज सुभाएँ । ठवनि जुबा मृगराजु लजाएँ ॥ ८ ॥

sunī guru bacana carana siru nāvā. haraṣu biṣādu na kachu urā āvā. 7 ṭhāṛhē bha’ē uṭhi sahaja subhā’ēm̐. ṭhavani jubā mṛgarāju lajā’ēm̐. 8.

Upon hearing the words (or rather, ‘instructions’) of his Guru (sage Vishwamitra), he (Lord Ram) bowed his head at his feet (as a mark of respect and acceptance).

The Lord was without any sort of emotions—he neither felt happy and joyous nor sorrowful; he exhibited neither excitement nor hesitation or doubt.<sup>1</sup> (7)

He stood up in a natural way (without being self-conscious and showing any sign of excitement or nervousness, especially when thousands of eyes of the assembled people were focused on him). As he stood there, he looked so elegant, majestic and magnificent that he put to shame a young lion who is the king of the forest.<sup>2</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This was the special quality of Lord Ram which we find throughout the story of the Ramayana. The Lord remained unruffled, and the excitement accompanying any good news, or worry arising from any bad news, did not disturb his mental poise. For instance, when he learnt about the bad news that he was banished to the forest for 14 year exile by his step-mother Kaikeyi by forcing king Dasrath to concede to her outrageous demands, the Lord remained calm and showed no anger or ill-will towards any one. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 41; (ii) Doha no. 51 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8; (iii) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 149.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas—(i) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 12 in which the gods have acknowledged this well-established divine quality in Lord Ram; (ii) Baal Kand, 2nd line of Doha no. 270 which describes how Lord Ram responded politely and without fear or arrogance to sage Parashuram when he came angrily to punish anyone who had dared to break Lord Shiva's bow.

Feelings of joy and sorrow are the emotions of ordinary mortal creatures, and not who are divine and self-realised—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 116. Lord Ram was an incarnation of the Supreme Being, and thus he was beyond the effects of sorrows and happiness.

<sup>2</sup>The lion does not treat any challenge in the forest as deserving any special attention. As the king of the forest, it is natural for it to hunt down even the wild elephant that all other animals fear because of its sheer size and strength. Likewise, Lord Ram stood up majestically, and his bearing was elegant and fearless; he was not at all worried about the formidable nature of the challenge of breaking the mighty bow that had just a while ago vanquished the combined might of all the assembled valorous kings and princes of the realm who were famed for the strength of their arms. To wit, Lord Ram stood up fearlessly and majestically like the lion rising to make the kill.]

दो०. उदित उदयगिरि मंच पर रघुबर बालपतंग ।

बिकसे संत सरोज सब हरषे लोचन भृंग ॥ २५४ ॥

dōhā.

udita udayagiri mañca para raghubara bālapataṅga.
bikasē santa sarōja saba haraṣē lōcana bhṛṅga. 254.

As Raghubhar (the brave chief of the kings of the Raghu dynasty) rose elegantly from his seat (to carry out the instructions of the sage), he resembled a sun rising majestically over the 'Udaigiri' Mountain (the legendary mountain above which the sun appears to rise) in the eastern horizon.<sup>1</sup>

Even as the lotus feels happy when the sun rises (as is evident from its beginning to open its petals as soon as the sun emerges over the horizon), and the blackbee too feels joyous (as it begins to buzz enthusiastically over the flower in search of nectar), the saints and other noble-hearted persons present there felt themselves happy and joyous much like the lotus flower, their eyes opening wide to exhibit their excitement and exhilaration even as they became lively and active (to watch each and every move of Lord Ram) just like the blackbee hovering over the lotus flower with expectation in its heart.<sup>2</sup> (Doha no. 254)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A dark pall of gloom and despair had descended over the assembly after none of the kings could move the bow, and king Janak made his determination clear that he is not going to change his vow inspite of that meaning that his daughter, Sita, would have to remain unmarried.

Everyone in the assembly, the citizens as well as the members of the royal household, had expected that Sita would be married on this occasion—because they could not have guessed, even in their wildest of dreams, that with thousands of strong and brave warrior kings and princes from all the corners of the earth assembled there and determined to break the bow, none would be able to as much as move the bow even an inch from its position on the platform.

This foreboding prospect that Sita would have to remain unmarried and the utter sense of helplessness and abject despair that followed in its wake were like the darkness of the night that had descended upon the whole assembly. The lotus flower closes during the night and the bees retire to their hives.

When Lord Ram was instructed by sage Vishwamitra to ‘get up’ and break the bow, the Lord ‘rose’ from his seat. His ‘rising’ from his seat is compared here to the ‘rising of the sun from behind the Udaigiri Mountain’.

The metaphor is most appropriate because Lord Ram’s getting up from his seat to break the bow, which would in turn eliminate the torment, the sorrow and the grief that had eclipsed the hearts of Janak and others in the city, is like the sun rising and eliminating the darkness of the night.

What was a moment earlier an atmosphere of gloom and defeated spirits, an atmosphere that was filled with dejection, despair, helplessness and haplessness, is now replaced with that of hope and expectation of happiness to come.

The metaphor of the ‘Udaigiri Mountain’ is also significant here as it stresses the intensity of hope and expectation that was generated when Lord Ram rose from his seat. When the land is flat, as in plains, light begins to appear in the east and the land begins to get illuminated even though the sun is still far below the line of the horizon at dawn. Even as the sun rises above this line, its splendour, glory and brightness in those early moments of sunrise are not as much intense as when the sun is much above the horizon.

But imagine the scene when we are in a valley and the landscape is surrounded by high mountains: the darkness of the night is more profound, and the valley remains quite dark inspite of the dawn breaking in the eastern horizon. The nascent sun is not visible because of the obstruction of the surrounding mountains. Therefore, it is much later when the sun has risen much higher up in the sky so as to be at an angle above the peaks of the eastern mountains, and in the meanwhile has attained its full splendour and dazzling glory, that one is able to have its first sight. The rays of the sun pierce through the valley and stabs the darkness of the night in a sudden move, eliminating it instantly as compared to a flat land where the darkness goes away gradually.

So we now see how remarkably this metaphor has been employed to dramatise the effect of Lord Ram getting up from his seat by comparing it to the “rise of the sun over the Udaigiri Mountain”. It highlights the severity of the depression that prevailed in the assembly, and the way it was suddenly replaced with the ray of light of hope and joy as soon as Lord Ram made his divine presence clear by rising from his seat.

<sup>2</sup>The saintly and pious people (“Sant”) present on the occasion immediately cheered up like the lotus flower opening its petals as soon as it sees the first light of the sun. The lotus knows for certain that once the sun has risen there is neither any chance of the darkness of the night surviving nor of the sun going away suddenly; the brightness of the sun would go on enhancing with the progress of the day. So, the lotus opens its petals with confidence, and without harbouring any doubts about the sun’s ability to keep the darkness of the night at bay. Similarly, good people were confident that once Lord Ram has got up from his seat to break the bow, there is no going back, there is no chance of the gloom of a few moments early coming back to haunt them again. So they all cheered up and became happy like the lotus flower.

The blackbee also becomes active during the daytime because the lotus has opened, and therefore now they can seek nectar from the flower. During the night the bee retires because the lotus was closed. The bee hovers over the lotus flower, waiting for it to open fully. Similarly, the eyes of these saintly persons began hovering over Lord Ram, expecting the Lord to quickly break the bow and allow them the once-in-a-lifetime chance to enjoy the pleasure of watching and participating in the festivities and ceremonies that would mark the divine marriage of the Lord with his divine consort Sita.]

चौ०. नृपन्ह केरि आसा निसि नासी । बचन नखत अवली न प्रकासी ॥ १ ॥

मानी महिप कुमुद सकुचाने । कपटी भूप उलूक लुकाने ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

nṛpanha kēri āsā nisi nāsī. bacana nakhata avalī na prakāsī. 1.

mānī mahipa kumuda sakucānē. kapaṭī bhūpa ulūka lukānē. 2.

[In these verses which follow now we will read what pshycological effect Lord Ram’s getting up from his seat to go and break the bow had on others in the assembly.]

The night symbolising the remnants of hope that the failed kings might have harboured in their hearts faded away. All the countless words of boast and pretension they had all been vociferously voicing too faded away and lost their relevance like the countless stars of the night that begin lose their light with the fading away of the night (that comes automatically with the rise of the sun)<sup>1</sup>. (1)

While the kings who were falsely proud of themselves became ashamed and bashful, withdrawing themselves like the water-lily shutting up its petals in the presence of the sun, those who were wicked and evil-hearted hid themselves from view like the owl which vanishes from sight during the daytime<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>As soon as Lord Ram got up from his seat to break the bow, the remnants of murmur and consultations that were going on amongst the kings as to what options were open to them and what king Janak might now propose, subsided. Deep silence prevailed in the entire assembly.

Prior to Lord Ram standing up to go and break the bow, the defeated kings and princes, already smarting from their defeat and its attendant humiliation, were discussing amongst themselves what measures they should take to avenge their insult even though king Janak had virtually declared the competition closed. Remember: They were not ordinary competitors who would accept defeat and return home humbly. All the participants were great kings in their own right, and had kingdoms and vast realms under their domain. They could not afford to go back to their native kingdoms where their own subjects would be anxiously waiting for their king to return victor and with the trophy represented by Sita in tow. Further, all of them were accustomed to politicking and scheming, making and breaking alliances to suit their interests. Accepting such a ridiculous defeat in such an abject manner at the hands of a lifeless bow that was old, rusty and creaking was simply unpalatable for them. They were contemplating some sort of action, even planning a revolt and were getting ready for the battle that would ensue in its wake. In fact, they would rise in revolt a little later, even going to the extent of declaring their intention of snatching Sita forcibly at the time of her putting the victory garland around the neck of Lord Ram—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 266.

While all this was going on, Laxman stood up and spoke angrily like thunder striking the earth. These murmurs suddenly vanished like countless people talking animatedly amongst themselves suddenly falling silent as soon as a stab of lightening strikes the earth with a deafening roar. Everyone was stunned into numbness—because none had expected anyone to speak such fiery words directed straight at Janak in full court. But when Laxman was asked to sit down by Lord Ram, some of the murmuring and buzzing reappeared.

Remember: The developments happened in quick succession—as soon as Laxman was asked by Lord Ram with a gesture of his eyes to stop and sit down, sage Vishwamitra asked the Lord to get up and break the bow, and immediately the Lord stood up. In other words, the murmurings that may have resumed in the few intervening moments between Laxman sitting down and Lord Ram standing up, subsided once again. This silence persisted till the time the bow was broken with a snap and a thunderous roar that reverberated throughout the world—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 and its accompanying Chanda that precede Doha no. 261.

<sup>2</sup>Two categories of kings are cited here: one category consisted of kings who were very proud of their strength and valour as well as the majesty and powers of their respective clans, and the second category was those kings who were crooked at heart and would go to any length to fulfill their wishes, even if it meant adopting unfair means and violating the norms of society and good conduct.

The first category of kings felt ashamed when Janak had sternly rebuked them for their vanity and boastfulness, and their humiliation was compounded by Laxman's caustic words. They lowered their faces in shame and kept sitting with a dejected mood, trying to avoid any attention. These kings may have had a history of valiant deeds to their credit which made them so confident that they would easily tackle this bow, but the bow proved too much of an opponent for them. Their defeat at the hands of the bow did put them to shame, but since they had not adopted any unfair means they just sat in their seats with a shameful look on their faces as compared to the second category of wicked kings.

This second category of kings were the evil and wicked ones who had never adopted honest means to achieve success in their lives and had relied on cunning and deceit to achieve their objectives. They had little or no history of creditable and valiant deeds to boast of, and they had even tried all the dirty tricks to break the bow, throwing all caution to the wind. It was this category of kings which tried to hide like the owl. In their zest to grab Sita by hook or by crook and to claim credit for breaking the bow, they waited on the sidelines till the time the major kings had individually tried and failed. Then these wicked fellows invoked the brotherhood of kings and instigated others to come and join hands with them so that they would move the bow together—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 251.

They did not actually exert any effort at moving the bow, but may have merely touched it and pretended to make exertion, while others had actually sweated, huffed and puffed and made strenuous efforts to move it. And in the event the bow would have been broken, they would also have claimed credit for it as well as an equal right for the reward like their friends who had actually made some effort. These cunning and wicked kings are likened to the owl here. They made some excuse and slid away quietly from the venue, fearing exposure and severe punishment.]

भए बिसोक कोक मुनि देवा । बरिसहिं सुमन जनावहिं सेवा ॥ ३ ॥
 गुर पद बंदि सहित अनुरागा । राम मुनिन्ह सन आयसु मागा ॥ ४ ॥
 सहजहिं चले सकल जग स्वामी । मत्त मंजु बर कुंजर गामी ॥ ५ ॥

bha'e bisōka kōka muni dēvā. barisahim sumana janāvahim sēvā. 3.
 gura pada bandi sahita anurāgā. rāma muninha sana āyasu māgā. 4.
 sahajahim calē sakala jaga svāmī. matta manju bara kunjara gāmī. 5.

The sages and gods resembled the bird known as 'Koka' (or "Chakwak", the ruddy goose, a type of ostrich). They were freed from the sense of sorrow and grief that had been felt by them till now. They showered flowers (on Lord Ram) to show their approval and happiness (at the Lord deciding to go and break the bow)<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Lord Ram paid his respects (bowed his head) at the feet of his Guru (sage Vishwamitra) with affection, and also sought permission from the sages who were accompanying him<sup>2</sup>. (4)

After that, the Lord of the entire world ("Jag-Swami") proceeded ahead (towards the platform where the bow was kept) with an elegant gait that was normal and routine for him (as if nothing special had happened, or there was nothing special to be done; the Lord had no sign of excitement or uncertainty on his face; his gait was normal)<sup>3</sup>.

This gait, however, was very majestic and elegant as it reminded one of a mighty elephant in a rut who is walking triumphantly without any bother in its mind<sup>4</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The Chakwak bird is happy during the day because a male is reunited with its female companion. The couple was separated during the night. Lord Ram has been compared to the 'rising sun' in Doha no. 254 above. Hence, when the sages and the gods saw him standing and ready to proceed to the bow to break it, they felt very happy and exuberant.

The question is: Why were the sages and gods worried; hadn't they known that Lord Ram was able to break the bow and remove the darkness of gloom that had descended on the assembly? The answer is: Yes, they were aware of the abilities of the Lord, but they were concerned because they wondered whether or not the Lord wanted to actually break the bow as till that moment he had shown no sign of interest in doing so. Lord Ram had kept sitting silently, and had even asked Laxman to sit down when the latter sought his permission to go and break the bow—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Doha no. 253 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 7-8; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 254.

So, the sages and gods were in doubt. Lord Ram remaining neutral and showing no visible sign of interest in breaking the bow made them unhappy. But the situation changed suddenly when sage Vishwamitra asked the Lord to stand up and go and break the bow, and the Lord obeyed his instructions and stood up immediately. Now these sages and gods were sure that the desire of their hearts would bear fruit as Lord Ram would now surely break the bow. That is why it is specially highlighted in this verse that they became happy at the exact moment when Lord Ram stood up to go and break the bow.

Their doubts were dispelled and they all felt cheerful. They showed their happiness and approval by showering flowers.

<sup>2</sup>Remember: Sage Vishwamitra was not alone; many sages had accompanied him to Janakpur—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 240.

Sage Vishwamitra was the Guru (teacher) of the two brothers; he had taught them the secrets of using mystical weapons and skills required to defeat the most formidable of enemies, as well as how to overcome hunger and thirst during long battles—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 209 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 7-8.

It is absolutely necessary to pay the greatest of respect to one's Guru if one wishes to succeed in any endeavour. Lord Ram himself set an example by bowing at the feet of his Guru before setting out on the endeavour to break the bow. This is also the reason why the Lord walked confidently as he proceeded towards the bow because he was certain that with the blessing of his Guru—and mind you, he was not any ordinary Guru, but a renowned sage with stupendous mystical powers and spiritual capabilities, one who had the ability to turn events favourably for anyone whom he desired to favour—he had nothing to worry about. The Lord was well aware of how fearless and confident he had felt in the protective custody of the sage when ferocious demons had confronted him in the forest, once by Tadka while they were on the way to the sage's hermitage, and then by the huge demon army of Marich and Subahu at the time of the protection of the sage's fire sacrifice. At that time there was a real danger and uncertainty because it was a ferocious no-hold-barred battle with demons, but now the issue is merely of breaking an old creaking bow! If the spiritual powers and mystical might of the sage had enabled the former victory, the Lord thought, the breaking of the bow is merely a child's play. So, what to worry and bother about?

He sought permission from all other sages present there to show his respect to them, though this was nothing but a formality. None would have gone against the wishes of sage Vishwamitra in the first place, and secondly, all of them had wanted that Lord Ram should go and break the bow as it is clear when they felt happy at Laxman's angry outburst—refer: Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 254.

With the blessing of these great sages, Lord Ram was absolutely sure of success.

<sup>3</sup>Lord Ram was “the Lord of the world”, or in other words, the Supreme Being, the Parmatma in a human form. The supreme Lord is also known as “Brahm” in the Upanishads. This Brahm is said to be neutral and dispassionate; for Brahm every situation is alike. There is nothing so desirable that its access or possession would give happiness to him, or so undesirable that its presence would create repugnance in him. Being the supreme Lord of the world, he knows everything. Lord Ram knew that he was Lord Vishnu, and that Sita was his eternal divine consort goddess Laxmi, that they had taken human forms to fulfill the promise the Lord had made to the gods and mother earth to come down from the heaven to eliminate the cruel demons who had unleashed a reign of terror (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1 and 7 that precede Doha no. 187).

Therefore Lord Ram knew that he and Sita were destined to be united, and this is another reason why he showed no reaction or emotion as he walked towards the bow when sage Vishwamitra asked him to break it.

<sup>4</sup>In Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 89, stanza no. 11, the way Lord Ram walked towards the bow has been compared to the way a ‘lion’ (mrgapati) walks forward—fearlessly, without a trace of hesitation and doubt, majestically and royally.]

चलत राम सब पुर नर नारी । पुलक पूरि तन भए सुखारी ॥ ६ ॥
बंदि पितर सुर सुकृत सँभारे । जौं कछु पुन्य प्रभाउ हमारे ॥ ७ ॥
तौ सिवधनु मृनाल की नाई । तोरहुँ रामु गनेस गोसाई ॥ ८ ॥

calata rāma saba pura nara nārī. pulaka pūri tana bha'ē sukhārī. 6.
bandi pitara sura sukr̥ta sam̐bhārē. jaur̐m kachu pun'ya prabhā'u hamārē. 7.
tau sivadhanu mṛnāla kī nā'īm. tōrahum' rāmu ganēsa gōsā'īm. 8.

As Lord Ram moved towards the bow, a thrill passed through the bodies of all the men and women present on the occasion; all of them felt exceedingly happy and excited (as this was the moment they were waiting for)<sup>1</sup>. (6)

They (the men and women; the citizens who had collected to watch the event) frantically bowed before their respective ‘Pittars’ (benevolent Spirits of dead ancestors) and prayed to the gods (“Surs”), pleading with them urgently and sincerely as follows—‘Whatever good deeds we have done, whatever merit we have accumulated in our lives [7], then oh Lords, as well as Lord Ganesh, please make it possible that the bow of Lord Shiva is easily broken by Lord Ram as if it was merely a stalk of the lotus flower [8].<sup>2</sup>’ (7-8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>All the citizens had fervently wanted Lord Ram to be Sita’s groom. This is abundantly clear at two places—(i) the first is during the two brothers’ visit to the city: refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 222; and (ii) the second evidence is when the citizens rushed to the arena as soon as they learnt that the two princes are going to attend the bow breaking ceremony: refer—Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 240.

What more could they want? The grand moment has arrived. This electrified all the citizens, and they were filled with hope and expectation. As we shall be reading in the following verses, all of them staked whatever rewards were due to them for any good and meritorious deed they may have done as they prayed frantically to their respective gods and goddesses to make the bow light so that Lord Ram breaks it easily.

These citizens were overcome with grief and sorrow a while ago when king Janak had declared that since no one could break the bow, Sita would have to remain unmarried—refer: Chaupai line nos. 5 and 7 that precede Doha no. 252.

Their sense of despair was compounded because Janak had made no mention of inviting Lord Ram to break the bow when he said “no one could break it”; he had not given any hint to the effect that the Lord was offered an opportunity but he had declined to accept it. The humble citizens fretted and fumed under their breaths, but none could dare to challenge their king because it would mean great indiscipline and an insult of their king in front of the full assembly where great kings and princes from all the corners of the world were present. Even if the king excused them if they stood up and spoke, as he had indeed forgiven Laxman, still the citizens feared that these invited kings would get a very wrong and negative impression of the kingdom which they would spread far and wide when they returned home. All of them loved their kind king and his lovable daughter Sita very much. So they did not want to do anything from their side that would precipitate things and create a horribly piquant situation of ignominy that comes with indiscipline in a kingdom, a development that would leave an indelible negative image of the citizenry and the kingdom as a whole on the minds of the assembled kings and princes.

Therefore, at that time the citizens had felt very sorrowful and sad. But now, when Lord Ram stepped forward to break the bow, the atmosphere of gloom and despair was suddenly replaced with that of hope and joy. Hence, the citizens felt ‘happy now’. The contrast between the two moments is sharp and clear.

<sup>2</sup>The citizens have heard Laxman who had, just a few moments ago, declared that he would lift the bow as if it was very light and soft like the stalk or stem of the lotus flower—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 253. Hence, they decided that it must be made as light and soft as the stalk of the lotus flower to enable Lord Ram to break it because Laxman can’t be wrong in making this comparison. The people had no time or the mental inclination during those crucial moments to think of some better metaphor or simile, so they just invoked Laxman’s example to pray to their gods because there was no time to be lost.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 260 herein below.]

दो०. रामहि प्रेम समेत लखि सखिन्ह समीप बोलाइ ।

सीता मातु सनेह बस बचन कहइ बिलखाइ ॥ २५५ ॥

dōhā.

rāmahi prēma samēta lakhi sakhinha samīpa bōlā’i.

sītā mātū sanēha basa bacana kaha’i bilakhā’i. 255.

Sita's mother looked affectionately at Lord Ram. She summoned her lady friends and, unable to contain her emotions arising out of her affection for the Lord, spoke to them with great sadness and grief in her poignant words. (Doha no. 255)

[Note—This was the first time when Sita's mother, the queen, had seen the two brothers. The mere sight of Lord Ram filled her motherly heart with affection and natural love like that a woman would have for her own son. She lamented that it is inappropriate to send such a nice, such a tender and young boy to lift a hard and heavy bow that even the mightiest of kings of the earth had failed to move. This young boy should be spared this humiliation even if her daughter remained unmarried for life. Sending him to lift the stern bow is like striking a rocky mountain with a soft clod of earth; how can this clod move the mountain? The clod itself would be broken to pieces. Why does the sage and her own husband, the king, not realise this?

A mother's kind heart cannot bear to see her young son, who has never faced any hardships in life previously, being suddenly left to fend for himself against odds that stack heavily against him by his own father and other senior members of the family. Her heart cries out in grief and agony and pain though she cannot gather courage to resist the orders of her husband and other seniors. She vents her frustration and pain by telling her close female friends how much and how strongly she disapproves of this development. This is the way Sita's mother reacted.

This Doha also shows that she too had developed a natural sense of love and affection for Lord Ram as her husband had done already at the time of meeting the Lord when he had gone to welcome sage Vishwamitra. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 215—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 216.

What the queen told her companions, we will read below from verse nos. 1-5.]

चौ०. सखि सब कौतुकु देखनिहारे । जेउ कहावत हितू हमारे ॥ १ ॥

कोउ न बुझाइ कहइ गुर पाहीं । ए बालक असि हठ भलि नाही ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

sakhi saba kautuku dēkhanihārē. jē'u kahāvata hitū hamārē. 1.

kō'u na bujhā'i kaha'i gura pāhīm. ē bālaka asi haṭha bhali nāhīm. 2.

Sita's mother was extremely sad and poignant, and when she spoke her words reflected her pain, dismay and desperation—'Oh friend! Even those who profess that they are our friends and well-wishers, are watching (or rather 'enjoying') this development as ordinary spectators.

[To wit, why are our so-called friends and well-wishers not intervening and speaking up against the inappropriateness of pitting such a young boy as Lord Ram against the bow which is very strong and sturdy? Why do they keep quiet? Don't they see that it is a great injustice that is being perpetrated right before their eyes? Why should an innocent boy of young age be humiliated in this way because he cannot disobey the orders of his Guru who has thoughtlessly instructed him to break a bow which everyone has seen just now didn't move a bit even when kings renowned for their strength and power did their best to move it? A person is said to be one's friend and well-wisher if he fearlessly gives appropriate good advice, but these people are sitting mutely and enjoying the spectacle like other ordinary people. Then say, what is the difference between them and the rest of the people? Haven't they lost the moral right to call themselves our friends and well-wishers?]<sup>1</sup> (1)

Why is no one explaining to the Guru (sage Vishwamitra) and advising him that he (Lord Ram) is now merely a young boy, and not a matured warrior. Hence, this decision on the Guru's part in ordering him (to go and break the bow) is totally uncalled for; it is absolutely unwarranted and unjustified. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The implication is clear: The queen means that these people are not willing to speak out of fear of king Janak. But a true friend and well-wisher is one who speaks fearlessly and gives honest advice, who is more concerned about the welfare of the person than the fear of annoying him if he does not like their advice. Remember: Janak was a king, and a king is supposed to have advisors who give him good advice irrespective of whether he likes it or not. Can't the king's ministers and confidantes see the wrong that is being perpetrated just because Sita has to be married?

Is it that they don't want to give the impression that they are creating hurdles in allowing a competitor to try his hand at the bow in the hope that he might actually succeed against all the odds inspite of clearly seeing that this boy's tender age and delicate body do not allow this to become possible?]

रावन बान छुआ नहिं चापा । हारे सकल भूप करि दापा ॥ ३ ॥
सो धनु राजकुअँर कर देहीं । बाल मराल कि मंदर लेहीं ॥ ४ ॥ rāvana bāna chu'ā nahim cāpā. hārē sakala bhūpa kari dāpā. 3.

sō dhanu rājaku'amra kara dēhim. bāla marāla ki mandara lēhim. 4.

Even Ravana and Banasur did not dare to touch the bow. All the kings who dared were defeated after making loud boasts. (3)

How ridiculous and strange it is that the same bow is being allowed to be handled by a young prince? Say, can a young Swan ever lift Mt. Mandar (“mandara”; also known as Mandrachal)? [Has everyone, the sage, the king and all our well-wishers, taken leave of their senses?] (4)

[Note—Mt. Mandrachal is a huge cylindrical mountain that was used to churn the ocean by the gods and the demons in search of nectar. According to mythology, it is one of the heaviest mountains in existence, the others being Mt. Sumeru where the gods live, and Mt. Kailash where Lord Shiva lives.

In this verse, Lord Ram is compared to a young swan, and the bow to Mt. Mandrachal. Sita's mother wonders how it is ever possible for a swan to lift this huge mountain. In other words, she says that it seems highly unlikely to her that Lord Ram would be able to lift the mighty bow.]

भूप सयानप सकल सिरानी । सखि बिधि गति कछु जाति न जानी ॥ ५ ॥
बोली चतुर सखी मृदु बानी । तेजवंत लघु गनिअ न रानी ॥ ६ ॥

bhūpa sayānapa sakala sirānī. sakhi bidhi gati kachu jāti na jānī. 5.
bōlī catura sakhī mṛdu bānī. tējavanta laghu gani'a na rānī. 6.

It appears that good sense and wisdom have taken leave of the king (Janak) (because he is allowing such a stupid thing to happen in his presence, without resisting or at least requesting sage Vishwamitra to reconsider his orders).

Oh friend, the ways of destiny and providence are queer; no one knows what the creator (“Bidhi”) had in mind while he designed a person’s future.<sup>1</sup> (5)

[The queen’s female attendant, who was also her close ‘friend’, constant companion and confidante, assured her that she need not worry about Lord Ram’s young age or delicate frame as these external features are very misleading and do not give an idea of the Lord’s mystical powers that are of an astounding proportion.]

The clever friend of the queen replied reassuringly with a sweet voice—‘Oh queen! One must not be misled or become deluded to treat someone as weak, fragile, incompetent, lacking in abilities and powers simply due to his external features because more often than not they do not give a true idea of the reality hidden behind the external façade, the reality about the person’s stupendous mystical and spiritual powers as well as his virtues, abilities, strength, character, nature, intelligence etc. that are subtle aspects of a person’s over-all personality and are hidden from view<sup>2</sup>.

So oh queen, he (Lord Ram) has astounding glory and dynamic powers that are not visible externally. And therefore, you must not treat him as weak and fragile and incompetent (to break the formidable bow)<sup>3</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The queen mother implies that this world is such a mysterious place to live in. One person’s destiny entangles another person if the two cross paths. If it is true that it is written in providence that Sita would remain unmarried as declared by king Janak (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 252), then this innocent boy, Lord Ram, has unnecessarily been drawn into this vortex of misfortunes just because he happened to come here for a causal visit in the company of sage Vishwamitra.

She laments, “How sorrowful it is that this lovely and innocent boy Ram is being dragged into the dark pit of infamy and humiliation just because my daughter Sita has everything written wrong in her own destiny!”

She argues that Lord Ram was not a competitor; he had not shown any interest or eagerness to try the bow. This is proved when the sage ordered him to get up and go break the bow: Lord Ram had shown no emotions whatsoever (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precedes Doha no. 254).

He had even disciplined his angry brother and made him sit down (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 254).

Why is he then being forced to face certain humiliation when everyone knows about the fate of other kings who are physically much stronger and better well-built than Lord Ram, and are experienced and matured at handling weapons?

<sup>2</sup>From the perspective of spiritualism and metaphysics, one must not be misled by, or be disillusioned with the external features of something in this gross world, as more often than not this veil of delusions hide the subtle reality which is quite the opposite of what is visible externally. For instance, the world appears to be true and real from its external features, it appears to be a provider of happiness and joy. But in reality it is a harbinger of all sorrows and miseries that torment the creature. It is just like a mirage seen in a desert: the more one pursues it in the quest for happiness and peace, the further away it recedes from him. So those who are wise do not seek happiness or bliss in this external world, but rather they turn inwards to find these virtues hidden in a subtle form in the Atma, the pure consciousness, that lies within one's own 'self' rather than in the external world.

<sup>3</sup>The lady friend must have heard about Lord Ram's great achievements, such as his liberation of Ahilya (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 211 along with its preceding Chanda and Chaupai line nos. 11-12), his slaying of the demoness Taadka (refer: Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 209), his defeating and elimination of the demon army along with its commanders Subahu and flicking of another demon Marich into the ocean (refer: Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 210), and helping sage Vishwamitra complete his fire sacrifice (refer: Chaupai line nos. 1-2, 6 that precede Doha no. 210).

The word about Lord Ram's great achievements had spread like wildfire in the city of Janakpur—refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 221.

Hence, this friend was well aware of all these developments and therefore was confident about the Lord's abilities. Further, she also knew about sage Vishwamitra's own fame and great mystical powers, and when she observed that Lord Ram has full blessing and support of the sage she became absolutely certain that victory that would come with the breaking of the bow will be his.

The queen's lamentations and doubts show that she was yet unaware of these developments; no one had told her about them. This means also that her own husband, king Janak, either hadn't had the time or did not think it necessary to tell her about Lord Ram and Laxman as well as about the arrival of the great sage Vishwamitra, because had the king told her about what the sage had himself told him about the two brothers (refer: Doha no. 216 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 6-8) then she would not have behaved the way she did.

The king did not tell anybody about the two brothers because it would have been extremely odd on his part and would have given a wrong message to everyone if he had praise any one particular prince when so many hundreds of them have arrived to take part in a competition which was supposed to be open to all in an impartial manner. King Janak was renowned for his dispassion and detachment from all worldly emotions (which the king himself has admitted in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 215—to Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 216), and if the king had praised the two brothers openly it would have given an impression that he has developed some sort of liking for them, something that was not in his nature or character, and would have surely boomeranged to create a negative picture of him and undermine his exalted stature in the society. Hence, king Janak had not told anybody, including the queen herself, about his affection for the two brothers.]

कहँ कुंभज कहँ सिंधु अपारा । सोषेउ सुजसु सकल संसारा ॥ ७ ॥

रबि मंडल देखत लघु लागा । उदयँ तासु तिभुवन तम भागा ॥ ८ ॥

kaham' kumbhaja kaham' sindhu apārā. sōṣē'u sujasu sakala sansārā. 7.
rabi maṇḍala dēkhata laghu lāgā. udayam' tāsū tibhuvana tama bhāgā. 8.

[To prove her point and convince the queen, this friend sites a number of instances in the following verses—]

What comparison can be made between sage Agastya who was born out of a pitcher or jar (“Kumbhaj”—i.e. one who had a small frame that fitted in a pitcher)<sup>1</sup>, and the vast ocean that cannot be measured (which is endless and fathomless). But still this sage’s glory and fame is well known in the world as he had dried the mighty ocean by scooping it up in his cupped palms and then drinking it in three gulps<sup>2</sup>.

[To wit, inspite of being like any other human being with a limit to what one can drink and accommodate in one’s stomach, sage Agastya had such astounding mystical powers that he had once drunk the water of the whole ocean to completely empty it, to completely dry it. Sage Agastya’s physical body was like any other man, and so apparently was the ability of his stomach to accommodate water.

No one could have imagined by looking at the physical features of sage Agastya who was like an ordinary ‘man’ with limited space in his body that he can drink the whole ocean in merely three gulps so as to completely dry its bed. But he actually did it, and this mysterious feat of his is well known in the world and has made him famous for all times to come. So, in the present context of Lord Ram and the mighty bow, you must not be worried: just like the humble-looking sage Agastya had devoured the mighty ocean which seemed an impossible thing to do if one were to judge things merely on their physical aspects and dimensions, Lord Ram would also triumph over the resistance offered by the bow very easily though he looks so young and tender while the bow has already proved its mightiness and strength by defeating the combined strength and might of the greatest of kings.] (7)

The Sun looks so small against the background of the vast domain of the sky, but as soon as it rises, the darkness that had hitherto encircled the entire world known as the ‘Tribhuvan’ (i.e. the heaven, the earth and the nether world) runs away from sight (i.e. the darkness of the night vanishes and leaves the sky alone)<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 3, and Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 32.

<sup>2</sup>The story of sage Agastya and his drinking of the ocean is as follows in brief—

Sage Agastya is a renowned sage who had composed several of the hymns of the Rig Veda, e.g. Rig Veda Sanhita, 1/166-191. He is known as a ‘Brahm-rishi’ or a celestial sage tracing his origin to the creator Brahma.

He was born to sage Pulastya and his wife Havirbhuk. During this birth, his other brother was sage Visrawaa. It is also believed that in the Swayambhu Manvantar (age of Manu named Swambhu), he was born as the son of sage Pulastya, but in that birth he was named Dattoli.

According to another version, he was the son of Mitra and Varuna. In this version, he was born in a jar or pitcher known as ‘Kumbha’. Hence, he is also known as Kumbhaja (born out of a Kumbha), Kumbhodbhava (rising out of a Kumbha), Kalasi-suta (son born from a Kalas or a pitcher or jar). During this birth, his twin brother was sage Vasistha, the great sage who was the court priest of the kingdom of Ayodhya where Lord Ram was the king.

His wife was a princess of the kingdom of Vidharva, and her name was Lopaamudraa, also known as Kaaveri. The sage had a son whose name was Drudhaasya, also known as Idhmavaaha.

His chief disciple was Agniveshya.

Sage Agastya did severe Tapa and had vast knowledge. He is said to have destroyed the two demons named Ilvala and Vaataapi. The sage had stunted the growth of Mt. Vindhya which was growing and expanding endlessly so much so as to obstruct the light of the sun.

Once, when Indra had killed the demon Vrittaasur, other demons named 'Kaaleya' managed to escape and they hid themselves under the water of the ocean. From there they began terrorizing the sages and seers. They stayed under water during daytime and came out at night to torment and devour these sages, and generally cause nuisance and havoc all around. These demons had not spared even such renowned sages of the time as Vasistha, Chyavan and Bharadwaj, because the demons attacked their hermitages and killed the sages and seers who lived there. It was then that the Gods, led by their king Indra, requested sage Agastya to somehow expose the demons. At this, the sage had scooped up the water of the ocean in a cup made by joining the two palms of his hands and had drunk the water of the ocean in one gulp so as to expose the demons. The Gods were then able to destroy them.

This story is narrated in: (i) Skanda Puran, Nagar Khand, (ii) Padma Puran, Srishti Khand, and (iii) the epic Mahabharat, Vanparva.

Some of the demons, however, managed to escape and hid themselves in the nether world. This is how the demon race survived then. However, when the ocean was completely dried up it created another problem for the world because countless marine creatures begin to suffer and die. Besides this, the ocean was the largest natural reservoir of water on earth. So the Gods requested sage Agastya to refill it. The sage replied that the water has been digested in his stomach, but he can oblige the Gods by reproducing the ocean in the form of urine. That is the reason, according to this legendary story of the Purans, why the ocean is salty and sour—because it is the urine of sage Agastya.

This fact, that the ocean is sour and salty because it is the urine of sage Agastya, is explicitly narrated in the Anand Ramayan (purported to have been written by sage Valmiki), in its Vilaas Kand (Chapter), ninth Sarga (Canto), verse nos. 18-24 where Sita explains to Lopaamudraa, the wife of sage Agastya, why Sri Ram had constructed the bridge in order to cross the ocean to reach Lanka. She explained that the Lord did not ask the sage to dry up the ocean once again by drinking its water because it would be unthinkable to ask the sage to drink his own urine. Even if the sage had actually drunk the water, the Lord would be heaped with the ignominy of being so selfish that he made a Brahmin drink his own urine so that his purpose is served. The Lord did not swim across the ocean because it would be insulting and extremely demeaning for the Lord to swim in urine, and it would also be improper for him to step across a Brahmin's urine because it is to be regarded as holy as the urine of a cow.

There is a legendary story how once sage Agastya had converted king Nahush as a serpent. The story goes that once Indra, the king of Gods, was demoted from his exalted stature due to the curse of killing some Brahmins, and king Nahush had taken his place. Nahush lustfully eyed the consort of Indra, named Indrani. To punish him, Brihaspati, the moral preceptor of Gods, devised a stratagem by which Indrani requested Nahush to come to her riding a palanquin that was never used by anyone earlier. Overcome and blinded by passions, Nahush forgot everything about propriety and probity, and he summoned all the great sages and seers of the time to act as carriers or bearers of his palanquin. Humble sages and seers did not mind because Nahush was now elevated to the stature of Indra, the king of Gods. Nahush was so eager to reach heaven as quickly as possible that he kept prodding and scolding these sages to walk faster. Enraged, astonished and peeved at this nonsense being perpetrated by the haughty king, sage Agastya had then cursed him to become a great and poisonous snake. This story appears in Mahabharat, Anushaashan Parva, 99-100. Sage Agastya lived in the Dandakaaranya forest when Lord Ram met him. The sage had then given some invincible divine weapons to the Lord which stood him in good stead during the epic war of Lanka, as well as in overcoming the demons whom the Lord encountered and destroyed during his sojourn in the formidable forest.

The sage is said to have brought about reconciliation between Indra, the king of Gods, and Maruts, the Wind Gods.

A whole class of people came to be known after him, and in due course the term 'Agastya' became a title and sort of honour given to learned sages and seers who were experts in the philosophy and knowledge that sage Agastya was an expert in and had preached during his lifetime. The sage has been made immortal by finding a place amongst the brightest stars in the sky. He is identified with Canopus, which is the brightest star in the sky of south India. The Canopus has been named after this sage as 'Agastya', and seeing this star in the sky when the sun is in the middle of Virgo (Kanyaa) sign of the zodiac and worshipping him at night is regarded as an auspicious deed. This is a symbolic way of honouring the sage by elevating him to an exalted stature of a 'bright star' and recognizing his stellar qualities.

He is regarded as the one who had created the Tamil language of South India. He is accredited as being the author of several treatises on medicine, mysticism and magic. One of his books is the 'Agastya Sanhita' which elaborately deals with ritualistic forms of worship.

It is said that once sage Agastya and the noble king named Shankha had a divine vision of Lord Vishnu at the banks of river Swami-pushkarni.]

<sup>3</sup>The same idea was earlier expressed by Laxman in Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 239.

The lady friend uses the same logic as she had used for sage Agastya in the previous verse, that one must not judge anyone by physical appearances, here also by applying it to the Sun and its ability to remove the darkness of the night. She in effect says that merely judging the ability of any entity based on its physical dimensions does not provide the real picture of its actual abilities because the Sun, though only a small ball against the vast area of the sky, is able to triumph over the all-encompassing and impenetrable veil of darkness that prevailed in the world before it (the Sun) arrived.

The veil of darkness of the night is absolutely over-powering; it covers the entire world in a thick dark shroud that not even the combined strength of the full moon as well as millions of stars are able to remove or overcome. But the mere hint of the sun coming up in the sky in the very early hours of dawn while it is still below the horizon in the east, much before actual sun-rise, the darkness of the night begins to fade away, or literally the darkness 'runs away', leaving the sky and world free from its overwhelming influence.

Further, when the sun rises in the sky, all other heavenly bodies that had made their appearances during the night, such as the moon and the stars, too fade away. Similarly, Lord Ram's presence in the arena has put to shame all the kings and princes—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 245; (ii) Doha no. 238.

Hence, the lady friend assured the queen that Lord Ram would certainly overcome the might of the bow and remove the darkness of gloom and despair that this bow has cast over all of them much like the Sun triumphing over the formidable and foreboding darkness of the night.]

दो०. मंत्र परम लघु जासु बस बिधि हरि हर सुर सर्व ।
महामत गजराज कहूँ बस कर अंकुस खर्ब ॥ २५६ ॥
dōhā.

mantra parama laghu jāsu basa bidhi hari hara sura sarba.
mahāmatta gajarāja kahum̐ basa kara ankusa kharba. 256.

A Mantra (which is an esoteric spiritual formula)<sup>1</sup> is very small (as it consists of a few letters, words or phrases), but its effect is so profound and far-reaching that all the great Gods, such as the three great Gods of the Trinity, ‘Bidhi’ (Brahma, the creator), ‘Hari’ (Lord Vishnu) and ‘Har’ (Lord Shiva), as well as all other gods of the pantheon are under its influence.

Similarly, a simple looking goad is so powerful and effective in controlling even the wildest of elephants<sup>2</sup>.

[Though a Mantra is too small and consists of lifeless letters, but its dynamism and effect are so profound that even the most powerful of gods are under its control and influence. Similarly, a small iron goad that may not even be visible from a distance is used by the elephant tamer to control a huge wild elephant. Hence, sizes and appearances are no measurements or criterion to judge the potentials, abilities, strength and power of any given entity.

In the present context this means that though Lord Ram appears to be so delicate in frame and young in age that he apparently appears to be no match against the might of the bow which has successfully put to shame thousands of well-built and strong warriors, but this is a fallacious premise to determine the Lord’s actual hidden potentials and mystical powers.

In other words, the lady friend assures the queen that she must be sure that Lord Ram will indeed break the bow, and therefore she must stop worrying.] (Doha no. 256)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A Mantra is an esoteric formula specific for each god. It represents a god’s dynamic field, and it is like that god’s special code or key. It consists of individual letters known as the Beej Mantra or seed Mantra of that god, or may also be a group of letters forming words, such as the holy name of the god, or of phrases that may take the shape of a hymn dedicated to a particular god.

A Mantra is employed by the devotee of a god to invoke the blessings of the worshipped god; it sort of knocks at the concerned god’s door directly, reminding the latter that his devotee needs his help. These Mantras are used for worship purposes as well.

Being specific, use of a particular Mantra during rituals means that a particular god to whom it belongs is being exclusively worshipped or invoked though the general external features and usual steps involved in all the rituals may appear to be the same.

<sup>2</sup>As compared to the huge size of a wild elephant as well as its strength, the goad appears to be too small and inconsequential. But a Mahaut (an elephant tamer) sits on the animal's back and controls it by stabbing this goad on the elephant's head, neck or sides.]

चौ०. काम कुसुम धनु सायक लीन्हे । सकल भुवन अपनें बस कीन्हे ॥ १ ॥

देबि तजिअ संसउ अस जानी । भंजब धनुषु राम सुनु रानी ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

kāma kusuma dhanu sāyaka līnhē. sakala bhuvana apanēm basa kīnhē. 1.

dēbi taji'a sansa'u asa jānī. bhañjaba dhanuṣu rāma sunu rānī. 2.

The god known as Kamdeo (cupid) has kept the whole world under his sway by holding an arrow consisting of flowers; he uses this arrow to subdue and conquer the world.

[Flowers never injure or harm anybody in any way. They are metaphors for beauty, love, kindness and softness. When one has to overcome stiff resistance from one's opponent, when one finds that the use of conventional weapons of threat, persuasion, reasoning and reward fail to make any dent on the opponent's stubbornness, the humble 'flower' does the trick, and it does it so softly, sweetly and harmlessly that the same opponent submits meekly in a way that no other weapon would ever be able to do. All resistance crumble, even the sternest of hearts yield and buckle when literally attacked by this subtle weapon, the 'flower'. Where all other methods fail to achieve the desired result and make one's adversary mellowed, the 'flower' does the trick.

Kamdeo is the god of love. He uses this soft weapon to conquer the world. In other words, 'love' that is manifested in the form of a 'flower' is able to subdue all resistance and opposition that one may face in life.]<sup>1</sup> (1)

Hence, oh gracious lady (i.e. the queen), you must abandon all sort of doubts and their attendant consternations and confusions. Listen queen—Lord Ram will indeed break the bow.<sup>2</sup> (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Kamdeo had used this trick to overcome Lord Shiva's reluctance to get involved in such mundane matters as marrying and raising a family, because the Lord is always engrossed in meditation and contemplation, is a renunciate hermit and a recluse. The story goes that when the demon Tarkasur had unleashed his reign of terror in the world, the gods approached Brahma, the creator, to plead with him to find out a way of this horror. Brahma said that it is written in destiny of Tarkasur that he would be killed only by the son of Lord Shiva. But the irony was Shiva was lost in a state of perpetual meditation, and has declared his intention to remain a recluse and a hermit. 'So what has to be done', asked the gods. Brahma replied that only if Shiva marries and begets a son then this demon could be eliminated.

The problem was not of finding an appropriate wife for Shiva because Parvati, the daughter of the king of Mountians, had already done severe Tapa (penance) to be able to marry him, but the problem was that Shiva had renounced all his attachments with the mundane affairs of the world and submerged himself in deep meditation. So, the question now was how to arouse him from his trance-like state of meditation and inspire him to marry.

Since Lord Shiva was the senior god, being known as ‘Maha-deva’, the ‘Great God’, it would not be proper for the gods to be impolite with him and rudely wake him up from his meditative posture. Some subtle and pleasant method had to be urgently found. It was now that Kamdeo was summoned and assigned this task by the gods.

Kamdeo used an arrow made of ‘flowers’ to strike at Lord Shiva. The use of this weapon ensured that the Lord was neither hurt and nor would be insulted—because flowers are used routinely in worship and offerings. As it happened, Lord Shiva did wake up, but he was so annoyed by Kamdeo’s impertinence and temerity to disturb his meditation and contemplation that the Lord opened his third eye from which spouted a flame of angry fire which burnt Kamdeo to ashes.

This entire story is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 82—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 87.

<sup>2</sup>It is noteworthy how confidently this friend assures the queen. The message here is simple and obvious: We must have fast and total faith in our Lord God; we must not doubt his ability to remove our grief and sorrows. The Lord is omniscient and all-knowing; he watches every thing we do or think of. He just waits for the moment when we put a decisive foot forward, and then the victory is ours. Dithering and trying to jump boats midstream—i.e. getting distracted and thinking that the Lord God whom we adore is not as strong and able as the one whom our companion worships—would make us sink in the sea rather than reaching the shore. Then we go to blame our Lord God for all our miseries and misfortunes and his inability to help us, not ourselves for our lack of faith and conviction and devotion and love for our Lord.]

सखी बचन सुनि भै परतीती । मिटा बिषादु बढी अति प्रीती ॥ ३ ॥
तब रामहि बिलोकि बैदेही । सभय हृदयँ बिनवति जेहि तेही ॥ ४ ॥

sakhī bacana suni bhai paratīti. miṭā biṣādu baḥhī ati prīti. 3.
taba rāmahi bilōki baidēhī. sabhaya hṛdayam<sup>3</sup> binavati jēhi tēhī. 4.

When the queen heard these words of her friend, she developed affection and faith in Lord Ram (and the Lord’s ability to remove her sorrows and worries about the future of her daughter Sita). Her despondency, grief and the sombre mood that had hitherto overwhelmed her disappeared. This was replaced with enhanced affection and faith in the Lord<sup>1</sup>. (3)

At that moment (i.e. at that time when her mother raised doubts about Lord Ram’s abilities and her fears were dispelled by her friend, and the moment when Lord Ram had risen from his seat to walk to the bow), Vaidehi (Sita) looked at Lord Ram, and with fear in her heart she began to pray or plead with all and sundry she could think of (to help her at this crucial moment of her life by enabling Lord Ram to break the bow so that the uncertainty about her future is removed)<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The queen's lady friend has literally acted as her 'Guru' or moral preceptor in disguise. A Guru's duty is to remove doubts and fears in the mind of his disciple or student. To achieve this aim the Guru speaks fearlessly, without any favour or bias. It is his duty to enlighten his disciple about the reality, and not to add to his confusion. The disciple may not be aware of certain things which the Guru knows, and therefore he must tell the truth. For this purpose and to achieve this aim, anyone can be a person's Guru as long as this Guru helps the person see the reality behind the misleading façade of externals and helps him to overcome doubts and groundless fears.

The lady friend therefore acted in the role of the queen's Guru. When the disciple is told the truth about anything by his Guru, he finds peace because his mind comes to rest.

This attendant of the queen also lived up to her role as a true friend, companion and advisor who strives to remove all sorts of misgivings from the mind and heart of his or her friend in distress, and tries his or her best to encourage the other person to not give up hope.

So, when her lady attendant told her the real potentials of Lord Ram, the queen was reassured and found her mental peace amidst the emotional turmoil that she had faced till now. She now was confident that Lord Ram would indeed break the bow and thereby remove all cause of her misery.

This being the certainty of the case, the queen and her husband king Janak began henceforth to treat Lord Ram as her dear son because once the Lord breaks the bow and marries Sita he would become their 'son-in-law', an inseparable part of their family. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 242.

Similar ideas are expressed elsewhere also in Ram Charit Manas. For instance, goddess Parvati had her doubts about the divine nature of Lord Ram removed when her divine consort, Lord Shiva, had enlightened her about the reality of Lord Ram. Refer: Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 119—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 120.

Similarly, Garud, the celestial mount of Lord Vishnu, had doubts about the divine nature and supremacy of Lord Ram because he had seen the Lord acting like an ordinary human being. So he approached Lord Shiva to tell him the truth. The Lord directed him to the crow-saint Kaagbhusund who was able to remove all doubts in the mind of Garud who thanked the crow for it. Refer: Uttar Kand, from Doha no. 124 Kha—to Doha no. 125 Ka.

Another important point to note here is this: One develops affection, respect and faith in someone only when he is enlightened about that person's noble virtues, goodness, character, abilities and qualities. In Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 89, saint Kaagbhusund tells Garud that "When one is not aware about the grand virtues and qualities of someone, he cannot develop respect, affection, faith and devotion for him just like it is not possible to have a smooth, lubricating effect on a surface without the presence of water".

Having doubts and confusions are like poisonous snakes that robs a person of his mental peace and happiness, and instead fills his mind with fear from imaginary phantoms and ghosts—refer: Ram Charit Manas—(i) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 93; and (ii) Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 9 that precedes Doha no. 11.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 92, stanza no. 2 also.

Let us remember that three developments are occurring simultaneously: (i) Lord Ram has got up from his seat and is proceeding towards the bow; (ii) Sita's mother was concerned at the wisdom of allowing Lord Ram to attempt to break the mighty bow that had put to shame the mightiest of warriors in this world by not moving a bit; and (iii) Sita herself becoming extremely worried as to what would happen of her future in the coming few minutes. In fact, Sita was the most worried of the lot as her entire future hinged on the outcome of the next few moments.

When a man becomes extremely nervous and worried, he loses his mental bearing and begins to seek help from any quarter that he can imagine of. It's like the case of a drowning man who would cling to any float in the hope of swimming to safety. This is why Sita prays to all the gods and goddesses that came to her mind.

In those desperate moments Sita had forgotten what goddess Parvati had assured her when she had gone to pray and seek her blessings in the temple in the royal garden. The goddess had categorically assured her that her wishes would be fulfilled and that she would be able to marry the dark-complexioned prince she has taken fancy for—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 236 and its preceding Chanda along with Chaupai line nos. 7-8.

Sita was so nervous and overcome with uncertainties that she forgot this boon. She asks goddess Parvati and Lord Shiva to make the bow light as we shall read in verse nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 257 just below this verse. She didn't realize that even Parvati would not like this attitude of Sita especially in the context of the goddess' explicit assurance as cited above, because it means that Sita did not have faith in her blessings and words, and now repeats her requests once again. Not only limiting herself to requesting Parvati and Shiva, Sita goes on pleading with sundry other gods—refer: Chaupai line nos. 4 and 7 that precede Doha no. 257.

This incident teaches us not to lose our mental bearing and calm during troubles in our lives because then we tend to forget about our inherent abilities and strengths as well as the hidden support we have been assured of by our patron deity. It only rocks the boat rather than stabilizing it.

This fidgety and anxious state of mind of Sita was read by Lord Ram. We shall read how Lord Ram had waited for the moment till Sita could focus her mind and concentrate her attention on the Lord instead of seeking help from sundry other gods and goddesses. In her anxiety and nervousness, Sita had forgotten this sacrosanct rule of 'Bhakti', or devotion for the Lord, by asking this god and that god to save her future instead of relying on the Lord himself to extricate her from her predicament. So, Lord Ram waited till she finally decided to surrender her self and her fate to the Lord and seek exclusive refuge with him before he actually broke the bow—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede Doha no. 259, and Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 261.

This observation is in consonance with the one made in respect to her mother in a note of verse nos. 2 and 3 that appear just before the current verse. Having true faith and devotion in one's chosen Lord means that one should ask only him for his needs and have loyalty only towards him. For a true devotee, his chosen Lord God is the only god, the only lord and the only master in this world. He would not go knocking at the doors of other gods and goddesses because this clearly means lack of loyalty and faith. If this happens, his boat is sure to sink mid-stream.]

मनहीं मन मनाव अकुलानी । होहु प्रसन्न महेस भवानी ॥ ५ ॥

करहु सफल आपनि सेवकाई । करि हितु हरहु चाप गरुआई ॥ ६ ॥

manahīm mana manāva akulānī. hōhu prasanna mahēsa bhavānī. 5.
karahu saphala āpani sēvakā'ī. kari hitu harahu cāpa garu'ā'ī. 6.

She was very upset mentally, and eagerly prayed to Lord Mahesh (Shiva) and his consort Bhavani (goddess Parvati)—‘Oh Lord Mahesh and goddess Bhavani. (5)

Please give me the reward of all the services that I have rendered to you in my life (such as prayers, worship, offerings and all such other meritorious and good deeds that I have done and offered to you). For my sake and my welfare, please remove the heaviness of the bow (and make it light so that Lord Ram can easily lift and break it). (6)

[Note—Refer to note appended to verse no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 257 herein above.]

गननायक बरदायक देवा । आजु लगें कीन्हिउँ तुअ सेवा ॥ ७ ॥

बार बार बिनती सुनि मोरी । करहु चाप गुरुता अति थोरी ॥ ८ ॥

gananāyaka baradāyaka dēvā. āju lagēm kīnhi'um' tu'a sēvā. 7.
bāra bāra binatī suni mōrī. karahu cāpa gurutā ati thōrī. 8.

Oh Lord Gan-naayak (“gananāyaka”; i.e. Lord Ganesh, the chief of all attendants of Lord Shiva)! Thou art the Lord who grants desired boons to those who seek them from thee (“baradāyaka”; i.e. you are the wish-fulfiller of those who pray to you)<sup>1</sup>.

I have been serving thee (i.e. offering worship to you and praying to you) till this day with all diligence and faith, and to the best of mine ability. (7)

I most earnestly and repeatedly beg thee (by citing and invoking thine gracious nature of fulfilling the wish of those who seek anything from thee, and especially so in mine case because I have been serving thee all my life till this fateful day when my future is to be decided) that thou must pay heed to mine prayers and make the bow as light-weighted as it possibly can be made by thee (for I am thine humble devotee who hath been serving thee for the whole of mine life, and therefore expect this favour from thee).<sup>2</sup>, (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 235 of this book.

Lord Ganesh has many other names besides the two cited here, i.e. ‘Gan-naayak’ and ‘Bar-daayak’. He is also known as Vinaayak. Other names of Lord Ganapati are enumerated in the Ganapati Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition as follows:—Lord Ganesh (refer verse no. 8); Ekdanta or the Lord with one tusk, Vakratunda or the Lord with a bent trunk (refer verse no. 10); Vraatpati or the one who is the chief amongst the Gods, Ganapati or the chief of the attendants of Lord Shiva, Pramath-pati or the chief of a special category of attendants of Lord Shiva, known as Pramaths, who give immense misery to those who are sinful, Lambodar or the one with a big abdomen; pot-bellied, Vighna-Vinaayak or the one who destroys all hurdles and misfortunes, Sri Varadmuti or the one who is an embodiment of blessings and grants whatever boons one desires, and Shiva-sut or the son of Lord Shiva (refer verse no. 15).

The Lord derives his name Gajaan or Gajpati or Gajamukh from the root word 'Gaj' meaning an elephant, and 'Ja' meaning an origin or birth. Hence, these names indicate that the Lord has taken birth in a form that has the head and body like that of an elephant. The elephant head stands for the macrocosm, while the rest of the body which resembles that of a human stands for the microcosm. These two aspects of this creation are not separate from one another but form a composite unit just like the head and the body of Lord Ganesh are not separate from one another but form one composite body of the Lord, though the head represents an animal (an elephant) and the rest of the body represents a human being.

In other words, one is regarded as learned, wise and enlightened only if he is able to see the Supreme Being even in the oddest and the most unconventional form of life in this creation. One must see the Lord in a healthy man as much as in a deformed and a handicapped individual; one must see the Lord in an animal as much as in a human form.

Another connotation is the following—the word 'ga' implies 'gati' or fate and destination of creation, and 'ja' means birth or origin. Hence, the word 'Gajpati' means the Lord from whom the rest of the creation has taken birth, and in whom the creation would finally collapse and merge at the end.

He is said to be the wisest and most honoured of the Hindu Gods and is always worshipped in the beginning of any endeavour or enterprise, whether it pertains to the mundane worldly affairs or to the spiritual realm. This is done to invoke his blessings which preempt any evil forces from throwing a spanner in the wheel of the successful completion of the exercise.

The two wives of Lord Ganapati are said to be Buddhi and Shiddhi who are personifications of the virtues of intellect and the glories that come with achievements.

One of the sub-Purans or Up-purans, known as 'Mudgal-puran' which is named after sage Mudgal is dedicated chiefly to the narration of the nine main incarnations of Lord Ganapati, or Lord Ganesh who is the son of Lord Shiva and Parvati, and is the chief deity who is worshipped first during any religious ceremony or auspicious activity. This Up-puran was probably written between 900-1100 A.D. The nine incarnations of Ganapati mentioned in this sub-Puran are the following—Vakradanta, Ekdanta, Mahodar, Gajaan, Lambodar, Vikat, Vighna-raaja, Dhumra-varna, and Yoga. Besides these nine incarnations, it also lists 23 more forms of Lord Ganesh.

He is said to be the wisest and most honoured of the Hindu Gods and is always worshipped in the beginning of any endeavour or enterprise, whether it pertains to the mundane worldly affairs or to the spiritual realm. This is done to invoke his blessings which preempt any evil forces from throwing a spanner in the wheel of the successful completion of the exercise.

The Tripura Tapini Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition, Canto 3, verse no. 15, describes the Mantra of Lord Ganesh which highlights his exalted nature and superior stature amongst all the gods, while Canto 4, paragraph no. 12 describes its importance for the worshipper.

The Mantra is "Ganaanam Twa Ganpatim Havaamahe Kavim Kavinaamupasra-vastabham; Jyestha Rajam Brahanam Brahamnaspata Aa Naha Srinva-nnutubhiha Seed Saadanam". [Briefly it means—"I pay my obeisance and respect to Lord Ganesh who is the most senior amongst all the attendants of the Lord and even the Gods. He is most exalted, wise and learned. He is like the biggest king or emperor amongst those who are enlightened about Brahm, and is Brahm himself personified. There is no one better or senior than you. Be gracious upon me; be pleased with me. I bow before you most humbly and submit myself before you.’]

When this hymn is being said, the worshipper should prefix and suffix it with the Beej Mantra of Ganesh, which is the Sanskrit letter ‘Ga’ (as in gum) with a Bindu (dot) on top, and pronounced as ‘Gam/Gan(g)’ (pronounced as gum or gun(g)).]

The ‘Tarak Mantra’ of Lord Ganapati is ‘OM Gum/gun(g)’ according to the Ganapati Upanishad, verse no. 8.

Now let us understand the symbolism of the various parts of this God. His ‘large ears’ imply that the Lord hears everything, from every corner, and from everyone; the Lord is extremely receptive and gathers information and knowledge from all available sources. He is a good listener, a virtue that makes him a good teacher, because one has to learn first and it is only then that he can teach others. The large size of the ear that resemble a winnow-basket or a hand-held fan indicate that the Lord is able to blow away useless pieces of information and accept only the useful ones like the case of the winnowing basket or the hand-fan that is used to blow away chaff and retain the grain.

His ‘large head’ stands for great intellect and mind.

He has ‘two tusks’—one that is full stands for the Truth that is perfect, complete, priceless and beautiful. The other tusk that is broken indicates an imperfect world that is incomplete, worthless, and not as good as it seems to be. Since the two tusks are part of Lord Ganesh’s body, the implication is that both the Absolute Truth as well as the not-so-absolute truth is a part of the universal whole known as Brahm. In other words, the perfect world of spiritual truth represented by the full tusk, and the imperfect world of material sense objects represented by the broken tusk are part of the same universal Truth known as Brahm. The fact that the intellect helps one to discriminate between the right and the wrong only when there is a choice is indicated by the two tusks—one that is full indicates the correct and the straight path, and the one that is broken implies the crooked and the wrong path.

The ‘bent and long trunk’ has the following connotations—(i) it stands for OM, the cosmic sound that reverberates (‘trumpets’) in the ether that fills the space of the sky where the entire creation is harboured; (ii) since the trunk emerges from the head of the elephant and it can uproot big trees and clear the path ahead for the elephant, the implied meaning is that the Lord employs his mind and intellect to get rid of the greatest of delusions and ignorance and other spiritual obstacles or hurdles, no matter how crooked they may be, that come in the way of seekers of Truth.

His ‘wide mouth’ indicates a good appetite, and this stands for his ability to accept a wide range of knowledge. It also means that the Lord can speak on a wide range of topics with the greatest of ease and with the highest level of erudition and expertise at oratory.

His ‘big belly’ stands for his endless appetite for knowledge and wisdom which he assimilates with ease. Being a personified form of Brahm, the Supreme Being, it also means that the Lord harbours the entire creation inside his own self. His big belly stands for the immense size of the universe.

Ganesh has ‘four arms’ indicating the four components of the Antha-karan, called the inner-self. These are Mana (mind), Buddhi (intellect), Chitta (sub-conscious) and Ahankaar (ego, false pride etc.)

One of his hands holds a ‘Paasha (snare; rope)’ which stands for worldly attachments and entanglements that the Lord is able to control. The second hand holds an 'Ankush (goad)' which stands for the ability to exercise control over the sense organs and natural urges. The third hand holds a 'Modak' (a ball of sweetmeat) which stands for the spiritual rewards. And the fourth hand is held in the 'Var Mudra' which is used to bless his devotees and give them fearlessness.

His mount is a 'small mouse'. The mouse is notorious for stealing grain and ruining the store. Hence it is a metaphor for all the evil and negative qualities in a creature that are demeaning for his soul and lead to his ruin, and the fact that the Lord sits on the mouse shows that the Lord helps one to overcome them; or the fact that the Lord is able to overcome and subdue all the negativities of creation. The 'small' size of the mouse indicates that even a small negative trait in us can rob us of all the other good we have like the small rat can ruin the greatest of harvest or a huge granary.

The mouse is fond of sweets and grains. This indicates that the Lord is fond of good virtues and qualities of creation, and he searches them out from all the corners of creation like the mouse that goes on rummaging for grain and sweetmeats throughout his life.

The Ganapati Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition, which is the twenty-fifth Upanishad of this Veda, is entirely dedicated to him. It is propounded therein that Lord Ganapati resides in the inner-self of all living beings as their Atma, the soul and the pure consciousness. It then goes on to explain the meaning of the word Ganapati, how to meditate upon the Lord, the Mala-Mantras dedicated to him which are used to turn the beads of the rosary while doing Japa (repetition of the holy Mantras), the spiritual rewards of such meditation and contemplation, some special Mantras of the Lord which helps the worshipper fulfill his desires and attain fruits of his efforts, the benefits of reading this eclectic Upanishad, and the rules to be followed while doing so as well as for preaching this Upanishad to others. The visible form of Lord Ganapati has also been described in this Upanishad (verse no. 11-14).

The image of Lord Ganapati is described in verse nos. 11-12 of the Ganapati Upanishad as follows—

“verse no. 11 = The Lord (Ganapati) has one tusk and four arms. He holds a 'Paash' (a snare) and an 'Ankush' (a goad) in two of his arms, while the third is held in the 'Abhaya Mudra' (the posture that grants perpetual fearlessness to his devotees) and the fourth in the 'Var Mudra' (the posture that grants boon of wish fulfillment to his devotees). He holds a flag with the insignia of a rat/mouse (11).

“verse no. 12 = His countenance is red like blood. His abdomen is large (big and pot-bellied). His ears are also large like the hand-held winnowing fan. He is covered in clothes of red colour.

His body is covered by a paste of red-coloured perfume. He is duly worshipped with red coloured flowers (12).”

<sup>2</sup>Sita's prayers can be paraphrased in a different way as follows—“Oh Lord Ganesh! You have an unchallenged and immaculate reputation as the God who fulfills any desire the worshipper has when he offers his worship to you. You are universally adored and offered worship on a priority basis before one offers worship to any other god because not only are you the greatest in the pantheon of gods but also because once you are pleased with the worshipper then all other gods are easy to please; none of them would ever think of denying what the worshipper wishes if you have agreed to fulfill his wishes. This fact is metaphorically depicted in your being appointed as the 'chief of the attendants of Lord Shiva'. Lord Shiva the greatest of the three senior-most gods, i.e. the three gods of the holy Trinity consisting of Brahma the creator, Vishnu the sustainer, and Shiva or Rudra the concluder. It is this reason why Shiva is honoured by the title of a ‘Maha-Deva’, the Great God. All other gods are his juniors, i.e. they attend to the wishes of Lord Shiva. Therefore, your anointment as the chief of Shiva’s attendants is a symbolic way of making you the ‘chief of all the gods who are junior to Lord Shiva’.

Today is the day I had been waiting all my life. Today is the day of my judgement as to how sincerely and diligently I have been serving you. Today is the day that will test your fame as the gracious and benevolent bestower of boons. Today is the day which will decide the entire future of my life and its happiness. Today is the day of making or breaking for me.

Hence, I employ all the powers that prayers inherently have in them, and I have come begging at your doorstep with the full hope and expectation that I will not be turned away disappointed. Remember Lord Ganesh: If my wish is not fulfilled today, which is extremely crucial for me and my entire future life, then you will not be able to save your reputation, your grace and your face in the world anymore.

I have never requested you for anything all my life inspite of serving you to the best of my ability. This is the first time I am in need. So please be compassionate and considerate inspite of my failings and drawbacks that I cannot deny I have. So, notwithstanding all other things, you are requested to salvage my life today. And all I request you is to ‘make the bow as light-weight as you can.’”]

दो०. देखि देखि रघुबीर तन सुर मनाव धरि धीर ।

भरे बिलोचन प्रेम जल पुलकावली सरीर ॥ २५७ ॥

dōhā.

dēkhi dēkhi raghubīra tana sura manāva dhari dhīra.
bharē bilōcana prēma jala pulakāvalī sarīra. 257.

Sita repeatedly glanced at the form (literally the ‘body’; “tana”) of Lord Ram, gathered courage and invoked or prayed to the gods.

Her eyes were filled with tears of affection (for the Lord), and her body was thrilled. (Doha no. 257)

[Note—In other words, the more Sita looked at Lord Ram, the more anxious and nervous she felt. She has already prayed fervently to Parvati, Shiva and Ganesh, the three deities who are renowned for their benevolence and magnanimity when it comes to granting boons and fulfilling one’s desires. After this prayer, Sita somehow felt a little bit reassured that the chances of Lord Ram breaking the bow has brightened because she was absolutely certain that none of these deities would disappoint her. So she looked at Lord Ram and sighed. But she was so overcome with anxiety and worries that she could not sufficiently assure herself, and therefore started praying to the remaining gods so that they too feel pleased and help her. She feared that otherwise the remaining gods might get offended at being by-passed and create some sort of unexpected problems in Lord Ram’s breaking of the bow.

Inspite of the prayers, Sita’s worries and anxiety did not abate. She sobbed and wept silently and plaintively, because she was not sure if her desire to marry Lord Ram would ever fructify. She thought that this is the last chance she has of seeing her beloved Lord, because if he is unable to break the bow for any reason whatsoever, then that is it: she will never see him again! This uncertainty compounded her miseries manyfold.

The verses that follow herein below explain why she was so worried.]

चौ०. नीकें निरखि नयन भरि सोभा । पितु पनु सुमिरि बहुरि मनु छोभा ॥ १ ॥
अहह तात दारुनि हठ ठानी । समुझत नहिं कछु लाभु न हानी ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

nīkēm nirakhi nayana bhari sōbhā. pitu panu sumiri bahuri manu chōbhā. 1.
ahaha tāta dārūni haṭha ṭhānī. samujhata nahim kachu lābhu na hānī. 2.

She (Sita) looked at the charming, handsome and enthralling form of Lord Ram till her eyes felt contented. But soon the gloom and despair returned as she recalled the vows of her father (that he will marry her only to someone who breaks the bow)<sup>1</sup>. (1)

She was remorseful and lamented as follows—‘Oh my dear father! What a horrible vow have you made without taking into consideration its consequences. You have not understood its gains or losses; you did not weigh its pros and cons.

[You have put my entire life on stake just to prove that you are very truthful to your words—refer: Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 252. But this is an utter nonsense; it is not practical. You have not consulted me, when it is I who am directly affected.]<sup>2</sup> (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>As we have read in the note of Doha no. 257 above, Sita initially felt assured after her prayers to Parvati, Shiva, Ganesh and all other gods that they would listen to her prayers and enable Lord Ram to break the bow. So for a while she enjoyed the wonderful sight of Lord Ram’s enchanting image. But her gloomy thoughts took hold over her once again.

She recalled the vow of her father, and his nature that he does not yield once he makes up his mind. He has already declared that since no one could break the bow, he will have to bear with the pain of keeping his daughter unmarried—refer: Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 252.

Like her mother who had doubts about the ability of Lord Ram, by the external look of his delicate frame and his young age, to lift and break the heavy bow which has already put to shame the strength, power and valour of thousands of kings who prided themselves for these qualities, Sita too gets worried about the Lord being actually able to lift and break the bow. But whereas the queen mother had felt free to disclose her thoughts to her well-informed friend who had removed her doubts by explaining the reality to her, Sita did not have this privilege at this moment as she was standing in the arena with all eyes focused on her, and therefore had to be careful about each movement and gesture to avoid scandals and ignominy. She was left to fend for herself, trying to rationalise with her anxious mind which was already on the edge, to the best of her logic and reasoning, without being able to seek any moral support or having a shoulder of a friend to place her head upon and weep.

It’s really to the credit of Sita that she managed to maintain her external poise, did not faint or her allow her knees to buckle and make her fall.

Now, when she remembered her father’s vow, she mentally cursed him as narrated in verse no. 2.

<sup>2</sup>Sita admonishes her father silently in her heart for his lack of foresightedness. He had made the breaking of the bow the sole criterion for deciding who would marry Sita. Breaking of a bow could judge the candidate's physical strength and abilities, but it was no judgement for his other qualities, such as his personal character, his nature, his temperament, his intelligence, his wisdom, his education, his family background, his habits and likings, and so on. Did he ever take into consideration what would happen if some rascal, a wicked person, a pervert, a drunkard or a promiscuous man was able to break the bow; would he like his daughter to be married to such a person? If not, then isn't his vow tying her marriage to the breaking of the bow nonsense and illogical?]

सचिव सभय सिख देइ न कोई । बुध समाज बड़ अनुचित होई ॥ ३ ॥

कहँ धनु कुलिसहु चाहि कठोरा । कहँ स्यामल मृदुगात किसोरा ॥ ४ ॥

बिधि केहि भाँति धरौं उर धीरा । सिरस सुमन कन बेधिअ हीरा ॥ ५ ॥

saciva sabhaya sikha dē'i na kō'ī. budha samāja bara anucita hō'ī. 3.
kaham' dhanu kulisahu cāhi kaṭhōrā. kaham' syāmala mṛdugāta kisōrā. 4.
bidhi kēhi bhām'ti dharauṁ ura dhīrā. sirasa sumana kana bēdhi'a hīrā. 5.

The chief minister is afraid of annoying you, and so are the rest of those who call themselves wise and learned in the society, because no one has the guts to rise up and advice you that whatever is happening, or is being allowed to happen, is extremely uncalled for and is most pitiful, unjust, improper, inappropriate, impractical and unwise.

[There is another way of reading this verse as follow—"The chief minister is afraid of giving appropriate advice because he fears of annoying the king. None of the others are also gathering courage to give proper advice. It's a great pity that a great injustice is being perpetrated upon me openly in a society that prides itself of its members who are expected to be wise and act wisely in a rationale and well-thought out way. But it seems to me that all wisdom and caution has been thrown to the winds in my case because such an impractical and improper thing is being allowed to happen in front of all without anyone raising a voice of sanity and opposing this grave injustice and wrong that is being done."]<sup>1</sup> (3)

On the one hand is the bow which is harder than 'Kulis' (Vajra, the weapon of Indra, the king of gods; said to be made of the hardest material in existence), and on the other hand is this dark-complexioned prince with a delicate frame and immature (young) age. [It is highly absurd to force such a delicate prince to go and lift a bow that is so stern and unyielding that it has just a few moments earlier shamed thousands of strong warriors by not moving an inch from its place inspite of their making strenuous efforts to the best of their abilities.]<sup>2</sup> (4)

I am dismayed and distressed, am in a great dilemma, and feeling flustered. Oh Creator, I don't know how to keep my wits together and gather sufficient courage to maintain my mental balance, poise and calm.

Say, is it ever possible for the pointed end of a tender Siras flower (of a family of trees similar to the Shisham tree, the Indian rosewood tree; Latin name Dalbergia sisu) to be able to pierce a piece of diamond* (which is the toughest thing in the world)?<sup>3</sup> (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The same thing was said by Sita's mother to her friend—refer: Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 256.

Sita curses under her breath that her father wishes to keep her unmarried out of some old-fashioned notion of being true to one's words, no matter how nonsensical that 'word' may be. At least she should now be given a last chance to make her choice and choose her groom, especially when it is clear that no one has been able to marry her in accordance to her father's wishes or vow of breaking the bow. How ridiculous it is to let her suffer for life just because her father had made an absurd vow by tying her entire future and happiness to an old and rusty bow.

Even if he had erred in his decision to call-off her marriage just because no one could break the bow, at least now his chief minister or his other court advisors must step forward and tell him what to do that would be proper and fit under changed situation. After all, this is the very function, a moral obligation and a duty of a chief minister or other advisors of any king to give him sane and practical advice if they find that the king is making a mistake or taking a wrong decision. If they do not do so out of fear of annoying the king, then they fail to live up to their expectations, and must be dismissed and punished. It means they are all sycophants, yes-men. A king who allows himself to be surrounded by such 'yes-men' is bound to come to ruin. Sita wonders, why does her father not realise this?

Why aren't these so-called wise men and intelligent advisors not taking the king into confidence and fulfilling their responsibilities to fearlessly tell him that it is not proper to keep his daughter unmarried just because every candidate has failed the eligibility test that the king had decided arbitrarily without taking the pros and cons into consideration—refer: Chaupai line no. 2 above? Why has no one got the courage to stand up and tell the king that in all sooth it is a good wisdom for a king not to be rigid in his views or stance because one must be practical in his approach and change one's course of action or decision to suit changed circumstances, and to rework one's expectations and objectives in accordance with the current situation? Being stubborn and adamant and inflexible is not a sign of wisdom. Great kings are supposed to be quick to adapt themselves to changed situations, whether it is in the battle-field or in dealing with the administrative and political affairs of the kingdom. Rigidity makes one stale and outdated; adaptability and flexibility infuses vibrancy and life. If one does not change and adapts according to the changing times and circumstances, one leads to one's own ruin, and no one else, not even the gods, is to be blamed for the misfortunes that come in the wake of being stubborn, adamant and rigid.

Now, this is Sita's perspective. But from the viewpoint of the chief minister and other advisors of the king it would have been overstepping their jurisdiction if they had intervened and requested Janak to let Sita make the choice of her husband. This is because the marriage of a king's daughter is his family matter and his personal affair, and not the affair of the state or the kingdom for which they have been appointed to advise the king. If the king made a mistake in making a decision related to the affairs of the state then the chief minister as well as other advisors would have been within their rights to stand up and tell the king that what he is planning to do was wrong. But they may be rebuked by the king if they unnecessarily tried to act smart in matters that are king's family and personal affairs.

Besides this point, the king had not sought their opinion or advice with respect to his decision of making the breaking of the bow the sole criterion to choose the groom for his daughter Sita, and therefore it was prudent for them to keep quiet. In matters of state they would be within their jurisdiction to convey their ideas to the king even if not being asked specifically, but in personal affairs it was wise to keep quiet.

<sup>2</sup>Refer also to: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 78, stanza no. 3, and verse no. 70, stanza no. 3.

In other words, there is no match between them. It is not wise and proper to pitch two opponents against each other if there is a glaring mismatch between their abilities and qualifications. For instance, there is no sense in making a doctor stand up against an engineer to debate on an engineering subject, or an engineer to argue with a doctor on a medical topic.

All the earlier competitors were mature veteran warriors with muscular, well-built bodies. But Lord Ram is of a young age and has a delicate frame. It will be incongruous to imagine that he would be able to lift a bow that is extremely hard and huge, especially when thousands of strong warriors have tried their might but failed to move it an inch—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 12 that precede Doha no. 251; and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 256.

<sup>3</sup>In this verse, Lord Ram is likened to this flower, and the bow to the diamond. Even as it is ridiculous to imagine that the soft pointed end of the flower could pierce through the diamond, it is also equally ridiculous to imagine that Lord Ram, who has a delicate body, would be able to lift the rusty huge bow and overcome its hardness in order to break it.

Sita wonders, ‘So, why are these people putting this lovely prince to shame; why do they want to humiliate him in this abject manner? My fate is decided by the absurd vow my father has made. I will have to remain unmarried for life; it’s my bad fate. But what is the great idea in insulting this innocent prince and subjecting him to public insult by making him attempt to lift a bow which apparently he won’t be successfully able to do because of the obvious mismatch between the physical appearances of the two—for, Lord Ram is of a delicate frame, while the bow is heavy, rusted, old, ugly and huge in size.’

These verses show the extent of affection and love that Sita had developed for Lord Ram. A true lover would never want the object of his or her adoration to be subjected to any trouble or humiliation for his or her sake. A true lover would rather suffer himself or herself than allowing or wanting the object of adoration to undergo any sort of suffering.

Sita in effect laments that her fate is already doomed, but why should Lord Ram, the object of her adoration and affection, be put to shame unnecessarily for no fault of his. The Lord has not even shown any desire to participate in the competition; even when his brother Laxman vented his anger at Janak, the Lord had calmed him down and ordered him to sit down—refer: Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 254.

But when his Guru sage Vishwamitra ordered him to go and break the bow, he was left with no choice but to obey his Guru’s command. But this is injustice and improper. Just like my whimsical father who has made me a laughing stock in this world by making an absurd vow, the sage is also making Lord Ram an object of laughter by forcing him to go and break the bow though apparently there is no physical possibility of the Lord being able to lift and break it because he is delicate while the bow is exceptionally heavy and stern.

*One important thing to note here is this: In the previous verse, the bow is compared to the Vajra of Indra (“Kulis”), and here it is compared to the diamond. The underlying quality in both the Vajra and the diamond is ‘their un-breakability and formidably high strength’. They are the toughest things in existence.]

सकल सभा कै मति भै भोरी । अब मोहि संभुचाप गति तोरी ॥ ६ ॥
 निज जड़ता लोगन्ह पर डारी । होहि हरुअ रघुपतिहि निहारी ॥ ७ ॥
 अति परिताप सीय मन माहीं । लव निमेष जुग सय सम जाहीं ॥ ८ ॥

sakala sabhā kai mati bhai bhōrī. aba mōhi sambhucāpa gati tōrī. 6.
 nija jaratā lōganha para dārī. hōhi haru'a raghupatihi nihārī. 7.
 ati paritāpa sīya mana māhīm. lava nimēṣa juga saya sama jāhīm. 8.

[Now, as a last resort, Sita pleads with the ‘Bow’ itself as follows--]

The whole assembly has forfeited its senses; every single person seems to have lost wisdom. In this frightening scenario, oh Lord Shiva’s bow, I seek refuge in you. [I surrender before you and pray to you to help me.] (6)

You<sup>1</sup> have already cast your legendary heaviness upon the people (by dulling their senses and making them inert). So, please now become light as soon as you see Lord Ram (i.e. please show mercy upon Lord Ram and shed your stubbornness for his sake; please become light in the view of the fact that the Lord himself is so delicate).’ (7)

Sita’s heart was very agitated and tormented. Even a second appeared to be as long as an era (“Yuga”) for her. [Time was passing too slowly for her; each second appeared to be as long as an age, weighing heavily on her mind as she waited with bated breath for her fate to be decided. She was on her edge during the time Lord Ram rose from his seat till the time he broke the bow.] (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Here, the word ‘you’ refers to a personified form of Bow, or the ‘bow’ has been deified as a ‘divine entity’ that has great powers to decide what to and what not to do, as well as to oblige someone who prays to it. It is no longer an ordinary bow, but a ‘Bow’ with mystical powers. And it is also not wrong to assume this ‘bow’ to be a divine entity because it is the ‘bow of Lord Shiva’.

Sita is so upset mentally that she has begged all and sundry to somehow help her overcome her miseries, but everyone seems powerless and helpless. Previously she has already begged with Shiva, Parvati, Ganesh and other gods. Then she has cursed her father and his advisors. Failing to evoke sympathy and empathy from anyone, she now turns to the ‘bow’ and begs it to help her. We shall soon discover that once she did it, the mystical ‘bow’ of Lord Shiva immediately obliged her: it became as light as a feather, and as fragile and soft as a lotus stem so that Lord Ram would easily lift and break it as if it was a trifle matter.

Sita pleads with the ‘bow’ to become appropriately light so that it can match the delicate nature of Lord Ram. She tells the bow—“Oh bow! You are so hard and stern. Have a look at Lord Ram; he has such a soft touch of his hands. Won’t you be ashamed of yourself if your rough surface injures the Lord’s hands? I don’t request you to break; what I am begging of you is simply to become light and soft so that the Lord is not hurt when he touches you. You are Lord Shiva's bow, and Shiva is a merciful Lord. Say then, how can you be so stern with Lord Ram whom even your own master, Shiva, adores Lord Ram so much as to enshrine him in his heart as his revered Lord—for instance, refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 51, or (ii) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 82 amongst many other examples? Hence, please be gracious to become light and soft as soon as you see Lord Ram near you.”]

दो०. प्रभुहि चितइ पुनि चितव महि राजत लोचन लोल ।
खेलत मनसिज मीन जुग जनु बिधु मंडल डोल ॥ २५८ ॥

dōhā.

prabhuhi cita'i puni citava mahi rājata lōcana lōla.
khēlata manasija mīna juga janu bidhu maṇḍala ḍōla. 258.

Sita was repeatedly glancing first at the Lord and then at the ground in quick succession. This created an impression that two lovely fish of Kamdeo (cupid) are swimming around a pail represented by the full disc of the moon. (Doha no. 258)

[Note—Sita's eyes explored the Lord's lovely face by gliding over it, and then she felt abashed because the whole assembly was watching her each move. So, she immediately looked down towards the ground. Unable to resist the charm of the Lord's countenance and her internal urge to look at the beautiful sight of the Lord's image as much as she could while still there was time and chance, she would lift her eyes from the ground to look at Lord Ram once again. A storm was blowing in her mind and heart. She was overwhelmed with emotions of love and affection on the one hand, and with uncertainty and helplessness on the other hand. She was unable to either fix her eyes on the Lord or on the ground. For one moment she looked up at Lord Ram, and at the other moment she lowered her eyes to look at the ground. This up-and-down movement of Sita's eyes continued unabated, prompting Tulsidas to write this Doha.

Sita's face was beautiful and fair complexioned like the face of the full moon which is here likened to a silver pale full of Amrit, the elixir of bliss and happiness, while her eyes are compared to two fish of the god of beauty and love, known as Kamdeo (cupid). When her eyes constantly flickered and shifted from one point to another as she once looked at Lord Ram, allowing her eyes to hover over the Lord's charming face for some time, and then to the ground for some moments, only to lift the eyes again to look at the Lord's lovely countenance, and this process went on repeating again and again, Tulsidas, the poet, compares it with two fish of Kamdeo (cupid) which were moving around playfully in a silvery-pail full of Amrit for which the bright disc of the full moon is used as a metaphor.

In effect, this 'full moon' refers to the lovely fair-complexioned face of Sita, and the 'two fish of Kamdeo (cupid)' to her eyes. The reason for citing 'Kamdeo (cupid)' is that Sita was overcome with affection and love for Lord Ram, and she longed to marry him.]

चौ०. गिरा अलिनि मुख पंकज रोकी । प्रगट न लाज निसा अवलोकी ॥ १ ॥

लोचन जलु रह लोचन कोना । जैसें परम कृपन कर सोना ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

girā alini mukha pañkaja rōkī. pragaṭa na lāja nisā avalōkī. 1.

lōcana jalu raha lōcana kōnā. jaisēm parama kṛpana kara sōnā. 2.

Sita could not say a word out of shyness and shame. It appeared that her voice was held captive in her lotus-like mouth just like the black-bee does not gather courage to venture out during the night.

[The bee becomes active during the daytime when there is light and the lotus flowers open up. The reason is that the bee searches for nectar of the flower to quench its thirst, and the majority of flowers open their petals only during the day. This fact is already pointed out with reference to the lotus flower in Baal Kand, Doha no. 254 herein above.]<sup>1</sup> (1)

Tears did well up in her eyes, but they remained confined to the corners of her eyes (as if they had dried up even before they could emerge from eye and roll down her cheeks) just like a miser's gold remains buried in some remote or obscure corner<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It is to be observed here that Sita wishes to speak and let the assembly know how she feels, what she wants and what injustice is being done to her without as much as giving her a chance to put forward her views, especially when the issue at hand directly effects her entire future life. But hesitation takes the better hold of her and forces her to keep quiet. She is reluctant to speak up as it would be completely at odds with the established tradition of society which forbades a girl, especially a girl who is about to be married and is standing in the middle of an assembly full of people watching her intently, to speak out boldly in public. It would be deemed to be scandalous and sacrilegious; it would put her entire family to shame and public scorn; it would embarrass her father, herself and the rest of the family; it would be high indiscipline, extremely indecent and violative of established protocol.

There were thousands of invited kings and princes in attendance; what impression would they get about her character? So, reluctantly and out of compulsion she desisted from speaking.

<sup>2</sup>Sita held back her tears. She literally fought back her tears. Onlookers did not see even a single drop of tear on her face, and therefore no one could judge the horribly agonizing state of her mind. People thought that Sita is not affected or bothered by the development that no one has been able to break the bow, that a dark future stares her on the face. No one in the assembly could have a hint of the great emotional storm that was blowing in her mind and heart. Had tears flowed down her cheeks, some in the assembly would have had shown empathy for her and gather courage to intercede on her behalf to ask her father Janak to at least find out why Sita is weeping or what causes her discomfort. It would have been simply cruel and inhuman to let a helpless girl stand in the middle an assembly with hawkish eyes devouring her and letting her cry inconsolably without showing any mercy and compassion. So at least someone in the assembly would have stood up on her behalf and taken up the issue with king Janak. May be the king himself, or Sita's mother or the chief minister or some other high-ranking courtier would have noticed her weeping and realize that she is in great discomfort, ask her the reason for her weeping, and then some solution could have been found.

But though it would have been in Sita's favour if she had wept openly, it would have meant that she has a weak heart, a feeble mind, and is emotionally immature. Weeping and sobbing in public is certainly not a trait of someone with a strong mind and personality. Sita did not want to create an unsavory scene bordering on drama that would make her a butt of laughter in this world. She was already in great misery, and if there were jeers and cat-calls if she showed any sign of weakness of personality by letting the tears drop from her eyes, the resultant agony and shame would be unbearable.

So Sita fought back her tears and soaked them in the corners of her eyes before they could roll down her cheeks.

Sita was not only fighting to hold back her tears but also the strong desire to speak and let everyone present there know what she wants as has been said in the previous verse no. 1.

Her determination not to let the tears come out and make her mental agonies and torments public is compared in this verse to a miser who tries his best to hide his gold from public knowledge by tucking it in some secret place. Sita wishes to put up a brave face that would make her look dignified and as one who possesses a strong personality.]

सकुची व्याकुलता बड़ि जानी । धरि धीरजु प्रतीति उर आनी ॥ ३ ॥
तन मन बचन मोर पनु साचा । रघुपति पद सरोज चितु राचा ॥ ४ ॥
तौ भगवानु सकल उर बासी । करिहि मोहि रघुबर कै दासी ॥ ५ ॥ sakucī byākulatā baḍi jānī. dhari dhīraju pratīti ura ānī. 3.

tana mana bacana mōra panu sēcā. raghupati pada sarōja citu rēcā. 4.

tau bhagavānu sakala ura bāsī. karihi mōhi raghubara kai dāsī. 5.

Finding her self extremely nervous and agitated, Sita thought that it was prudent and wise to keep her mind calm and have courage in her heart (instead of fretting and fuming in vain). She decided instead to rely on the strength of her (true) love for the Lord (as it is said that true love always wins against the most severe of odds)<sup>1</sup>. (3)

If my vow (of surrendering myself to Lord Ram for the rest of my life, of accepting only the Lord as my life-partner and husband) is truthful, honest and sincere in all respects involving my 'Tana' (literally the 'body', implying one's physical being, physical existence, and deeds or actions of the physical body), my 'Mana' (thoughts of the mind and emotions of the heart) and my 'Bachan' (words that are spoken), and if I have true affection for the lotus-like holy feet of Lord Raghupati (Ram) [4], then, Oh Lord God ("Bhagwan") who lives in the heart of all living beings (and hence knows the secret thoughts and emotions of all; nothing is hidden from him), let me please become a loyal maid of the Lord. [The word used in the text is "Daasi" which literally translates into a female attendant who serves her lord faithfully and loyally, with great sense of servitude, for the rest of her life as if she was under a bond to serve him. But here the word means a 'loyal wife' and not a slave. In other words, Sita prays that she should be blessed and allowed to serve Lord Ram diligently and faithfully as if she was his maid, not as a bonded slave but as a loyal and loving wife who finds pleasure in serving her husband, who does not treat this service as a burden on her, but as a privilege.] [5] (4-5)*

{*These two verses can also be read slightly differently as follows—“If my determination to serve Lord Ram with my body, my heart and mind, and by my words (i.e. what I speak) is honest and truthful, then I am sure that the Lord God, who is privy to all the personal thoughts and emotions of every single living being because he lives in the innerself of all, will enable me to serve the holy lotus-like feet of Raghupati (Lord Ram) for the rest of my life.” (4-5)}<sup>2</sup>

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Sita was perplexed because she did not know what to and what not to do. Fretting and fuming, worrying and getting anxious, weeping and sobbing, or cursing and muttering angrily under the breath—none would help in any way. As far as requesting gods and goddesses to intervene, she has already done it.

So, the only way now is to have courage and reassure her self that there is still chance of Lord Ram breaking the bow and marrying her because it has been always said that true love and devotion for the Lord do not go in vain and are sure to produce positive results in her favour (refer especially to Chaupai line nos. 4-6 that precedes Doha no. 259 below that expressly endorses this view).

Hence she thought over the matter and decided that it is wiser to keep calm and surrender her self to Lord Ram and rely on the Lord’s basic nature of honouring the virtues of love and devotion in his devotees (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-6 that precede Doha no. 35 where Lord Ram has told Sabari, the old woman who was patiently waiting in the deep forest for the Lord for a long time for the Lord to come to her hermitage and provide her with liberation).

Not only this, the Lord has declared that he will give unconditional protection to those who, after having lost all other hopes in this world for solace and succour, have come to him for protection (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 48 where the Lord welcomed Vibhishan, the younger brother of the demon king Ravana, warmly when he was insulted and kicked out of his kingdom by his elder brother in a fit of rage).

Sita’s condition was no better: no one was coming to her aid. Her own father had become instrumental in her torments, what to talk of others. Her mother, ministers of the kingdom, their Guru (royal priest, Satanand) and the rest of those who she had thought were her well-wishers had now become mute spectators and dumb. So, the only route open for Sita to escape this horror is to surrender at the holy feet of the Lord himself, and leave her fate upon him. This is what she has done now. Refer also to Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 261 below which clearly endorse the views elicited here.

<sup>2</sup>Sita has finally sought succour in the strength of her own faith in the power of her devotion for Lord Ram and a desire to completely surrender herself for the rest of her life at the holy feet of the Lord. Such is the mystical power of having Bhakti (devotion) for Lord Ram that where all other methods had failed to give any trace of relief to Sita, as soon as she invoked this sole method of Bhakti by declaring to her self that she would think and serve no one else in her life except Lord Ram, peace and comfort came to her.

Not only this, as has been noted in earlier verses, this was the only factor for Lord Ram to decide whether or not he should break the bow. So, as soon as the Lord learnt that Sita has stopped praying to this god and that goddess, and has completely surrendered herself to him, the Lord lost no time to snap the bow into two pieces—refer: Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 261 herein below.]

जेहि कें जेहि पर सत्य सनेहू । सो तेहि मिलइ न कछु संदेहू ॥ ६ ॥
 प्रभु तन चितइ प्रेम तन ठाना । कृपानिधान राम सबु जाना ॥ ७ ॥
 सियहि बिलोकि तकेउ धनु कैसें । चितव गरुरु लघु ब्यालहि जैसें ॥ ८ ॥ jēhi kēm jēhi para satya sanēhū. sō tēhi mila'i na kachu sandēhū. 6.

 prabhu tana cita'i prēma tana ṭhānā. kṛpānidhāna rāma sabu jānā. 7.
 siyahi bilōki takē'u dhanu kaisēm. citava garuru laghu byālahi jaisēm. 8.

There is no trace of doubt in the ancient adage that a one surely gets something for which one has sincere love and affection, which one longs for, yearns for, and for which one has a strong desire.<sup>1</sup> (6)

Then she (Sita) looked at the physical form (body) of Lord Ram and made a stern vow of love and affection for the Lord. The merciful Lord Ram, who is all-knowing and omniscient, became aware of every thing (i.e. the Lord saw that Sita has finally committed herself to him, and there is no more any doubt in her faith and love for him). (7)

The Lord gave Sita a final glance (as if to assure her not to worry any longer), and then he looked at the bow in the same fashion as Garud (the mount of Lord Vishnu, here meaning an eagle or a kite) looks down contemptuously at a small serpent.

[The kite or the eagle swoops down on the reptile as soon as it sees the latter lying on the ground. Once the bird decides to make a kill for the serpent, the latter cannot escape no matter what trick it tries because the bird swoops down so swiftly on it from the sky that the poor serpent has no time to escape and hide anywhere.]<sup>2</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This adage has very practical usage. If a man is sincere about his objective in life, then he is sure to make an all-out effort to achieve it, and surely success would be his. His efforts to reach his goal in life then won't be half-hearted or driven by formalities or hindered by obstacles, no matter how formidable they may be; his efforts to reach his target would be diligent and forceful and honest. And this is surely going to produce positive results for him.

Even Lord Shiva has endorsed this view when he had advised the gods to pray to Lord Vishnu right at the place where they were present at the moment instead of worrying to go to the heavenly abode of the Lord searching for him. Shiva said—“If you have true and sincere devotion and love for the Lord then he will manifest himself right here. I know of this fact; I vouch for its truthfulness.” Refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 185.

Sita has full confidence in herself and her conviction that if her surrender to the Lord is true and complete in every sense then there is no doubt that Lord Ram would accept her. This is very clear in Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 109.

<sup>2</sup>These two verses, nos. 7-8, clearly indicate that by this time Lord Ram has reached the bow and is contemplating his next move. Things are happening quickly, but their narration takes some time.

When Lord Ram discovered that Sita has pledged her loyalty and her own self at the feet of the Lord, and that she has made a vow to live up to her determination to serve the Lord and be faithful in her love for him for the rest of her life come what may, he decided to remove the only hurdle that stood between his devotee, Sita, having access to him.

The shape of the bow lying on the platform resembled a huge python sleeping on the ground. This is why a serpent is used as a metaphor here. Lord Ram did not waste any time in lifting, stringing and breaking the bow just like the fraction of time that elapses between the instant the kite or the eagle sees the serpent and it actually swooping down and scooping it away in its claws.]

दो०. लखन लखेउ रघुबंसमनि ताकेउ हर कोदंडु ।

पुलकि गात बोले बचन चरन चापि ब्रह्मांडु ॥ २५९ ॥

dōhā.

lakhana lakhē'u raghubansamani tākē'u hara kōdaṇḍu.
pulaki gāta bōlē bacana carana cāpi brahmāṇḍu. 259.

Laxman saw that the Lord (Ram), who was like a 'gem of the Raghu dynasty' ("raghubansamani"), was looking (gazing) intently at the bow (and was preparing to break it)<sup>1</sup>.

So he (Laxman) became thrilled in his body (i.e. he became excited and hoped for the best)<sup>2</sup>. He pressed the universe ("brahmāṇḍu") under his feet<sup>3</sup>, and warned (the entities listed below in the forthcoming verses to become alert so that the world does not split and collapse by the shock waves that would be generated when Lord Ram breaks the bow)—(Doha no. 259)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When Lord Ram stood close to the bow, he considered it carefully. Many thoughts were flying past his mind: such as that he should first and foremost silently offer his prayers to Lord Shiva and seek his nod to break the latter's bow; he should closely examine the bow and contemplate upon the best strategy to be adopted to tackle it; he should keep in mind and consider the long-term consequences of breaking this bow because the Lord was fully acquainted with Janak's vow that it would automatically mean marriage with Sita but he wasn't sure how his own father, king Dasrath, would take this news as he was unaware of the equation between him and Janak; what would be done if the failed kings rose in revolt and there was a battle and bloodshed; whether or not Sita would be compatible with him or the other members of his family; and so on and so forth. Many such factors were weighing heavily on Lord Ram's mind simultaneously during those crucial moments when he stood gazing at the bow. He had but little choice though—because his Guru, sage Vishwamitra, had ordered him to go and break the bow, and defying the Guru's orders was unthinkable for him no matter what befell as a result.

<sup>2</sup>Laxman was a personified form of the qualities of bravery, valour and strength. On other occasions also, when the chance came for Lord Ram to exhibit these virtues, Laxman has felt excited and thrilled. One such example is found when Lord Ram has raised his bow to dry the ocean when the latter was adamantly not giving Lord Ram and his army of monkeys a passage to cross over to Lanka—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 58.

Another reason for Laxman to get excited was that his feeling of being insulted by Janak when the king had declared that the world has no strong warrior because no one could break the bow, even without giving any of the two brothers a chance, would now be vindicated.

<sup>3</sup>Laxman was a personified form of Seshnath, the thousand-hooded celestial serpent who is believed to hold the world aloft on its hood. In other words, it was the duty of Laxman to make sure that the world does not tumble over and get destroyed by the huge waves of shock that would be generated when the bow of Lord Shiva would break into two, and compounded when Lord Ram throws the broken pieces onto the ground with a horrifying thud.

Besides this, there was the fear that as soon as it is lifted from its pedestal, the earth would lose its balance and may roll over because the bow was extremely heavy and its lifting by Lord Ram would shift the center of gravity many points.

So, Laxman symbolically put his legs on the top of this ball-like universe to prevent it from rolling over and obliterating life.]

चौ०. दिसिकुंजरहु कमठ अहि कोला । धरहु धरनि धरि धीर न डोला ॥ १ ॥

रामु चहहि संकर धनु तोरा । होहु सजग सुनि आयसु मोरा ॥ २ ॥

चाप समीप रामु जब आए । नर नारिन्ह सुर सुकृत मनाए ॥ ३ ॥

caupāī.

disikunjarahu kamaṭha ahi kōlā. dharahu dharani dhari dhīra na ḍolā. 1.

rāmu cahahiṃ saṅkara dhanu tōrā. hōhu sajaga suni āyasu mōrā. 2.

cāpa samīpa rāmu jaba ā'ē. nara nārinha sura sukrṭa manā'ē. 3.

[Laxman alerted the following entities as Lord Ram prepared to lift and break the bow—] ‘Oh Diggajs<sup>1</sup>, the Tortoise<sup>2</sup>, the Serpent<sup>3</sup>, and the Varaaha<sup>4</sup>! Hold the earth carefully so that it does not topple or roll over.* (1)

Become alert on my command as Lord Ram wants to (or is preparing to) break Lord Shiva’s bow. (2)

When Lord Ram came near the bow, all the men and women invoked the blessings (help) of the gods and staked all the rewards that were due to them for the good and meritorious deeds they had ever done in their lives (so that the Lord successfully breaks the bow)<sup>5</sup>. (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to:--(i) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 254; (ii) Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand—stanza no. 4-5 of verse no. 90; stanza no. 1 of verse no. 92 etc.; and (iii) Janki Mangal, verse no. 98.

The Diggajs—These Diggajs are eight in number and they are said to be strong elephants which support the earth from eight directions or corners. The word ‘Diggaj’ itself means anyone who is very strong and muscular. According to the Purans, these eight directions and their respective Diggajs are the following—(i) in the north, the Diggaj (elephant) is known as ‘Saarvabhoum’; (ii) in the north-east, the Diggaj is known as ‘Suprateek or Saptateek’; (iii) in the east, the Diggaj is known as ‘Airaawat’; (iv) in the south-east, the Diggaj is known as ‘Pundareek’; (v) in the south, the Diggaj is known as ‘Vaaman’; (vi) in the south-west, the Diggaj is known as ‘Kumud’; (vii) in the west, the Diggaj is known as ‘Anjan’; and (viii) in the north-west, the Diggaj is known as ‘Pushpa-danta’.

However, according to Valmiki’s Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 40, verse nos. 14, 18, 20 and 22, when king Sagar’s sons went to dig the earth in search of the horse of the sacrifice that had gone missing, they saw only four Diggajs as follows—(i) in the east they saw the Diggaj named ‘Virupaaksha’, (ii) in the south, the Diggaj named ‘Maha-padma’, (iii) in the west, the Diggaj named ‘Saumnas’ (pronounced as Saw+um+nus), and (iv) in the north, the Diggaj named ‘Bhadra’.

<sup>2</sup>The Tortoise (Kamath)—This is said to be one of the forms of Lord Vishnu who holds the earth on the back of his shell so that it does not sink into the fathomless pit of the nether world and get lost for ever. It is the second incarnation of Vishnu. The Lord had supported the legendary Mountain called Mandara which had started sinking during the churning of the ocean by the Gods and the Demons in search of Amrit, the elixir of eternal and life.

<sup>3</sup>The Serpent (Ahi)—This is the celestial serpent with a thousand hoods which holds the earth on its hoods. Its name is Seshnath. Laxman is believed to be a manifestation of Seshnath—refer Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, line no. 1 of Doha no. 197. Lord Vishnu reclines on the coiled body of Seshnath as it floats on the surface of the celestial ocean of milk known as Kshir-sagar.

<sup>4</sup>The Varaaha (Kolaa)—The Boar manifestation of Lord Vishnu. It is the third incarnation of Vishnu in which he killed the demon Hiranyaaksha and lifted the earth from the flood water where it had vanished. According to some versions, this demon had hidden the earth in the bowls of the ocean. This extrication and resurrection of the earth is a symbolic way of saying that the Lord saves the creation from being submerged in the vast ocean of sins and evil. An Upanishad preached by Lord Varaaha appears in the Krishna Yajur Veda tradition as its 30th Upanishad. The female aspect of Varaaha is known as Goddess Vaaraahi.

*The above four entities hold the earth from below in the following sequence—at the very bottom is Varaaha (the Boar), then comes Seshnath (the Serpent), above the latter is the Tortoise (Kachhap; Kurma), and on the top are the Diggajs (the Elephants).

<sup>5</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 255 which endorse this view.

The citizens are perplexed by the magnitude of the obstacle that Lord Ram had to face. The following verse nos. 4-7 enumerate the hurdles that have all teamed up to oppose Lord Ram.]

सब कर संसु अरु अग्यानु । मंद महीपन्ह कर अभिमानू ॥ ४ ॥

भृगुपति केरि गरब गरुआई । सुर मुनिबरन्ह केरि कदराई ॥ ५ ॥
सिय कर सोचु जनक पछितावा । रानिन्ह कर दारुन दुख दावा ॥ ६ ॥ saba kara sansa'u aru agyānū. manda mahīpanha kara abhimānū. 4.

bhṛgupati kēri garaba garu'ā'ī. sura munibaranha kēri kadarā'ī. 5.
siya kara sōcu janaka pachitāvā. rāninha kara dārūna dukha dāvā. 6.

The doubts and ignorance of all those who had assembled there (who did not know the truth of Lord Ram being an incarnation of Lord Vishnu and of Sita being that of Laxmi, the divine couple whose union in their human forms was merely a formality that was destined to happen), the arrogance and vanity of foolish kings (that no one is stronger than them, that if they could not break the bow then no one else would, and that they would not allow Sita to be married to anyone else even if he manages to break the bow) [4], ---

--- the pretensions and ego of sage Parashuram (“Brighu-pati”) about his own strength and invincibility (as well as being the one who finds pleasure in punishing the Kshatriya race, the warrior race to which Lord Ram belonged), the fear and apprehension of gods and sages (that in case Lord Ram is not able to break the bow, what would happen to Sita, and more importantly, about the long-term objective of Lord Vishnu to kill the cruel demons in his human as Lord Ram when their king, Ravana, would steal Sita and the Lord would find an excuse to wage a war to liberate her, and in the process eliminate the terror of the demons) [5], ---

--- the worries in the mind and heart of Sita (which made her pray to so many gods and goddesses), the lamentations and regret of Janak (about the rigid vow he had made, a vow that proved to be nonsensical and impractical, a vow that became instrumental in causing so much pain and agony to all concerned, such as Sita, the royal family members, the citizens etc.), the horrifying agony in the heart of Sita’s mother who was literally burning in its fire [6], (4-6) ---

संभुचाप बड़ बोहितु पाई । चढ़े जाइ सब संगु बनाई ॥ ७ ॥
राम बाहुबल सिंधु अपारू । चहत पारु नहिं कोउ कड़हारू ॥ ८ ॥ sambhucāpa baṛa bōhitu pā'ī. caṛhē jā'i saba saṅgu banā'ī. 7.

rāma bāhubala sindhu apārū. cahata pārū nahim kō'u kaṛahārū. 8.

--- All of the above have personified themselves as formidable obstacles and have teamed together to board the huge boat represented by the great bow of Lord Shiva [7] ---

--- in their attempt to cross over or measure the fathomless ocean represented by the might and powers of Lord Ram’s arms [8]. (7-8)

[Note—Chaupai line nos. 4-8 should be read together to make the meaning clear. The citizens are worried that all the negative factors listed in verse nos. 4 to 6 have formed a coterie to oppose, challenge and tease Lord Ram.

Here, the strength of Lord Ram's arms is compared to an ocean that is so vast that it cannot be measured, but the entities mentioned here are doing their best to prove themselves superior to the Lord and symbolically defeat him by teaming together to challenge the authority and powers of the Lord successfully, using the bow as a weapon. If Lord Ram could not lift and break the bow it would mean that he has been defeated by his opponents who are hell-bent to prevent Lord Ram from marrying Sita.

If the strength of Lord Ram's arms is compared to the vast ocean that is measureless in length, then these opponents are compared to the passengers who have boarded a ship represented by the bow to cross this ocean to prove to the latter that it is wrong to say that the 'ocean is measureless' as they have been able to cross it and find its other end. One cannot find the other end of something that is 'measureless', but when one reaches the other shore of the ocean it means that he has symbolically 'measured' the length of the ocean, from the end where he boarded the ship to the end where he disembarked from it.]

दो०. राम बिलोके लोग सब चित्र लिखे से देखि ।

चितई सीय कृपायतन जानी बिकल बिसेषि ॥ २६० ॥

dōhā.

rāma bilōkē lōga saba citra likhē sē dēkhi.
citaī sīya kṛpāyatana jānī bikala bisēṣi. 260.

Lord Ram glanced at all the people and saw that all of them are in an immobile and transfixed state as if they are part of a picture.

Then the merciful Lord looked at Sita and found her in a specially (i.e. more than anyone else) agonized, restless and perplexed state. (Doha no. 260)

[Note—This Doha links with Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 of Doha no. 259 herein above, and with Chaupai line no. 1 that follows herein below.

The reason for Sita being in an extremely agitated state of mind was that it is she who would be directly affected by the outcome of this bow breaking competition. The few moments that were left between the time Lord Ram had yet not touched the bow and when he had actually broken the bow looked like an interminable period of time for Sita. Her heart must have been beating rapidly, her body perspiring profusely and her head reeling under the tremendous nervous and emotional pressure through which she was passing in those crucial moments of her life.

The entire assembly was on edge; the people were sitting or standing transfixed as if in a daze. Even their eyelids stopped flapping and they held their breath in anticipation of some miraculous event that was about to occur. There must have been a total pin-drop silence in the extensive arena which was abuzz a while ago with whisperings and mutterings.

The scene is aptly summarised by comparing it to a picture where none of the characters move or show any sign of life.]

चौ०. देखी बिपुल बिकल बैदेही । निमिष बिहात कलप सम तेही ॥ १ ॥

तृषित बारि बिनु जो तनु त्यागा । मुँ करइ का सुधा तड़ागा ॥ २ ॥ का बरषा सब कृषी सुखानें । समय चुकें पुनि का पछितानें ॥ ३ ॥

caupāī.

dēkhī bipula bikala baidēhī. nimiṣa bihāta kalapa sama tēhī. 1.
tṛṣita bāri binu jō tanu tyāgā. mu'ēm̐ kara'i kā sudhā tarāgā. 2.
kā baraṣā saba kṛṣī sukhānēm̐. samaya cukēm̐ puni kā pachitānēm̐. 3.

Lord Ram observed that Vaidehi (Sita) was extremely agitated and perturbed. A second appeared to be a long era for her (because time seemed to come to a standstill in those crucial moments of her life)<sup>1</sup>. (1)

[The Lord thought to himself—] If someone dies for want of water to drink, then what is the use and sense of giving his dead body an access to a pond of water (or 'nectar', because "Sudha" means 'an elixir of eternity known as Amrit, and "Tadaka" means a pond<sup>2</sup>) to quench its thirst? (2)

Similarly, what is the use of having rains once the fields dry up and the harvest is destroyed?

Say, what is the use of regretting later on if the right time for doing something passes away; or what sense does it make in not taking timely action and repenting for it later on once the window of opportunity is closed?<sup>3</sup> (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer Doha no. 260 herein above. This verse is an extension of this Doha and seeks to establish a bridge between its previous events and what is to follow next.

<sup>2</sup>The word "Sudha" literally means an elixir of life that provides eternity. So it may mean 'water' as well as 'Amrit', the nectar drunk by gods to remain free from death. This Amrit has a mystical power to prevent death, but it cannot revive a body that is already dead. However, in the context in which this word is used in this verse, both the meanings fit well. That is, it's no sense to pour Amrit or water over a dead body if the person dies of thirst for want of water.

<sup>3</sup>Refer also to: (i) Geetawali Ramayan, Sundar Kand, verse no. 7, stanza no. 2, line no. 4; and (ii) Dohawali, verse no. 444.

After observing the precarious condition of Sita, her emotional upheaval, the dilemma of her heart and the perplexity of her mind, Lord Ram decides to take action immediately. We have read earlier that he wanted to make sure that Sita has sincerely surrendered herself to him, and her devotion for him was complete and doubtless. But now the Lord discovered that she was on the verge of collapse, and if he delayed in breaking the bow much longer then in all probabilities she would faint. So, there was no point in postponing the breaking of the bow any longer.

The above two adages are time tested doctrines that simply mean that one must take timely action.]

अस जियँ जानि जानकी देखी । प्रभु पुलके लखि प्रीति बिसेषी ॥ ४ ॥

गुरहि प्रनामु मनहिं मन कीन्हा । अति लाघवँ उठाइ धनु लीन्हा ॥ ५ ॥ asa jiyam̐ jāni jānakī dēkhī. prabhu pulakē lakhi prīti bisēṣī. 4.

gurahi pranāmu manahim̐ mana kīnhā. ati lāghavam̐ uṭhā'i dhanu līnhā. 5.

Contemplating thus in his heart (that there is no point in delaying any further as each passing moment is becoming unbearable for Sita and the rest of the people), the Lord glanced one more time finally at Sita. The Lord felt thrilled (i.e. fully contented and satisfied in his heart) when he observed that Sita's affection (as well as her devotion, loyalty and love) for the Lord is remarkable (i.e. it is complete, undiluted and undoubtful)<sup>1</sup>. (4)

He (Lord Ram) mentally offered his obeisance to his Guru (sage Vishwamitra) to invoke his blessings<sup>2</sup>, and then he lifted the bow so swiftly that everything was finished in an instant, so fast that in one instant the bow was on the ground and in another instant it was in the Lord's hand<sup>3</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Tulsidas' book "Janki Mangal", verse nos. 103—104 also.

We will note that Lord Ram had decided to accept Sita by breaking the bow only after ensuring himself that her affection, devotion and surrender to the Lord is complete and unquestionable. The lesson to be drawn from these lines is that the Lord first tests his devotee's 'Bhakti' (devotion) and sincerity in seeking the Lord's grace and refuge before going all-out to help him. And once the devotee is able to convince the Lord about his integrity and sincerity, he has nothing to worry any longer as it now becomes the Lord's responsibility to take full care of him.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Ram has bowed to his Guru three times till now, this being the third time. The 'first time' was when the sage had ordered him to get up and go break the bow—refer: Chaupai line nos. 5-7 that precede Doha no. 254; the 'second time' was when Lord Ram actually left his seat and moved towards the platform where the bow was kept—refer: Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 255; and now at this is the 'third time' when he pays his respects to his Guru while actually lifting and breaking the bow, or in other words, carrying out the orders of the Guru.

It is said that paying one's respects to elders, such as one's parents and his Guru, has three dimensions—by one's physical body and its actions, by one's words or what one speaks, and the third component is mental which implies that one is completely committed to obey at the mental level.

All these three dimensions are applicable here: (i) In the first instance when Lord Ram has bowed at the feet of his Guru as he got up from his seat on the latter's orders, it is his obeying the Guru's commands with physical action of getting up instantly without hesitation. (ii) In the second instance when he bowed to the Guru and asked his permission to move towards the bow, it is his obeying the Guru's orders by employing words because he has 'asked' for the Guru's permission and told him that 'it will be done as ordered'. (iii) And finally now, in the third instance, he has bowed to his Guru at the mental level to seek his final blessing before actually carrying out the ordered deed, which in this case was to break the bow.

There is another interesting reason why Lord Ram has bowed before his Guru 'mentally'. For one, the Guru was sitting far away in his seat near king Janak, and it made no sense of going there to touch his feet to seek his blessings and permission once again when that has already been granted.

Secondly, at that time Lord Ram was facing the bow and had his back to the place where the Guru was seated in the pavilion. Had he physically turned round to, say, wave at the Guru or loudly seek his blessings, it would have been a laughable matter and would have given a wrong signal to all those present that he was dithering, feeling fidgety and uncomfortable, and that he was being showy and boastful. This would unnecessarily stoke the fire of jealousy and envy in the heart of the failed kings. Lord Ram did not want to create scene and a mockery of himself.

The third reason is that the mystical powers of holy souls and their blessings and goodwill are invoked silently by means of mental prayer, without any physical sign that one is offering worship and prayer. The worship and prayer is done at the mental level rather than at the physical level, and it is the sincerity and faith with which this is done that is of paramount importance than the show of supplication and devotion.

<sup>3</sup>This is the same bow which had not moved an inch when all the warriors, individually as well as together, had tried their best to lift it, or at the least move it. The Lord simply plucked it from the ground in a swift move, so quickly that there was no time lapse between the moment when the bow lay on the ground and the moment it was in his hand.]

दमकेउ दामिनि जिमि जब लयऊ । पुनि नभ धनु मंडल सम भयऊ ॥ ६ ॥
लेत चढ़ावत खैंचत गाढ़ें । काहुँ न लखा देख सबु ठाढ़ें ॥ ७ ॥
तेहि छन राम मध्य धनु तोरा । भरे भुवन धुनि घोर कठोरा ॥ ८ ॥ damakē'u dāmini jimi jaba laya'ū. puni nabha dhanu maṇḍala sama bhaya'ū.

6.

lēta caṛhāvata khaincata gāṛhēm. kāhum'na lakhā dēkha sabu ṭhāṛhēm. 7.
tēhi chana rāma madhya dhanu tōrā. bharē bhuvana dhuni ghōra kaṭhōrā. 8.

[These three verses, nos. 6-8, describe the actual breaking of the bow.]

As soon as the Lord lifted it from the ground, it emitted a dazzling spark of brilliant light that resembled the stab of lightening one sees in the rain-bearing dark clouds in the sky. Then when the bow was in the air in the Lord's hand, it bent and assumed a curved form like the curvature of the sky's parasole (as the Lord bent its one end in order to string it). (6)

No one could see him pick the bow from the ground, stringing it, and then pulling it hard (with one outstretched hand holding the bow in front, and the other hand pulling its string as far back as his ears). All they could see that there was a dazzling light and then Lord Ram was standing with the bent bow in his hands.

[In other words, these three actions—of lifting, stringing and pulling the bow—were done very swiftly, as if done in a second. The blinding spark of light that was produced at the instant the bow had left the ground made all those watching the proceedings blink their eyes, and when they opened it they found that the Lord was standing with the bow already strung and bent sharply because its string was pulled back right upto his ears in a swift movement of his hand.] (7)

Right at that instant, Lord Ram broke the bow in the middle. It snapped with a thunderous roar that reverberated and echoed throughout the 'Bhuvans' (or the entire world)<sup>1</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 92, stanza no. 5 also.

Remember that it was not an ordinary bow made by any human craftsman. It was crafted by Vishwakarma, the Smith of the gods, and was intended to be used by Lord Shiva to kill demons. So naturally this bow had celestial dimensions.

The bow gave out a sharp spark of blinding light like the one that is seen in the dark rain-bearing clouds in the sky, or that is witnessed when a high-voltage live electric wire is snapped. Then the upper end of the bow was pulled in to bend it sufficiently in order to put the string on it. After that, without losing any time, the Lord pulled the string hard, right upto his ears, thereby bending the bow to an angle which made it snap in the middle.]

छं०. भरे भुवन घोर कठोर रव रवि बाजि तजि मारगु चले । १ ॥
चिक्करहिं दिग्गज डोल महि अहि कोल कूरुम कलमले ॥ २ ॥
सुर असुर मुनि कर कान दीन्हें सकल बिकल बिचारहीं । ३ ॥ कोदंड खंडेउ राम तुलसी जयति बचन उचारहीं ॥ ४ ॥

chanda.

bharē bhuvana ghōra kaṭhōra rava rabi bāji taji māragu calē. 1.
cikkarahim diggaja ḍōla mahi ahi kōla kūruma kalamalē. 2.
sura asura muni kara kāna dīnhēm sakala bikala bicārahīm. 3.
kōdaṇḍa khaṇḍē'u rāma tulasī jayati bacana ucārahīm. 4.

#All the 'Bhuvans'<sup>1</sup> were filled with the deafening sound of the bow breaking into two. The horses of the chariot of the Sun God got so scared that they ran hither and thither away from their designated path across the sky. (Chanda line no. 1)

The Diggajs gave out a shrill cry. The earth shook and trembled. The Serpent, the Tortoise and the Boar squirmed and shifted in their respective places<sup>2</sup>. (Chanda line no. 2)

The gods (in the heaven), the demons (in the nether world), and the sages and hermits (on the earth) closed their ears with their hands (when they heard the deafening roar of the bow as it broke). All of them became restless and guessed that (Chanda line no. 3) ---

--- Lord Ram has finally broken the formidable bow (because no other event would produce this sort of sound)<sup>3</sup>.

Tulsidas (the author of this epic book, the Ram Charit Manas) praises this moment and honours his Lord, Sri Ram, hailing his victory and proclaiming his glory in the world.<sup>4</sup> (Chanda line no. 4)

[Note—# Refer also to: Geetawali, Baal Kand, verse no. 1/90, stanza no. 8; and verse no. 1/92, stanza no. 5.

<sup>1</sup>There are fourteen ‘Bhuvans’ or parts of this universe. They are the following—(A) The upper worlds called Urdhva Lokas are seven in number:—(i) Bhu, (ii) Bhuvha, (iii) Swaha, (iv) Maha, (v) Janaha, (vi) Tapaha, and (vii) Satyam. (B) The seven nether worlds or lower worlds called Adhaha Loka:—(i) Atal, (ii) Vital, (iii) Satal, (iv) Rasaatal, (v) Talaatal, (vi) Mahaatal, and (vii) Paataal. The total number of Lokas is, therefore, fourteen.

These fourteen Bhuvans incorporate the entire living creation within its meaning. Hence, the sound of the bow breaking spread throughout this creation.

<sup>2</sup>Now, broadly speaking, the Bhuvans can be divided into three areas—the heaven consisting of the sky, the terrestrial part made up of the earth, and the nether world which lies underneath the earth. Each of these parts is represented here by one entity—viz. the heaven is represented by the Sun God’s horses that move across the sky, creating day and night, the Diggajs represent the earth because they hold the latter from its eight corners, and the lower world is represented by the Serpent, the Tortoise and the Boar who lie below the Diggajs and hold the earth from below.

<sup>3</sup>The news of the bow-breaking ceremony had spread far and wide. The ‘gods’ represent the heaven, the sages represent the earth, and the demons represent the nether world.

<sup>4</sup>Chanda line nos. 3-4 can be interpreted in another way as follows—“Tulsidas says that the gods, the sages and the demons closed their ears with their hands as the thunderous sound of the bow breaking reached them. They realized that this sound means that the bow was indeed broken by Lord Ram (as all of them had heard that the bow-breaking ceremony was in progress). So they hailed this development and sang the glories of the Lord.”

Now, a pertinent question would arise—it is alright to think of the gods and the sages lauding Lord Ram’s breaking of the bow, but why did the demons celebrated when they knew that Lord Vishnu has come down to earth as Lord Ram to kill them? Well, the answer is simple: not all the demons were bad, and not all of them were killed by the Lord. This will be evident later on in the story when we read that at the end of the war at Lanka, Vibhishan, the younger brother of the demon king Ravana, was anointed as the ruler of Lanka along with the demons who survived the war, and this included Ravana’s wife Mandodari. In other words, only the nasty demons were eliminated, and not those who did not torment others in spite of them having the physical body of a demon.]

सो०. संकर चापु जहाजु सागरु रघुबर बाहुबलु ।

बूड़ सो सकल समाजु चढ़ा जो प्रथमहिं मोह बस ॥ २६१ ॥

sōraṭhā.

saṅkara cāpu jahāju sāgaru raghubara bāhubalu.

būṛa sō sakala samāju caṛhā jō prathamahim mōha basa. 261.

The bow of Lord Shiva was like a huge ship, and the strength of Lord Ram’s arms was like the vast and fathomless ocean (whose depth and enormity could not be measured). Those deluded and ignorant people who had tried to cross this ocean with the help of this symbolic ship sank in this ocean along with the ship itself. (Sortha/Doha no. 261)

[Note—In this Sortha/Doha, the breaking of the bow by Lord Ram is likened to the sinking of the ship in the ocean. Those who had laughed at the thought (i.e. had thought it impossible) that the Lord would be able to break it simply because none of the mightiest warriors of the earth, either individually or together, had been able to move the bow as much as an inch, had to hide their faces and bury themselves in a heap of shame.

Since the deluded people, including the haughty kings, in their utter ignorance had relied on the hardness of the bow and its determination not to move, no matter what happens, to doubt at the possibility of Lord Ram ever breaking it, a possibility they thought was never going to materialise, all their misconceptions about the true nature of Lord Ram collapsed like a pack of cards and sank in a pit of shame, disgrace, embarrassment and humiliation just like a group of arrogant and over-confident passengers, who are determined to conquer the vastness and ferocity of the ocean, boarding a big ship that is renowned for its robust built and unsinkability, jeering and teasing the huge waves of the mighty ocean to challenge the latter, suddenly drowning in its deep waters when the ship capsizes all of a sudden without any warning.

Yes, this is what exactly happened. The bow broke ‘without a warning’; it was a very sudden and an unexpected development—refer: Chaupai line nos. 5-8 and their following Chanda that precede this Sortha no. 261.

In other words, those who did not know the reality of Lord Ram that he was a personified form of Lord Vishnu, and in their ignorance they thought him to be an ordinary human prince, just could not imagine in their wildest of dreams that the bow which all of them could not move even a fraction of an inch could ever be lifted, stringed and broken so easily by Lord Ram. They had attempted to measure the strength of the Lord’s arms by weighing it against the determination of the bow not to break at any cost; they had tried to compare the Lord’s endless divine abilities and measureless strength with their own limited human abilities and strength. They had virtually challenged the ability of the Lord to break the bow and prove himself as the strongest warrior in the world. All such people had to bite the dust.

When Lord Ram was proceeding towards the bow, these people, who were under the spell of delusions and were driven by ignorance, had thought that a big joke is being played upon them. They wondered how a young prince, who has a delicate body as compared to the muscular and well-built bodies of veteran kings, and who is still very young and lacks experience which these war-hardened veterans possessed, can ever lift the heavy bow, leave aside stringing and breaking it, when all the warrior kings had failed to move it an inch?

The common people harboured grave doubts about the possibility of Lord Ram lifting the bow, while the kings who had actually tried to lift the bow thought it was impossible because they had actually touched it, examined its strength and had tried their best but failed. These kings were so sure and confident of themselves, of their own strength and powers that they thought that if they can’t do it, nobody on earth would be able to do it. They must have sneered, smirked and jeered at Lord Ram when he got up from his seat, proceeded towards the bow, and stood before it.

Hence, when the bow actually snapped, the ego, haughtiness and arrogance of these kings also snapped with it. In other words, both the bow as well as the false sense of pride of the haughty kings broke simultaneously.]

चौ०. प्रभु दोउ चापखंड महि डारे । देखि लोग सब भए सुखारे ॥ १ ॥
 कौंसिकरूप पयोनिधि पावन । प्रेम बारि अवगाहु सुहावन ॥ २ ॥ रामरूप राकेसु निहारी । बढत बीचि पुलकावलि भारी ॥ ३ ॥

caupāī.

prabhu dō'u cāpakhaṇḍa mahi ḍārē. dēkhi lōga saba bha'ē sukhārē. 1.
 kausikarūpa payōnidhi pāvana. prēma bāri avagāhu suhāvana. 2.
 rāmarūpa rākēsu nihārī. baṛhata bīci pulakāvali bhārī. 3.

The Lord dropped the two pieces of the broken bow on the ground. Everyone became happy and joyous when they saw this<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Sage Vishwamitra became exhilarated, and his body thrilled beyond description. His physical form was metaphorically like a huge ocean of nectar (or sweet water) in which huge waves of happiness and exhilaration began to heave and rise up when the sage saw the beauteous form of Lord Ram that resembled a full moon.

[Here, the metaphor of the waves of the ocean rising when the full moon shines in the night sky is cited to give an idea of the happiness and joy that the sage felt. His excitement and jubilation is like the rising waves in the ocean which is compared to the sage's body. Just like an ocean that is filled with sweet water instead of the usual salty water, the sage's inner being was filled with fatherly love and affection for Lord Ram. When he saw the Lord standing triumphantly near the broken bow, he could no more suppress his joy and excitement just like the ocean cannot suppress its waves that rise up and go higher up as if they want to reach out and touch the full moon.]<sup>2</sup> (2-3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Earlier it has been already said that “the Lord broke the bow from the middle”—refer: Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Sortha no. 261 above. In other words, the bow broke into ‘two pieces’ of roughly the same size which the Lord then dropped on the ground.

This was the moment the people were waiting for. So, as soon as the Lord dropped the broken bow pieces on the ground, the people became jubilant.

Remember: These people who became happy should not be confused with those who are referred to above in Sortha no. 261. Those people were the ones who harboured inimical thoughts and had negative attitude, and they obviously were the defeated kings. These kings had refused to listen to the sane advice of their bretherens but decided to go and break the bow so that they can marry Sita inspite of being advised that she was Jagdamba (the mother of the world, the Mother Goddess) and Lord Ram was the personified form of the Supreme Father of the world—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 246.

The people who felt happy and joyful by the breaking of the bow were the citizens of Janakpur<sup>1</sup>, the family members of Sita<sup>2</sup>, and of course the ‘good kings’<sup>3</sup> who had decided to desist from attempting to lift the bow as they were wise enough to perceive the reality of Lord Ram and Sita.

Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—1(i) Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 249; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 255; (iii) Doha no. 255—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 257; and 3(iv) Doha no. 245 and its preceding Chaupai line no. 8; (v) Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 246.

<sup>2</sup>To wit, when the sage saw Lord Ram standing victorious by the side of the broken bow, his heart pumped with joy and his body could not hide its excitement.

Remember: It was a moment of great happiness for sage Vishwamitra as he had fulfilled his role and obligation as a ‘foster-father of Lord Ram’ that the Lord’s real father, king Dasrath of Ayodhya, had assigned upon him at the time of sending the two brothers with the sage to protect his fire sacrifice—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 208 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 10.

What would any father want more than his son achieving a magnificent victory that would proclaim him at once as the greatest warrior on earth, an achievement that would at once establish his fame and name in the whole world because this victory was no mean achievement as it involved the breaking of a formidable bow that none of the famous and the mightiest kings of the time could break, an event that was witnessed by all the kings and princes of the world in a jam-packed assembly, and which was rewarded with marriage with a girl of one of the greatest dynasty of kings that ruled the earth at that time, a girl whose beauty and elegance was unmatched anywhere.

Indeed sage Vishwamitra felt happy that he was able to reward Lord Ram and Laxman with this happy moment for their helping him to complete his fire sacrifice, and freeing him from the terror of the demons, who had been constantly tormenting him for long, by killing all of them.]

बाजे नभ गहगहे निसाना । देवबधू नाचहिं करि गाना ॥ ४ ॥

ब्रह्मादिक सुर सिद्ध मुनीसा । प्रभुहि प्रसंसहिं देहिं असीसा ॥ ५ ॥ bājē nabha gahagahē nisānā. dēvabadhū nācahiṁ kari gānā. 4.

बरिसहिं सुमन रंग बहु माला । गावहिं किंनर गीत रसाला ॥ ६ ॥

brahmādika sura sid'dha munīsā. prabhuhi prasansahiṁ dēhiṁ asīsā. 5.

barisahim sumana raṅga bahu mālā. gāvahiṁ kinnara gīta rasālā. 6.

[As soon as the formidable ‘bow’ broke into two, there was a spontaneous outburst of celebrations that erupted instantaneously everywhere—in the heavens as well as on the earth. There was a thunderous applause of congratulation, thanksgiving and adulation that was accompanied by the clamour of playing of variety of musical instruments, the exuberance of merriment and dancing and singing in joyance abundance, and a general atmosphere of great exhilaration and ecstasy that seemed to surpass anything ever witnessed anywhere in the world aforetime and not to be witnessed aftertime.

Thereat, Janak’s royal priest ordered Sita to proceed to Lord Ram and put the ‘victory garland’ around the Lord’s neck to declare him victorious and seal the bond of marriage. Thence, Sita was escorted to the spot where Lord Ram stood near the bow. Sita was so much seized with ecstasy and dumbled with joy that seemeth to burst through her heart and swamp her entire being that when the time came to actually raise her hands and garland the victor, her beloved Lord Ram, and then bow down to touch his feet as a gesture of paying her respect, she was absolutely stunned and stone-immobile as a statue, her mind failing to register any thoughts and the body responded to no impulses though they were thrilled beyond imagination and measure.

When the defeated kings and princes saw Sita demur from garlanding Lord Ram and bowing to pay her respects to him, these pervert-minded and jealous fellows misinterpreted it as Sita's unwillingness to accept the Lord. Earlier we have read in Baal Kand, Doha no. 248 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that when Sita came to the arena at the beginning of the bow ceremony, she had causally glanced in all the direction to see the assembly, obviously taking stock of the situation and getting a general bird's eye view of the suitors who had assembled there to vie for her. While doing this her eyes fell on each of the eager faces of the competing kings and princes who were all staring at her. Now, when Sita's eyes scanned the assembly and bounced from face to face, each of these greedy and lustful fellows thought that Sita had stopped her glance at him for a trifle longer moment, implying that she seemeth to like him! The fact was that Sita was searching for Lord Ram, and as soon as she saw him she stopped moving her eyes any further, casting them down out of modesty.

Therefore, when these envious and jealous kings of perverted mind saw Sita's stupefied reaction when asked to garland Lord Ram and touch his feet, they rose up in revolt in what seemeth to be their apparent attempt to express sympathy for her cause and solidarity with her in her reluctance to declare Lord Ram the victor by the means of putting the 'victory garland' around the Lord's neck and accepting him as her husband by bowing and touching his feet, expecting that by this dare-devilry and chivalrous action of theirs they would be able to gain her attention and admiration, and, in their vilest of hopes, of her hand as well in marriage.

These events that haply happened in quick succession are described below, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 262—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 266.]

Kettle-drums began to be sounded (played) in the sky (heaven) with a loud noise. The celestial nymphs and dancers of the gods (known as Apsaras) broke out in a spontaneous dance that was accompanied by singing of melodious songs. (4)

Brahma (the creator) and other gods, the Siddhas (mystics) and the Munis (sages) praised the Lord and blessed him profusely. (5)

They rained (showered) flowers of a variety of colours as well as garlands upon the Lord. The Kinnars (heavenly male dancers and singers) sang many melodious songs. (6)

[Note—Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 90, stanza no. 9 also. Whereas the gods, the Kinnars and the Apsaras represented the inhabitants of the heaven, the sages and mystics represented those of the earth.

A similar idea of an all-round celebration and blessing by the sages and mystics appears in Baal Kand, Chanda stanza no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 327 in the context of the marriage of Lord Ram along with his other three brothers. It is said here that "there was immense exultation in the city as well as in the sky (heaven); everyone, the sages, the saints, the mystics and the senior gods, blessed the four couples with a long and happy life; and musical instrument known as Dundubhi (a kettle-drum) was played with great enthusiasm".

Celebrations were accompanied by dancing, singing and playing of musical instruments both in the city as well as in the heaven—refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 265. The verses that follow below compliment the description of the celebrations that have started in the current verses.]

रही भुवन भरि जय जय बानी । धनुषभंग धुनि जात न जानी ॥ ७ ॥
मुदित कहहिं जहँ तहँ नर नारी । भंजेउ राम संभुधनु भारी ॥ ८ ॥ rahī bhuvana bhari jaya jaya bānī. dhanuṣabhaṅga dhuni jāta na jānī. 7.

mudita kahahim jaham̐ taham̐ nara nārī. bhañjē'u rāma sambhudhanu bhārī.
8.

The entire world was filled with the sound of profound blessings and profuse felicitations that were showered upon Lord Ram from all the different directions; all the Bhuvans reverberated with the sound of praises and hailings of the Lord's glorious achievement. The cacophony created by the sound of these exultations, cheers, hailings, praises and blessings that erupted everywhere, in all the corners of the world, was so intense and deafening that it literally drowned (i.e. was louder than) the still-lingering echo of the thunder that was initially created when the bow broke an instant ago.

[In other words, no sooner had the bow broken than the world erupted in a tumult of joy and cheering. The first wave of the thunderous sound that was produced at the instant the bow broke was heard by everyone, and all who heard it had to involuntarily close his or her ears to avoid becoming deaf. But almost simultaneously there was an eruption of joy and exultation, the sound of which was so immense that it surpassed the intensity of the sound of the bow's breaking.

The cacophonous sound of celebrations suppressed the secondary sound of the breaking of the bow that still lingered on in the form of an echo that continued to reverberate for some more time before it subsided completely.]<sup>1</sup> (7)

Exhilarated men and women are exulting with joy, and they tell each other excitedly here and there that Lord Ram has broken the heavy bow of Lord Shiva<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 265.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 265.]

दो०. बंदी मागध सूतगन बिरुद बदहिं मतिधीर । करहिं निछावरि लोग सब हय गय धन मनि चीर ॥ २६२ ॥

dōhā.

bandī māgadha sūtagana biruda badahim matidhīra.
karahim nichāvari lōga saba haya gaya dhana mani cīra. 262.

While the talented bards, minstrels, poets and singers sang praises of the Lord and the legend of his glories, other people gave away horses, elephants, wealth and clothes as gifts to celebrate the occasion and express their joy. (Doha no. 262)

[Note—The royal bards were employed by the king to sing laudatory songs on happy occasions. Refer other instances in Ram Charit Manas such as when Lord Ram and his other three brothers were born (refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 194), and when Sita has put the victory garland around the neck of Lord Ram (refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 265 among other instances).

These singers assemble during celebrations such as marriage or the birth of a child in the household to sing songs, and in return they are gifted valuables such as gems, money, food and clothes. Gifting of elephants and horses may be a figure of speech, a hyperbole to indicate the enormity of the gifts that were given. But at the same time it must also be remembered that Janakpur was a prosperous kingdom, and there is no doubt that there were rich merchants and other wealthy citizens who could afford to keep a personal collection of large number of horses and elephants as symbols of their status in the society. So it was not difficult for them to give some of these animals as gifts to others to show their happiness.

The general scene is of extreme euphoria and mass celebrations. It was a momentous event, and the whole city erupted in a spontaneous wave of happiness and joy that was not experienced by its citizens earlier in their lives.]

चौ०. झाँझि मृदंग संख सहनाई । भेरि ढोल दुंदुभी सुहाई ॥ १ ॥

बाजहिं बहु बाजने सुहाए । जहँ तहँ जुबतिन्ह मंगल गाए ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

jhām̐jhi mṛdaṅga saṅkha sahanā'ī. bhēri ḍhōla dundubhī suhā'ī. 1.

bājahim̐ bahu bājanē suhā'ē. jaham̐ taham̐ jubatinha maṅgala gā'ē. 2.

A cacophony of loud sound was produced by an assortment of musical instruments playing simultaneously. They included crashing of cymbals, playing of timbrels or tambourines, blowing of conches and clarionets, beating of drums and kettle-drums in a pleasant and melodious form<sup>1</sup>.

Women folk sang auspicious songs befitting the occasion everywhere, wherever they were present on that moment (as soon as this auspicious news reached their ears)<sup>2</sup>. (1-2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The moment is for a grand celebration. Music played on musical instruments of various kinds to the accompaniment of melodious songs is part of such celebrations. These instruments were in vogue in those days. The kettle-drum is the standard musical instrument that is played by the gods in the sky (heaven). There are many references to this instrument played by the gods to celebrate special occasions. Some of these occasions are the following:--(i) Birth of Lord Ram (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 191); (ii) Lord Ram breaking the bow (refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 262); (iii) Celebration of Lord Ram's victory over the demon king Ravana at the end of the epic war of Lanka (refer: Lanka Kand, line no. 3 of Chanda no. 1 that precede Doha no. 103, and line no. 1 of Doha no. 109).

The conch is blown prior to making of an important announcement, such as before the commencement of battle or after some great victory. It is also blown at the start and the end of an auspicious, religious ceremony, when one proceeds for a journey, and all such occasion that herald a change. For instance, when the marriage party of Lord Ram and his brothers left the kingdom of Janakpur for their own kingdom of Ayodhya, all these musical instruments mentioned here, including the conch, were played enthusiastically—refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 344.

Geetawali Ramayan of Tulsidas also captures this celebratory moment in its Baal Kand, verse no. 94.

<sup>2</sup>It is not practical that each and every woman of Janakpur was present in the arena where the bow was broken. Though a large number of them had come, but an equally large number could not be accommodated or had preferred to remain at home because they knew there won't be sufficient space in the arena, no matter how vast it might have been, to accommodate each single citizen of the city. All the citizens had been eagerly waiting for the good news that Lord Ram has finally broken the bow. And when this news spread like wild-fire as soon as the bow broke, spontaneous celebrations erupted throughout the city. The women folk sprang up to dance and sing wherever they were present at that instant. Refer also to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 265 below.]

सखिन्ह सहित हरषी अति रानी । सूखत धान परा जनु पानी ॥ ३ ॥
जनक लहेउ सुखु सोचु बिहाई । पैरत थकें थाह जनु पाई ॥ ४ ॥

sakhinha sahita haraṣī ati rānī. sūkhata dhāna parā janu pānī. 3.
janaka lahē'u sukhu sōcu bihāī. pairata thakēm thāha janu pāī. 4.

[These two verses, nos. 3 and 4, describe the happiness of Sita's parents, the queen mother (Sunayana) and king Janak.]

The queen, along with her companions, was as happy and contented as a farmer is when it begins to rain just at the time when the horrible spectre of a drought was looming on the horizon<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Janak's worries and consternations faded away just like the case of man who has become tired of swimming in deep water (of an ocean) and is about to give up when he suddenly finds a some solid land (or any float for that matter) that renews his hope and saves him from sure drowning<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The queen was very perplexed as to what would happen if Lord Ram does not or is unable to break the bow. She had confided with her close companion about her worries. This friend had then assured the queen not to be distressed and feel contrite as Lord Ram was sure to break the bow and marry Sita. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Doha no. 255—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 257.

But though the queen found some solace by this assurance, she was still skeptical as no one can predict with absolute certainty what is in store in the future. Her condition is compared to a farmer who is on the edge and in great mental and emotional torment as he fears about the possibility of a severe drought which will ruin his harvest. He would pray to gods and discuss with everyone he meets to find some emotional support, but his mind is submerged in fear and worries. Then the unexpected miracle happens—when everything seems lost, when he has no more hopes of saving his harvest and has resigned himself to his fate, preparing to face the worst consequences that stare on his face, dark clouds portending the coming of rain suddenly, unexpectedly, appear on the horizon, and then soon it begins to rain heavily. Obviously, his joy will know no bounds.

In this metaphor, when all the kings had failed to move the bow, for the queen it was like the looming drought that the farmer faces because Sita would have to remain unmarried for the rest of her life. No mother would ever want this to happen. It was tantamount to the farmer coming to utter ruin when his hope of a good harvest is destroyed without rainfall.

When all seemed lost, Lord Ram rose from his seat. It was like the unexpected appearance of the dark rain-bearing clouds in the horizon. The metaphor is exceptionally apt because Lord Ram had a dark complexion and was provider of solace and succour to all his devotees much like the rain-bearing clouds that provide the life-giving rain that quenches the thirst of the earth, helps produce crops, and provides happiness to all living beings. Hope rose as soon as the queen saw the Lord get up from his seat to proceed towards the bow—refer: Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 257.

And when the Lord finally broke the bow, it was like the rain actually falling down on the parched field of the farmer, saving his crop and harvest. It is indeed a time to celebrate.

<sup>2</sup>Refer also to: (i) Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 90, stanza no. 7; and (ii) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 286.

The same logic applies to Sita's father, king Janak. He too had lost all hopes of ever being able to marry Sita. He was a renowned king and could not act foolishly by breaking his vows and becoming a butt of laughter and scorn in the world. After all, he had to maintain his dignity and respect of his dynasty that had always stood by its words.

The mental and emotional condition of Janak is compared with a man about to get drowned when he suddenly sees a buoy floating towards him out of nowhere to save his life.

In this instance, when Janak had declared that Sita would have to remain unmarried because no one has been able to break the bow, he had virtually surrendered himself to his fate like a man who has lost all strength to swim any more and has resigned to his fate that he would be drowned. Then suddenly, unexpectedly and without his asking anybody, sage Vishwamitra ordered Lord Ram to go and break the bow to "remove the worries of Janak" (refer: Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 254. This was like the case of tired swimmer who was about to give up and prepare himself to face the worst scenario of getting drowned when he suddenly feels some solid land below him. It is also like the case of a providential buoy that comes floating on its own volition to the drowning man to save him.

One really marvels at the skill of Tulsidas, the author of this great epic Ram Charit Manas, in employing excellent metaphors and wonderfully apt similes to highlight the subtle nuances of any development.]

श्रीहत भए भूप धनु टूटे । जैसैं दिवस दीप छबि छूटे ॥ ५ ॥

सीय सुखहि बरनिअ केहि भाँती । जनु चातकी पाइ जलु स्वाती ॥ ६ ॥ śrīhata bha'e bhūpa dhanu ṭūṭē. jaisēm divasa dīpa chabi chūṭē. 5.

sīya sukhahi barani'a kēhi bhāmṭī. janu cātakī pā'i jalu svātī. 6.

[This verse describes the condition of the kings who had failed to move the bow.]

The competing kings (who had failed to move and break the bow) lost all their glories, their countenances losing their shine to become faded just like the earthen lamps losing the illumination of their lights and fading away in importance to become irrelevant as soon as the sun rises and the day dawns<sup>1</sup>. (5)

[This verse describes the condition of Sita and her extreme sense of fulfillment.]

How can sufficiently describe the joy and happiness that Sita felt (when Lord Ram broke the bow). Her condition was like a female Chatak bird who gets a drop of dew that falls during the Swati constellation<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 90, stanza no. 6 also.

When it is dark in the night, even a single lamp appears to shine brilliantly, its light illuminating its surroundings. Against the background of the darkness, the lighted lamp can be seen from a distant. But when the sun rises up in the sky, all these lamps become inconsequential, and even if they are lighted they do not attract attention. Against the brilliant illumination of the day and the dazzling light of the sun, the feeble light emanating from the wick of the lamp is as good as not being there at all. Millions of lighted lamps fade away in the presence of a single sun.

Here, all the thousands of kings are likened to the lamps in this verse. Their faces glowing with pride and self-importance are like the light around the wick of these lamps, and Lord Ram is compared to the single sun in the sky during the daytime. All the kings sulked and lost the sheen on their faces as soon as the bow broke because a single prince, Lord Ram, had put all of them to shame. It is exactly like the case of thousands of lighted lamps suddenly fading away when the sun rises in the sky.

<sup>2</sup>The Chatak bird is famous for its determination to drink only that drop of dew or rain that falls during a special constellation of stars known as Swati (pronounced as 'Swaati'). If it does not get this drop of water, it would prefer to die than to save its life by drinking from any other source of water.

Sita had decided that if she has to marry then she would marry Lord Ram and no one else. She would prefer to remain unmarried for life if she was denied marriage with Lord Ram. That is why she felt happy in her heart when none of the kings could move the bow and Laxman has stood up to challenge her father that if Lord Ram gives him permission he will break the bow as if it was a child's play. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 254 above.

So, her dreams were realized when the Lord broke the bow. She felt a new life was given to her just like a Chatak bird who is about to die due to thirst is granted a drop of dew or rain-water during the Swati constellation.

The immense sense of contentedness and fulfillment of Sita is indescribable in words—refer also to Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 242.]

रामहि लखनु बिलोकत कैसें । ससिहि चकोर किसोरकु जैसें ॥ ७ ॥
सतानंद तब आयसु दीन्हा । सीताँ गमनु राम पहिं कीन्हा ॥ ८ ॥ rāmahi lakhanu bilōkata kaisēm. sasihi cakōra kisōraku jaisēm. 7.

satānanda taba āyasu dīnhā. sītām̐ gamanu rāma pahim̐ kīnhā. 8.

[This verse describes the happiness of Laxman, Lord Ram's younger dear brother and constant companion.]

Laxman watched Lord Ram, happily and with great affection, in a way a young Chakor bird looks at the full moon, enchanted and exhilarated in its heart<sup>1</sup>. (7)

Then, on the instructions of Satanand (the royal priest of king Janak), Sita proceeded towards Lord Ram (to put the victory garland on him)<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The Chakor bird is said to be so enamoured of the moon that it fixes its gaze on the latter as soon as it rises in the east, follows the path of the moon across the sky and till it sets in the west. Likewise, Laxman watched his dear and loving brother Lord Ram closely: from the time he rose from his seat, walked upto the bow, and finally broke the bow and stood beside the broken pieces lying on the ground.

Laxman was not only a dear brother of Lord Ram but also his close friend and constant companion with whom the Lord shared all his thoughts. Laxman had served the Lord truly like a devoted servant during the 14 years of forest exile, carrying out all his orders and making the Lord's stay in the forest as comfortable as possible. Laxman had remained vigilant and gave protection to Lord Ram and Sita throughout their forest sojourn, even going without sleep for this long period so that he can keep watch while the Lord and Sita rested. If there was any remote hint of danger or harm to Lord Ram, it was Laxman who stepped forward to give protection. There are countless instances to support these observations in Ram Charit Manas. Some of them are the following—

(a) Baal Kand: (i) Doha no. 197; (ii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 198; (iii) from Doha no. 230—to Doha no. 231; (iv) Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 238; (v) Doha no. 253 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8.

(b) Ayodhya Kand: (i) from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 70—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 72. (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 90; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 6 that precedes Doha no. 141; (iv) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 142; (v) Doha no. 230 along with its Chaupai line nos. 1-8.

(c) Aranya Kand: (i) Doha no. 23; (ii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 30.

(d) Kishikindha Kand: Doha no. 18 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8.

(e) Sundar Kand: Chaupai line nos. 1 and 5 that precede Doha no. 58.

(f) Lanka Kand: Sortha no. 61 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-18.

Hence, it was natural for Laxman feel jubilant when his beloved Lord and dear brother obtained victory by breaking the bow.

This happiness of Laxman also removes any doubt about his intentions when he had angrily said that if Lord Ram gives his permission then he would break the bow like it was some soft lotus flower. Laxman did not mean to either insult Lord Ram or marry Sita by breaking the bow. What he intended was to seek retribution and save the glory of Lord Ram because king Janak had declared in the Lord's presence that "the world was empty of warriors because no one could break the bow". How dare Janak make this statement in the presence of Lord Ram when the latter was not even invited to break the bow, or at least asked if he would like to try his hand at the bow. This infuriated Laxman as he could not tolerate such slight on his Lord.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 1/96, stanza no. 2 also.

It was a standard practice that before taking any action, a permission was needed from the family's Guru. If that family happened to be the ruling family, then its Guru played the role of a royal priest as well.

In the case of king Janak, this Guru and the royal family's priest was Satanand, while in the case of king Dasrath of Ayodhya the royal priest was sage Vasistha.

For Lord Ram and Laxman, this role of a Guru was assumed by sage Vishwamitra as he had taught them the secrets of the art of warfare and use of mystical weapons, and was their guardian in the forest as well as in Janakpur.

There is an interesting point to note here. When Sita was summoned to come to the arena, king Janak had ordered that she be brought there, and not Satanand. But here it is Satanand who gives the orders to Sita to go and put the garland on Lord Ram. This difference is because Janak was Sita's father, and a father can call his son or daughter any time he wants. No permission is needed by any father from anyone for this. But putting the victory garland on Lord Ram was a formal occasion as it would seal their marriage in an open court, which was a very important event. The whole of the marriage ceremony and its accompanying rituals needed the guidance and participation of the family's Guru, and putting the victory garland on the would-be-groom was the first step in this process. Hence, the Guru had to be involved.

We have already read about a similar thing earlier in the case of Lord Ram being summoned by his father to pay his obeisance to sage Vishwamitra when the latter had arrived in Ayodhya. But when the time came for sending the two brothers to the forest with the sage, their Guru sage Vasistha had to intervene. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 207, and Chaupai line nos. 8-9 that precede Doha no. 208.

Now, when Lord Ram had broken the bow and claimed undisputed victory, Sita was automatically deemed to have become his bride according to the vows of king Janak (refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 250). But formalities had to be kept, and so Sita was needed to put the victory garland around the neck of Lord Ram to officially and formally acknowledge his victory and seal the bond that made them husband and wife in an open court.

It is merely said in this verse that "Satanand has given his orders", but it has not been clarified what orders he gave. The answer lies in common sense that it was for Sita to go and put the victory garland on the victor, who in this case was Lord Ram.

Though her marriage with Lord Ram had been decided at the instant the bow was broken, but it was necessary for her to walk upto the Lord and voluntarily put the garland around his neck to show that she had accepted this alliance and was ready to become the Lord's wife.

Though seemingly superficial and merely a formality, this ritual of 'putting the garland on the victor' was necessary to make sure that the bride-to-be has no objection to accept the victor as her groom. In case she did not approve of him, she had one last chance to show her dislike and disapproval by refusing to garland him. Then her parents and the assembly would be given a hint that the girl is not ready to accept the competition's victor as her groom, and then some other methods could be devised. This was an extremely crucial step in the entire process because the girl—whose whole future was tied to such marriage ceremonies as the one employed by Janak to marry his daughter Sita that were in vogue in ancient times—was not consulted by her parents before they decided on any method to find a suitable groom for her. The poor girl was left at the mercy of her parents in a patriarchal society. Hence, if the girl did not approve of anyone who was to become her groom, she can publicly show her disapproval by refusing to garland him.

In other words, this ritual of 'garlanding the victor' by the girl was used as a 'safety valve' to avoid future complications.]

दो०. संग सखीं सुंदर चतुर गावहिं मंगलचार ।

गवनी बाल मराल गति सुषमा अंग अपार ॥ २६३ ॥

dōhā.

saṅga sakhīm sundara catura gāvahīm maṅgalacāra.
gavanī bāla marāla gati suṣamā aṅga apāra. 263.

Accompanied by her friends who were charming and clever, and who were singing auspicious songs suitable for the occasion, she (Sita) walked elegantly (towards Lord Ram with the garland in her hand) like a young Swan (a cygnet). Her countenance and form were exceptionally charming and beautiful to behold. (Doha no. 263)

[Note—Sita was in full bridal gear. She was a princess, and therefore all measures must have been taken to adorn her with the best of ornaments and clothes; no effort was left to decorate her. The girls who accompanied her must have been selected carefully to match her elegance and glamour as they were the center-piece of the entire ceremony; all eyes would be focused on them. The best of beautiful girls of the kingdom must have been selected to accompany Sita.

Besides the criterion of beauty and charm, their level of wisdom, common sense and wit was also taken into consideration so that they could deftly handle any sticky situation that may arise which needed instant decision. Sita would be nervous and had to maintain her dignity, she would be required to conform to traditions by keeping her eyes and head low. Hence, those who accompanied her needed to be careful and witty. Refer also to Baal Kand, Doha no. 246 which has an identical idea.

Another quality that was required of the bride's companions was their ability to sing auspicious songs of the marriage ceremony. This practice is still in vogue in India whereby the ladies accompanying the bride sing songs throughout the marriage rituals. Refer also to Baal Kand, Chanda line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 311 which reiterates this view.]

चौ०. सखिन्ह मध्य सिय सोहति कैसें । छबिगन मध्य महाछबि जैसें ॥ १ ॥

कर सरोज जयमाल सुहाई । बिस्व बिजय सोभा जेहिं छाई ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

sakhinha madhya siya sōhati kaisēm. chabigana madhya mahāchabi jaisēm.

1.

kara sarōja jayamāla suhāī. bisva bijaya sōbhā jēhim chāī. 2.

Sita looked so fabulous and extremely beautiful in the middle of her friends that this scene reminded one of a wonderful picture which was very enchanting and attractive in a general way, but its central figure was so remarkably outstanding that it stood out from the rest of its surroundings and caught one's eyes instantly<sup>1</sup>. (1)

She held a wonderful "victory garland" (jayamāla) in hands<sup>2</sup>.

This garland personified (symbolized; represented) victory over the whole world; it appeared that the glory and fame of attaining undisputed triumph over the whole of the world were condensed and packed into the form of this 'victory garland'<sup>3</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A similar idea is expressed in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 230. The occasion was Sita's arrival in the garden and Lord Ram seeing her for the first time. Her beauty and charm had held the Lord spell-bound.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: (i) Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 96, stanza no. 1 also wherein it is said that it looked as if this garland was made by Kamdeo-cupid, the patron god of the virtues of beauty, comeliness and magnificence, himself.

(ii) 'Janki Mangal', verse no. 107.

<sup>3</sup>This is because only a person who could break the formidable bow of Lord Shiva, a bow that Shiva had used to conquer the three legendary cities of the demon Tripura that was a metaphoric victory over all the three worlds, i.e. the heaven, the earth and the nether world, would become eligible to wear this 'victory garland'. This garland stood as a symbol of victory over all the three levels of the universe as said above. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 250.]

तन सकोचु मन परम उछाहू । गूढ़ प्रेमु लखि परइ न काहू ॥ ३ ॥

जाइ समीप राम छबि देखी । रहि जनु कुअँरि चित्र अवरखी ॥ ४ ॥

tana sakōcu mana parama uchāhū. gūṛha prēmu lakhi para'i na kāhū. 3.

jā'i samīpa rāma chabi dēkhī. rahi janu ku'am̐ri citra avarēkhī. 4.

While Sita's body showed all signs of modesty and restrained behaviour (as she walked slowly to put the garland around Lord Ram's neck), her heart on the other hand was jumping with joy, it was exhilarant. No one could externally perceive the enormous amount of hidden joy and happiness that Sita felt inside her heart<sup>1</sup>. (3)

When she reached near Lord Ram and looked at the Lord's astounding beauty from so close a quarter, she was spell-bound by it and stood motionless as if in a daze and stone-cast, resembling a portrait of a beautiful princess<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>After all, this was the moment she was waiting for. Externally she had to maintain her calm and walk in a dignified manner as she was conscious of the fact that thousands of eyes are riveted on her. But her inner being was bubbling with joy and happiness. These moments were the best moments of her life.

A person's eyes do not have the penetrating ability to see what goes inside the other person's heart; only the external behaviour is seen. Hence, all those who were watching Sita had no inkling of the immensity of joy that filled her heart. The onlookers thought that the victory of Lord Ram had no special effect on Sita; they did not know how much she was affected.

This illusion of disinterest and nonchalance that was created by Sita's external calmness led some of the frustrated kings to make a wrong deduction that she was not happy with this alliance but was reluctant to speak because of fear of her father and rebuke by the society. We shall read below that when Sita was reluctant to touch Lord Ram's feet because she feared that she would also meet the same fate as Ahilya, the wife of sage Gautam who was liberated from her gross body as a stone to come alive in a divine body that she originally had (refer: Baal Kand, from Doha no. 210 and its preceding Chaupai line no. 12—to Chanda line nos. 1, 14-16 that precede Doha no. 211), the defeated kings thought that she does not like to be married to Lord Ram, and so they stood up in revolt and created a rucous, declaring their intention to prevent her marriage with the Lord—refer: Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 265—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 266.

To give due credit to Sita it must be pointed out that she had maintained her poise throughout this ordeal—even when her future was hanging in the balance, she had shown minimal external signs of weakness and worry. Refer: from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 257—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 259.

<sup>2</sup>Till this time Sita had seen Lord Ram from a distance, whether it was in the garden where she had gone to offer prayers to goddess Parvati and had seen the Lord for the first time, and also when she stood in the arena during the bow-breaking event. Now, when she approached the Lord to put the victory garland on him, she saw him at close quarter, and the Lord's stunning beauty completed dumbing her into immobility.

It was also the first time that Lord Ram was seeing the stupendous charm of Sita from so close. Hence it is practical to expect that both of them were enchanted with each other in equal measure. This fact is endorsed a little later in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, line nos. 3-4 of Chanda stanza no. 2 that precede Doha no. 323 which we shall be reading when we come to it during our narration.]

चतुर सखीं लखि कहा बुझाई । पहिरावहु जयमाल सुहाई ॥ ५ ॥

सुनत जुगल कर माल उठाई । प्रेम बिबस पहिराई न जाई ॥ ६ ॥

catura sakhiṁ lakhi kahā bujhāī. pahirāvahu jayamāla suhāī. 5.
sunata jugala kara māla uṭhāī. prēma bibasa pahirā'i na jāī. 6.

The clever friends saw that the opportune moment was there, and they advised Sita to put the beautiful victory garland on Lord Ram<sup>1</sup>. (5)

When Sita heard this advice, she raised her two hands with the victory garland, but she was so overwhelmed and numbed with love and affection for the Lord that she could not actually put the garland around his neck<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It has been said in the previous verse no. 4 that Sita was dazed at the sight of Lord Ram when she saw the Lord from up close. She was virtually immobile like an image in a painting. These two verses, nos. 5-6, expand upon it.

When the friends of Sita observed that she is standing motionless and time was passing away, they prodded her to put the garland on the Lord. As as been noted earlier, her companions were selected carefully, and only those who could handle delicate situations were allowed to accompany her. This was one such occasion which needed deft handling. So, the wise friends muttered into Sita's ears to stop procrastinating and put the garland on Lord Ram; why is she delaying?

The same situation had prevailed earlier in the garden where also Sita had stood motionless on seeing Lord Ram and Laxman for the first time, and there also her friends had to wake her up from her trance-like state—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 232; Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precede Doha no. 234.

<sup>2</sup>Sita woke up to the realities of life and raised her hands that held the garland to put it around Lord Ram's neck. But a storm was still blowing in her heart and mind. She must have been thinking in these lines: "what is the necessity of this formality of putting the garland on the Lord when I have already accepted him as my eternal lord and master? "; Or that "this garland is made up of worldly flowers that would dry up and shrink in due course of time, so why should I use it to express my love for the Lord that is eternal and more beautiful than the flowers of this garland?"; Or that "why should I not embrace the Lord with my outstretched arms and encircle his neck with a natural wreath symbolized by them instead of using an artificial garland to express my love for him?"

In order to put the garland around the Lord's neck and drape it on his broad shoulders and chest, she had to move still closer to him. It was like a dream come true for Sita! For some moments she forgot that she was here to perform some formal task in the full glare of the public. She instead dreamt of embracing her beloved Lord right there. The physical movement of the hands that was required to put the garland around the neck was similar to actually reaching for the Lord with her outstretched hands and then making a circle around his neck with these hands to bring him closer and embracing him. In other words, these thoughts so overwhelmed Sita that she did not realize that her internal emotions are translating into external delay in observing the formality of garlanding the victor.

So we see how these and such other thoughts made Sita hesitate for a fleeting moment before she finally put the garland around the Lord's neck.]

सोहत जनु जुग जलज सनाला । ससिहि सभित देत जयमाला ॥ ७ ॥
गावहिं छबि अवलोकि सहेली । सियँ जयमाल राम उर मेली ॥ ८ ॥ sōhata janu juga jalaja sanālā. sasihi sabhita dēta jayamālā. 7.

gāvahim chabi avalōki sahēlī. siyam̐ jayamāla rāma ura mēlī. 8.

The fascinating and adorable sight of Sita's two raised hands holding the victory garland in front of the face of Lord Ram resembled the sight of two tender lotus flowers with their stalks attempting hesitatingly to encircle the moon in a gesture that meant that they want to adorn (honour) it with a garland of victory<sup>1</sup>. (7)

Watching this charming and magnificent scene (as described in earlier verses), the friends of Sita began to sing in merriment. At that moment (or alerted by their singing), Sita finally put the victory garland around the neck of Lord Ram and draped it on his chest as its adornment (as well as an unequivocal declaration of Lord's victory and an affirmation of her acceptance of the Lord as her dear husband).

{This verse can be read as follows—"When the friends of Sita saw the beautiful sight of Sita standing with the garland in front of Lord Ram, they felt so exhilarated that they began singing songs spontaneously. This alerted Sita, and so she finally put the victory garland around the neck of Lord Ram so that it draped on the Lord's chest."

There is yet another way of reading it as follows—"When the friends of Sita saw the wonderful sight that Sita has put the victory garland around the neck of Lord Ram and it is resting elegantly on the chest of the Lord, they broke out in spontaneous singing of auspicious songs befitting the occasion."}<sup>2</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In this wonderful metaphor, Lord Ram's beautiful face is compared to the full moon, while the two raised hands of Sita are likened to the stalks of the lotus flowers. The two fists of Sita that hold the two upper ends of the garland are like the lotus flowers themselves.

This imagery is so remarkable and fascinating. Since the face of the Lord is in the middle of the circle formed by the Sita's raised hands holding the garland, it is likened to viewing the disc of the moon through the circle formed by two lotus flowers touching each other atop their long stalks.

A striking resemblance is found at one other place—when Lord Ram applies varmilion powder on the head of Sita during the wedding rites. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 8-9 that precede Doha no. 325. When read together, they appear to be a symphony in verses.

Refer also to the books (i) 'Janki Mangal' of Tulsidas, verse no. 109; and (ii) Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 96, stanza no. 4.

<sup>2</sup>Refer also to: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 90, stanza no. 10; and verse no. 93, stanza no. 3.

The entire episode of Sita garlanding Lord Ram has been narrated in Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 96 also.

We have seen earlier how Sita was dazed and stood motionless with the garland. Her friends had told her to put the garland on Lord Ram in verse no. 5 above, but still Sita did not. The reason for her delaying is explained in verse no. 6, that she was overwhelmed and rendered immobile with emotions of affection and love for the Lord.

People were watching intently from all directions. So these ‘clever and wise’ friends thought that instead of telling Sita quietly and whispering into her ears not to delay any further because the whole assembly was watching, they decided to sing appropriate songs that are sung when the victory garland is actually put on the victor. This was a master stroke by them—because it alerted Sita and pulled her out of her loving reverie.

To those watching from their seats in the arena which were at a considerable distance from the spot where Sita was standing, surrounded by her friends, in front of Lord Ram, the songs camouflaged the delay in Sita putting the garland around the neck of the Lord. As soon as they began singing appropriate songs, the people sitting around the extensive area of the arena thought that the garland has been put on Lord Ram, whereas the fact was that it still was in Sita’s hands. Meanwhile, Sita suddenly realized her folly, and immediately put the garland around the neck of the Lord. This clever ploy of the friends had saved Sita from great embarrassment and scandalous gossip.

<sup>2</sup>While in the first interpretation of this verse, Sita hadn’t put the garland on Lord Ram when the friends started singing songs so as to subtly alert her, to remind her to go ahead and not delay any further as her standing with the garland without actually putting it on the Lord is creating an extremely piquant and uneasy situation, the second interpretation is that they began to sing once Sita had put the garland on the Lord.

This verse is a typical instance of the wonder in Tulsidas’ composition—that a single statement can be interpreted and read in a variety of ways, depending on the way the reader visualises the actual events as they may have unfolded at the time of their happening.]

सो०. रघुबर उर जयमाल देखि देव बरिसहिं सुमन ।

सकुचे सकल भुआल जनु बिलोकि रबि कुमुदगन ॥ २६४ ॥

sōraṭhā.

raghubara ura jayamāla dēkhi dēva barisahir̥ṁ sumana.
sakucē sakala bhu'āla janu bilōki rabi kumudagana. 264.

When the gods saw that the victory garland has adorned the chest of Lord Ram, they showered flowers (from the sky).

On the other hand, the kings (who had attempted to lift the bow but had failed) felt ashamed and shrank due to embarrassment and disgrace like the lily that shrivels up and closes its petals at the sight of the sun<sup>2</sup>. (Sortha no. 264)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The gods have expressed their joy by two means—by showering flowers and by playing musical instruments. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 262 where flowers have been showered upon the Lord; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes the same Doha no. 262 that says that musical instruments were played and dancing and singing had broken out in the sky.

Similar idea is expressed in Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that follow hereinafter just below the present Sortha.

<sup>2</sup>Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Doha no. 238; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 263.]

चौ०. पुर अरु ब्योम बाजने बाजे । खल भए मलिन साधु सब राजे ॥ १ ॥

सुर किंनर नर नाग मुनीसा । जय जय जय कहि देहिं असीसा ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

pura aru byōma bājanē bājē. khala bha'e malina sādhu saba rājē. 1.
sura kinnara nara nāga munīsā. jaya jaya jaya kahi dēhim asīsā. 2.

Musical instruments started playing in the city (of Janakpur) as well as in the sky (i.e. in the heavens)<sup>1</sup>. Those who were wicked went into depression (were dejected and depressed; they hid their faces), while those who were virtuous and saintly beamed with joy (i.e. became happy and joined in the celebrations)<sup>2</sup>. (1)

All the pious and noble souls, such as the gods (sura), the kinnars (celestial dancers), the human beings (nara), the subterranean creatures represented by the 'Naagas' (nāga; serpents), and the sages, seers, hermits and ascetics (collectively called the 'munīsā')—all of them broke out in a chorus of praises for the Lord, Sri Ram. They collectively blessed the Lord (dēhim asīsā) and hailed his victory by chanting 'Hail, Hail; Glory to the Lord (jaya jaya jaya kahi)!<sup>3</sup>' (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 93, stanza no. 1 also.

<sup>2</sup>There were two categories of people—one who had a dominance of 'Tama Guna' or the evil qualities dominating their mind and heart, and the other who had the 'Sata Guna' or the virtuous qualities dominating their character.

The first category of people was that who were inherently wicked and inclined to be jealous with everyone, and enjoy when others suffer even if their sufferings won't do them any personal good. These people would have preferred that no one breaks the bow and there was gloom and grief all around. Then they would have fodder for gossip and spreading of scandals, such as saying that Janak had done this and that misdeed in his life and it is the result of it that he has to suffer. They could not tolerate others being happy; celebration and festivities were like painful sores for them. This group of people included the selfish, haughty and over-jealous kings who had thrown all caution and principles of morality to the wind when thousands of them had together tried to move the bow without bothering the horrible consequences of their action upon the marital future of Sita if they had managed to move and break the bow. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) from Chaupai line nos. 5-7 that precedes Doha no. 245; (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 251; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precedes Doha no. 266; (iv) Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 241; and (v) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 263.

The second category of people was that who had seen a divine aura around Lord Ram and could judge the situation wisely, if not by anything else than at least by the use of common sense when they found that the mighty sage Vishwamitra was in the Lord's favour, and that amongst all those who were present as candidates vying to marry Sita, it was Lord Ram who fit the bill perfectly because of so many factors, such as his age that was in consonant with the age of Sita, his charm and beauty that matched Sita's, and his demeanours and manners, his elegance and dignity and the way he carried himself that was most suitable for someone who would become a royal groom and an honoured guest of the renowned kingdom of Janakpur. In this category of people we include those kings who desisted from participating in the bow lifting competition precisely for the reasons listed above. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 245—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 246; (ii) from Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 266—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 267; and (iii) Chaupai line no. 5, that precedes Doha no. 241.

Amongst this category of wise people were those who were pious, holy and saintly who could see in the form of Lord Ram a personified form of the deity they worshipped—refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1, 4-5 that precede Doha no. 242. The citizens of Janakpur also come under the second category because they would not have liked gloom and despair to descend upon the kingdom; they all wanted that Sita be married to Lord Ram—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 222—to Doha no. 223; (ii) Chaupai line no. 7, that precedes Doha no. 252; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 1, 8 that precede Doha no. 262 etc.

And of course, the family members of Sita, her parents and friends and other kith and kin, the gods in heaven and the sages and others on earth too come under the second category as all of them felt very happy when Lord Ram had broken the bow—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) from Chaupai line nos. 4-7 that precede Doha no. 262; and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 263.

<sup>3</sup>All these entities collectively represented the three levels of the world—viz. the gods and kinnars represented the heaven, the humans and the sages represented the terrestrial world, and the serpents represented the subterranean world.

In other words, the victory of Lord Ram was welcomed and celebrated by all the good creatures in this world, in whatever form they were. We have already read in verse no. 1 above that only those who were good at heart welcomed the Lord's victory and celebrated the occasion. Refer also to Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 262.

A similar situation prevailed when Lord Ram won the war at Lanka and had slayed the demon king Ravana. At that time also, there was a chorus of praise and blessings for the Lord from all directions—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 10-11 that precede Doha no. 103.]

नाचहिं गावहिं बिबुध बधूटीं । बार बार कुसुमांजलि छूटीं ॥ ३ ॥
जहँ तहँ बिप्र बेदधुनि करहीं । बंदी बिरिदावलि उच्चरहीं ॥ ४ ॥ nācahīm gāvahīm bibudha badhūṭīm. bāra bāra kusumāñjali chūṭīm. 3.

jaham̐ taham̐ bipra bēdadhuni karahīm. bandī biridāvali uccarahīm. 4.

All sorts of heavenly dames and damsels (such as the consorts of different gods of various denominations, as well as the celestial nymphs or dancers known as Apsaras) began dancing and singing merrily. They filled their hands with flowers and repeatedly sprinkled them (upon Lord Ram and Sita from the sky)<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Here and there and everywhere, the Brahmins (individually as well as in groups) were chanting verses from the Vedas and the bards and minstrels were singing the glories of the royal dynasty<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4 and 6 that precede Doha no. 262.

<sup>2</sup>Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Doha no. 262 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 5 in the context of the breaking of the bow, and (ii) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 194, as well as Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 195 in the context of the celebrations that marked the birth of Lord Ram and his three brothers at Ayodhya.]

महि पाताल नाक जसु ब्यापा । राम बरी सिय भंजेउ चापा ॥ ५ ॥
करहिं आरती पुर नर नारी । देहिं निछावरि बित्त बिसारी ॥ ६ ॥

mahi pātāla nāka jasu byāpā. rāma barī siya bhanjē'u cāpā. 5.
karahim āratī pura nara nārī. dēhim nichāvari bittā bisārī. 6.

The auspicious news and glad tidings that Lord Ram has married Sita by breaking the bow spread to all corners of the world, such as the terrestrial world (earth), the nether world and the subterranean world<sup>1</sup>. (5)

The men and women folk of the city waved lighted lamps before the couple (Lord Ram and Sita) to ward off any bad effects of evil eyes or by evil spirits (in a ritual known as the 'performing of the Aarti'), and they gave away abundant gifts irrespective of their financial standing to celebrate the occasion as well as to invoke the blessings of the receivers of such gifts for the welfare of the couple<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to (a) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 8 and Chanda line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 261; (ii) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 262; and (b) Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 1/93, stanza no. 3.

<sup>2</sup>An identical idea is expressed in Ram Charit Manas in Baal Kand where the birth of Lord Ram and his three brothers has been described.

Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 194 that mentions the performance of the ritual of "Aarti" by the women folk of Ayodhya for the welfare of the newly born brothers.

The "Aarti" is a formal ritual in which lighted earthen lamps are arranged on a platter along with other items such as rice grains, coloured powder, incense sticks etc. and waved in a clockwise fashion or in a to-and-fro pattern before the person who is to be honoured or blessed.

Aarti is usually accompanied by showering of flowers upon the person who is being honoured or blessed, or putting a garland around his neck.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 194 which describes how the citizens of Ayodhya liberally gave away gifts and whatever valuables they had to anyone who sought them to celebrate the happy occasion of birth of Lord Ram and his three brothers. Even those who received these gifts did not keep them for themselves, but they gave them to others in an all-pervading spirit of generosity and magnanimity, of celebration and festivities.]

सोहति सीय राम कै जोरी । छबि सिंगारु मनहुँ एक ठोरी ॥ ७ ॥

सखीं कहहिं प्रभुपद गहु सीता । करति न चरन परस अति भीता ॥ ८ ॥

sōhati sīya rāma kai jōrī. chabi siṅgāru manahum̐ ēka ṭhōrī. 7.

sakhīm kahahīm prabhupada gahu sītā. karati na carana parasa ati bhītā. 8.

The image of the couple, Sita and Lord Ram, looked so fabulously beautiful and charming that it fascinated all those who watched it, for the couple looked like personified forms of the virtues of beauty and love respectively that have come together to stand side by side of each other<sup>1</sup>. (7)

Sita's friends told her to bow (or kneel) down to touch the feet of Lord Ram (as a gesture of showing respect to him, as well as to surrender or submit her self before the Lord). But Sita hesitated in touching the Lord's feet as she was afraid to do so. [As a result, she remained standing before Lord Ram.]<sup>2</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In this imagery, Lord Ram is likened to the virtue of love, and Sita to beauty.

Likening Lord Ram to the virtue of 'love' is very significant here because till this moment it was Sita who has been repeatedly depicted as the one who has developed affection for Lord Ram. There are many instances where her love and affection for the Lord have been stressed. On the other hand, Lord Ram has been portrayed as being the recipient of this affection.

This has happened during the bow-breaking event that is currently being described here {refer:--(i) Doha no. 257; (ii) Doha no. 258 and its preceding Chaupai line no. 1; and (iii) Chaupai line nos. 3-7 that precede Doha no. 259}, and earlier when Sita met Lord Ram for the first time in the garden {refer:--(i) Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 232; (ii) Doha no. 234 and its preceding Chaupai line no. 5.}

So it was necessary to make the record straight and point out that even Lord Ram had love and affection for Sita in equal measure in which she had them for him, as has been done in the present verse.

The fact that Sita was a personified form of beauty is undisputed. Even Lord Ram has acknowledged this. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Doha no. 230 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8; (ii) Doha no. 231; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 235; and (iv) from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 237—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 238.

Again, Sita's beauty has been extensively described with the help of metaphors in Doha no. 247 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8.

So we see that this verse acts as bridge to bring together the twin virtues of beauty and love so they form a formidable force to reckon with.

<sup>2</sup>The reason for Sita's reluctance and fear has been given in the next Doha no. 265 that follows below.

Touching the feet of elders, learned people, one's husband or parent or teacher etc, is a gesture of showing respect and honour to them is a tradition in vogue since ancient times. For instance, Lord Ram and Laxman had bowed and touched the feet of sage Vishwamitra at many places—viz. Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 238, (ii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 239, etc.

When king Janak had met sage Vishwamitra, he had knelt down and touched his head to the feet of the sage—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 215.

Earlier, when Lord Ram and Laxman had departed from Ayodhya to accompany sage Vishwamitra to the forest, the Lord had gone to touch the feet of his mother—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 208 Ka.

Later on in this story we read that when Lord Ram had gone to his mother to seek her permission to go to the forest, he had bowed at her feet—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 52.

At the time of leaving Ayodhya, he had bid farewell to his father Dasrath as well as the royal priest sage Vasistha in the same way, by bowing at their feet—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 77; (ii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 79.

Lord Ram had bowed at the feet of all elders, Brahmins and his Guru sage Vasistha before proceeding to the forest: refer—Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, (i) Doha no. 79; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 81.

Moving further ahead we see that when Bharat, the younger brother of Lord Ram, meets him in the forest where the former had gone to try to persuade the Lord to return to Ayodhya, he had also fallen at the feet of Lord Ram—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 240.

Then we see that Hanuman, the monkey devotee of the Lord, had also fallen down at the feet of the Lord when they first met at the foothills of Mt. Rishyamook—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 2.]

दो०. गौतम तिय गति सुरति करि नहिं परसति पग पानि ।

मन बिहसे रघुबंसमनि प्रीति अलौकिक जानि ॥ २६५ ॥

dōhā.

gautama tiya gati surati kari nahim parasati paga pāni.
mana bihasē raghubansamani prīti alaukika jāni. 265.

Remembering (recalling) the fate of sage Gautam's wife Ahilya, Sita was reluctant to touch the feet of Lord Ram<sup>1</sup>.

'Raghubansamani' (Lord Ram, the gem of king Raghu's dynasty) realised the sublime and divine nature of Sita's love for him, and so he smiled internally (instead of feeling uneasy due to her hesitance to touch his feet)<sup>2</sup>. (Doha no. 265)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Please refer to a detailed note on Ahilya appended to Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 11-12 that precede Doha no. 210 above.

The news of Ahilya turning from the visible gross form of a stone into an invisible subtle form as the wife of sage Guatam when Lord Ram touched her with the dust of his feet, and then ascending to the heaven to join her husband, had spread far and wide. Everyone in Janakpur was aware of it—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 221.

Sita feared that if she touched the Lord's feet then chances are that her soul would also be freed from its gross body which the world recognised as 'Sita', the daughter of king Janak. She would then have to assume her original sublime form as goddess Laxmi. Well, how then will she serve Lord Ram, whom she knew to be a human form of Lord Vishnu, her eternal divine Lord in the heaven, and how will then she accompany him in a gross visual form on this earth to help him accomplish the task of killing the demons? Being the divine goddess Laxmi who is a consort of Lord Vishnu, she was taken into confidence by the Lord at the time of coming down to earth, and was told that she will have to play the role of a bait by which the demon king Ravana would be trapped and finally killed by Lord Vishnu in his human form as Lord Ram. We will read that the Lord reminded her of this role just prior to her abduction by Ravana. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 23—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 24.

So, if by chance Sita gets to leave her gross body as the daughter of king Janak and is transformed into goddess Laxmi by the mystical and powerful effect of touching Lord Ram's holy feet—which incidently must be remembered, has a natural and inherent power to give liberation and deliverance to the soul of all living beings from the grossness that surrounds it in this world—then the whole plan devised to eliminate the demons and free the gods and the earth from their terror would fall apart. This cannot be allowed to happen.

Sita was undecided because she thought that if her gross body was discarded and replaced with a subtle form while her beloved Lord was still in his gross human form, then how will she serve him and help him in carrying out his duty to give protection the gods and earth by eliminating the evil forces represented by the cruel demons.

But while the reason for Sita's hesitation was realised by Lord Ram, and he felt extremely happy in his heart, the wicked kings who were watching from the stands misinterpreted it as a sign of Sita's unwillingness to accept Lord Ram as her husband. Putting the 'victory garland' on the victor is one thing as no one could deny that Lord Ram had broken the bow and had publicly become eligible for this honour, but accepting him as a husband by Sita in a whole-hearted manner, without any reservation and with full submission, was another thing.

This misinterpretation of Sita's internal feelings for Lord Ram that was triggered by her delay to touch his feet was compounded by her delaying to put the garland around the Lord a few moments earlier—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 264 above.

We shall soon read that the defeated and frustrated kings stood up in revolt menacingly, and there was a spectre of a fierce battle had sage Parashuram not arrived at that time. The sage's arrival was ostensibly was to seek revenge for breaking the bow of Lord Shiva, but it sent kings scrambling for cover because the sage was renowned to mercilessly punish kings at the slightest wrong committed by them. All these developments have been elaborately described below, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 266—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 268.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Ram realised Sita's internal feelings as he was all-knowing and omniscient. We have already read how the Lord had judged Sita's love for him before he decided to actually break the bow. In this context, refer specially to (i) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 259; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Sortha/Doha no. 261 above.

The Lord had witnessed this behaviour of Sita earlier also in the garden where they had met for the first time. At that time also she had become so stunned at the sight of the Lord that she had been rendered completely immobile—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-7 that precede Doha no. 232.

So, the Lord was not surprised either when Sita delayed to put the garland on him, and when she delayed to touch his feet.]

चौ०. तब सिय देखि भूप अभिलाषे । कूर कपूत मूढ़ मन माखे ॥ १ ॥

उठि उठि पहिरि सनाह अभागे । जहँ तहँ गाल बजावन लागे ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

taba siya dēkhi bhūpa abhilāṣē. kūra kapūta mūrha mana mākhē. 1.
uṭhi uṭhi pahiri sanāha abhāgē. jaham<sup>2</sup> taham<sup>2</sup> gāla bajāvana lāgē. 2.

Then, looking at Sita (i.e. watching that she was reluctant to both put the garland on Lord Ram and also hesitating to bow down to touch his feet<sup>1</sup>), some of the kings who had no scruples, were morally degenerate, were a scar on the reputation of their respective royal families, and were extremely stupid, rose up in revolt because they had a subdued and oppressed longing for Sita<sup>2</sup>. (1)

These pervert and malice-bitten jealous kings, who were smacked with a burning desire for revenge and settle scores, for they could not come to terms with the stark reality of their ignominious defeat that had stared right up their noses, rose from their seats one after another, tied their body armours (to get ready for battle), and began to boast like a vain coxcomb<sup>3</sup>. [What they said is narrated below in verse nos. 3-5.] (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer to an elaborate note appended to Doha no. 265 above.

These were the same kings who refused to heed sane advice given by their compatriots that they shouldn't try to break the bow and invite sure defeat and its attendant humiliation because all subtle indications are that Sita would be married to Lord Ram as he was not an ordinary human prince but Lord Vishnu and the one whom even Lord Shiva, the lord of the bow that is to be broken, worships. Therefore, how can these 'stupid and ill-witted' kings expect Shiva to favour them instead of Lord Ram? Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 245—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 246.

<sup>2</sup>But these malice-ridden pervert kings were so overcome with passion and lust on the one hand, and on the other hand, itching with jealousy to seek revenge for their abject defeat and humiliation which they faced when they couldn't lift and string the great Bow, which they all tried to move with the combined strength of their muscular arms but failed to move it an inch, that they now threw all caution and decency to the wind and rose up in a common revolt, creating a furious uproar and a wild pandemonium in the packed arena.

Their senseless action only added to their self-invited ridicule and public sensor and scorn as it not only proved their moral turpitude but also established the stupidity and perversion of their minds in the face of the fact that they had all failed to move the bow individually as well as jointly when thousands of them had tried to lift the bow simultaneously without bothering about the immorality and impropriety of this act. These wicked kings should have kept their wits together and remained silent, sitting quietly in their seats to avoid further embarrassment. They should have realized that they had already committed a grave sin by trying to break the bow in their thousands—because had they been successful, Sita would be married to ‘thousands of kings at the same time’, making her ‘a wife of all of them’ at once! It was, in the first place, such an extremely ridiculous and absurd proposition that it ought to have made them remorseful, regretful, repentant and shameful to the extreme. But on the contrary, they had now started shouting and making a mockery of themselves because these maddened kings’ mind and intellect and the common sense of propriety and probity were so much eclipsed by delusions that were driven by passion and fired by their jealous zeal to grab Sita at any cost that they had not thought of the huge negativity and the ignominious consequences that would come in the wake of their creating a nuisance by their ruckus behaviour that caused an uncalled for pandemonium in the middle of a sober royal assembly of great kings and princes from all the corners of the world, especially when all those assembled had themselves witnessed the defeat of these mischief-mongers when the latter could not break the bow and returned to their seats with a down-cast head. These rascals did not even think of the negative name their respective families would get by their irrational and pervert behaviour.

As it turned out finally, they did get shame and ignominy. They were so extremely idiotic that inspite of seeing how Lord Ram had so easily broken the same bow which they could not as much as move in their thousands, they still wanted to challenge the authority and might of the Lord. Didn’t they witness Laxman’s anger a little while ago, and how even king Janak could not reprimand him? Didn’t they realise that Lord Ram’s marriage with Sita by breaking of the bow had the unreserved blessing of the mighty sage Vishwamitra whose mystical powers were well known? Didn’t they understand that Sita had already put the garland on Lord Ram, and for all practical purposes was his bride, and in this condition how immoral it is to even think of grabbing her and preventing her from marrying the Lord? Didn’t they realise that now Lord Ram and Laxman would wipe them out if they dared do any nonsense?

But still these stupid, ill-witted and pervert kings were so overwhelmed by lust and passions that they could not desist from making a last-ditch attempt to marry Sita. Now, in the following verses we shall read what they did and said.

But the question arises: what was the fuse that lit this fire of revolt amongst the failed competitors? Well, when they observed that Sita was demurring and hesitating to immediately put the victory garland around Lord Ram, they deduced that it was because she was reluctant to marry him, she did not actually wish to marry the Lord but was forced to go with the garland under instructions of her guru Satanand and father Janak. So they instantly grabbed this opportunity to jump into the fray with the intention of settling accounts with their common enemy, Lord Ram.

On the pervious occasion we have read that when they came back from the bow, unable to move it, and sat down crest-fallen on their seats, with lowered heads and shame writ large on their ashen faces, they had witnessed how Laxman brazenly and fearlessly rebuked Janak, a powerful king in his own right, the Lord in whose realm and patronage the ceremony was taking place, and who could have severely punished Laxman for his irreverent behaviour, but chose to keep quiet, which these failed kings took as a signal for themselves to keep quiet too, for they quickly consulted amongst themselves in hushed tones that there must be surely something serious and powerfully in favour of Laxman that forced Janak to bear with this insinuation of Laxman's vitriolic diatribe in front of full court.

They also feared sage Vishwamitra who was accompanying Lord Ram and Laxman, for everyone knew the might of the sage's mystical powers; 'it's better not to annoy him and invite his wrath', they decided.

But now when they saw Sita herself dithering in the matter of garlanding Lord Ram, they thought it was the right moment to hit back at their adversary. If Sita was not willing to marry Lord Ram, they surely she would side with these revolting kings and see to it that her father too supports their cause—for it would give her a chance to break free from the bondage of marrying someone she did not like.

So they rose in revolt to challenge Lord Ram for a combat, saying that if he were to marry the princess then first he will have to prove himself in princely valour, strength and courage by defeating other suitors before thinking of marrying her. As for the condition of the marriage being tied to the mere breaking of the bow, they have serious doubts about the fairness and the integrity of the way in which the ceremony was undertaken, for they are certain there was foul play and underhand dealing in the entire matter—for it seems obvious that the things were contrived in such a devious way that the bow wouldn't move a bit when anyone else tried his hand on it, but would easily be lifted when the pre-selected person, in this case Lord Ram, comes to lift and break it. If this is true, then god forbid and heaven be a witness, king Janak would pay a heavy price for it for subjecting all the great kings and princes of the earth to such humiliation and shame as he had managed to inflict upon them in the garb of holding a bow breaking ceremony with the bait of marrying his daughter.

This strong feeling and resentment of the kings is clear in Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that follow herein below.

Alas indeed and pity for these unfortunate wicked people who did not know the facts of the case. We shall soon read that they couldn't get the chance to fulfill their desire for a combat, for soon sage Parashuram would arrive on the scene, furious and hell-bent in punishing anybody who had broken the Bow as it belonged to Lord Shiva, his revered deity. Seeing the raging sage, known for his anger and willingness to kill Kshatriya kings at the least provocation, these kings and princes were once again on the defensive, hiding themselves and trying to avoid eye-contact with sage Parashuram, lest he would turn his wrath upon them instead of Lord Ram.

From a different angle, the arrival of angry sage Parashuram was a boon-in-disguise for these kings itching for a fight to settle scores with Lord Ram. Well, they were rather happy—for now they can sit quietly and enjoy the drama that would unfold, and let the sage do the dirty job for them, for all of them were sure that now Lord Ram and his short-tempered irreverent brother Laxman would be smacked for good and taught a bitter lesson of their lives by the angry sage. This we shall be reading soon. {Refer to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 268—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 270 which explicitly reiterates the above observation.}

<sup>3</sup>Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 95, stanza no. 1 also.]

लेहु छड़ाइ सीय कह कोऊ । धरि बाँधहु नृप बालक दोऊ ॥ ३ ॥

तोरें धनुषु चाड़ नहिं सरई । जीवत हमहि कुअँरि को बरई ॥ ४ ॥
जौं बिदेहु कछु करै सहाई । जीतहु समर सहित दोउ भाई ॥ ५ ॥

lēhu charā'i sīya kaha kō'ū. dhari bām̐dhahu nr̥pa bālaka dō'ū. 3.
tōrēm dhanuṣu cāra nahim sara'ī. jīvata hamahi ku'am̐ri kō bara'ī. 4.
jaur̥m bidēhu kachu karai sahā'ī. jītahu samara sahita dō'u bhā'ī. 5.

Some of them ranted as follows—‘Snatch Sita by force, and capture and hold in bondage the two princes of the king (i.e. Lord Ram and his younger brother Laxman). (3)

Merely breaking the bow won't suffice to satisfy his (Lord Ram's) desire (to marry Sita). Say, how can anyone dare to have his wish to marry the princess fulfilled as long as we are alive?

[To wit, let Ram be sure that the matter is not as easily settled as he thinks it to be. First he will have to prove his mettle, valour, strength and eligibility to marry such a great princess as Sita by vanquishing us in a combat if he wishes to fulfill his dream of marrying her. We smell a rat; there seems to be some cunning underhand method contrived to make him so easily break the mighty bow which our combined might failed to move even a fraction of an inch. No, it is not going to be a cake-walk for him; never as long as we are around, and it is not going to be otherwise. We challenge him for a duel; let us engage in a combat and prove ourselves.] (4)

If Videha (king Janak) tries to help them (Lord Ram and Laxman), we will win him too along with the two brothers in the battle.<sup>1</sup> (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The intention of the wicked kings was clear: they were ready for bloodshed and a showdown. The reason is that passion and lust aside, they faced the prospect of shame, disgrace and humiliation when they returned empty-handed to their respective kingdoms. This was unacceptable by all of them. In their madness to save their dignity they thought that with all of them joining hands it would be very easy to defeat king Janak and his army in a battle if they tried to protect Sita and side with the two brothers.

In this context, the reader should refer to an elaborate note appended to verse nos. 1-2 herein above.

This episode of Sita's marriage hinging on an absurd condition of breaking of a bow without considering other factors such as testing the qualifications, abilities, family history, personal character and temperament of the would-be groom, or even without consulting the girl whose entire future was at stake, and open declaration of war for such minor issues as marrying this or that girl, especially when she has already been officially declared as a bride of a particular man, is a sad and poignant commentary of the ways the society worked and the conditions that prevailed in ancient India.

We have read above that these kings were “stupid and ill-witted”. Didn't they realize that if king Janak decided to order his huge army to surround and disarm them, what would they do; what chance did they have against the huge army of Janakpur with only a few, a handful and a limited number of body-guards and soldiers who had accompanied them to Janakpur as escorts and official retinue that routinely accompanies a king going to attend an invitation?

Common sense says that they stood no chance, but passion and prospects of shame had the better of them when they decided to revolt.

Besides this logic, the other reason for them being decidedly “stupid” is that it was well known to them that the bow belonged to Lord Shiva, and they themselves had tried their best, both individually and jointly, to move it, but had failed miserably. The same bow was broken so easily by Lord Ram. Couldn’t they realize that there must be some hidden mystery in this development? They had been explicitly warned not to make a fool of themselves by wiser kings who had told them that Lord Ram and Sita were personified forms of the Lord and Mother of this world respectively, and that Lord Ram was worshipped even by Lord Shiva himself, but these kings paid no heed. These kings have also been described as being driven by passion and lust, as well as by arrogance and self-pride. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 245—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 246.]

साधु भूप बोले सुनि बानी । राजसमाजहि लाज लजानी ॥ ६ ॥
 बलु प्रतापु बीरता बड़ाई । नाक पिनाकहि संग सिधाई ॥ ७ ॥
 सोइ सूरता कि अब कहूँ पाई । असि बुधि तौ बिधि मुहँ मसि लाई ॥ ८ ॥ sādhū bhūpa bōlē suni bānī. rājasamājahi lāja lajānī. 6.

 balu pratāpu bīratā baṛāī. nāka pinākahi saṅga sidhāī. 7.
 sōī sūrātā ki aba kahūṁ pāī. asi budhi tau bidhi muhamṁ masi lāī. 8.

When the good kings heard this boastful outburst of the wicked kings, they sternly admonished and rebuked them, saying—‘Shame to all of you! In fact, this assembly of kings and princes has acted in such a disgraceful manner that if ‘shame’ had been personified then it would have shied away from coming here and show its face. (6)

Your boast of having great strength, bravery and fame has already been shattered and cut to pieces with the breaking of the bow. [Or, all your pretensions of strength, valour and reputation of being brave have already been crushed as soon as the bow broke.] (7)

Now say, from where have you retrieved these qualities of bravery and valour again? [Or, these qualities had already vanished with the breaking of the bow in public, so tell us from where have you got them back again?]

It is because you fellows are so foolish and dull-headed that the Creator decided to blacken your faces in full public view in this manner. (8)

[Note—These good kings are the ones who had seen the writing on the wall. They had realized that Sita is destined to marry Lord Ram, and had tried to persuade the stupid kings to have common sense and desist from trying to break the bow. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line nos. 2-4, and 8 that precede Doha no. 245—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 246.]

So when they found that in spite of Lord Ram’s clear victory and the evidence of the broken bow lying in front for anyone to see these arrogant kings are hell-bent on creating nuisance, they intervened and rebuffed these stupid fellows. They have come to attend a marriage ceremony and not to a battle-field!

Didn't these stupid kings realize that in an open competition only one person wins, whoever he is. And in this case it was Lord Ram, and he himself was a prince. So there was no reason for creating such a fuss and rubble-rousing. Had Lord Ram not belonged to a royal family or some higher class in the society then there was a ground to argue that since Sita belonged to a royal family then only a prince or king befitting her stature can marry her, and nobody else. But in this case this question does not arise at all as the family of Lord Ram was as reputed as that of Sita.

A shameful and disgraceful act by a handful of pervert and shameless kings would taint and cause ignominy to the entire society of kings and princes for no fault of theirs. Hence, the wise amongst them stood up to rebuke the nonsensical behaviour of their brethren.

Refer also to Tulsidas' 'Kavitawali Ramayan', Baal Kand, verse nos. 15 where the good kings have scolded these wicked kings.]

दो०. देखहु रामहि नयन भरि तजि इरिषा महु कोहु । लखन रोषु पावकु प्रबल जानि सलभ जनि होहु ॥ २६६ ॥

dōhā.

dēkhahu rāmaḥi nayana bhari taji iriṣā madu kōhu.
lakhana rōṣu pāvaku prabala jāni salabha jani hōhu. 266.

Look at Lord Ram and imbibe the beautiful sight of the Lord till your eyes are fully satisfied with it. Discard the attitude of jealousy and arrogance, and overcome your futile anger.

Laxman's anger is no less than a raging fire, and so be ware. Don't allow yourselves to become insects that get burnt when they voluntarily come too close to a burning fire. (Doha no. 266)

[Note—The good kings had advised the same thing—to enjoy the rare sight of seeing the beautiful form of Lord Ram—earlier also before the bow breaking ceremony had commenced. They themselves concentrated in enjoying this sight. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3, 6-7 that precede Doha no. 246.

The beautiful form of Lord Ram in the arena has been described in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Doha no. 242—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 244.

Laxman's anger was so violent that the earth shook, and its support, the Diggajs, had trembled out of fear—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 254.]

चौ०. बैनतेय बलि जिमि चह कागू । जिमि ससु चहै नाग अरि भागू ॥ १ ॥
जिमि चह कुसल अकारन कोही । सब संपदा चहै सिवद्रोही ॥ २ ॥
लोभी लोलुप कल कीरति चहई । अकलंकता कि कामी लहई ॥ ३ ॥
हरि पद बिमुख परम गति चाहा । तस तुझार लालचु नरनाहा ॥ ४ ॥

caupāī.

bainatēya bali jimi caha kāgū. jimi sasu cahai nāga ari bhāgū. 1.
 jimi caha kusala akārana kōhī. saba sampadā cahai sivadrōhī. 2.
 lōbhī lōlupa kala kīrati cahaī. akalañkatā ki kāmī lahaī. 3.
 hari pada bimukha parama gati cāhā. tasa tumhāra lālacu naranāhā. 4.

[In these four verses, the good kings have ridiculed their greedy and haughty friends, the wicked kings who have stood up in revolt and want are itching for a bloody fight to take Sita away, by comparing them to a number of entities whose attempt to do the impossible make them a laughing stock in this world.]

Just like a crow wanting to grab the share kept aside for Garud (during a religious ceremony), or just like a humble rabbit coveting the share of a lion (who is so strong that he can comfortably afford to be an enemy of an elephant without fear), [1] ---

--- Or just like a man who is accustomed to become angry without any cause expecting to have welfare, happiness and peace, or just like someone who is inimical to Lord Shiva expecting to have good fortunes and prosperity in life, [2] ---

--- Or just like a greedy, indulgent, selfish and rapacious man ever expecting to have any kind of credit, a good name and worthy reputation, or just like a lustful, lascivious and promiscuous man ever hoping to acquire a reputation of an immaculate character and trustworthiness, [3] ---

--- Or just like a person opposed to Lord Hari's holy feet (Hari = Lord Vishnu, the Supreme Lord) ever imagining that he will have liberation and deliverance for himself (i.e. freedom for his soul from the world and its horrors, freedom from the cycle of birth and death)—

Oh foolish kings, your desires and longings (for Sita, for victory over the two brothers, for acquiring some fame, for saving your lost prestige and honour etc.) are similar to the instances cited above by us. [4]

[To wit, you will never succeed in your stupid endeavours, you will never get what you desire, and you will never get any chance of having any sort of honour, but instead you will only invite further disgrace and humiliation for yourselves by indulging in utter nonsense and acting imprudently.

At least till now you had an excuse that it was Lord Shiva's bow which you did not actually want to break for the fear of causing insult to the Great Lord of the world, Lord Mahadeva, Shiva, but had gone to the bow to touch it and pay your respects to it, but what you all are up to now, declaring your intention to fight a battle to take Sita away and capture the two brothers, will close all doors for you to somehow gracefully save your ugly faces from abject disgrace and ignominy. Come on, have common sense, and stop being fanatically mad and creating nuisance to put all of us of the kingly class to utter shame in the annals of history. So you better shut up and sit down before it's too late.] (1-4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to Tulsidas' book 'Kavitawali Ramayan', Baal Kand, verse no. 1/15 in this context.

The wise kings were stunned and confounded by the unwarranted belligerent attitude of the wicked kings. First, they had not heeded the sane advice given to them by their wiser compatriots to desist from trying to lift the bow and make a mockery of themselves, then they had failed to move the bow individually, and finally they had miserably failed to do it even when thousands of them joined hands to try their combined might against a single opponent which was only an old and rusty ‘bow’, something that would be otherwise considered as absolutely inconsequential and easy to handle.

Meanwhile, king Janak was so gracious that he had kept quiet even when thousands of kings were trying to move the bow simultaneously—though he would have been within his rights to disallow it and could have strongly objected to this highly unethical act of these wicked kings because his daughter could not be allowed to marry all of them at the same time if they managed to somehow break the bow. Besides this, it was common sense that the king had meant that a ‘single individual who would be able to break the bow first would marry his daughter Sita, without any second thoughts and imposition of any other subjective conditions’. No father would allow this nonsense be perpetrated right in his front in the name of his daughter. But still Janak has maintained his calm. Couldn’t these wretched kings give king Janak a credit for showing so much restraint when all of them tried to break the bow jointly by not ordering his army to imprison all of them as they were violating principles of morality and proper conduct and attempting to bring disgrace to his entire dynasty? And instead of empathising with him and sharing his sorrows at the doomed fate of his daughter, they were now preparing for bloodshed?

So the wise kings took strong exception to the wild act of these greedy and arrogant kings who failed to accept their undeniable fate gracefully, politely, and with a smile in a sportsman-like spirit instead of showing the negative side of their character. Their hilarious act of belligerence and dare-devilry would bring disgrace and disrespect to the entire community of kings and princes to which even the noble-hearted and good kings belonged. Hence it was totally unacceptable to the latter category of kings that any nuisance be allowed to be perpetrated by their disillusioned and deluded brethren in their presence.

In all probability, if these wicked kings had indeed managed to go ahead with their plan to fight and forcefully snatch Sita, the good kings would have risen against them and fight alongside Janak and the two brothers. But as the things happened, this situation did not arise because sage Parashuram came in angrily to the arena just at that time, and seeing the angry sage those kings who were shouting and creating a ruckus a while ago went into hiding out of fear for their own lives! We shall soon read about it below.

Meanwhile, let us examine the similes cited by the good kings to rebuke the wicked ones.

(a) Chaupai line no. 1 = (i) The first instance is of the crow trying to eat the share kept aside for Garud. It is a normal practice during religious ceremonies that out of the offerings, a small part is kept aside for ‘Garud’ (the divine Eagle who is a mount of Lord Vishnu) along with parts kept aside for other gods and holy spirits. A hungry crow, which is also a bird like the Garud but is employed as a metaphor for a contemptuous, sinful and greedy creature, watches from a distance, coveting this share of Garud which is a divine bird. As soon as this crow hops near and tries to touch this share of Garud, it is shooed off contemptuously. The wicked kings are like the crow, Lord Ram is like Garud, and Sita is like the offering of the religious ceremony. She is meant to be married to Lord Ram, but these wicked crow-like kings are coveting her.

The comparison of the wicked kings with a ‘crow’ is very apt because like this bird which keeps on greedily eyeing the offering and crowing continuously for it until its voice becomes hoarse, and finally shooed away or even beaten back if it dares to come too near the holy offering intended for Garud, these failed and frustrated kings are also unsuccessfully trying to grab Sita though they know, like the wretched crow, that they won't succeed.

(ii) The lion is so powerful that it does not fear the mighty elephant that is huger in size than it; it easily kills the elephant. The lion may eat its hunt over a number of days, little at a time. A greedy rabbit eyes the kill, and when the lion's attention is diverted it tries to steal the food that is meant for the lion. The foolish rabbit does not realize that if the lion discovers that the wretched rabbit has been stealing over his shoulders, it would be killed instantly. Can the humble rabbit oppose and fight and win over the lion that can easily kill the mighty elephant which is hundred times larger and stronger than the petty rabbit? But in its ignorance the rabbit does not realize this but thinks that it can have its way with the lion. A similar idea is expressed in Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 15 that precedes Doha no. 28.

(b) Chaupai line no. 2 = (iii) A person who is inclined to be angry and wrathful for no reason, or for inconsequential reasons, cannot ever hope to find mental peace and happiness. He will surround himself with enemies instead of friends. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Doha no. 38.

(iv) The next example is that of a person who is opposed to Lord Shiva. Shiva is the "Maha-Deva", the Great God. When a person can't expect his welfare by opposing ordinary lords and masters of this world under whose domain he lives, how can he imagine that he will live happily by opposing the 'Great Lord' of the world, Lord Shiva? Kamdeo had dared to tease Lord Shiva and was reduced to ashes. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 83.

(c) Chaupai line no. 3 = (v) Similarly, a greedy, indulgent and lascivious man, a man who is haughty and arrogant, will only invite dishonour and ignominy instead of any good name or honour. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand—(i) Doha no. 38; (ii) Doha no. 23.

(vi) And finally, a person who is opposed to the Lord God, the Lord of the world known as Lord Hari (Vishnu), can only live in a fool's paradise if he expects any welfare for his soul, if he aspires for attaining liberation and deliverance for himself. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3, 5 that precedes Doha no. 23.

The good kings essentially advised their angry brethrens that they cannot expect to have any welfare by opposing Lord Ram who is a personified form of the Supreme Being. An identical idea was conveyed by Angad to Ravana, the demon king of Lanka, when he was sent by Lord Ram as a messenger to the court of Ravana in an attempt to avoid the ruinous war of Lanka. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precede Doha no. 27.

These deluded, impertinent and haughty kings, who were driven by a false sense of hurt ego and shamed self-esteem as well as overcome with lust and jealousy, must realize that Lord Ram was not an ordinary prince, but the Lord of the world in a personified form (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 246). Even Ravana's wife Mandodari had advised her husband the same thing (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 14), and once again Angad had also warned him of this fact (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 26). But unfortunately like Ravana, these foolish kings won't listen.]

कोलाहलु सुनि सीय सकानी । सखीं लवाइ गई जहँ रानी ॥ ५ ॥
 रामु सुभायँ चले गुरु पाहीं । सिय सनेहु बरनत मन माहीं ॥ ६ ॥ kōlāhalu suni sīya sakānī. sakhīm lavā'i ga'īm jaham' rānī. 5.

 rāmu subhāyam' calē guru pāhīm. siya sanēhu baranata mana māhīm. 6.

When Sita saw the pandemonium created by the wicked and boastful kings and heard the noise and the ruckus created by them, she was frightened (because she feared for the worst and the unexpected, as she had all along been watching the mad and fidgety behaviour of this wretched kings, and she had heard how quickly such situations go out of control and lead to violence and all sorts of misdemeanours).

So, her companions quickly escorted her back to the queen-mother for safety.

(5)

Meanwhile, with Sita leaving the place, Lord Ram too decided to go to his Guru (sage Vishwamitra) as there was no point in remaining standing there any longer. On the way, he kept on praising in his heart Sita's affection for him.

[This shows that the madness of the kings and the tumult they created had no effect on the Lord. He wasn't even a bit afraid of these kings just like a lion not being afraid of a herd of trumpeting mad elephants.] (6)

[Note—Sita had an inkling of what was to come. Remember: She was a princess, and was aware of how bloody wars were occasionally fought by kings and princes over a woman and hurt ego. Before Lord Ram broke the bow, she had observed how these kings were greedily eyeing her, and how they had put all morality and principles of propriety and conscientiousness to the wind when they attempted to lift the bow together in their thousands, not bothering to imagine what horror it meant for Sita if they succeeded in their ridiculous attempt.

She was now afraid that these kings would try to hide their frustration and disgrace by indulging in unwarranted bloodshed. So she was quickly scurried by her escorting companions to her mother, the queen, for safety.

Meanwhile, Lord Ram gave a damn to these rascals. Remember: Lord Ram and Laxman had fearlessly faced and effortlessly killed ferocious and blood-thirsty demons while protecting the fire sacrifice of sage Vishwamitra (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chuapai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 210).

So, when the Lord hadn't feared the demons, there was no question of his fearing these human kings. Rather, his attention was fixed on Sita and her love for him. This verse is a representative one that indicates the mental condition of all men who are about to be married to their beloved. For some time their mind and heart seemed obsessed, as if possessed, by the thought of their beloved, and they become oblivious of everything else, even of a great danger that might be lurking in the corner.]

रानिन्ह सहित सोचबस सीया । अब धौं बिधिहि काह करनीया ॥ ७ ॥
 भूप बचन सुनि इत उत तकहीं । लखनु राम डर बोलि न सकहीं ॥ ८ ॥

rāninha sahita sōcabasa sīyā. aba dhaurṁ bidhihi kāha karanīyā. 7.
bhūpa bacana suni ita uta takahīm. lakhanu rāma ḍara bōli na sakahīm. 8.

Hearing the mad rantings of the angry kings (that they would snatch Sita, that they will imprison the two brothers, Lord Ram and Laxman, and that they would defeat king Janak if he decides to intervene on the behalf of the two brothers in the battle that is bound to ensue), Sita and the queen became extremely worried as to what would happen now according to the destiny determined by the Creator<sup>1</sup>. (7)

Meanwhile, upon hearing the boastful words of these kings, Laxman looked became irritated and fidgetedly looked here and there with great annoyance. He wanted to speak out (just like he had sternly rebuked Janak a while ago), but desisted from doing so out of fear of annoying Lord Ram.<sup>2</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>No one can be certain what the destiny holds for him or her. There is an old adage that says ‘there are many a slips between the cup and the lip’. When everything appeared to be going in the right direction and things had started taking an upswing after the harrowing hours of uncertainties when no one had been able to move the bow and king Janak had virtually declared the ceremony closed and that Sita would have to remain unmarried, there was a sudden ray of hope and a light at the end of the dark tunnel when sage Vishwamitra ordered Lord Ram to break the bow and let Janak overcome his grief, and at the end of the tense moments that followed the Lord had actually broken the bow into two, thereby settling the issue for all times to come. And then, as if a thunderbolt struck from the blue, sparked by some ill-fortune, this nasty situation of revolt by the defeated kings has arisen.

So, Sita and her mother became remorseful and lamented at Sita’s misfortunes as they contemplated at the mysterious and stern ways of the Creator who shows no mercy and compassion when deciding the destiny of a person, placing the latter on a bed of roses at one moment and then tossing him or her on charcoals at the next. Both the daughter and her mother were in a quandary, not knowing what to do and how to respond.

<sup>2</sup>Laxman never did anything without the permission of his elder brother, Lord Ram. Even when he had spoken out against Janak a while ago, he had first taken permission from Lord Ram (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 252). But at that time the Lord was sitting near him, while in the present situation he is at a distance from Laxman as he is near the bow.

Remember: It was a huge arena, and things were organized and planned on a grand scale. The bow was kept in the center and the seats for the guests were in a circle all around it like we have in modern-day sport stadiums. The bow must have been separated from the sitting galleries by a distance of, say, roughly a hundred or so metres. So, at the time when the kings started creating a ruckus, Lord Ram was far away from Laxman and the latter had no opportunity to seek the Lord’s permission to bluntly face these boastful kings and show them their ground. This made Laxman fidgety with irritation. On the one hand he was finding hard to suppress his anger and was eager to vent his ire at the kings, and on the other hand he could not do anything without Lord Ram’s permission. And since the Lord was at a distance there was no choice for Laxman but to remain silent, though he must have been edgy and muttering curses under his breath for these wicked kings!

Just read the Doha that follows herein below to get an idea of the anger which Laxman was trying to suppress.

Refer also to Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 95, stanza nos. 2-3.]

दो०. अरुन नयन भृकुटी कुटिल चितवत नृपन्ह सकोप । मनहुँ मत्त गजगन निरखि सिंघकिसोरहि चोप ॥ २६७ ॥
dōhā.

aruna nayana bhr̥kuṭī kuṭila citavata nr̥panha sakōpa.
manahum̐ matta gajagana nirakhi siṅghakisōrahi cōpa. 267.

His (Laxman's) eyes became red and his eyebrows curved menacingly as he looked angrily at the kings. His mental condition and demeanours were like a lion's young cub which gets excited when it sees a group of trumpeting elephants. (Doha no. 267)

[Note—Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 1/95, stanza nos. 2-3 also.

Bravery and fearlessness is in the blood of a lion, it's his natural character, and it is inherited by its cub. Elephants are proud of their huge and strong bodies. When they walk they trample underfoot humble creatures and young plants without any bother; they rampage in the forest uprooting trees and breaking their branches. When a wild elephant is in heat, no animal dare face it. The only adversary of this elephant is the 'king of the forest', i.e. a lion. The lion is not at all afraid of the elephant, and it cleverly kills even the wildest and the strongest of elephants.

This trait of the parent lion is inherited by its cub. So when the cub sees a group of trumpeting elephants, it gets excited and wants to attack them.

This metaphor is cited here to indicate how Laxman felt. The boasting kings are likened to the group of trumpeting wild elephants, and Laxman to the lion's young cub.]

चौ०. खरभरु देखि बिकल पुर नारीं । सब मिलि देहिं महीपन्ह गारीं ॥ १ ॥
तेहिं अवसर सुनि सिव धनु भंगा । आयउ भृगुकुल कमल पतंगा ॥ २ ॥ देखि महीप सकल सकुचाने । बाज झपट जनु लवा लुकाने ॥ ३ ॥
caupāī.

kharabharu dēkhi bikala pura nārīṁ. saba mili dēhīṁ mahīpanha gārīṁ. 1.
tēhīṁ avasara suni siva dhanu bhaṅgā. āya'u bhr̥gukula kamala pataṅgā. 2.
dēkhi mahīpa sakala sakucānē. bāja jhapaṭa janu lavā lukānē. 3.

When the women-folk of the city saw the tumult, they became restless, and all of them joined to unanimously curse the kings (who were creating the ruckus)<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Just at that moment, sage Parashuram, who was like a sun with respect to the lotus representing the great family of sage Bhrigu (bhr̥gukula kamala pataṅgā—the most illustrious and famous member of the line of sages descending from Bhrigu)<sup>2</sup>, came there when he heard that Lord Shiva's bow has been broken<sup>3</sup>. (2)

When the defeated kings (who were up in arms and restless for a bloody showdown with Lord Ram) saw the angry sage (Parashuram) enter the arena in a huff, panting and scowling menacingly in fierce rage, they were so scared out of their wits that they tried to hide themselves from view like a quail hiding when the hawk swoops down upon it<sup>4</sup>. (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 95, stanza nos. 2-3 also.

When everything appeared to be settled and the tide seemed to have turned in favour when Lord Ram was a clear victor as he had broken the bow in front of everyone, when Sita had already put the marriage garland on Lord Ram and there was no turning back from it, the claim of these pervert, greedy and haughty kings that they won't allow Sita to be married to anyone else other than themselves though none of them could move the bow for as much as even a fraction of an inch, what to talk of lifting and breaking it, and that merely breaking the bow was not the determining factor to decide who will marry her, was as hilarious and ridiculous as it was improper, pervert and wicked because it was the declared condition that whosoever breaks the bow would marry Sita, and they had entered the competition with full knowledge of this singular condition.

So, instead of accepting failure with dignity, self-respect and a spirit of competition, these rascals were showing their true colours possessed by an evil mind that is driven by wickedness and perversion.

So, the citizenry vehemently cursed these wicked kings for their rashness, for their lack of scruples, for their imprudence and impertinence.

<sup>2</sup>Sage Parashuram was born in the line of sages that traced their origin to sage Bhṛigu. The metaphor of 'the sun and the lotus flower' is used to mean that Parashuram gave great fame and glory to this family of great sages who felt happy that he was a member of their race just like the lotus flower that feels so happy when the sun rises in the sky that it opens its petals to indicate its joy at the sight of the sun.

Refer also to: Kavitawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse nos. 18—22.

Now, let us read in brief about this great sage Parashuram whose name literally means "Ram with a battle-axe".

It is believed that he was the sixth incarnation of Vishnu. Parashuram was the youngest of the five sons of sage Jamdagni (pronounced "Jamdaagni") and his wife Renuka. He had subdued the haughty Kshatriya race or the warrior race led by king Kaartavirya who had become tyrannical and were oppressing others. The story goes that once Jamdagni doubted the infidelity of his wife Renuka and therefore asked his sons to behead her. The four sons refused and were cursed by him, but Parashuram did as told. The father was pleased and asked Parashuram to request for a boon, upon which the latter requested that his mother be revived, his brothers be pardoned, and Jamdagni should discard his angry temperament. The father agreed to all.

Jamdagni was killed by Sahastraarjun. The story in brief is as follows:--

There was once a thousand-armed Kshatriya (warrior class) king known as 'Sahastraarjun' or 'Arjun with a thousand hands'. Once he approached the Ocean and asked who was stronger than him. The Ocean told him that sage Jamdagni's son Parashuram was a fit match for him and would welcome him in battle. Such was Sahastraarjun's sense of ego and pride that he could not bear that someone stronger be there on earth in his presence. So he collected his huge army and went to the hermitage of sage Jamdagni.

The sage duly welcomed the king and extended warm hospitality to him. Sahastraarjun was however astonished at the lavish way the forest-dwelling hermit had entertained him. So he wanted to know the reason. Upon finding out that the sage managed to do this miracle because he possessed a divine cow known as 'Kamdhenu' or Kapila cow which could produce anything desired in an instant, the greedy king was filled with jealousy. Driven by avarice and rapacity, he demanded that the sage give this cow to him. Obviously Jamdagni refused. So the king forcefully snatched the cow from him and in the ensuing tussle he killed Jamdagni.

At that time, Jamdagni's brave son Parashuram was not there. When he returned, home he found his mother grieving. Coming to know of the reason, he immediately took the vow that he will eliminate all the Kshatriya kings from the surface of the earth by killing all of them. His mother had beaten her chest twenty-one times as a sign of mourning, so he declared that he will continue to wipe out the Kshatriya kings for an equal number of times, i.e. for twenty-one generations.

He comforted his mother and attacked Sahastraarjun, severed all his thousand arms with his battle-axe and then killed him. {This story is narrated in Srimad Bhagwat's Aashwamedhik Parva.}

Extremely peeved and angered by the Kshatriya race to which this king belonged, Parashuram vowed to eliminate the entire race from the surface of the earth as a revenge for the killing of his father. This was the reason why Parashuram had fought and killed thousands of Kshatriya to avenge the killing of his father by Sahastraarjun.

The Shiva-Puran has narrated the story of sage Parashuram as follows—

There was a king named Gadhi. His daughter was name Satyavati. Satyavati was married to the sage Richika. Richika arranged for a spectacular sacrifice. Some rice pudding was obtained from the yajna and Richika gave it to his wife Satyavati.

He said, 'Split this rice pudding into two halves. Eat half yourself and give the remaining half to your mother. Here, let me divide it. This is your half and that is your mother's. We are Brahmins. So we will have a son who will display the traits of a Brahmin. Your father is a Kshatriya, and your mother will have a son who will behave like a Kshatriya.'

Saying this, Richika went off to meditate in the forest. But mother and daughter managed to mix up their halves. In the course of his meditations, Richika realized that Satyavati was going to give birth to a Brahmin son who would display Kshatriya traits.

Through his powers, he managed to postpone this birth by a generation. So Satyavati gave birth to Jamadagni. It was Jamadagni's son Parashuram who exhibited all the Kshatriya like characteristics.

Gadhi's son was Vishvamitra. Vishvamitra was born a Kshatriya. But because of the mixing up of the rice pudding, Vishvamitra turned out to be Brahmin-like.

There was a king of the Haihaya dynasty named Arjun. He had a thousand arms. He had also obtained the boon that flaming fire itself would be perpetually present on the tip of his arrow. Whenever he shot an arrow, the fire from the tip of the arrow burnt up the target. In this fashion, Arjuna used to burn up villages, cities and forests. He once burnt up the hermitages of sages. And one of the sages cursed Arjun that he would be killed by Parashuram.

Parashurama learnt the art of fighting from Shiva himself. While Parashuram was away learning how to fight, Arjuna arrived in Jamadagni's hermitage. Jamadagni had a wonderful cow (dhenu), known as a kamadhenu because it produced whatever objects one asked (Kama) from it. Using this Kamadhenu, Jamadagni treated Arjun and his entire retinue to a royal feast.

Arjun asked Jamadagni to give him this cow, but the sage refused. Arjun then asked his soldiers to forcibly take away the cow. But just as this was going on, Parashuram arrived. He killed Arjun, slicing off Arjun's thousand arms in the process. Having disposed of Arjun, Parashuram went off to meditate and pay another visit to Shiva.

Taking advantage of Parashuram's absence, Arjun's sons invaded Jamadagni's hermitage. They killed Jamadagni. When Parashurama returned, he exacted vengeance for this evil deed. He killed Arjuna's sons. Since Arjuna and his sons happened to be Kshatriyas, Parashuram also killed all the Kshatriyas in the world. He did this not once, but twenty-one times over. Why twenty-one times? The reason was that there were twenty-one weapon-marks on the dead Jamadagni's body.

But killing was a crime and Parashuram had committed a sin. As penance, Parashuram donated cows and performed a lot of Tapa. He also arranged an Ashvamedha Yagya, the great horse-sacrifice. All this did not prove to be atonement enough. To complete the penance, Parashuram sought the advice of the sage Kashyapa. Kashyapa told him to perform the donation that is known as Tulaa-Purush. A Tula (or 'Tulaa-danda') is a pair of scales; the person (Purush) who is performing the donation is placed on one side of the weighing scale. On the other side are placed objects like honey, clarified butter, molasses, clothing and gold. The weight of the objects being donated has to be equal to the weight of the person performing the donation. This is known as 'Tulaa-purush'. Parashuram performed Tulaa-purusha and was freed from his sin.

<sup>3</sup>When Lord Ram had broken the bow its thunderous sound was heard in every corner of the world. All the gods as well as the sages knew about it, and they had rejoiced on the occasion. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 261—to Chaupai line no. 2 that preceded Doha no. 263.

It was not a secret that the bow belonged to Lord Shiva. King Janak had openly declared it to be so—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 250; (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 252. Everyone knew it to be so—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 262.

Now, when sage Parashuram heard about it, he became very angry, as he interpreted this breaking of the bow as an insult of his revered deity Lord Shiva. So he took his battle-axe and rushed to the site to punish the guilty.

Tulsidas has cleverly conceived of the idea of the arrival of the sage at the site of the bow breaking ceremony at the moment when the kings were itching for a bloody fight and Laxman was getting ready to give them a befitting reply to dramatically turn the tide of events in a favourable manner and effortlessly steer clear of bloody showdown that was otherwise imminent. This is because as soon as the angry kings saw the sage, they were so scared that they tried to hide themselves from view like a quail hiding when the hawk swoops down on it (refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 268 below).

At the same time, Tulsidas wanted to highlight the fact that not even sage Parashuram, who was reputed to kill members of the Kshatriya race, the warrior race, at the drop of a hat at the slightest provocation (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 272), could do any harm to the two brothers, that neither Lord Ram nor Laxman was afraid of him, and that the sage at last realized that Lord Ram was indeed a personified form of Lord Vishnu (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 284—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 285 below).

This is in consonance with Tulsidas' entire effort in writing his epic books on the story of Lord Ram—that is to highlight the divinity of the Lord and to treat him as the Supreme Being himself personified. Every event and every opportunity has been used to underscore this point. We will read below how sage Parashuram realizes this fact, and then gives Lord Ram the 'Sarang bow' that is held by Lord Vishnu (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 284 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 7-8).

However, Tulsidas was well aware of the fact that the other renowned versions of the story of Lord Ram, cited herein below, depict the arrival of the sage while the marriage party was on its way back to the kingdom of Ayodhya. So in deference to these versions and to show his respects for their authors, Tulsidas has briefly referred to this meeting in his book 'Janki Mangal' which is exclusively dedicated to the theme of Lord Ram's marriage with Janki, or Sita. In this book, sage Parashuram meets Lord Ram, Laxman and their father king Dasrath, vents his anger and then goes back subdued—refer: Janki Mangal, verse nos. 177-179.

The other famous versions of the story of Ramayana mentioned herein above where sage Parashuram has arrived when the marriage party was on its way back to Ayodhya instead of at the venue of the marriage itself are the following—(i) Veda Vyas' 'Adhyatma Ramayan', Baal Kand, Canto 7; and (ii) Valmiki's Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 74, verse nos. 13-24—to Canto 76.

<sup>4</sup>Tulsidas has cleverly conceived of the idea of the arrival of the sage at the site of the bow breaking ceremony at the moment when the kings were itching for a bloody fight and Laxman was getting ready to give them a befitting reply to dramatically turn the tide of events in a favourable manner and effortlessly steer clear of bloody showdown that was otherwise imminent. Refer to a detailed note appended to verse no. 2 above.

The metaphor of the hawk 'swooping down' on the poor quail indicates that the sage came almost running to the venue from his hermitage in the mountains, precisely Mt. Mahendraa-chal, prepared to punish anyone who broke the bow. And as soon as the kings saw him, they scrambled for cover like the terrified quail.

Well, this is very dramatic. While thousands of kings who prided themselves for their valour and strength, who were a moment ago boasting of snatching Sita and imprisoning Lord Ram and Laxman as well as defeating the entire army of Janak, are now scampering for cover to hide themselves from the view of the angry sage Parashuram because they feared that he will chop-off their heads with his battle-axe without even giving them a chance to explain themselves or protect themselves, Lord Ram and Laxman stood fearlessly and nonchalantly as if nothing had happened.

So we see how Tulsidas has expertly employed this episode to underscore the inherent strength, authority and power that the two brothers had. This incident is the second in the series of many such events that would emphasise this point. The first event, as we all know, was when the two brothers had faced and killed the fierce demons while protecting the fire sacrifice of sage Vishwamitra.]

गौरि सरीर भूति भल भ्राजा । भाल बिसाल त्रिपुंड बिराजा ॥ ४ ॥

सीस जटा ससिबदनु सुहावा । रिसबस कछुक अरुन होइ आवा ॥ ५ ॥

भृकुटी कुटिल नयन रिस राते । सहजहुँ चितवत मनहुँ रिसाते ॥ ६ ॥
 बृषभ कंध उर बाहु बिसाला । चारु जनेउ माल मृगछाला ॥ ७ ॥
 कटि मुनिबसन तून दुइ बाँधे । धनु सर कर कुठारु कल काँधे ॥ ८ ॥ gauri sarīra bhūti bhala bhrājā. bhāla bisāla tripuṇḍa birājā. 4.

 sīsa jaṭā sasibadanu suhāvā. risabasa kachuka aruna hō'i āvā. 5.
 bhr̥kuṭi kuṭila nayana risa rātē. sahajahum̐ citavata manahum̐ risātē. 6.
 bṛṣabha kandha ura bāhu bisālā. cāru janē'u māla mṛgachālā. 7.
 kaṭi munibasana tūna du'i bām̐dhēm̐. dhanu sara kara kuṭhāru kala kām̐dhēm̐.
 8.

[These five verses, nos. 4-8, describe the glorious image or physical form and vestiture of sage Parashuram.]

The ash that is smeared over his fair-complexioned body looks magnificent. The three horizontal lines of the religious mark known as the 'Tripund' (that is worn by devotees of Lord Shiva) adorn his broad forehead. (4)

There was a matted lock of hairs on his head. His bright moon-like face, that was otherwise very charming, now however looked a bit red with anger. (5)

With knitted and curved eyebrows as well as eyes that are virtually effusing anger, even when he glances anywhere in a causal manner (without any particular intention or meaning any harm) it gives the impression that he is looking there in anger<sup>1</sup>. (6)

His shoulders were well-built and muscular like those of a strong bull. His arms are long, and his chest is broad. He wore a magnificent sacred thread (across his chest), a wonderful garland (that was draped on his chest; or a rosary that was around his neck), and a deer-skin (that was wrapped around the upper part of his body). (7)

Around his waist was tied a piece of cloth like the one worn by hermits, and to its fastening cord were tied two quivers on either side of his hip. He held a bow and arrows in his two hands, while a battle-axe was tied to his shoulder. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We shall read below in Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 269 that “even when the sage glanced at any of the kings casually in a normal friendly way, that individual was so terrified that he thought that the span of his life has come to an end—i.e. the sage has selected him to vent his anger”.

Why were the kings so terrified at the mere sight of sage Parashuram? Doha no. 268 says that Parashuram's general attire and bearing, his general appearance was like that of a serene and dispassionate sage, but the deeds that he did were very cruel, such as relentlessly killing members of the princely class for whimsical reasons. The general physical description of the sage as narrated above is in consonance with the appearance of any other great sage, except the last half of verse no. 8 that describes him as having quivers tied to the hip, a battle-axe tied on his shoulders, and a bow and arrows held in the hands. This is the physical sign that he was a warrior sage.

Normally he would be calm and poised like any other great sage of repute, but when he became angry he spouted fire and brimstone. This is indicated by his reddened eyes and curved eyebrows.

So, when he approached the kings with fiery eyes, they lost their wits and feared the worst.]

दो०. सांत बेषु करनी कठिन बरनि न जाइ सरूप । धरि मुनितनु जनु बीर रसु आयउ जहँ सब भूप ॥ २६८ ॥

dōhā.

sānta bēṣu karānī kaṭhina barani na jā'i sarūpa.
dhari munitanu janu bīra rasu āya'u jaham̐ saba bhūpa. 268.

It is very difficult to describe the real character, form and nature of sage Parashuram because though his external attire and general appearance resembled those of great sages, but his deeds and acts were cruel (and just the opposite of what one would expect from some great sage whom he resembled by his appearance).

[But if one were to describe him using a simile or a metaphor, then it can be said that when sage Parashuram came to the venue of the bow-breaking ceremony—] It appears that the qualities of a gallant warrior and a valiant hero have taken the glorious form of a hermit or a sage and have arrived at the place where all the kings were present. (Doha no. 268)

[Note—Sage Parashuram's external appearance presents a picture in contrast. On the one hand he wears all the signs of a sage or a hermit—viz. ash smeared on the body, the Tripund mark on his forehead, matted hairs on the head, a sacred thread, a rosary or a garland on his chest, a deer-skin wrapped around his upper body, and a broad loin-cloth around his hips.

Contrasted with this is his warrior-like signs that suited war veterans rather than pious hermits—viz. a battle-axe, quivers, a bow and arrows; broad shoulders and long arms.

Further, while great sages and hermits always have a calm and peaceful countenance, Parashuram's was one of anger and wrathfulness—viz. curved and knitted eyebrows, red angry eyes.]

चौ०. देखत भृगुपति बेषु कराला । उठे सकल भय बिकल भुआला ॥ १ ॥
पितु समेत कहि कहि निज नामा । लगे करन सब दंड प्रनामा ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

dēkhata bhr̥gupati bēṣu karālā. uṭhē sakala bhaya bikala bhu'ālā. 1.
pitu samēta kahi kahi nija nāmā. lagē karana saba daṇḍa pranāmā. 2.

As soon as the kings saw the fierce form of Bhrigupati (sage Parashuram, the lord of line of sages tracing their origin to Bhrigu), they were all terrified, and rose from their seats (to pay respect to him). (1)

They began to mention their own names along with that of their respective fathers, and then prostrated themselves before him (a mark of respect that was done mechanically more out of fear of incurring the sage's wrath than out of any genuine respect for him because all the kings knew his reputation that he is inherently inimical to their race and finds pleasure in punishing members of the warrior Kshatriya race for the flimsiest of reasons). (2)

[Note—Just a few moments ago the kings had been on their feet, shouting and gesticulating wildly, seeking revenge for being humiliated—refer: Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 266 above. And now it is said that “they rose from their seats as soon as they saw sage Parashuram, and introduced themselves by telling their own names as well as those of their fathers before prostrating themselves in front of the angry sage.

It clearly means that as soon as they saw the angry sage rush in through the gate of the arena, they stopped shouting and boasting and immediately sat down so that they do not invite the attention of the wrathful sage. Pin-drop silence descended upon the arena as if by magic. No king or prince wanted to be caught red-handed, shouting and boasting, by the sage, because if the sage saw any one of them standing and shouting then it was sure that he would immediately vent his ire on that individual by chopping-off his head even before anyone could blink an eye.

Now, after entering the arena, the excited and angry sage was looking here and there to find out who was the culprit who broke the bow, and as he walked down the row of kings he stared down their faces. The person who faced the sage as he walked down the arena must have been shivering and sweating under his clothes out of fear for dear life. So, before the sage could become annoyed at them for not saying who they were, they began introducing themselves by uttering their names and those of their fathers, and then falling at the sage's feet to please him and keep him appeased and in good humour.

All of them fell before the sage one after another in quick succession. If they had not done so, they feared that the sage would treat it as sign of arrogance and haughtiness, and taking this sign as an affront to his authority he would have immediately chopped-off their heads.

When one prostrates before another person, he not only shows respect to the second person but also implies that he is surrendering before him and intends no confrontation. One is always unarmed while prostrating on the ground.

We can visualise this hilarious scene: As soon as the sage moved on to the next king, not bothering about the one who had just a moment ago fell down and prostrated on the ground before him, the first fellow rose up terrified, expecting the axe of the sage swinging towards him to cut off his head, and seeing that the sage has moved ahead to the next fellow and has spared him, he must have profusely thanked his stars and gods for still being alive! Then, after heaving a sigh of relief, this coward king must have wiped the sweat off his brow and sat down to see which fellow faces the sage's wrath.]

जेहि सुभायँ चितवहिं हितु जानी । सो जानइ जनु आइ खुटानी ॥ ३ ॥
जनक बहोरि आइ सिरु नावा । सीय बोलाइ प्रनामु करावा ॥ ४ ॥
आसिष दीन्हि सखीं हरषानीं । निज समाज लै गई सयानीं ॥ ५ ॥

jēhi subhāyam̐ citavahim̐ hitu jānī. sō jāna'i janu ā'i khuṭānī. 3.
janaka bahōri ā'i siru nāvā. sīya bōlā'i pranāmu karāvā. 4.

āṣiṣa dīnhi sakhīm haraṣānīm. nija samāja lai gaīm sayānīm. 5.

Even when the sage glanced at any of the kings casually in a normal friendly manner, that individual was so terrified that he thought that the span of his life has come to an end—i.e. the sage has selected him to vent his anger (otherwise why is he looking at him, why has he not moved ahead)<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Then king Janak came forward and bowed his head before the sage. He called Sita and made her too bow before him<sup>2</sup>. (4)

The sage (Parashuram) blessed her (Sita), and this made her friends happy. [Now there was no fear for her as well as her groom Lord Ram from the wrath of sage Parashuram.]<sup>3</sup>

After this, they (Sita's friends) escorted her back to the place where other women were waiting. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We have read above in verse no. 2 that each of the kings told the sage his own name as well as that of his father. Sage Parashuram knew all the great kings and their family dynasties. So when he heard the names of each of these kings and the names of their fathers, he would stop now and then before any one of them if he happened to belong to some great dynasty to wish that particular king and ask for the welfare of his family. But the sage had such a wild reputation of being angry, wrathful and vengeful that even though he spoke in a friendly manner, or just smiled and shook his head politely to a king whom he knew or had heard of, just to acknowledge the latter's respects, the concerned king lost his breath, fearing for his life!

<sup>2</sup>Janak deemed it fit, necessary and obligatory, being the host of the event, to come forward voluntarily to welcome and pay his respects to sage Parashuram. Earlier also, when sage Vishwamitra had come to Janakpur with Lord Ram and Laxman, Janak had gone outside the city to pay his respects to the sage and welcome him (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 214—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 215).

When a king learnt that a great sage has arrived, he would invariably go to receive him. When sage Vishwamitra had gone to Ayodhya to meet king Dasrath to ask the latter to send Lord Ram and Laxman with him so they can protect his fire sacrifice from being defiled by the demons, the king had gone forward to meet the sage outside the palace gates—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 206 and Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 207.

<sup>3</sup>Then king Janak summoned his daughter and made her pay respects to sage Parashuram.

Again, this is a normal thing for a father to do. We have seen earlier that when sage Vishwamitra had gone to Ayodhya to ask king Dasrath to send Lord Ram and Laxman with him, the king had first paid his own respects to the sage and then called all his four sons (Lord Ram and his other three brothers) to pay their individual respects to the sage—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-5 that precede Doha no. 207.

Now obviously, when king Janak politely bowed before the sage and summoned his daughter to make her also bow before the sage, no matter how angry the sage might have been he had no other choice but to exercise restraint as it would have been absolutely unbehaving for a sage or a hermit of his stature not to bless an innocent girl and her elderly father when they are bowing before him and seeking his blessing.

Now, how would a sage bless someone paying his respects? The obvious rule-of-thumb response to such situations is to bless by saying “be happy; be blessed; may god keep you happy and prosperous; have a long life; let your wishes be fulfilled”, and so on and so forth.

Once a sage blesses someone, the recipient sort of acquires immunity against all things that would go against his interests that are covered by this blessing. For instance, if the sage blesses that ‘you will succeed in your life’, then none of the evil stars that would have otherwise ruined his life would be able to make him fail now.

A girl’s most cherished desire, especially when she is about to be married, is to seek a sage’s blessings and good omen for the welfare and well-being of her husband and herself, for a happy married life, for a bright and happy future together. An elderly sage would voluntarily, as a natural impulse, out of his inherent compassionate nature, and out of courtesy, always bless a girl for a happy married life and good fortunes for her husband. But certainly, he cannot at all curse her and her husband; that would be wrong for a great sage.

Hence, sage Parashuram blessed Sita that she will have a cheerful married life, and all happiness would be hers. As soon as the sage uttered these reassuring words, Sita’s friends felt very happy because the danger on Lord Ram was eliminated instantly, by default. This is because the blessing of the sage, in whatever words he may have actually used to bless Sita, would become null and void if Sita’s beloved groom, Lord Ram, comes to any harm. Sita can’t be expected to remain happy and joyful if her dear husband Lord Ram is harmed in any way by the sage’s anger for the Lord breaking the bow. And since the sage’s words can be in vain, Lord Ram’s safety was ensured. In other words, the sage had granted an indirect immunity to Lord Ram by blessing Sita!

The same logic applies to her father Janak. What more a father would want at a time when his daughter is on the brink of being married than for her and her groom’s welfare and well-being? Sage Parashuram has also blessed the king, and so this was another ensurance for Lord Ram’s safety.

Further on we shall read herein below in verse nos. 6-7 that sage Parashuram has also blessed Lord Ram and Laxman directly in the presence of another great sage Vishwamitra. It is now certain that no harm can ever come to either Lord Ram or his brother Laxman through sage Parashuram at least, because he has himself blessed them.

That is why no matter how angry the sage was and how hard he had tried to hit either Lord Ram or his brother Laxman, his hands did not cooperate with him and refused to hit at either of the two brothers. There are enough hints of this—refer: Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 4, 7-8 that precede Doha no. 275; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 276; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 278; (iv) Doha no. 279 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 7-8; (v) Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 281; and (vi) from Doha no. 283—to Doha no. 284.

Besides this, if sage Parashuram had harmed Lord Ram in any way, it would have directly gone against his blessing for Sita that she be happy in future, and if he had harmed Laxman then also it would go against his blessing because Lord Ram cannot be expected to remain happy with Laxman injured, and therefore Sita too can’t be expected to be happy with this situation.]

बिस्वामित्रु मिले पुनि आई । पद सरोज मेले दोउ भाई ॥ ६ ॥
 रामु लखनु दसरथ के ढोटा । दीन्हि असीस देखि भल जोटा ॥ ७ ॥
 रामहि चितइ रहे थकि लोचन । रूप अपार मार मद मोचन ॥ ८ ॥ bisvāmitru milē puni ā'ī. pada sarōja mēlē dō'u bhā'ī. 6.

 rāmu lakhanu dasaratha kē ḍhōṭā. dīnhi asīsa dēkhi bhala jōṭā. 7.
 rāmahi cita'i rahē thaki lōcana. rūpa apāra māra mada mōcana. 8.

Then sage Vishwamitra came and met sage Parashuram, and made the two brothers (Lord Ram and Laxman) together touch the lotus-like (holy) feet of the sage. (6)

He introduced them to sage Parashuram, saying—‘They are Ram and Laxman. They are sons of king Dasrath.’<sup>1</sup>

Parashuram saw the charming pair of brothers and blessed them<sup>2</sup>. (7)

When the sage’s eyes fell upon Lord Ram—whose beautiful form was so astounding that it put to shame the pride of Kamdeo (cupid) that he has the most charming form in the world—he was completely swept off his feet, became spell-bound and so profoundly mesmerized by the Lord’s matchless charm that his eyes could not move away from the Lord<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Ram and Laxman were still young princes. Their father, king Dasrath, was however a renowned king, and was therefore known to sage Parashuram. But obviously for practical reasons, the sage was not expected to know about every son of every king who ruled the earth. That is why each of the kings had introduced themselves to him by first telling their own names and then that of their father and dynasty—refer: Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 269 herein above.

When sage Vishwamitra had met king Janak for the first time after arrival at Janakpur, at that time also he had introduced the two brothers to the king in the same way—telling their names and the name of their father. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 216 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8.

<sup>2</sup>Till this moment sage Parashuram did not know who had actually broken the bow. This will be clear shortly when he enquires from king Janak about the reason for the festivities, and upon learning about the breaking of Lord Shiva’s bow he demanded to know who had broken it. Refer: Doha no. 269—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 270 that follow herein below.

This is the primary reason why he has not yet cursed anyone or had threatened anyone that he would kill him. On the contrary, he has blessed all who sought his blessings—e.g. Janak, Sita, Lord Ram and Laxman.

But Parashuram was caught unaware in his own trap: After blessing Sita and the two brothers he will discover that it was Lord Ram who has broken the bow, and to rub salt on his wounds he will face the scathing taunts and scorns of Laxman who will tease the sage no end, leaving him wringing his hands and fretting and fuming in anger—but, ironically, unable to do anything. Why? Well, after having blessed them, how can the sage now cause them any harm. His blessing itself stood as a shield that afforded protection to Laxman and Lord Ram against the sage’s wrath.

This entire episode is narrated below in Baal Kand, from Doha no. 270—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 285.

<sup>3</sup>The images of Lord Ram and Laxman were so mesmerizing, so captivating that they enthralled the mind and heart of anyone who looked at them. Every single place that we come across in the story of the Ramayan which describes the reaction of those who saw the two brothers, we observe this fact in a universal manner. More recently, we can cite the following examples:--

(i) Janak was enthralled by this beautiful image when he first saw the two brothers while welcoming sage Vishwamitra (refer: Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 215—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 216);

(ii) then the citizens too were swept off their feet by this beautiful sight (refer: Baal Kand, from Doha no. 218—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 221);

(iii) and of course Sita was deeply enchanted by them (refer: Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 232—to Doha no. 234).

What's more, even the dispassionate sage Vishwamitra could not move his eyes away from the face of Lord Ram when he first saw him at Ayodhya when the sage had gone to bring the two brothers to his hermitage for protection of his fire sacrifice—refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 207.

Now, as it happened, after the two great sages Vishwamitra and Parashuram met each other and exchanged customary greetings, Lord Ram and Laxman were ordered by their guardian sage Vishwamitra to touch the feet of Parashuram. Till this moment sage Parashuram had no chance to closely see the charming images of the two brothers as his attention was diverted elsewhere. But when the two brothers stood up before him after paying their respects to the sage by touching his feet, it was the first time that Parashuram saw them from so close quarters. And as was expected, he was enthralled.]

दो०. बहुरि बिलोकि बिदेह सन कहहु काह अति भीर ।
पूछत जानि अजान जिमि ब्यापेउ कोपु सरीर ॥ २६९ ॥

dōhā.

bahuri bilōki bidēha sana kahahu kāha ati bhīra.
pūchata jāni ajāna jimi byāpē'u kōpu sarīra. 269.

Now, inspite of being aware of everything, sage Parashuram feigned ignorance and asked Janak—‘Well, tell me, why is there such a huge crowd here?’

Though he pretended to be ignorant of the reason for this huge assembly, he was seething with anger internally so much so that his whole body was virtually soaked in anger and a desire for revenge. (Doha no. 269)

[Note—Sage Parashuram asked Janak and nobody else because Janak was the ruler of the place, its king, and therefore acted as the host of the ceremony. The kings and other people had gathered here at his invitation. So he is the proper person to answer this question.

The sage already knew that Shiva's bow has been broken—this was the reason why he had come here to the venue in the first place. Refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 268. But he wanted to punish Janak along with the person who broke the bow, and so used this ploy of ignorance to let Janak say himself that this gathering had been called for breaking the bow, at which the angry sage will get an excuse to punish him. This is clear when he threatened Janak that he will upturn the earth within the periphery of his kingdom, meaning he would cause widespread destruction in his kingdom and bury everything underground like it happens during an earthquake—refer: Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precedes Doha no. 270 herein below.

From the corner of his eyes perhaps he had seen the broken bow lying on the ground, and this sight had fired his anger so much that his whole body seemed to be soaked in it.]

चौ०. समाचार कहि जनक सुनाए । जेहि कारन महीप सब आए ॥ १ ॥

caupāī.

samācāra kahi janaka sunā'ē. jēhi kārana mahīpa saba ā'ē. 1.

Janak told him (sage Parashuram) the whole story in detail as to why all the kings had come there. (1)

[Note—The reason has been narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 249—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 250.]

सुनत बचन फिरि अनत निहारे । देखे चापखंड महि डारे ॥ २ ॥
अति रिस बोले बचन कठोरा । कहु जड़ जनक धनुष कै तोरा ॥ ३ ॥
बेगि देखाउ मूढ़ न त आजू । उलटउँ महि जहँ लहि तव राजू ॥ ४ ॥ sunata bacana phiri anata nihārē. dēkhē cāpakhaṇḍa mahi ḍārē. 2.

ati risa bōlē bacana kaṭhōrā. kahu jaṛa janaka dhanuṣa kai tōrā. 3.
bēgi dēkhā'u mūṛha na ta ājū. ulaṭa'um' mahi jaham' lahi tava rājū. 4.

Hearing this, the sage turned his eyes towards that direction where the pieces of the broken bow were lying on the ground.<sup>1</sup> (2)

The sight of the broken bow lying unceremoniously on the ground infuriated him beyond measure, and losing all inhibitions and control over himself he sternly asked king Janak in an extremely harsh and threatening voice—‘Oh you stupid fellow Janak, tell me who has broken the bow. (3)

Be quick to answer me, you fool, and show me that fellow who has done it (and who had the temerity to break Lord Shiva's bow). If you don't do it, I will turn the earth upside down as far as your kingdom stretches (i.e. I will reduce your kingdom to rubble and bury everything underground).<sup>2</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The sage was fully aware that the bow had already been broken as he had heard the loud thunder caused when it had snapped into two—refer: Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 268.

The bow was central to the whole ceremony, and therefore was placed prominently on a central platform of the circular arena. The seats of invited kings and other guests were arranged in a circle around this platform. The king hosting the event, king Janak, and the chief guest of the event, sage Vishwamitra, were seated on an elevated area in one prominent corner of the arena that was so strategically located that the entire venue could be seen from there. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precedes Doha no. 224.

The bow was not a small one; it had huge unconventional dimensions because it had belonged to Lord Shiva and was used by him to kill the demon Tripurasur. So its broken parts were visible from all parts of the arena.

Remember: We have read a little earlier that Parashuram had ‘pretended’ that he does not know why this assembly has gathered—refer: Doha no. 269 above. We have also read that his eyes were red with anger and his general countenance showed that he was restless with anger and vengeance—refer: (i) Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 268; and (ii) line no. 2 of Doha no. 269, along with Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes it.

In short, Parashuram had already seen the bow lying broken on the ground, but was waiting for Janak to tell him the story of its breaking. Sage Parashuram had the intention of punishing Janak in public for being the cause of something that was otherwise deemed unimaginable—which was ‘to cause an indirect insult to Lord Shiva by getting the Lord’s bow broken at his behest’.

<sup>2</sup>Janak has been dubbed as a “fool and stupid fellow” by the angry sage Parashuram who used these epithets to mean that Janak should have used this bow to worship Lord Shiva through its medium, as a symbol of Shiva or a treasured gift by the Lord, but instead he has got it broken. What can be more idiotic and nonsensical behaviour? Sage Parashuram has threatened to “upturn the earth as far as the kingdom of Janakpur stretched”. Well, Parashuram knew that Janak was a compassionate king who loved his subjects more than anything else. When he is threatened with the prospect of ruining his kingdom and causing unprecedented horrors for his subjects, then the chances are better that he will divulge the name of the person who has broken the bow.

We must note here that though Parashuram knew about the breaking of the bow even before he arrived at the venue, he did not know who had actually broken it. He did not guess that this person was Lord Ram till the moment the Lord himself stepped forward to tell him so—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Doha no. 270—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 271 which we shall read below shortly.

We observe that Janak has had to face great humiliation in full public view for his decision of getting the bow of Lord Shiva broken. The ‘first occasion’ was Laxman’s humiliating verbal tirad against him (refer—Baal Kand, from Doha no. 252—to Doha no. 253; Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 254), the ‘second occasion’ was the kings threatening to defeat him in battle and snatch his daughter right under his nose (refer—Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 266), and the ‘third occasion’ is now with sage Parashuram calling him names, viz. ‘a stupid’, ‘a fool’, and threatening to destroy his kingdom and lay it to ruin in the present verses.

Why was this so? The answer is very interesting. Let us see how.

When we come to think of it and scrutinize the events, we observe that Janak had indeed acted impertinently and irresponsibly by being instrumental in getting Lord Shiva's bow broken in public, thereby causing an indirect insult of Lord Shiva. Remember: This bow was kept by Lord Shiva with his ancestors for safe-keeping because the Lord trusted them. The Lord had not told the custodian king to get rid of it or dispose of it as he wills either at that time or in any time in future. What right did one of their descendants, Janak, have to get it broken? Obviously the answer is 'none'.

Then there were other problems too. Breaking anything kept by someone for safe-keeping without that person's express permission is equivalent to showing utter contempt and disrespect to that person to whom the thing originally belongs. In this case the bow belonged to Shiva, and Janak's family was a mere custodian. Therefore, Janak had no moral right to show disrespect to it and its rightful owner Lord Shiva by getting it broken.

Since this bow had once been held by Lord Shiva, it deserved reverence and respect like any other thing or symbol associated with the Lord. Getting it broken so contemptuously was nothing short of an insult of Shiva.

Now let us see what punishment Janak got for this sin. This is very interesting. He got repaid with the same coin that he had used to imply disrespect for Shiva. He was scolded, scorned at, rebuked, bitterly threatened and humiliated in full public view, in an over-packed assembly attended by his own subjects as well as by all the worthwhile kings and princes of the time, along with their retinues, in front of his own daughter, ministers, courtiers, priest etc.—not once, not twice, but 'thrice', for his misdeed.

It definitely goes to the credit of Janak that he bore with this public humiliation quietly without showing any anger, perhaps because he, being a highly wise, righteous and judicious king, realized that this was a punishment for his sin of getting Shiva's bow broken. He must have regretted his decision; he must have wondered that he should have thought of it before it was too late, that he could have devised some other means of finding a suitable groom for his daughter instead of making the bow a condition as it is now proving a thorn on his back.

But was this public humiliation enough of a punishment for Janak for getting Lord Shiva's bow broken? Yes, it was. Being ridiculed, scorned at, strongly censored, facing abuses, angry reprimands and admonishments, with a lowered head and not being able to answer back to defend one's self, one's honour and actions, or unable to seek retribution, is worse than actual physical death. For an honourable man of self-respect, an upright man of dignity and stature, nothing can be worse. Janak was not an ordinary man of humble means; he was a great king.

He definitely felt like burying himself in the ground, out of shame and humiliation, if it split open, after being subjected to such unimaginable ignominious treatment thrice in front of his own subjects and family members, in the midst of the society of kings and princes and other invited dignitaries. Death is far better than to live in this world after having been subjected to this great public insult—this is endorsed in Ram Charit Manas as well. Refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 63. The context here is this: Sati, the divine consort of Lord Shiva, had gone to attend the fire sacrifice of her father, Prajapati Daksha. He harboured some old grudge against Shiva, and therefore had neither invited the Lord to attend the fire sacrifice nor had kept any offering for him though offerings were made to all other gods as is the practice during such sacrifices. Sati regarded this as a public insult of her husband, Lord Shiva, and declared “all past sorrows and wounds of my heart caused by previous insults and humiliation have faded in comparison to this present one which is intolerable for me; though there are countless forms of sorrows and grief in this world, the worst is an insult and humiliation in front of the society to which one belongs”. Here she meant that her father has publicly insulted and shown contempt for her husband, Lord Shiva, by not inviting him to the sacrifice, or giving him his due share of the offerings made to the sacred fire while all other gods, even those who are very junior to Shiva, have been invited, shown due respect and offered their share. The invited gods were looking at Sati with smirks and wicked smiles on their faces, sneering at her for being there even when she knew that her dear husband would be insulted. Why did she come to the fire sacrifice of her father when she knew that Shiva has not been invited; is she so eager to join in the celebrations that she preferred to disregard the value of her husband’s prestige and self-respect? This showed her in very bad light as for any honourable woman her husband occupies the highest place in her life.

So, Sati decided to burn herself and die instantly rather than live all her life with this shame and the memory of the public humiliation that she has had to face. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 63—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 64.

The idea is that the way Janak was insulted and humiliated thrice, as enumerated above in this discussion, it was the worst kind of punishment that he could have got. It would have been better if he was killed in action in a battle than having to live all his life with this history dogging him.]

अति डरु उत्तरु देत नृपु नाहीं । कुटिल भूप हरषे मन माहीं ॥ ५ ॥

सुर मुनि नाग नगर नर नारी । सोचहिं सकल त्रास उर भारी ॥ ६ ॥

ati ḍaru utaru dēta nṛpu nāhīm. kuṭila bhūpa haraṣē mana māhīm. 5.
sura muni nāga nagara nara nārī. sōcahīm sakala trāsa ura bhārī. 6.

The king (Janak) was so terrified that he could not answer the sage. The wicked kings, meanwhile, felt very happy (as they now felt that the angry sage would do what they had themselves hoped to do—i.e. punish king Janak as well as Lord Ram)<sup>1</sup>. (5)

On the other hand, the gods, the sages, the Naagas (the serpents; the subterranean creatures), and the citizens of the city, men and women alike, became very worried and extremely anxious in their hearts (because none of them knew what would happen now as almost all had heard about the unforgiving and uncompromising nature of sage Parashuram)<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Janak was struck with fear as he knew about the sage’s reputation. He knew that Parashuram was not merely boasting; he will indeed cause unprecedented havoc in his kingdom now that the bow has been broken and this fact cannot be hidden. His fear was compounded because it was he who had been the cause of its breaking. He was terrified because what was expected to be an occasion for celebration will turn out to be an occasion for grieving and mourning.

The wicked kings, as expected, rejoiced. What more could they want. They had wanted to disrupt the marriage ceremony somehow, even by an armed conflict—refer: Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 266 above. Now they were happy that sage Parashuram would do it for them; they were rather grateful to him for fulfilling their desire without giving them any trouble or any bad name.

The question why the kings and princes felt happy when they heard sage Parashuram declaring that he will punish him who has broken the Bow has been explained elaborately earlier as a note on this subject that has been appended to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 266 heretofore.

<sup>2</sup>The entities mentioned here represent all the living beings in this world. The gods represent the inhabitants of the heaven such as holy spirits etc., the serpents represented the subterranean creatures, and the terrestrial creatures were represented by the sages and the citizens, the former symbolizing learned men and the latter the ordinary human beings.

Earlier, when the bow was broken and there was celebration, they had rejoiced; they had played musical instruments, sang and danced. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 262—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 263.]

मन पछिताति सीय महतारी । बिधि अब सँवरी बात बिगारी ॥ ७ ॥

भृगुपति कर सुभाउ सुनि सीता । अरध निमेष कलप सम बीता ॥ ८ ॥

mana pachitāti sīya mahatārī. bidhi aba sam̐varī bāta bigārī. 7.

bhṛgupati kara subhā'u suni sītā. aradha nimēṣa kalapa sama bītā. 8.

Sita's mother (queen Sunayana) regretted and lamented in her heart about the developments. She became pensive and very remorseful that at a time when things appeared to be getting right, the malignant Creator ("Bidhi") threw a spanner in the wheel and ruined everything<sup>1</sup>. (7)

When Sita heard of the sage's temperament and reputation (from her friends), she was so emotionally upset that each passing moment appeared to be as long and stretched as a full era of time<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Doha no. 255—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 256. When Lord Ram had stood up to break the bow on the orders of sage Vishwamitra, the queen mother had worried at that time also.

When he had broken the bow, she had felt elated. Refer: Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 263.

Now, all of a sudden, this horrifying prospect of ruin and being at the receiving end of a sage's anger has erupted out of nowhere and most unexpectedly.

These quick developments were like a roller-coaster emotional ride for the queen-mother. She was swung from the extreme of joy when Lord Ram broke the bow and Sita had put the victory garland on the Lord's body to the pit of grief and sadness when first the failed kings threatened battle and then this furious sage, who was well-known for his killing sprees while in anger, has now come with his battle axe drawn to strike-off the head of the culprit who broke the bow. Oh Creator, she prayed, what do you want?

<sup>2</sup>To wit, Sita became very impatient; time became unbearable for her, it seemed to stop. She did not want to contemplate about the next moment because god only knew what would happen then. She feared the worst.

What was the thing about sage Parashuram's nature that made her so nervous when her friends told her about it? Well, we don't have to go far to seek the answer; it is provided by the sage himself while venting his anger on Lord Ram and Laxman. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Doha no. 272 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 4-8; (ii) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 274; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precedes Doha no. 275; (iv) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 281; and (v) Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 283.

Sita was very sad and felt hopeless, hapless and helpless. When things began to look bright for her, there is this sudden prospect of gloom and overriding grief. To use a metaphor, when the sun broke through the gloomy darkness of the night to shine bright and give the world the light of hope and happiness, it was suddenly being overcome by the solar eclipse, causing darkness and gloom to descend once again on the world!

In this context, refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 267 which says that both the queen and Sita were worried when they saw that the wicked kings had risen in revolt and there was an imminent danger of war.]

दो०. सभय बिलोके लोग सब जानि जानकी भीरु ।

हृदयं न हरषु बिषादु कछु बोले श्रीरघुबीरु ॥ २७० ॥

dōhā.

sabhaya bilōkē lōga saba jāni jānakī bhīru.

hr̥dayam̐ na haraṣu biṣādu kachu bōlē śrīraghubīru. 270.

When Raghubir (Lord Ram, the brave Lord of the Raghu dynasty) saw that all the people as well as Janki (Sita) were afraid, he spoke (to answer sage Parashuram) without feeling either happy or remorseful in his heart. (Doha no. 270)

[Note—Lord Ram is very merciful and compassionate. He is the Lord and protector of the world; he is its guardian and supreme care-taker. So when he saw that everyone is terrified and Janak has become tongue-tied, the Lord decided to intervene and spare them any further embarrassment.

Lord Ram has a natural temperament of being neutral and dispassionate; he exhibits an exemplary sense of equanimity in all situations, favourable or unfavourable. Goddess Saraswati, the patron goddess of speech, has acknowledged this in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 12.

Earlier in this episode, when sage Vishwamitra had ordered Lord Ram to get up and break the bow to remove the cause of Janak's immense sorrows, the Lord had got up from his seat and moved towards the bow with the same nonchalance, the same indifference and neutrality that he shows now while speaking to sage Parashuram. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 254.

Since he was the one who had broken the bow, the Lord decided that it was his responsibility to face the consequences, whatever they might be. Why should he let others suffer? King Janak had already suffered so much, so it would not be proper to force him to undergo any more rounds of sufferings and humiliations.]

[PAUSE 9 FOR A THIRTY-DAY RECITATION]

चौ०. नाथ संभुधनु भंजनिहारा । होइहि केउ एक दास तुहारा ॥ १ ॥
 आयसु काह कहिअ किन मोही । सुनि रिसाइ बोले मुनि कोही ॥ २ ॥
 caupāī.

nātha sambhudhanu bhanjanihārā. hō'ihī kē'u ēka dāsa tumhārā. 1.
 āyasu kāha kahi'a kina mōhī. suni risā'i bōlē muni kōhī. 2.

[Lord Ram spoke very politely to sage Parashuram—]

‘Oh Lord! The person who has broken the bow of Lord Shiva must be (literally) one of your servants. [That is, this person is surely junior to you, because you are such a great sage that no one can be greater than you. And being your servant or subordinate, he surely had no intention at all of insulting you or injuring your ego.]
 (1)

Why don't you tell me what you command is, or what you wish? [That is, why don't you tell me what is that you want, now that the bow is broken already?]<sup>1</sup>

Hearing these words of Lord Ram, the sage replied angrily—(2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Ram has carefully worded his enquiry. What he said in verse no. 1 was intended to soothe the ruffled ego of the haughty sage. The message that was conveyed was crystal clear—“It is me, Ram, who has broken the bow, but oh sage, do not become unnecessarily angry as I had no intention of either insulting you or Lord Shiva, and neither do I want to give an impression that I have any intention of insubordinating you. You are a great sage, while I am merely a prince. I don't deny that I have broken the bow, but you being so senior a person, you must exhibit maturity and poise. The bow is already broken, and so getting angry and shouting won't help. Let us be practical and discuss wisely what remedy can be found for something that has already happened. What do you want from me?”

This statement of Lord Ram shows that inspite of breaking the formidable bow of Lord Shiva that had defied the combined might of the mightiest of kings of the earth, the Lord had no trace of ego or pride in him. This is clear by the term “Daas” in the text—which literally means a ‘servant’. Here the term does not actually mean a menial servant who does household chores for his lord or master, but it means someone who is very humble and junior to the person addressed.

The sage was not a child; the Lord's reply hinted to him that he is the one who has broken the bow. This is because the sage had asked king Janak about who had broken the bow, and it was Janak who should have replied. Why would or why should someone else, a third person who is not involved in the incident at all, must unnecessarily interfere when he is not being asked anything? This clearly hinted to the sage that it was Lord Ram who had broken the bow, or at least directly involved in its breaking, or someone else who had Lord Ram's support had broken it on the Lord's orders, thereby necessitating intervention by the Lord.

Since Lord Ram spoke in the third person, i.e. said “it must be someone who is your servant” instead of directly accepting responsibility, the reply of the sage matched it: he also referred to that ‘third person’ who had broken the bow—refer: verse nos. 3-5 herein below.]

सेवकु सो जो करै सेवकाई । अरि करनी करि करिअ लराई ॥ ३ ॥
 सुनहु राम जेहिं सिवधनु तोरा । सहसबाहु सम सो रिपु मोरा ॥ ४ ॥
 सो बिलगाउ बिहाइ समाजा । न त मारे जैहिं सब राजा ॥ ५ ॥ sēvaku sō jō karai sēvakā'ī. ari karanī kari kari'a larā'ī. 3.

 sunahu rāma jēhiṁ sivadhanu tōrā. sahasabāhu sama sō ripu mōrā. 4.
 sō bilagā'u bihā'i samājā. na ta mārē jaihiṁ saba rājā. 5.

[The sage replied to Lord Ram angrily—]

‘A servant is one who serves with humility, and not one who acts like an enemy by doing something that annoys his lord. (3)

Listen Ram, anyone who has broken the bow of Lord Shiva is like the thousand-handed enemy for me. [Or, such a person is equivalent to ‘Sahastra-baahu’<sup>1</sup> as far as I am concerned. He had killed my father, and to punish him I had cut-off his thousand arms and killed him. Likewise I will chop-off the hands of the person who has broken this bow before killing him.] (2)

Let him step forward and separate himself from the rest of the kings, for otherwise I will kill all of them.’ (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 4; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 272.

The story of ‘Sahastra-baahu’, also known as ‘Sahastraarjun’ or ‘Arjun with a thousand hands’ is narrated in a detailed note on sage Parashuram that is appended to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 268 above. Now, Lord Shiva was sage Parashuram’s revered deity and his Guru, a moral preceptor, as Shiva is regarded as the universal Guru of all hermits and ascetics. Insulting a Guru is equivalent to insulting one’s parent, especially one’s father. Parashuram is referring to it. He means that since Shiva is as revered by him as his father sage Jamdagni, anyone who has dared to insult Shiva by breaking his bow is deemed to be Parashuram’s enemy just like Sahastrabaahu who had insulted his father Jamdagni. Therefore, just like he had killed Sahastrabaahu, he would also kill the person who has broken the bow.

It’s better for this fellow to step out, because otherwise all the kings would be punished for shielding him and taking side with him.

An interesting thing should be mentioned here in the passing. We have read earlier, while reading the note on sage Parashuram in Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 268, that he had vowed to kill the Kshatriya kings for “twenty-one times”. This limit had been crossed before this incident of the bow breaking ceremony had taken place. Perhaps the sage had not kept any count of the number of times he had already eliminated the kings, for if he had done so he wouldn’t have threatened to kill anyone beyond this limit.

As it eventually turned out, no matter how hard the sage had tried to hit Laxman when the latter was speaking to him in very scorching tones, his hands won't move and refused to cooperate with him. In fact, Parashuram was himself astonished why he was not able to punish Laxman, and why his hands refused to cooperate with him—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 280.]

सुनि मुनि बचन लखन मुसुकाने । बोले परसुधरहि अपमाने ॥ ६ ॥
 बहु धनुहीं तोरीं लरिकार्ई । कबहुँ न असि रिस कीन्हि गोसाईं ॥ ७ ॥
 एहि धनु पर ममता केहि हेतू । सुनि रिसाइ कह भृगुकुलकेतू ॥ ८ ॥ sunī muni bacana lakhana musukānē. bōlē parasudharahi apamānē. 6.

 bahu dhanuhīm tōrīm larikā'īm. kabahum'na asi risa kīnhi gōsā'īm. 7.
 ēhi dhanu para mamatā kēhi hētū. suni risā'i kaha bhṛgukulakētū. 8.

[Laxman was restive. He just could not cope with someone talking angrily with his beloved brother and Lord, Sri Ram. Unable to resist his urge to intervene on behalf of Lord Ram, Laxman spoke sweetly with a smile, but his demeanours were so aggressive and his manner of speaking so taunting and overtly insulting that his words and smile added fuel to the fire of the anger of the sage instead of calming him down.]

Hearing the words of the sage, Laxman smiled sarcastically and spoke in a way that was deemed to be insulting by Parashuram<sup>1</sup>—(6)

Laxman said to sage Prashuram—‘As a child I had broken many bows, but my lord you had never shown such anger at that time. (7)

What is so special with this particular bow that you love it so much (that its breaking has annoyed you extremely to the extent as to have brought you down puffing and fuming to this place from your hermitage, causing you to disrupt your spiritual pursuit and meditation, and get so much upset and angry)? [I don't see anything special with this bow; it looks to me as an old, rusty and wornout bow that is of no use whatever in practice, and therefore there should be no cause to become so fretful and agitated at its breaking. I don't think it is of any precious value or importance to invite such reaction from a sage of your repute and status. Come on sage, what's so wrong with its breaking that you are so furious and mad about?]

Hearing these words of Laxman, sage Parashuram (“bhṛgukulakētū”; literally ‘the flag-bearer of the greatness of the line of sages coming down from sage Bhrigu’) became very angry and peeved. He said in fury<sup>2</sup>—(8)

[Note—1The sage was already angry, and first Lord Ram had spoken to him out of turn because the sage had demanded to know who had broken the bow from king Janak and not from Ram, and now another prince has started speaking out of turn, without being asked anything. This truly annoyed the sage because he thought that these two brothers are taking him lightly and making a fun, a mockery of him.

Parashuram wondered angrily, ‘Why are these two fellows chirping out of turn? Do they think that I have come here to joke with them? The situation is very grave, my revered Lord Shiva has been broken, and instead of expressing any remorse or regret, this fellow Laxman is ‘smiling sarcastically’ at me as if the breaking of Lord Shiva’s bow is of no importance. Well, this is intolerable for me.’

Indeed the sage was extremely exasperated and infuriated because whereas other powerful kings and princes had developed pale faces out of fear of the sage, and were perhaps searching for a way to sneak out to avoid the wrath of the sage’s anger, here were two young princes talking boldly and fearlessly with him as if the issue was something of a joke. The sage was excessively annoyed at Laxman’s light-hearted treatment of this issue which the sage regarded as very grave.

The question arises, ‘why did Laxman choose to act in a way that would be insulting for the sage?’ Well, for one, a sage is supposed to be a calm and peaceful person who is forgiving by nature, and not one who spits fire and brimstone, who is full of spite and haughtiness, and who is ready to kill others at the drop of a hat. In other words, if a person who calls himself a ‘sage’ does not show virtues that are characteristic of such exalted souls then he is worthy of contempt. The second reason is that the sage had threatened to kill anyone who had broken the bow, and since this person happened to be Lord Ram whom Laxman revered highly, any hint that the Lord is being insulted ignited Laxman’s wrath. In a way, Laxman warns sage Parashuram to behave himself as he has at last met his match.

Further, the sage was very proud of his martial prowess and his ability to subdue the mightiest of kings. This character was not good for the spiritual welfare of the sage because pride, haughtiness and arrogance as well as anger and vengeance are negative characters that are never expected from a great sage and hermit; these negative traits pull down a sage from his exalted stature instead of elevating him. The sage was dressed like a hermit but behaved like an ordinary worldly man who is soaked in negative qualities. Hence, he was fit for contempt. The lesson that we draw from this episode is that no matter how learned a person is or how highly placed in society he may be, if he has negative qualities in him, such as anger, pride, haughtiness and vengefulness, then one day or the other he is bound to be insulted and put to shame.

<sup>2</sup>Why did the sage become angry? Well, this bow belonged to Lord Shiva whom sage Parashuram regarded as his Guru (moral preceptor and revered teacher) as well as the deity whom he worshipped. Treating a bow that belonged to the sage’s respected Guru and revered deity (Shiva) as being equal to other ordinary insignificant bows that children play and break umpteen numbers of time in a routine manner was deemed by sage Parashuram to be an extreme form of insubordination of Shiva, and since an insult caused to one’s Guru and deity is to be regarded as one’s personal insult, the sage took strong objection at Laxman’s behaviour.

Laxman’s questions offended the sage who took his sarcastic smile (Chaupai line no. 6 above), and his carefree attitude as if nothing wrong has happened (Chaupai line no. 7), as an affront to his dignity, self-respect and exalted stature as a renowned sage of a great pedigree, being a descendent of the famed sage Bhṛigu whose family name Parashuram carried, for never before had anyone dared to confront Parashuram with the same boldness and fearlessness which Laxman displayed now. This sort of attitude was unthinkable and too much to bear for the sage.]

दो०. रे नृप बालक काल बस बोलत तोहि न सँभार ।

धनुही सम तिपुरारि धनु बिदित सकल संसार ॥ २७१ ॥

dōhā.

rē nrpa bālaka kāla basa bōlata tōhi na sam̐bhāra.
dhanuhī sama tipurāri dhanu bidita sakala sansāra. 271.

[Sage Parashuram was very peeved and so he scolded Laxman, chiding him for his impertinence and denigrating Lord Shiva by comparing the Lord's bow worthy of respect and worship with an ordinary bow that children often break in their childhood while casually playing with it.]

The angry sage said to Laxman—‘Oh you young prince (“nrpa bālaka”; ‘nrpa’ = a king; ‘bālaka’ = a young boy)! (It appears that—) You are in the grip of death (or are under the spell of the death-god; “kāla basa”), and so you have no control over your words and speak without thinking of what you are saying, not understanding the gravity of your utterances (“bōlata tōhi na sam̐bhāra”).

How dare you compare the world-famous bow of Lord Shiva, the great Lord who is known as “Tripurari” (because he had used this bow to conquer the three formidable legendary cities and kill their ruler, the demon ‘Tripura’), with an ordinary, humble bow (when you say that you had broken many bows as a child and there was no hue and cry at that time). How dare you say so?’ (Doha no. 271)

[Note—The sage has used the words “Nrip-Baalak”, literally meaning a young son of a king, while addressing Laxman, and the word “Tripurari” for Lord Shiva. What the sage means is clear. He chides Laxman that the latter talks like an ignorant and immature boy (‘Baalak’) who seems to be unaware of the great events of this world, for otherwise did he not know that this bow was used by Lord Shiva to kill the formidable demon by the name of Tripura (‘Tripurari’) whom none of the other Gods, including Vishnu, could face. Besides this, the bow belonged to Shiva who is also known and revered as the ‘Maha-Deva’, the Great God of creation. Therefore it is absolutely irrational and highly stupid to compare such a mighty bow with an ordinary bow that children break while playing, as Laxman thinks it is—refer: Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes the current Doha no. 271.

The greatness and uniqueness of the bow was declared by king Janak's heralds as well as by king Janak himself—refer: Baal Kand: (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 250; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 252. So, how idiotic it is for Laxman to compare this formidable, world-renowned bow of Lord Shiva with ordinary bows that he (Laxman) may have broken as a child?

Only those people whose minds begin to hallucinate when they are under the spell of death talk irrationally and nonsense things. The sage sternly warns Laxman to mind his words and be careful with what he says because death is staring in his face, and if he (Laxman) tries to act too smart with the sage then let him be warned that he will be responsible for the consequences which would be fatal for him.

When Parashuram referred to ‘death’ while admonishing Laxman, he meant that hadn't Laxman paid attention to what the sage had said just a few moments ago—that he is determined to severely punish the person who has broken the bow of Lord Shiva, and when he punishes someone it means ‘death’. Refer—Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 270; and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 271.

The fact that the sage had no reservations about killing a person as a means of punishment is clearly declared by the sage himself a little later during this episode.

Refer: Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 274; (ii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 275; and (iii) Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 283.

It is said that when one is destined to die, when death is inevitable, when death looms over a person, his rational thinking, intellect and wisdom abandon him, and he is propelled to death by becoming reckless, ‘by losing control over what he says’, what actions he takes and how he behaves. He is attracted to death like the insect is to the wick of a lighted lamp or a raging fire, only to get burnt to death.

This particular sign that ‘one begins to talk incoherently and madly when one is in the jaws of death’ as implied by sage Parashuram here when he admonishes Laxman has another parallel in this book ‘Ram Charit Manas’ when Angad says the same thing to Ravana in Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 33. In this case, Angad was sent as an emissary by Lord Ram to Ravana in a final attempt to avoid the ruinous war. Angad tried every logic he could think of in an attempt to persuade Ravana to give Sita back to Lord Ram and avoid the calamitous war, but the demon king won’t listen. Instead, Ravana started boasting and denigrating the Lord. So Angad chides Ravana by saying that the latter’s death seems to be imminent because he won’t listen to any sane advice and ‘was babbling incoherently as if in a delirium because death seems to have got hold of him (by deluding and eclipsing his intellect, his sense of rational thinking and his wisdom)’.

A very interesting development has occurred here in a subtle manner. While Parashuram admonishes Laxman that the latter seems to be in the throes of death because he is talking nonsense, the sage himself, in his fit of anger, had been talking nonsense, without giving thought to what he is saying. Why is it so? Well, the sage has repeatedly stressed that the bow belonged to Lord Shiva. So why did he not ponder over the fact that since it is not a joke to break Lord Shiva’s bow, then obviously if someone had indeed broken it then that person must be at least equivalent to Lord Shiva if not greater than him! Besides this logic, how could anyone ever break Lord Shiva’s bow without the Lord’s consent. In other words, anyone who had broken the bow must have had Shiva’s approval and backing.

Therefore, would sage Parashuram not commit a grave and unpardonable sin by going against the wishes of Lord Shiva himself because it was impossible to break the bow without the Lord’s consent. This sin would be aggravated by harming that person who has broken the bow, obviously with Shiva’s consent—the person surely had the backing of Lord Shiva simply because had Shiva not wanted the bow to be broken then no power on earth would have been able to move it, let alone break it. This is evident when none of the mighty kings could move the bow even a fraction of an inch—refer: Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 251; and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 252.

So the sage had gravely erred in this case by threatening to kill the person who had broken the bow because he had neglected the fact that the bow cannot be broken without the consent of Lord Shiva. Therefore, while trying to act unilaterally in a self-righteous manner and pretending that he has the mandate to uphold the dignity of Lord Shiva by punishing any person who does anything that is purportedly insulting to the Lord, in the present case by breaking the Lord’s bow, the sage had unwittingly invited ridicule and humiliation upon himself at the hands of Laxman.

The lesson we draw from Parashuram’s episode is that ‘anger is one’s worst enemy’. It is anger that makes one lose sense of what he must say and do, anger is actually the element that makes a man lose his bearings and throws him virtually into the jaws of death because his intellect and wisdom abandon him, and it is anger that forces a man to make a clown of himself in the society.

By being angry, Parashuram had made a mockery of his own greatness and exalted stature, of his immense strength and powers that he had acquired by doing severe Tapa (penances) so much so that instead of seeking retribution for breaking of Shiva's bow he had only invited ridicule upon himself.]

चौ०. लखन कहा हँसि हमरें जाना । सुनहु देव सब धनुष समाना ॥ १ ॥
का छति लाभु जून धनु तोरें । देखा राम नयन के भोरें ॥ २ ॥
छुअत टूट रघुपतिहु न दोसू । मुनि बिनु काज करिअ कत रोसू ॥ ३ ॥

caupāī.

lakhana kahā haṁsi hamarēm jānā. sunahu dēva saba dhanuṣa samānā. 1.
kā chati lābhu jūna dhanu tōrēm. dēkhā rāma nayana kē bhōrēm. 2.
chu'ata ṭūṭa raghupatihu na dōsū. muni binu kāja kari'a kata rōsū. 3.

Laxman smiled wryly and retorted—‘Oh respected Lord (“dēva”)! In my opinion all the bows are alike. (1)

What is lost or what harm is done, and likewise what gain is made or honoured acquired by breaking an already worn-out, old, rusty and decrepit bow? So, why would Lord Ram break the bow intentionally?

The matter of fact is that when Lord Ram saw it, he just wanted to examine it closely by turning it sideways on its stand and lifting it in his hands, and he had no intention whatsoever to break it. (2)

But unfortunately this bow crumbled as soon as Raghupati (the Lord of the Raghu dynasty) touched it (because it was extremely fragile and highly rusted due to its old age and long storage without use, resulting in its losing its tensile strength and substance). [That is, the fact that the bow broke during its examination by Lord Ram was no fault of the Lord for the bow was already fragile and past its life span, and it simply gave in when turned on its side as is the wont of old and worn-out things that have remained untouched and uncared for a long time and had outlived their life span. No one gets fame by breaking old things, and so why would Lord Ram try such a stupid thing as to expect getting fame by breaking an old and rusty bow? Actually it would give him a bad name that he caused harm to an antiquity; and no one would like to be ticked off for this act.]

Oh sage, say then, what is the fault of Lord Ram, and therefore you are unnecessarily getting angry and worked-up for no reason or rhyme. [You must be realistic and try to understand the position. Lord Ram had no intention of either showing disrespect to Lord Shiva or the bow; perish such thoughts if you have any. And neither did the Lord wish to break the bow and attempt to get any fame for doing so as no one honours a person for breaking old things; rather it only invites scorn and infamy. So, oh wise and learned sage, think over the matter with a cool head and overcome your anger which is misplaced and out of proportion to the actual event. You know sage: by behaving the way you are behaving, it is not Lord Ram who gets a bad name but it is you who invite infamy and scorn and ridicule upon yourself.]’ (3)

[Note—Laxman has jumped to the defence of Lord Ram and puts forth the argument that the bow had already decayed; it was very rusty as well as crumbly because it was very old and had been kept in storage without use, resulting in it losing its tensile strength and material substance which had undergone severe decay. In this situation, anyone who would have touched it even for the purpose of routine cleaning would have caused some damage to it, such as a fracture to its frame. But it does not mean that the cleaner had any intent of either insulting the bow or purposely breaking it.

Lord Ram, says Laxman, went to examine it like other kings and princes, and that too only when their Guru sage Vishwamitra had ordered him to do so. The Guru perhaps wanted Lord Ram to have a look at this unique bow which was a novelty of sorts because thousands of kings and princes had gathered there just for the sake of this single bow, so there must surely be some mystery about it. And when one sees anything that is unique and magical, something that is a rarity and has an antique value, it is normal for him to go and see it. When one examines something rare and curious, he will first see it from all angles, then touch it to have a feeling of it, and then softly turn it sideways or lift it slightly to have a better understanding and feel of it. The examiner has no intention at all of harming the item on display, but if that thing inadvertently breaks while being examined then the person who was examining it must not be held guilty of willful and premeditated damage.

Laxman argues that the same thing has happened in this case also. Lord Ram had no intention of willfully breaking the bow to cause any insult to Shiva; it is unthinkable for him to even imagine it. The bow crumbled because it was already decayed and fragile. So there was no ground for Parashuram to become so angry, for Lord Ram does not get any honour for breaking something that was already rusty and fragile. After all, there is no valour and bravery in breaking an old bow, isn't it? The sage must understand that one cannot expect his well-being and good name by getting angry without a justified reason and at trifles—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 173.

Now, given that the damage has been done, merely shouting and creating a rucous or throwing tantrums won't rectify it; anger is no solution. If the sage has so great affection for the bow then they must all sit together to find out a remedy—to investigate how this bow can be repaired and restored to its former glory. Laxman suggests exactly this a little later to the angry Parashuram in an attempt to calm him down—that it would be better to call some expert bow-smith and get the bow repaired instead of wasting time and energy on anger—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 278.

It will be noted that each time Laxman had spoken to sage Parashuram, he had done so with a smile on his face. Now, this implies two things—one, that Laxman wanted to convey the message that he is not scared of sage Parashuram like all other kings, and two, that he wanted to be as polite and humble as he could be because smile indicates a friendly, a positive attitude and surely not a hostile one.

Meanwhile, Lord Ram got the hint from Laxman, and when his turn came to speak to Parashuram he too had offered the same excuse—that the bow broke on its own as it was very old and decayed. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 283.]

बोले चितड़ परसु की ओरा । रे सठ सुनेहि सुभाउ न मोरा ॥ ४ ॥

बालकु बोलि बधउँ नहिं तोही । केवल मुनि जड़ जानहि मोही ॥ ५ ॥

bōlē cita'i parasu kī ōrā. rē saṭha sunēhi subhā'u na mōrā. 4.
bālaku bōli badha'um' nahiṁ tōhī. kēvala muni jaṛa jānahi mōhī. 5.

[Laxman's out-of-turn bold replies and smiles were taken as an affront by sage Parashuram because he was not accustomed to such behaviour. Whenever the sage talked with or confronted kings and princes, they had always stood before him with a bowed head and folded hands, agreeing to whatever he said, but never ever gathering courage to reply him back or argue with him. So the sage regarded Laxman's behaviour as highly objectionable, and each statement of Laxman added fuel to the fire of anger of the sage.]

Sage Parashuram glanced at his battle-axe (in a hint that Laxman be warned of it) and retorted menacingly to Laxman—‘Oh you stupid and dull-witted boy; have you not heard of my nature and temperament (i.e. about my temper, and zero tolerance to bad behaviour and impertinence)? (4)

I am not killing you (and chopping-off your head with me blood-thirsty battle-axe) because you are merely a child (and killing a child would be sin)<sup>1</sup>. In your utter ignorance you think that I am merely a run-of-mill ordinary hermit (because had you known of my glories, my exploits, my famous deeds and achievements, you wouldn't have dared to speak with me the way you are doing at present)<sup>2</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To kill a child or a very young boy (“Baalak”) is a grave sin—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 167. The context here is mother Kaushalya comforting Bharat who was gravely grieving at the death of his father king Dasrath and for Lord Ram, Laxman and Sita going to exile in the forest. Bharat told her that he considers himself a great sinner because he had been, unwittingly and without his knowledge though, the cause of both these unfortunate incidents. It was then that Kaushalya lists some great sins that are unpardonable and lamentable, and ‘the killing of a child’ is one such great sin.

Remember: Both Lord Ram and Laxman are of a tender age, and this fact has been reiterated elsewhere also. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 256 where the mother of Sita also calls Lord Ram a ‘Baalak’, a young boy of an immature age.

Earlier, Sita's father had also called the two brothers ‘Baalak’ when he had first seen them while welcoming sage Vishwamitra to Janakpur. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precede Doha no. 216.

<sup>2</sup>Now we shall read below how sage Parashuram boasts about himself. Boasting and haughtiness are definitely not good virtues, and the lesson we derive from Parashuram's episode is that one must not be boastful and haughty because one fine day all our ego and pretensions would bite the dust in a very humiliating way like Parashuram's.

Later on in this epic story we will read that when Angad was sent by Lord Ram to the court of the demon king Ravana in an attempt to make truce and avoid war, Ravana had also boasted haughtily. At the end Ravana had to bite a humble pie when he was humiliated in full court by Angad who challenged him to move his foot from the ground to prove that he is indeed as strong and powerful as he claims himself to be. Ravana had failed to move Angad's foot even a fraction of an inch just like this bow which could not be moved an inch by the boastful and haughty kings. This episode of Angad and Ravana is narrated in great detail in Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 17—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 35. {Refer especially to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 34—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 35.}

Sage Parashuram thought that Laxman thinks that being a hermit and sage he (Parashuram) won't harm him. So the sage warns Laxman to be careful because aside of being a sage and hermit he was an invincible warrior too. Laxman should not take him for granted; Laxman should not play fools with him anymore.]

बाल ब्रह्मचारी अति कोही । बिस्व बिदित छत्रियकुल द्रोही ॥ ६ ॥
 भुजबल भूमि भूप बिनु कीन्ही । बिपुल बार महिदेवन्ह दीन्ही ॥ ७ ॥ सहसबाहु भुज छेदनिहारा । परसु बिलोकु महीपकुमारा ॥ ८ ॥

bāla brahmacārī ati kōhī. bisva bidita chatriyakula drōhī. 6.
 bhujabala bhūmi bhūpa binu kīnhī. bipula bāra mahidēvanha dīnhī. 7.
 sahasabāhu bhuja chēdanihārā. parasu bilōku mahīpakumārā. 8.

[Sage Parashuram now boastfully describes his own glories and achievements.]

I am a 'Baal Brahmachari', a celibate since birth, and am renowned for my anger (temper). It is known by the whole world that I am inimical to the Kshatriya<sup>1</sup> (warrior) race. (6)

On the strength of my arms I had eliminated all the Kshatriya kings from the surface of the earth repeatedly, and had each time given the land to the Brahmins. (7)

Oh son of a king (mahīpakumārā: "Oh prince")! Look here at this battle-axe which had chopped-off the arms and head of my enemy Sahastrabaahu<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The Hindu society has been divided into four sections or classes or segments by ancient sages for the sake of convenience and proper regulation of the huge society. It helped in judicious distribution of work to be done, to regulate the functioning of the society by delegation of authority and clearly specifying the jobs each section is supposed to do to maintain order and system in the world, to prevent overlapping of functions and avoid anarchy and chaos. This system helped in judicious regulation of the working of the society as a whole because each individual member of any given Varna knew what is expected of him. It helped in proper distribution of work that had to be done for day-to-day survival, without any duplicity and tussle.

These four sections are— (a) Brahmins*—the learned and teaching class; a wise one well-versed in the knowledge of the ultimate Truth about the supernatural Being called Brahm. They also presided over religious functions as priests, because these functions were central to life in the Vedic period; (b) Kshatriyas—they were the warrior, fighting, kingly class. They were assigned the job of giving protection to the society, dispensing justice and maintaining general law and order. (c) Vaishyas—they were the trading and farming class responsible for commerce and wealth generation. They provided for the necessities for a comfortable life. And finally (d) the Shudras—the service class of people whose main function was to free the other three classes from the humdrums of daily chores and concentrate their energies to the particular jobs assigned to those classes to which they belonged.

In ancient Indian tradition, the kings and the ruling class belonged to the caste called 'Kshatriya', and their main job/vocation was giving protection and providing sustenance to their subjects belonging to the other three castes. To do this, they had to wage wars—some in defense and some in aggression because they wanted to expand their area of influence. But wars nevertheless involved bloodshed which any peace loving soul of Satwic tendency would abhor. So a king could be Satwic by temperament but Rajsic by occupation and compulsion. Those who were Satwic were prescribed the non-violent method of worship and sacrifices to Goddess Durga during peace times as described in Devipurana Mahabharat, Canto 46, verse nos. 15-17½, while those of Rajsic bearings were to do worship requiring animal sacrifices as described in verse nos. 17-21, especially in preparation for and during wars. Even today it is observed that the army is non-vegetarian in its food habits because the soldiers cannot kill their enemies in battle—as is required of them because of their vocation as a soldier—if they avoid killing and instead show mercy and compassion on their enemies. Perhaps this is the reason why meat-eating is never looked down in army; in fact, it is a normal diet amongst the Kshatriya class. Though mercy and compassion are indeed supremely good qualities, they are not meant for the battlefield unless the enemy surrenders and relents. The world would have been a 'heaven-on-earth' if this quality prevailed in the battlefield! However, since Sri Ram was at war with a vicious, unforgiving, cruel and formidable enemy (Ravana), and a lot was at stake (e.g. the very existence of the world and its peace), and it was a no-holds-barred, fierce and uncompromising war, the second category of worship—animal sacrifice symbolising the death of the enemy—was prescribed for him by the Goddess. And this was precisely what Brahma and other Gods did as is evident in verse nos. 33.

Yajur Veda 31st Chapter, 11th Mantra says that Brahmins are the mouth of society, the Kshatriyas are its arms, Vaishyas are its stomach or abdomen, and Shudras are its legs. The body is regarded as a symbol of the society. As is obvious in this analogy, all these four units of the body must function properly and in close cooperation with each other in order that the body can survive and live comfortably and carry on with its assigned duties in an orderly fashion. The mouth is important because it is the medium by which the body takes food and speaks; the arms procure food and give protection to the body against enemies; the stomach digests food and supplies the whole body with the energy needed by it; the abdomen holds all the internal organs; and the legs carry the body wherever it wants to go such as the place where food is available. Since food is the basis necessity of life, this instance is cited here. And the logic can be extended to everything else. Each component of the society must work properly in order that the whole society survives; each component is as vital as the other; each has its own importance in the bigger picture.

*The salient features of Brahmins are the following—they should possess these noble qualities—(1) 'Riju'-be expert in the Rig and the Yajur Vedas, (2) 'Tapa'-should be involved in doing penances, observing austerities and enduring sufferings for the welfare of the soul and the society, (3) 'Santosh'-be contented and satisfied, (4) 'Kshamaa'-to be forgiving and tolerant, (5) 'Sheel'-to have such virtues as good character, dignity, decorum and virtuousness, (6) 'Jitendriya'-to have self control over the sense organs, (7) 'Data'-to be a giver, one who sacrifices his own interests for the benefit of others, (8) 'Gyani'-one who is well learned, wise, enlightened and erudite, (9) 'Dayaalu'-to be merciful and compassionate. [Shatpath Brahman.]

This word 'Brahmin' is too often misunderstood and misinterpreted to mean a particular member of the society who is supposed to be given respect, no matter what his moral and educational standard is. The real intention is not that even a corrupt, unwise, morally depraved and foolish person should be honoured just because he is born a 'Brahmin'. The intention of the scriptures is never this. In ancient times this was the class of people who were designated to study the scriptures and act as moral and practical guide to the rest of the society. This was envisioned by our ancestors to help regulate the functioning of the society in an orderly manner by dividing the entire working into four clear segments and delineating each segment with a list of duties its members were supposed to do. This prevented clash and duplicity of work, as each of the four classes knew what it is supposed to do. This in effect created a hierarchy in the society, with the learned ones who were known as the 'Brahmins' occupying the upper rung just like a patriarch of a large extended family who oversees the working and welfare of the entire family. A patriarch is an old man, and has the backing of years of experience behind him. Obviously he is the most competent man to give sane and rationale advice to the younger generation. This exactly was the role of the Brahmin.

Even in the modern world, a child is taught to give respect to his elders; its part of his moral education. Hence, 'paying respects to Brahmins' should be understood in the correct perspective.

<sup>2</sup>The story of sage Parashuram killing kings and the thousand-armed Sahastrabaahu has been narrated above as a note appended to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 268 of this chapter known as Baal Kand of Ram Charit Manas.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 4; (ii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 12; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 254.

By and by, the Kshatriya class had become very haughty and arrogant because all physical powers and military strength were vested in it. The king's treasury was supposed to a common pool where the society could keep its wealth that it generates by toil, and the king was merely its custodian. But as time passed, the kings began to treat this treasury as their personal property, and while they rolled in luxury the peasant class, the working class that toiled day in and day out to generate this wealth hadn't a square meal to dump in their empty tummies and a roof to cover them against the vagaries of cruel Nature. Though the powers and wealth of the Kshatriya class were meant for the welfare of the society as a whole, more often than not these elements went to the head of kings, making them arrogant, haughty, exploitative and insensitive towards others.

In this context, the elimination of such wild kings belonging to the Kshatriya Varna who had deviated from their duties and moral responsibilities that were ordained by ancient sages and seers became obligatory for the Supreme Lord of the world as the Lord was the Father of all, and he could not bear with one of his offsprings making others suffer because of his own pervert behaviour and selfishness. Hence, the Lord assumed the form of sage Parashuram to teach a lesson to such wicked kings who had fallen from their paths.

Killing such Kshatriya kings and restoring the earth to Brahmins should be viewed in this context; it has a great symbolic meaning. Whenever evil tendencies and negativity rises in this world, be it in the guise of demons or kings, the Lord comes down to set the house in order. This is the reason why sage Parashuram is regarded as one of the many incarnations of Lord Vishnu, the Supreme Lord of the world.

The logical spin-off of this is that Lord Ram and sage Parashuram are both the same Lord in different roles. What Lord Ram did for the welfare of sages and the humble creatures of the world by killing their tormentor demons led by Ravana of Lanka, sage Parashuram did the same thing by killing arrogant and wicked Kshatriya kings and handing over the world to pious and holy men known as Brahmins.

Going further on the issue we deduce that this is the precise reason why Laxman was not afraid of Parashuram because he, Laxman, being an incarnation of Seshnath, the legendary serpent on whose coiled body Lord Vishnu reclines in the celestial ocean of milk known as Kshir Sagar, knew the real identity of the sage—that he was a manifestation of his beloved Lord Vishnu just like Lord Ram, his brother. Laxman knew that sage Prashuram cannot harm him because Lord Vishnu loves Seshnath. It is only due to the gross body that Parashuram has that he has forgotten his real identity and who Ram and Laxman were. We shall read a little later on in this narration that finally the sage has realized the true identity of Lord Ram, and then he had bowed before him, asked for forgiveness and went to the mountains for doing penance. Refer: Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 284—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 285.]

दो०. मातु पितहि जनि सोचबस करसि महीसकिसोर ।
गर्भन्ह के अर्भक दलन परसु मोर अति घोर ॥ २७२ ॥

dōhā.

mātu pitahi jani sōcabasa karasi mahīsakisōra.
garbhanha kē arbhaka dalana parasu mōra ati ghōra. 272.

Oh you young son of a king! Don't do anything that would put your mother and father to grief. My battle-axe is very fierce and merciless; it can kill even an unborn offspring (i.e. the embryo) in its mother's womb. (Doha no. 272)

[Note—Just imagine the horrible and most disgusting way Parashuram is threatening Laxman without realising that he is publicly acknowledging that he is guilty of such a heinous crime as destroying a mature embryo, which obviously is a grave crime and sin.

Parashuram implies that he has spared Laxman for two reasons—one, that he is still a child (Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 272), and two, that he does not want to be accused of giving unwarranted sorrows to a great king of the Raghu dynasty, king Dasrath, by killing Laxman as Dasrath had not committed any offense and would surely be extremely sorrowful when he hears of his son's death because he loves him very much.

This Doha tells us how even an exalted person of the stature of a sage and a hermit would lose his high stature and neutralise all the good effects of his meritorious deeds when he commits heinous crimes out of his arrogance and haughtiness or in a fit of anger as was in the case of sage Parashuram. Born in a sage's Brahmin family and having done severe Tapa (penances and austerities), he was perfectly eligible to occupy a high spiritual stature in the society of great sages, hermits and ascetics. But instead of acquiring any good fame and spiritual credit in his life, he has gone down in history as 'a merciless killer of kings and unborn children (while they are still in their mother's wombs in the form of an embryo)', an achievement that would put even the greatest of sinners to shame, and definitely not something to be proud of. In fact, the horrible deeds of Parashuram had cast a long dark shadow on the otherwise exalted lineage of sages tracing their origin to the great sage Bhrigu.

Now, if we closely examine what sage Parashuram says in this Doha no. 272, that his axe kills unborn children in their mother's wombs, and compare it with what he says earlier in Chaupai no. 5 that precedes this Doha no. 272 where he says that he is sparing Laxman because he is merely an immature boy, a child ("Baalak"), there appears to be a contradiction—on the one hand he says that he does not spare even an unborn child, and then he says that he is sparing Laxman because he is only a child or an immature boy. How do we reconcile these two statements of Parashuram?

Well, the deduction is clear—he did not actually kill the embryo in the womb because that would require the mother to be killed first. Killing an innocent and helpless woman is more severe a crime than killing a male warrior in battle. What Parashuram actually meant was that his name created such a terror in the hearts of women-folk that as soon as a pregnant woman heard his name or a queen heard that her husband, the king, had to face Parashuram's wrath, she would abort automatically. He singled out the battle-axe for this (dis)honour because he used to kill his enemies with it by chopping off their heads. So, whenever a pregnant woman heard that sage Parashuram has arrived waving his battle-axe, she was so terrified and horrified that she aborted immediately!

This conclusion is not merely a wild guess but a fact because sage Parashuram has himself endorsed it a little later in Doha no. 279 herein below.]

चौ०. बिहसि लखनु बोले मृदु बानी । अहो मुनीसु महा भटमानी ॥ १ ॥

पुनि पुनि मोहि देखाव कुठारू । चहत उड़ावन फूँकि पहारू ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

bihasi lakhanu bōlē mṛdu bānī. ahō munīsu mahā bhaṭamānī. 1.

puni puni mōhi dēkhāva kuṭhārū. cahata uṛāvana phūm̐ki pahārū. 2.

Laxman smiled once again in a sarcastic manner and said to sage Parashuram—‘Oh sage! You regard (think) yourself as some great warrior [1], and are repeatedly showing me your axe as if you want to threaten me with it. It is like attempting to blow a huge mountain away by puffing breath at it [2]. (1-2)

[Note—Laxman essentially tells sage Parashuram that finally the latter has met his match. He tells the angry sage that he is very boastful, haughty and pretentious when he keeps on repeating that he is renowned for killing kings with his battle-axe. May be he is correct, but this time round the story is different. He has met his match in Laxman, and threatening him into submission with his battle-axe is like a ridiculously mad attempt to make the mountain move by blowing breath towards it.

Laxman taunts Parashuram when he addresses him as a “Maha Bhat”, meaning a great warrior. He means that sages are famed for their politeness, their loving, caring and friendly attitude, as well as for their peaceful and calm demeanours, and never for anger, vengeance, revenge and blood-shed. Further, a sage is never expected to be haughty and proud of his achievements as Parashuram is—“Bhat-Maani”, literally meaning ‘a proud warrior’. These negative characters are not behaving of a great sage. And if this is the case, then Parashuram is merely a warrior and not a sage, and therefore Laxman is within his rights to face him with a tit-for-tat reaction like any brave warrior would face his adversary.

And to top it all, isn't sage Parashuram ashamed of himself for boasting of being a slayer of infants and even un-borns; is this some great thing for which he is so proud? Shame to him for even uttering such a reprehensible thing as killing of infants and aborting of embryos! Has he completely lost his senses and committed his wits to demons to be so naïve as to admit of this horrendous crime and atrocity in public, and then have the temerity and audacity to claim fame for such a sinful and vile act?

Laxman implies that if Parashuram behaves like a sage and a hermit in accordance with his attire and lineage, then he can expect due respect from him, but if he boasts to be a warrior then Laxman would face him like a warrior faces his opponent; there's nothing wrong in it. This fact is also endorsed by Lord Ram in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from line no. 2 of Doha no. 281—till Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 282.

Another reason for Laxman smiling sarcastically at Parashuram and treating him with contempt is that the former claims to be a great warrior and sage while at the same time openly claiming to be a killer of unborn children who are still in their mother's womb, a sign of an extremely cruel and sinful person who is no less than a demon. How can such a pervert man expect anyone to show respect to him? Refer: Ram Charit Manas—(i) Baal Kand, line no. 2 of Doha no. 272, and (ii) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 167.

So, how can such a sinful man who is guilty of voluntarily killing embryos in mothers' wombs call himself a 'warrior'? Rather, such a person is a taint on the warrior race, and he deserves condemnation instead of honour.

Laxman said that Parashuram attempts to brow-beat him by showing his battle-axe 'repeatedly'. Well, till this point of time, Parashuram has indeed invoked his battle-axe three times in quick succession as follows—Chaupai line nos. 4 and 8 that precede Doha no. 272, and line no. 2 of Doha no. 272 itself.]

इहाँ कुङ्कुड़बतिया कोउ नाही । जे तरजनी देखि मरि जाहीं ॥ ३ ॥
देखि कुठारु सरासन बाना । मैं कछु कहा सहित अभिमाना ॥ ४ ॥

ihām̃ kumharabatiyā kō'u nāhīm̃. jē tarajanī dēkhi mari jāhīm̃. 3.
dēkhi kuṭhāru sarāsana bānā. mair̃ kachu kahā sahita abhimānā. 4.

Here there is no one who is like a pumpkin-in-the-bud which withers away or collapses as soon as an index finger is raised against it<sup>1</sup>.

[To wit, I (Laxman) am not like the super-sensitive mimosa plant that would shrivel up as soon as someone touches it. Don't think that I am scared of you and moved by your boasts, which however do not show you in good light in the first place.]<sup>2</sup> (3)

I (Laxman) have said some words of pride to show you my right to protect my dignity and self-respect after seeing your external features that bears an axe, a bow and an arrow.

[To wit, since you appear to be a warrior by your external features because you bear arms such as an axe, a bow and arrows, and have openly called yourself a 'brave warrior', I must stand up against your angry boasts and insulting behaviour towards me in order to protect my dignity and self-respect as no warrior worth his salt would ever tolerate in a cowardly manner such insults upon his self-respect as you are inflicting upon me in an open court. This is why I have replied to you in a tit-for-tat manner, though I do not intend to insult you in any manner whatsoever.]<sup>3</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This is a figure of speech to mean someone who is extremely sensitive by nature or is afraid of even harmless things.

<sup>2</sup>Laxman refers to the other kings in the assembly who became terrified when they saw sage Parashuram. He means that Parashuram should not treat Laxman in the same way that he had treated these impotent kings who fell at his feet and shivered at the sight of the axe that he held. Parashuram must remember that he is facing a warrior of his own match, and not a coward prince. So, Parashuram must not expect Laxman to be brow-beaten by his boisterous mannerisms.

<sup>3</sup>Refer: Lord Ram's explanation of Laxman's behaviour towards Parashuram in Baal Kand, line no. 2 of Doha no. 281, and Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 282. Here, Lord Ram has explained that it was because of Parashuram's external features that resembled that of some warrior that Laxman had stood up to reply sternly to him as he got the impression that Parashuram was some fighter who has come to create a hurdle in the marriage ceremony and was itching for a fight.

Being a warrior prince himself, it was natural for Laxman not to be cowed down by threats and wielding of weapons; only a coward would be afraid of such menacing attitude of his opponent.

Therefore, Laxman was not at fault for replying Parashuram sternly in the same language that the sage had used.]

भृगुसुत समुझि जनेउ बिलोकी । जो कछु कहहु सहउँ रिस रोकी ॥ ५ ॥
सुर महिसुर हरिजन अरु गाई । हमरें कुल इन्ह पर न सुराई ॥ ६ ॥ bhṛgusuta samujhi janē'u bilōkī. jō kachu kahahu saha'um̐ risa rōkī. 5.

sura mahisura harijana aru gā'ī. hamarēm̐ kula inha para na surā'ī. 6.

I (Laxman) tolerate whatever you say by somehow suppressing my anger and controlling myself (i.e. resisting the urge to challenge you for a duel to prove who is stronger and a real warrior) because I understand you to be a son of the exalted lineage of sage Bhrigu<sup>1</sup>, and also because you wear a sacred thread (showing clearly that you are a Brahmin)<sup>2</sup>. (5)

Indeed, my family and the race (i.e. the dynasty of Kshatriya kings) to which I belong do not find honour in showing lordship (i.e. pretend to be senior to; showing valour and strength) over 'Surs' (the 'gods who live in heaven'), 'Mahisurs' (the Brahmins; literally, the 'gods who live on earth'), 'Harijans' (devotees of Lord Hari, or Lord Vishnu), and 'Gaai' (cows)<sup>3</sup>.

[Since you are a Brahmin, I do not want to do anything that would violate this self-imposed restraint that our family and our forefathers have been practicing since ancient times. We do not treat ourselves senior to gods, Brahmins, devotees of Lord Hari, and the holy cows; all of them are revered by us.

So, I do not want to go down in history with an ignominious tag as being the one who had insulted and fought with a Brahmin sage belonging to the exalted race of sage Bhrigu, notwithstanding your angry, rude, vengeful, ruckus, haughty and bellicose behaviour which is completely at odds with the traditional way a sage should talk, behave and act.

I do not want to repeat the mistake you are committing by giving your family and race a bad name by speaking, behaving and acting in the way you are doing.] (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 268; (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 269.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 268.

<sup>3</sup>Laxman means to say that Parashuram is showing him his battle-axe repeatedly to frighten him, to threaten him, but Laxman is resisting from drawing his own arms, which is the arrow and the bow he holds, and challenging Parashuram for a duel because the latter wears a sacred thread, and this means he is a Brahmin. To fight with a Brahmin and humiliate him by defeating him in full public view, which Laxman was sure to do if the two actually fought with each other into a duel, is a great sin.

In Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 294, sage Vasistha, the royal priest of Ayodhya, praises king Dasrath, the father of Laxman, by saying that he has always served his Guru (moral preceptor and teacher), Bipra (Brahmins), Dhenu (cows), and Surs (gods). So Laxman was obliged to follow the tradition of his family by giving due respect to a Brahmin, which in this case was sage Parashuram.

Laxman is exercising self-restraint because of this problem, but Parashuram thinks that Laxman is merely a boy and cannot compare himself with the mighty warrior that Parashuram considers himself to be. This is why Laxman retorts with the stern words as spoken in these verses to warn Parashuram that he should not treat Laxman's restraint as a sign of submission or cowardice but as a sign of self-imposed restriction to uphold age-old tradition that one should not fight and humiliate a Brahmin under any circumstance as it would be a grave sin. Refer Chaupai line no. 7 herein below.]

बधैं पापु अपकीरति हारैं । मारतहूँ पा परिअ तुझारैं ॥ ७ ॥

कोटि कुलिस सम बचनु तुझारा । व्यर्थ धरहु धनु बान कुठारा ॥ ८ ॥ badhēm pāpu apakīrati hārēm. māratahūṁ pā pari'a tumhārēm. 7.

kōṭi kulisa sama bacanu tumhārā. byartha dharahu dhanu bāna kuṭhārā. 8.

Killing you, a Brahmin, in a battle would be a grave sin, and to lose in the battle (willingly, just to show respect to you as a Brahmin) would bring infamy and humiliation to me. [Therefore, it is not wise for me to challenge you for a duel. But don't take it as my weakness or my running away from the challenge. I am not going to repeat the sin you have committed by letting blood at the fall of a hat and for reason that is most hilarious and untenable!]

Hence, it is prudent for me to pay respect to you by falling at your feet even if you beat me. [You are a sage and an elderly man. I have been taught to show great respect to such people irrespective of the situation and the provocation. So I prefer to humbly submit before you instead of confronting you.]<sup>1</sup> (7)

[Now, in order to make it clear to Parashuram that what Laxman has just said about ‘falling at the former’s feet’ does not mean that he is afraid of him, Laxman taunts him further.]

Your (Parashuram’s) words are as sharp and hard to bear with as the ‘Kulis’. [The Kulis is also known as the ‘Vajra’ which is the weapon of Indra, the king of gods. It is said to be made of the hardest material in existence and is exceptionally sharp like a razor, striking hard and creating terror all around. Laxman means that the words of Parashuram are very sharp, caustic and irritating. The sage does not know how to speak politely in a civil manner, and speaks as if acid is being poured on the listener.]

Therefore, it is useless for you to hold a bow, an arrow and a battle-axe (because their purpose of subduing anyone who dares oppose you, and forcing him to submit himself before you is very well served by your words alone). [To wit, you need not trouble yourself by carrying the weight of a bow, arrows and a heavy axe, because when you get angry at someone and scold him, your scorching words are sufficient to terrorise him and make him faint, and they have the same, if not more, horrifying effect upon the person concerned as the sight of the weapons you carry.]<sup>2</sup> (8)

Note—<sup>1</sup>This verse concludes what Laxman has said in the previous verse nos. 5-6 above. He makes it clear here why he is tolerating all the nonsense that sage Parashuram is babbling and the haughty way he is behaving—because he (Laxman) does not want to commit the sin of hitting back at a Brahmin and hurting him, nor does he want to invite humiliation for himself by first challenging Parashuram for a duel and then being forced to step back to avoid hurting a Brahmin for the fear of committing a great sin, and by inference being forced to accept defeat in spite of the fact that he is perfectly able to show Parashuram the dust in a duel.

Laxman was correct to say that even if sage Parashuram, being a Brahmin, hits him, it is wiser for Laxman to bow before the sage and not hit him back because it is an established principle that one should never hurt a Brahmin even if the latter becomes hostile and scolds a person, because a Brahmin is always to be shown respect—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 34.

Even Lord Vishnu had politely borne with the insult when sage Bhrigu had once kicked the Lord on his chest out of anger. Well, Laxman knew of this incident and hence he says that even if Parashuram, a descendent of Bhrigu, hits him, he would still bow before the feet of Parashuram simply because he is a Brahmin and belongs to the family of Bhrigu, and not because Laxman is afraid of him and has surrendered before him to avoid being injured or killed.

<sup>2</sup>Remember: Brahmins who did Tapa (penances and austerities) possessed great mystical powers. When they got annoyed with anyone they would merely ‘curse’ him, and their curse had the potential of destroying the offender like any other powerful weapon.

Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 13-14 that precede Doha no. 109. Here it is reiterated that even if anyone manages to escape punishment in the form of death by Indra's weapon known as Kulis (Vajra) and Kaal's (god of death's) weapon known as Kaal-danda, he cannot escape being burnt to death by the scorching effects of the fire of wrath (curse) of a Brahmin.

So, Laxman taunts Parashuram by saying that since he is a Brahmin, why does he not destroy his opponents by merely cursing them instead of getting his hand bloodied by killing them physically with such weapons as a bow and an arrow or a battle-axe that would look more suitable in the hands of a Kshatriya king than in the hands of a Brahmin. Parashuram is expert in using caustic words that can scorch a person as if hot liquid has been poured over him. And therefore he can simply give effect to his wrath by cursing his opponent instead of wasting his energy by waging a physical battle against him and using these difficult and heavy weapons.

As is to be expected, these words of Laxman fanned Parashuram's anger further instead of dousing it. This will be clear in Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that follow Doha no. 273 herein below.]

दो०. जो बिलोकि अनुचित कहेउँ छमहु महामुनि धीर । सुनि सरोष भृगुबंसमनि बोले गिरा गभीर ॥ २७३ ॥

dōhā.

jō bilōki anucita kahē'um' chamahu mahāmuni dhīra.
suni sarōṣa bhr̥gubānsamani bōlē girā gabhīra. 273.

I have said unwarranted words when I saw them (i.e. when I saw your weapons, the axe, the bow and the arrow) (because I thought that you are some haughty warrior showing yourself off and itching for a fight). So oh great sage, have patience and forgive me.'

When 'Bhrigumani' (literally 'the gem of sage Bhrigu's family'; i.e. sage Parashuram) heard Laxman politely asking for forgiveness (after first sternly replying on his face in an insulting manner, and then taunting him about his way of speaking and holding of weapons), he became very peeved, and angrily said in a grave voice— (Doha no. 273)

[Note—Parashuram's annoyance had two prominent reasons—one, why did Laxman speak to him sternly and in an impolite manner to cause insult to him when he knew that he was a Brahmin, and two, it was the first time in his life that anyone had ever dared to speak back so boldly and fearlessly with Parashuram.

Parashuram was accustomed to people falling over their backs, heads over heels, to appease him so that he does not get angry with them. And here was Laxman, a young boy, who entered into a verbal duel with him. It was a height of impertinence and disobedience in the views of Parashuram that a Kshatriya prince should talk back to him, instead of bowing his head in submission.

After insulting Parashuram with impunity and teaching him a bitter lesson of his life for which he was not ready, Laxman now asks for forgiveness, putting the sage on a sticky ground. When an opponent begs forgiveness and even gives a reason for his earlier uncalled for behaviour of being rude, a noble warrior or a Brahmin is morally bound to excuse him and not punish him.

The reason which Laxman cites is justifiable: he says that when he saw the weapons that Parashuram held, such as the bow, the arrow and the axe, he had thought that Parashuram was a jealous warrior who has come to show off his strength in the middle of the society of kings and princes, or to create an unnecessary ruckus to divert attention upon himself and come to the limelight to establish himself and get recognition. Otherwise there was no reason for so much futile jumping and shouting just because a rusty old bow was broken.

But when Laxman realized that this person, Parashuram, whom he had mistaken to be a jealous and haughty warrior, was actually a great sage who traces his line to the exalted race of sages descending from sage Bhrigu, he immediately became polite and asked for forgiveness.

Lord Ram has endorsed Laxman when he requests sage Parashuram not to mind Laxman's words or behaviour and excuse him because he is merely a boy, had behaved in an insulting manner with the sage because he had mistaken the latter for a haughty warrior, and because it is the natural reaction of a Kshatriya prince when anyone comes and threatens him—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precedes Doha no. 282.

In this situation, if sage Parashuram does not forgive Laxman then it is he whom the world would raise its fingers against—because one of the stellar qualities of a sage and a Brahmin is 'forgiveness and tolerance'. Thus, Parashuram was in a quandary. Given to being vengeful, angry and wrathful as his fundamental nature and character, Parashuram became angrier instead of calming down and ending the bitter saga.]

चौ०. कौसिक सुनुहु मंद यहु बालकु । कुटिल कालबस निज कुल घालकु ॥ १ ॥

भानु बंस राकेस कलंकू । निपट निरंकुस अबुध असंकू ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

kausika sunahu manda yahu bālaku. kuṭila kālabasa nija kula ghālaku. 1.
bhānu bansa rākēsa kalaṅkū. nipaṭa niraṅkusa abudha asaṅkū. 2.

[Extremely peeved by Laxman's behaviour and angered at the way he rebuked sage Parashuram, the latter did not want to talk with Laxman any longer. So, he turned to sage Vishwamitra and said—]

'Listen Kuasik (another name of sage Vishwamitra). This boy is very stupid and wicked. He seems to be under the grip of the death-god known as 'Kaal' (i.e. he is courting death by instigating me), and is therefore inviting ruin for his own family by his own impertinence. [In other words, Laxman goes on instigating me (Parashuram) though I do not want to kill him as he is merely a boy. But there is a limit to my tolerance. If he provokes me further I will kill him, and then his whole family would grieve.] (1)

He is a scar on the face of the full moon representing the glory of the Solar Race (to which his father, king Dasrath and the rest of his forefathers belong). He is extremely unruly, rowdy, wild, unmanageable, boisterous and reckless. Not only that, he is foolish and dull-witted as well as ignorant of the consequences of his words, actions and behaviour. [He, Laxman, does not understand the gravity of the situation. If I lose my cool or self-control and actually carry out my threat by swinging my battle-axe at him, he would be killed instantly. He is so idiotic and haughty that he does not seem to realize this. Say, can a Kshatriya prince ever withstand the wrath and the curse of a Brahmin sage? Why is Laxman not realizing this? ] (2)

[Note—This angry outburst of sage Parashuram is in answer to Laxman's dressing-down of the former a while ago in Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 273.

Unable to cope with Laxman boldly preaching him as to how he should have behaved, sage Parashuram was so much irritated and angered with Laxman that he did not want to instigate the latter any more to provoke him to unleash another palisade of insults, which would further aggravate the situation and may force Parashuram to actually carry out his threats of killing Laxman. Further, the sage was angry also because one should not answer back at someone who is senior to him in terms of age, experience, knowledge and abilities. Laxman was yet a boy, but Parashuram was an aged sage of repute, a renowned warrior, and one who had done great Tapa (penances and austerity) as a result of which he possessed profound mystical powers. So, in effect, there was no comparison between sage Parashuram and Laxman.

This is what the angry sage means when he told Vishwamitra that this boy is stupid, ill-witted, does not know the consequences of his actions and behaviour, and is inviting ruin for his whole family. Not only would Laxman invite scorn from the world for insulting a mighty sage by speaking irreverentially with him but would also certainly invite physical harm by instigating a mighty warrior that Parashuram treated himself to be.

We find here that both Parashuram and Laxman are hot-headed. And when two such individuals meet in a confrontational situation, god can only help. But there is another spin to it—when an individual who thinks that he is superior to all others and goes around throwing his weight over all and sundry, threatening them and calling them names, suddenly meets another person of his match, the wind in the sail of the former passes away. When the first person realizes to his dismay that his boasts and threats that worked on other docile people and made them surrender to him in an abject manner won't work on this second person who matches him in every respect, the former makes a u-turn, proving that he was having his way till now simply because he hadn't met his real adversary.

In the present case we find exactly this to happen: till this day, sage Parashuram went around threatening and killing kings and princes at will, but now he is forced on a back-foot because he got the wind that if he takes one physical wrong step in his haughtiness, such as actually lifting and hitting Laxman with his axe to punish him, it would boomerang upon him and would do more harm to him than to Laxman.

So in brief, Parashuram wanted to avoid further confrontation with Laxman. Thus, he looked up and addressed sage Vishwamitra because the latter was deemed as Laxman's guardian. Remember: Parashuram has repeatedly called Laxman a "Baalak", a young boy or a child. When a child is out of control or acts irreverentially, one would naturally talk to the child's father, guardian or teacher, all three roles now vested in sage Vishwamitra, to rein in the troublesome boy who has become disobedient and has no sense of good manners. The father, guardian or the teacher is expected to exercise his influence upon the unruly boy and bring him under control. {(i)Vishwamitra as a 'father and guardian' = Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 208. (ii)Vishwamitra as a 'teacher or Guru' = Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 209 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8; Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 218; etc.}

So Parashuram sought Vishwamitra's help to keep Laxman under control because the latter was Laxman's Guru, guardian and a foster-father at present.

Another reason for Parashuram turning to sage Vishwamitra was that the latter himself being a 'sage' would understand the gravity of the situation and the deemed insult that is being caused to another sage of repute by a prince talking with the latter in a disrespectful manner as Laxman is doing at present. Parashuram thought that amongst all those present in the assembly, the only person who would empathise with him is another sage, i.e. Vishwamitra, and the latter is the only one who could prevail upon the naughty Laxman to be quiet because the latter would listen to no one else.

Parashuram's intention was to find out and punish the individual who had broken the bow, and not to enter into an unnecessary and futile verbal duel with some unknown prince who is not guilty of breaking the bow. The bow was broken by Lord Ram, and instead of being able to turn on the heat on the Lord, Parashuram was forced to dissipate his anger on Ram's brother, Laxman. It was a waste of time and energy to have a heated debate with Laxman, and so this nonsense had to be stopped so that the attention can be diverted to the actual offender, Lord Ram.

Hence, Parashuram turned towards sage Vishwamitra in the hope that the latter would instruct Laxman to be careful and keep quiet. This intention of Parashuram will be clear in the following two verses, Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that follow herein below.

But as we shall discover, sage Vishwamitra did not intervene, and Laxman would further taunt Parashuram in bitter terms.

The question arises: Why did sage Vishwamitra not intervene and pull-up Laxman for his behaviour? Well, we see that earlier also, when Laxman had sternly rebuked king Janak when the latter had declared that since no king could break the bow it is deemed that there are no strong warriors left on the surface of the earth and that Sita would have to remain unmarried, Vishwamitra had not intervened; he kept quiet. Refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 253 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8.

The probable reasons are two—(i) sage Vishwamitra was well aware of Laxman's tempestuous nature unlike Parashuram. So he did not wish to invite insult upon his own self by saying anything to Laxman while he is angry. (ii) Vishwamitra had known that the two brothers were divine personalities, i.e. Lord Vishnu and Lord Seshnath in the human form of Lord Ram and Laxman respectively. Seshnath is the legendary thousand hooded serpent who supports the earth on its hood. Seshnath hisses violently and fire is spewed out with its hiss. A serpent is by nature a vicious creature; it is extremely poisonous and dangerous when provoked. A man in his senses would always avoid any direct contact with a live poisonous snake. Laxman was, therefore, best to be left alone and avoided!]

काल कवलु होइहि छन माहीं । कहउँ पुकारि खोरि मोहि नाहीं ॥ ३ ॥

तुझ हटकहु जाँ चहु उबारा । कहि प्रतापु बलु रोषु हमारा ॥ ४ ॥

kāla kavalu hō'ihī chana māhīm. kaha'um̃ pukāri khōri mōhi nāhīm. 3.

tumha haṭākahu jaum̃ cahahu ubārā. kahi pratāpu balu rōṣu hamārā. 4.

He (Laxman) would be in the jaws of death in an instant (if he does not behave himself). I openly declare this, and hereat let no one blame me for the consequences henceforth. (3)

If you (Vishwamitra) want him to be saved from this horror, then please do something to rein him in by telling him about my glories, my valour and strength, as well as about my vicious anger (against which no one has ever survived till now).’ (4)

[Note—Refer note appended to previous verse nos. 2-3 herein above.

To wit, Parashuram requests sage Vishwamitra to advise Laxman to behave properly with a sage of Parashuram’s stature. Vishwamitra should tell Laxman about the glories of sage Parashuram, about his reputation as an invincible warrior who has not spared anyone who dared to defy him. In spite of all these warnings, if Laxman continues with his impertinence, if this irritating spat continues, then if Parashuram loses control over his anger and hits Laxman hard, then nobody should blame him for harming a boy.

Parashuram has said the same thing again a little later in Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 275 that “no one should blame him if he kills this boy (Laxman) who speaks in such a caustic and wicked manner”. So we conclude that Parashuram was angry with Laxman not because the latter had harmed the bow but because he speaks boldly and irreverentially with him, something to which Parashuram was not accustomed.]

लखन कहेउ मुनि सुजसु तुझारा । तुझहि अछत को बरनै पारा ॥ ५ ॥
अपने मुँह तुझ आपनि करनी । बार अनेक भाँति बहु बरनी ॥ ६ ॥

lakhana kahē'u muni sujasu tumhārā. tumhahi achata kō baranai pārā. 5.
apanē mumḥa tumha āpani karanī. bāra anēka bhāmṭi bahu baranī. 6.

Laxman was fearless and unrelenting as he retorted to the sage’s threats in a taunting manner—‘Oh sage, who else can laud your glories more competently and effectively than you can do yourself. (5)

Verily, you have indeed praised yourself repeatedly, recounting your glories and abilities, as well as citing your deeds and achievements in your own words in variety of ways.

[To wit, when you (Parashuram) are ready to list your achievements and heap praises on your own self, when you are blowing your own bugle and beating your own trumpet, what is the need for someone else to praise you? Well, you know about your own glories better than a third person can ever know about them. And you have already boasted about them<sup>1</sup>, so where is the need for sage Vishwamitra to tell me about them again?<sup>2</sup>] (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 272 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 4-8.

<sup>2</sup>A man who boasts about his own achievements is not regarded as honourable and respectable. He is pretentious and boastful. Such a man is more often than not an egoist, haughty and arrogant; he is full of vanity and a false sense of self-importance. None of these are noble characters, especially in a sage. That is why Laxman retorted to Parashuram in a sarcastic manner.]

नहिं संतोषु त पुनि कछु कहहू । जनि रिस रोकि दुसह दुख सहहू ॥ ७ ॥
बीरब्रती तुह धीर अछोभा । गारी देत न पावहु सोभा ॥ ८ ॥

nahim santōṣu ta puni kachu kahahū. jani risa rōki dusaha dukha sahaḥū. 7.
bīrabratī tumha dhīra achōbhā. gārī dēta na pāvahu sōbhā. 8.

If you are still not satisfied by what you have already said, then go ahead and say something more to satisfy your ego. Do not subject yourself to the agony of having to suppress your anger by not letting sufficient steam.

[To wit, you have already boasted so much about your self and have threatened to kill me. What else is left to be said? If there is still anything up in your mind, then let it out. If you suppress your anger it would torment you more, so it's better to vent your anger completely.]<sup>1</sup> (7)

You have assumed the role of a warrior, a hero who is resolute and not perturbed or disturbed by circumstances. It does not behove of you to abusive language for others.

[To wit, if you want to boast more about your achievements or marital exploits, then go ahead and enumerate them. But a brave and heroic warrior does not abuse his opponent like you have done by calling me names<sup>2</sup>.] (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 280. Here, Parashuram has accepted that his chest is getting 'burnt' (i.e. he is very irritated, peeved, angry etc., causing him a virtual heart-burn) at not being able to punish Laxman.

<sup>2</sup>Parashuram has used a number of denigrating epithets for Laxman. He has called Laxman a "Satha", broadly meaning someone who is extremely stupid, foolish, pervert, wild and wicked (Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 272); he has said that Laxman is a taint on his family, is in the jaws of death, is unruly, reckless, misbehaved and irreverent, is ignorant and unaware of the consequences of his actions and words, and that he would kill Laxman with his axe (Doha no. 271 and 272; Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 274).

In the next Doha no. 274, we shall read that Laxman gives another piece of advice to Parashuram that is more of a challenging taunt to him than a sincere advice to the sage to calm down. It further stoked the sage's anger.]

दो०. सूर समर करनी करहिं कहि न जनावहिं आपु ।
बिद्यमान रन पाइ रिपु कायर कथहिं प्रतापु ॥ २७४ ॥
dōhā.

sūra samara karanī karahim kahi na janāvahim āpu.
bidyamāna rana pā'i ripu kāyara kathahim pratāpu. 274.

A true hero and warrior is one who does valiant deeds in a battle, and not merely boast about what they had done on some previous occasion by way of blatantly advertising their past achievements.

It is a sign of cowardice to boast about one's valour and past exploits when fact to face with an opponent in a battle-field.' (Doha no. 274)

[Note—This statement of Laxman is an open challenge to Parashuram. Laxman in effect tells the sage that if he is itching for a fight then it would be better to settle scores through a duel instead of using abuses and spitting fire and brimstone in anger. If Parashuram indeed has done such great deeds as he claims to have done, such as for instance eliminating all the kings by killing them with his battle-axe, then well and good, let him use it against Laxman to show that he is merely not boasting but has some substance in him.

Parashuram had become very haughty and arrogant of late; he had forgotten that he had been able to kill haughty, selfish and wild kings because it was a divine mandate from the Supreme Lord of creation to teach them a lesson. A king who does not fulfill his role as a merciful caretaker of his subject is worthy of elimination. The fact that Parashuram had killed only such kings and not 'all' kings is borne by the fact that good kings who followed the laws of Dharma by being righteous, noble and judicious in all their actions and deeds were not harmed by Parashuram. Examples abound—we have the Raghu dynasty to which king Dasrath, the father of Lord Ram and Laxman, belonged, then there was the Nimi dynasty to which Janak belonged. Further, we have already read about 'thousands of kings who had tried to lift the bow'; they weren't harmed by him.

In other words, it is obvious that Parashuram was exaggerating his exploits when he claimed that "he had eliminated all the kings from the surface of the earth many times over and handed the earth (land) to Brahmins" (refer: Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 272) to impress the assembly of kings and terrify Laxman into submission.

Therefore, Laxman wanted to hint to Parashuram that he has caught his cunning and he is ready to face the bull and catch it by its horns, because he knows that the bull is merely boasting and does not have the guts to charge at a wall as it is well aware that striking the wall would result in breaking of its horns, instead of harming the wall.

Obviously, this infuriated sage Parashuram further. This will be clear in the forthcoming verses. Refer especially to Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 275 herein below. Now Parashuram could not find an excuse for his inability to face Laxman (or even Lord Ram for that matter though the Lord was very civil and polite with him) by saying that he has refrained from killing Laxman because he is a mere boy (a "Baalak")—refer: Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 272.

This episode of Parashuram being subjected to such public admonishment and rebuke has a subtle lesson: it is that if a person becomes unduly proud and haughty, if he thinks that he is the one who did this and that, if he is boastful of his achievements unmindful of the spiritual philosophy that it is the Lord God who controls every thing in this world and it is the Lord God who has made success possible for him, and that no one is superior to him in this creation, then one fine day he will meet his match and forced to bite the dust. The Supreme Lord of creation does not tolerate such negative attitudes, especially in a sage who is supposed to exhibit qualities just the opposite of what Parashuram had shown.

Then we must remember that Lord Ram, who is none else but the Supreme Lord himself in a human form, is present personally at the site where Parashuram is being given a dressing down. This means that the Lord, the Emperor of this creation, decided to teach Parashuram some lessons in his presence. As it would eventually turn out, Parashuram realised this fact, and would beg forgiveness from the Lord for whatever he had said and done, and then bow before the Lord and go to the forest to do Tapa (penances to atone for sins). {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 284—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 285.}

Incidentally, we shall also read a little later that Parashuram had conceded that he is feeling powerless against Laxman. He says “I don’t know what has happened that I am unable to raise my arm and my battle-axe against Laxman”—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 280.]

चौ०. तुह तौ कालु हाँक जनु लावा । बार बार मोहि लागि बोलावा ॥ १ ॥

सुनत लखन के बचन कठोरा । परसु सुधारि धरेउ कर घोरा ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

tumha tau kālu hāmka janu lāvā. bāra bāra mōhi lagi bōlāvā. 1.

sunata lakhana kē bacana kaṭhōrā. parasu sudhāri dharē’u kara ghōrā. 2.

[Laxman continued—] ‘It appears that you (Parashuram) have ‘Kaal’ (the god of death) at your beck and call, and are repeatedly summoning him for my sake (in order to punish me and vent your anger at me).<sup>1</sup> (1)

Hearing these highly scorching bold and harsh words of rebuke from Laxman, Parashuram was infuriated like a raging fire. He took the battle-axe in one of his hands and moved the other hand over it to find a proper place to grip it firmly, and then held it menacingly, with its sharp end pointing at Laxman<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Parashuram has indeed threatened to kill Laxman repeatedly, five times to be precise, till this point of time—refer: Baal Kand, (i) Doha nos. 271 and 272; (ii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 272; and (iii) Chaupai line nos. 1 and 3 that precede Doha no. 274.

So, Laxman scorns at and taunts the angry Parashuram that he has already threatened to kill him (Laxman) five times as if Laxman’s death, his destiny, is in the hands of Parashuram. So, the latter should either go ahead with his threats or keep quiet!

<sup>2</sup>Parashuram is so furious with indignation that he has lost sense of propriety and common sense; he forgot that a huge assembly is watching the oral duel closely, and the spotlight now seems to be on how he is being consistently humiliated by Laxman without him being able to exact any retribution inspite of all his boasts and threats in this regard. Parashuram was so mad with anger that he did not have the time to consider why, after all, Laxman is able to confront him so boldly and fearlessly, and he being unable to carry out his threats of punishing the offender.

Parashuram's mind and wisdom were so eclipsed by the dark veil of anger and indignation that came with his hurt ego that he could not think that surely there must be some real gravity in the matter and some sort of powerful backing that Laxman has to support him which has emboldened him so much so as to have the courage to rebuke the sage with complete impunity.

The sage's anger was fuelled by his inability to force Laxman to mind his tongue and desist from rebuking him further, so therefore he fretted and fumed furiously, and was so highly incensed with Laxman that he could not resist the temptation of drawing and wielding his favourite weapon, the battle-axe, waving it wildly in the air and threatening his adversary with dire consequences.

The sage thought that Laxman thinks that he (Parashuram) is merely trying to threaten him so that he (Laxman) would shut up, so he (the sage) waved the battle-axe merely as a warning for Laxman, but had no intention of actually harming the latter. Hence, Parashuram took out the axe and showed it to Laxman as a gesture to tell him that he actually means to carry out his threat to kill the latter if he does not behave himself. "Enough is enough, and now Laxman should shut up" was what Parashuram really intended when he wielded the battle-axe.]

अब जनि देइ दोसु मोहि लोगू । कटुबादी बालकु बधजोगू ॥ ३ ॥

बाल बिलोकि बहुत मैं बाँचा । अब यहु मरनिहार भा साँचा ॥ ४ ॥

aba jani dē'i dōsu mōhi lōgū. kaṭubādī bālaku badhajōgū. 3.

bāla bilōki bahuta mair̥m bām̐cā. aba yahu maranihāra bhā sām̐cā. 4.

[Parashuram said vehemently and seething with anger—] 'Let no one blame me now because this boy who speaks so wickedly and irreverentially is indeed fit to be killed. (3)

I have spared him for quite some time because he is a young boy (a "Baalak")<sup>1</sup>. But enough has happened, and it is true that it looks that he will die now.

[To wit, I have spared him a lot because he is a child, but he has crossed all limits and has become aggressive. So he deserves severe punishment. Let no one in this assembly blame me for killing a boy because this fellow's behaviour is inviting death on his own self.] ' (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Parashuram was making a clown of himself. Just a few moments ago he had bragged as the one who has slayed infants and aborted embryos (refer: Doha no. 272), and now he says that he had spared Laxman because he was a child as he had done earlier in Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 272.

The message in this episode is that anger makes a person lose all sense of wisdom and wit and turns him into a clown, making him irrational and a victim of self-contradictions and ridicule.]

कौसिक कहा छमिअ अपराधू । बाल दोष गुन गनहिं न साधू ॥ ५ ॥

खर कुठार मैं अकरुन कोही । आगे अपराधी गुरुद्रोही ॥ ६ ॥

उतर देत छोड़ुँ बिनु मारें । केवल कौसिक सील तुझरें ॥ ७ ॥
न त एहि काटि कुठार कठोरें । गुरहि उरिन होतेउँ श्रम थोरें ॥ ८ ॥ kausika kahā chami'a aparādhū. bāla dōṣa guna ganahim na sādthū. 5.

khara kuṭhāra maim akaruna kōhī. āgēm aparādhī gurudrōhī. 6.
utara dēta chōṛa'um' binu mārēm. kēvala kausika sīla tumhārēm. 7.
na ta ēhi kāṭi kuṭhāra kaṭhōrēm. gurahi urina hōtē'um' śrama thōrēm. 8.

[Seeing that things may go out of hand, and that this verbal spat between Laxman and Parashuram seems to be becoming more and more acrimonious and stretching beyond acceptable limits, the wise sage Vishwamitra intervened. He tried to calm the angry sage Parashuram and bring things under control before it's too late.]

Kausik (sage Vishwamitra) said to Parashuram, 'Excuse him (Laxman) for his misdemeanours and impertinent behaviour. Saintly people do not pay heed to either the faults or the virtues (i.e. demerits or merits) of children.<sup>1</sup>' (5)

[When sage Vishwamitra spoke to Parashuram, trying to pacify him, the latter replied—] 'My axe is sharpened and unforgiving. I have no mercy in my heart when I get angry. The fellow who has offended my Guru (Lord Shiva)<sup>2</sup> is standing before me (in a defiant mood). (6)

[Normally I must not forgive him because he has been instrumental in insulting Lord Shiva, my Guru, by being a part of the plan to break Shiva's bow. He has also offended me, and therefore deserves severest punishment.]

But oh Kausik (Vishwamitra), I will still let him go (i.e. I won't harm Laxman) just because of your gracious manners and good nature (inspite of this fellow's irreverential behaviour towards me, and his mocking of me by answering back at me in such an insulting way). (7)

Otherwise, had it not been for you, I would have put my stern and cruel axe on his neck (i.e. I would have mercilessly chopped-off his head with my axe). By doing this, I would have paid-off my moral debt that I owe to my Guru (Shiva)<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Vishwamitra has recalled Parashuram's own statement that the latter has spared Laxman till now because he was a "Baalak", a child, a young immature boy. Children are prone to be naughty and mischievous. When they grow up and face the world, they normally become more responsible. So a wise man neglects the behaviour of a child and pardons him for his misbehaviour. The child does not know what is correct and what is incorrect. Besides this normal trait in all children, a prince is more prone to be mischievous because of his pampered upbringing. Therefore, Parashuram should overlook how Laxman behaved with him, and move on.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Shiva is deemed to be sage Parashuram's Guru because the Lord is a revered diety and a deemed moral preceptor of all ascetics who practice Yoga and do Tapa.

<sup>3</sup>A disciple should protect the dignity and honour of his Guru at all times; it's moral duty that he owes his Guru. If anyone causes any insult to his Guru then the disciple must endeavour to punish the offender as soon as possible.

Now, in the present case, breaking of Lord Shiva's bow is an indirect insult of him. Since Parashuram holds Laxman equally guilty as Lord Ram for this sin, if he managed to punish Laxman in any severe manner then he would have symbolically repaid his moral debt to his Guru, Lord Shiva.

Parashuram should have known by now that Laxman was not guilty of actually breaking the bow of Shiva, and that it was broken by his elder brother Lord Ram. This is clearly indicated by Laxman himself in Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 272.

So, what was Laxman guilty of? One, Laxman was trying to defend Lord Ram and his breaking of the bow—refer: from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 271—to Chaupai line no.3 that precedes Doha no. 272. And two, Laxman has been continuously sneering at Parashuram and answering him back for quite some time, causing insult to a revered sage before whom the world bowed. This impertinent and irreverential behaviour of Laxman had angered sage Parashuram more than his taking the side of his brother, Lord Ram, and defending him for breaking the bow.]

दो०. गाधिसूनु कह हृदयँ हँसि मुनिहि हरिअरइ सूझ ।
अयमय खाँड़ न ऊखमय अजहुँ न बूझ अबूझ ॥ २७५ ॥

dōhā.

gādhisūnu kaha hr̥dayam̐ ham̐si munihi hari'ara'i sūjha.
ayamaya khām̐ṛa na ūkhamaya ajahum̐ na būjha abūjha. 275.

Hearing the angry outburst of Parashuram, sage Vishwamitra, the son of Gaadhi (“gādhisūnu”) smiled internally in his heart (at the delusions that have overtaken sage Parashuram's intellect and wisdom). He muttered to himself in an ironical tone that the sage (Parashuram) sees only greenery everywhere<sup>1</sup>.

Vishwamitra thought to himself that Parashuram does not realise that this time he has to deal with a steel sword (a reference to Laxman) and not a soft stem of the sugar-cane (that one chews easily)<sup>2</sup>. How ignorant and foolish is he! (Doha no. 275)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>That is, Parashuram treats everyone in the same way. He thinks that Laxman and Lord Ram are merely ordinary princes whom Parashuram can push and shove in any way he likes. Seeing ‘greenery everywhere’ is a figure of speech meaning that Parashuram thinks that he can easily frighten Laxman like he has been frightening all other kings since a long time. He is so deluded that he thinks that the whole earth is full of green vegetation, and does not realise that there may be a dry patch of land somewhere where not even a shrub grows.

In other words, in his arrogance Parashuram forgets that he will not be able to subdue Laxman as he has been subduing countless other kings earlier.

<sup>2</sup>Parashuram repeatedly speaks of ‘chopping-off the head of Laxman with his axe’. Does he not understand that his axe can cut a soft stem of the sugar-cane, but would bounce off a steel sword? In this metaphor, Laxman is likened to a steel sword which the axe cannot cut through.

An interesting thing can be seen in this comparison. Both the blade of the axe and that of the sword are made of steel. Here it clearly implies that both sage Parashuram and Laxman are a perfect match for each other in their stern attitudes; both of them are equal in terms of showing anger, using uncouth words, threatening each other, and being fearless of the other. Laxman's taunting remarks with words soaked in sarcasm that follow herein below reinforce this view.

One very important observation can be made here. Sage Vishwamitra has not stopped Laxman even once during the entire oral spat with Parashuram. What can be the probable reason? Well, obviously it is this: Vishwamitra had realized that Laxman is made of a very stern stuff, and barring his brother Lord Ram he cares for no one else no matter whoso he may be so much so that he had no regrets at not even sparing king Janak by speaking harshly at him and rebuking him in full assembly in spite of the fact that Janak was the host king, a most gracious one who had shown great hospitality towards them, and also an aged one who was almost of the age of Laxman's own father king Dasrath—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 252—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 254.

So Vishwamitra exercised prudence and kept quiet, being reluctant to say anything to Laxman to avoid any ugly situation should the latter forget to maintain decorum and decency of behaviour in his fit of anger and say something insulting to sage Vishwamitra in public which would be totally unacceptable to him, and in this scenario the things would go completely out of hand and control.]

चौ०. कहेउ लखन मुनि सीलु तुहारा । को नहिं जान बिदित संसारा ॥ १ ॥
माता पितहि उरिन भए नीकें । गुर रिनु रहा सोचु बड़ जीकें ॥ २ ॥
सो जनु हमरेहि माथे काढ़ा । दिन चलि गए व्याज बड़ बाढ़ा ॥ ३ ॥ अब आनिअ व्यवहरिआ बोली । तुरत देउँ मैं थैली खोली ॥ ४ ॥

caupāī.

kahē'u lakhana muni sīlu tumhārā. kō nahim jāna bidita sansārā. 1.
mātā pitahi urina bha'ē nīkēm. gura rinu rahā sōcu baṛa jīkēm. 2.
sō janū hamarēhi māthē kārhā. dina cali ga'ē byāja baṛa bārhā. 3.
aba āni'a byavaharīā bōlī. turata dē'um' mairi thailī khōlī. 4.

Laxman scorned at Parashuram and continued with his fearless talk, taunting the sage further in this manner—‘Oh yes sage, who in this world is not aware of your civility and good manners! It is famous world-wide<sup>1</sup>. (1)

You have fully paid the debt you owed to your parents (“mother and father”) and have washed your hands clean of this obligation<sup>2</sup>, now what is left is the debt you owe to your Guru<sup>3</sup>, and this obligation is agitating you, vexing your mind and making you worried. (2)

And it seems that we (Laxman and Lord Ram) had pledged to repay that burden of debt that you owed to your Guru, and you have come to force us to pay it. A lot of time has elapsed, increasing the burden of interest on the principal amount of the debt! (3)

So be it. Call the creditor<sup>4</sup> here at once, and I will open my purse to repay his loan immediately (to free you of your moral obligation so that you can calm down your anger and get peace like a true sage, instead of going about threatening people with your axe).’ (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The sarcasm is obvious and apparent. Parashuram has poured vitriol at Laxman and has called him names, has threatened him with death, has drawn his axe at him, has shouted and boasted of his achievements as a mass killer of kings who has not learnt to show mercy on anyone.

‘Under which criteria are these things considered polite and civil, who will regard the way Parashuram behaved as being good manners’—wondered Laxman when he made this taunt. Of course Parashuram is famous in the world, but everyone knows that his fame is based on all the wrong things.

Laxman is playing on Parashuram’s own use of the word “Sheel” (meaning civil and good behaviour, politeness and good manners) in Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 275 where Parashuram has praised the good virtues of sage Vishwamitra and said that it was because of the latter’s patronage that he (Parashuram) is sparing Laxman.

There is of course no comparison between the “Sheel” of these two sages. While Vishwamitra was a calm, wise, tolerant and loving sage, Parashuram was an embodiment of recklessness, intolerance, wrath and anger.

<sup>2</sup>This fact that Parashuram had avenged his father’s death by killing the Kshatriya kings because one of the members of this race, king Sahastraarjun, had killed his father sage Jamdagni, is lauded by Lord Ram himself in Valmiki Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 76, verse no. 2.

The story of Parashuram “paying the debt that he owed to his parents” refers to an incident in the sage’s life which is narrated in brief below. No monetary transaction was involved; it is a symbolic way of saying that Parashuram had fulfilled the wishes of his father which every son ought to do, notwithstanding the propriety of his father’s instructions. The story is this:

Once, Parashuram’s father, sage Jamdagni, asked his wife Renuka (who was a daughter of king Prasenjit) to go and fetch water from the river. When she went there she saw a Gandharva couple frolicking around and indulging in love making. She began to watch this playful activity and was therefore late in bringing water for her husband, sage Jamdagni. The sage closed his eyes and used his mystical powers to become aware of what had happened. He did not approve of his wife watching a stranger couple making love, so he became angry. He wanted her killed. He had five sons—Rumanyavaan, Sushen, Vasu, Vishwavas and Parashuram. He summoned each of them, but the elder four sons refused to kill their mother. Jamdagni was extremely peeved, so he finally ordered Parashuram to kill Renuka as well as the four disobedient sons. Parashuram obeyed the instructions of his father and used his axe to kill all of them.

Jamdagni was very pleased with Parashuram and asked him to seek a boon. Then, the wise Parashuram requested his father for two boons—one, that all his four dead brothers and his mother be brought back to life, and two, that they should not remember who killed them. Jamdagni was delighted, and all were revived.

In this way, Parashuram not only fulfilled the wishes of his father but also helped his mother as well as his four brothers to overcome the bad effects of the sin they had committed by undergoing severe punishment for it by getting themselves killed. But Parashuram did it in such a clever way that all of them emerged unscathed from the harshness of this punishment (of death) because they were all revived and did not remember what had happened to them.

Another version varies slightly in two minor details. One is that Renuka saw king Chitra-rath playing in the water with his wife, instead of seeing the Gandharva couple. And the second variation is that Parashuram had asked his obliged father an additional boon—that he has a long life and no one can ever defeat him in battle. The rest of the story is the same as the aforesaid version. This story is based in accordance with the version given in Mahabharat, Vanparva, Canto 116. The names of Parashuram's brothers are given in verse no. 2-4 and 10, while his boons are narrated in verse nos. 17-18.

Now, the above story outlines how Parashuram had obliged his father. Now let us see how he had obliged his mother. Once, the thousand-armed king known as 'Sahastraarjun' had taken away Jamdagni's all wish fulfilling cow known as Kamdhenu. Parashuram rushed to cut all the arms of Sahastraarjun as punishment. Sahastraarjun's kith and kin came back to the hermitage of Jamdagni when Parashuram was not there, and took revenge by killing the sage. Parashuram's mother grieved and wailed. When he came back and discovered what had happened, he promised his mother that he would take revenge, and vowed to kill all the Kshatriya kings on the surface of the earth to avenge Sahastraarjun's killing of his father. So in this way he had also fulfilled the wishes of his mother.

In Mahabharat, Shantiparva, Canto 49, verse nos. 45-47 it is mentioned that it was Sahastraarjun's son who had stolen the Kamdhenu cow, and not Sahastraarjun himself.

It ought to be noted that 'Sahastraarjun' is also known as 'Sahastrabaahu' because he had a thousand arms.

Now, after unnecessarily killing so many innocent Kshatriya kings, who had committed no offence, but who were nevertheless killed just to avenge his father's death at the hands Sahastraarjun, sage Parashuram was severely criticized by the community of Brahmins, which made the sage contrite and full of guilt. So, with a somber and disgusted mood, he went to the forest to do penance. At that time, sage Vishwamitra's grandson named Paraivasu came to him and teased him, saying, 'A fire sacrifice was done recently in which so many countless Kshatriya kings had come. But you did not kill any of them, thereby disobeying the promise you had made to your mother and have also violated your own vows. This is a sin in itself.' Peeved and instigated, Parashuram rose immediately and went berserk, killing and hacking all the kings and their kith and kin at random. Their pregnant wives somehow escaped by hiding here and there. After this, Parashuram performed a Horse Sacrifice known as the 'Ashwamedh Yajya', and gave the entire land (earth) that he had snatched from the kings to sage Kashyap as donation or gift during this sacrifice.

Sage Kashyap was wise, and he was worried that if some way out is not found then one day Parashuram will create such a situation by repeatedly killing kings that there would be no one to take care of the creatures who inhabit the planet, because the main function of the Kshatriya kings was to look after the welfare of the subjects of their kingdoms and protect the earth from marauding savages.

So Kashyap told Parashuram, 'Now that you have given me this earth as a gift, it belongs to me, and henceforth you have no right to kill any of its inhabitants (including of course the kings). You go to the shore of the southern ocean and do Tapa there.' After this, Parashuram lived on the shore of the southern ocean during the day, and left the earth during the night.

This version of the story is clearly mentioned in Valmiki Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 75, verse nos. 25-26, and Canto 76, verse nos. 13-14.

This is how Parashuram overcame the moral debt that he owed to his parents: by obeying their commands without questioning them. First he obeyed his father by killing his mother on his instructions, then he obeyed his mother by seeking revenge for her husband's death at the hands of Sahastraarjun by killing the latter as well as all the Kshatriya kings at random.

<sup>3</sup>Now, who was his 'Guru'? His Guru was Lord Shiva as the Lord is a deemed moral preceptor of all hermits, which sage Parashuram was. What was Parashuram's moral debt towards his Guru, Lord Shiva? It was to avenge the perceived insult that the breaking of the Lord Shiva's bow had caused by punishing the offender severely as he had done in the case of the Kshatriya kings who had killed his father. Breaking of Shiva's bow and killing of his father are equal offences because both these events involve violence.

So here Laxman hints at these major events in Parashuram's life when he says that the latter has freed himself from the obligation of repaying his parents debts because he had obeyed their commands. But his Guru's debt is still pending till he punishes Laxman and Lord Ram for breaking Shiva's bow.

<sup>4</sup>Laxman says that Parashuram should call the 'creditor' so that his loan can be paid. Who is the so-called 'creditor'? The creditor is his Guru, Lord Shiva, to whom Parashuram owes moral responsibility to uphold his dignity and punish anyone who insults his Guru even slightly and even by inference. So, Laxman asks him to summon Shiva. Laxman knows that Shiva loves Lord Ram and it was not possible to break the Lord's bow without his consent. In other words, Lord Ram could break the bow only because Shiva consented. Remember: When the bow was broken, all the gods—and the word "all" includes Lord Shiva—had assembled in the sky to shower flowers on Lord Ram, sing and play their musical instruments. (For instance, refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 4-7 that precede Doha no. 262; (ii) Doha no. 264; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 265.)

A little later on we shall read that when Lord Ram was proceeding towards the marriage venue dressed as a groom, Lord Shiva was exhilarated beyond measure; Shiva was captivated by Lord Ram's enchanting image and thanked his stars that he had fifteen eyes (five faces with three eyes each)—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 317.

Obviously therefore Lord Shiva was not at all offended by Ram breaking the bow, because otherwise he wouldn't have enjoyed and felt happy at Lord Ram's marriage, and wouldn't have joined in the celebrations either. After all, the marriage hinged on breaking of Shiva's bow, and how can one expect Shiva to celebrate the marriage of someone whom he held guilty of insulting him by breaking his bow?

These are clear indications that Shiva gave his consent to Lord Ram when the latter broke the bow. Therefore, the purported 'insult' of Lord Shiva by his bow being broken has no ground. But Parashuram was so overcome with anger and spite that he overlooked this fact. It was precisely for this reason that Laxman tells him to call the 'creditor', i.e. Lord Shiva, to ask him if anything is due to him. And if nothing is 'due'—in other words if Shiva says that he is not all offended by the breaking of this old and rusty bow which he himself had despised (because this bow had let Shiva down in his face-off with Vishnu, and it had been a cause of lot of bloodshed: see note of Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 244)—then why is Parashuram jumping around angrily that his Guru has been insulted?

Laxman was confident that Parashuram would be further trounced for being so haughty and angry, characters totally unbecoming for a great sage and a hermit.]

सुनि कटु बचन कुठार सुधारा । हाय हाय सब सभा पुकारा ॥ ५ ॥
 भृगुबर परसु देखावहु मोही । बिप्र बिचारि बचउँ नृपद्रोही ॥ ६ ॥
 मिले न कबहुँ सुभट रन गाढ़े । द्विज देवता घरहि के बाढ़े ॥ ७ ॥
 अनुचित कहि सब लोग पुकारे । रघुपति सयनहिं लखनु नेवारे ॥ ८ ॥ sunī kaṭu bacana kuṭhāra sudhārā. hāya hāya saba sabhā pukārā. 5.

 bhṛgubara parasu dēkhāvahu mōhī. bipra bicāri baca'um' nṛpadrōhī. 6.
 milē na kabahum' subhaṭa rana gārḥē. dvija dēvatā gharahi kē bārḥē. 7.
 anucita kahi saba lōga pukārē. raghupati sayanahim lakhanu nēvārē. 8.

Hearing these scornful and bitter words of Laxman, Parashuram moved his hands menacingly over his battle-axe, firmed his grip over it, as if about to strike. Seeing his grave posture, the assembly shouted in dismay—‘Alack, alack; Have mercy, have mercy’<sup>1</sup>. (5)

Laxman struck back with a vengeance, retorting—‘Oh Bhrigubar (literally meaning an exalted member of sage Bhrigu’s family; here meaning Parashuram)! Hark: why are you showing me your battle-axe repeatedly to threaten me?

But listen, you enemy of the kings! I am restraining myself from giving you a befitting reply (i.e. I am sparing you) just because you are a Brahmin (as we have been taught to show due respect to them). (6)

You have never met a brave warrior in a battle. [You have always met terrified kings who submitted before you humbly because you are a Brahmin. They never fought you because they thought that it would be improper to fight with and injure a Brahmin. This made you proud of your self as being invincible and being able to ride roughshod over everyone else. Now your time is up; you have met your match in me.]

Brahmins and gods are accustomed to receive submission and get obedience, but it is confined to places where they have their unbridled authority such as their own domains (i.e. homes for Brahmins, and heaven in the case of gods)<sup>2</sup>.

[But, remember, a battle-field is the domain of warriors, and not Brahmins and gods who are pampered beyond limits, making them boastful and haughty of their authority and powers. You had gone on the rampage, killing kings and princes in their homes, their cities and palaces, and never ever dared to face them in real battle conditions in a battle-field. Say, is it not unfair to kill someone who has submitted and is begging for mercy? And by killing submissive Kshatriya kings, you think you had done a big job or gained some great honour. Well, it is nothing short of cowardice. Now come, I challenge you for a real bit of battle, and I am a Kshatriya. Come, kill me if you can. Why are you merely raising the battle-axe in a hostile manner without being actually doing something about your threats just to prove your impotency?]' (7)

All the people assembled in the arena raised their voice at this rejoinder of Laxman, saying that it was not proper. [That is, the assembly objected to Laxman's remark invoking gods and Brahmins in general. Laxman had unleashed a torrent of rebukes and sarcastic remarks against Parashuram that was slipping out of control.]

So, Raghupati (Lord Ram, the lord of the Raghu dynasty) signaled to Laxman with a gesture of his eyes to stop<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Parashuram had wielded his battle-axe a number of times to threaten Laxman. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 273.

Moving his hands over the handle and the metal the blade of the axe was a gesture that he is preparing the weapon to hit. When a combatant readied himself for combat, he wiped his weapon and moved his hands, i.e. the palms and the fingers, over it to test its cleanliness and remove any last traces of dust etc, as well as to check the sharpness of its edge.

A warrior was habituated to this practice. For instance, we shall read later on in the story that when Bharat approaches the hermitage of Lord Ram in Chitrakoot along with senior citizens of Ayodhya and an army in an attempt to persuade the Lord to return to Ayodhya, Lord Ram was sitting in the company of sages and hermits who lived in the forest. At that time, "Lord Ram was slowly revolving his bow and an arrow in his hands". Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 239.

Meanwhile, we see here how a man, who has lost his wits due to anger, behaves. When a man of substance and authority threatens to punish someone for disobedience, he should actually punish the offender instead of just threatening to do so repeatedly, for otherwise he makes a mockery of himself. After one or two ineffective threats, his words lose their gravity and people start treating him as a clown. Thus, a powerful man should either keep quiet or go ahead with his threat of punishment by acting accordingly; a mere boastful threat without any follow-up action not only undermines a powerful man's authority but also demeans him and makes him a butt of joke and ridicule.

<sup>2</sup>Chaupai line no. 7 can be read as follows also—"Oh Vipra (Brahmin)! You have been treated with respect like a 'god' by householders (i.e. kings and princes), but you have not met someone in the environs of a battle-field. There you would have received a fair treatment that you deserve! Being accustomed to pampering and abject surrender by kings and other householders who showed respect to you like they would respect the gods they worshipped simply because you are Brahmin, you have become very arrogant and haughty. You have not met a true warrior till date, for he wouldn't have bowed to you and surrendered to your threats. So you think that you are invincible and the lord of the world. Come, today I'll show you the reality. Come, face me in battle. But don't show this axe to me like a pretender."

This statement of Laxman taunted Parashuram by saying in effect that he had shown his bravery by killing his mother and brothers at home. Then when he went around killing kings, they had submitted before him because he was a Brahmin whom everyone is taught to give due respect as one gives to a god. But that did not prove that Parashuram is a brave warrior—for he has never met someone in real battle conditions in a battle-field where his opponent refuses to submit before him and gives him a tit-for-tat reply. Perhaps if this had ever happened, Parashuram would have known how much wind was actually in his sail, but unfortunately no one ever dared to confront him and show him the ground he stood upon perhaps out of fear of his reputation of being excessively wrathful, and also because it would be improper to answer back a sage of great stature, for then the world would blame the person for insulting the sage instead of blaming the sage for unwarrantedly humiliating others, who had done no harm to him, just to satisfy his ego!

<sup>3</sup>It is interesting to note that till the time people did not object to Laxman's verbal duel with Parashuram and his insinuations, Lord Ram had kept quiet. But when the Lord saw that the public opinion is turning against Laxman, he immediately intervened to stop him.

By stopping Laxman with a polite gesture of the eye, Lord Ram showed his love for him and that he did not want to offend or insult Laxman by scolding him for showing his bad temper in public and insulting sage Parashuram. After all, Parashuram deserved this dressing-down because he had cultivated a bad habit of becoming angry and boasting.

Besides this, Lord Ram also showed that he respected the views of the people, for as soon as he discovered that the people are disapproving of Laxman's behaviour, he instantly got the latter stopped.

Refer Doha no. 276 herein below.]

दो०. लखन उतर आहुति सरिस भृगुबर कोपु कृसानु ।

बढ़त देखि जल सम बचन बोले रघुकुलभानु ॥ २७६ ॥

dōhā.

lakhana utara āhuti sarisa bhr̥gubara kōpu kṛsānu.

bar̥hata dēkhi jala sama bacana bōlē raghukulabhānu. 276.

Laxman's replies and rejoinders were like offering of liquid clarified butter as oblation into the fire pit of a sacrifice, sage Parashuram's anger was like the raging fire, and when Lord Ram, who was like a 'sun'<sup>1</sup> in the dynasty of king Raghu, saw that the fire was getting out of control (as it would go on becoming wilder and more fierce without subsiding or cooling off if more oblations or fuel was added to it by way of Laxman retorting to Parashuram's angry tirade and the latter getting wilder and angrier at Laxman's boldness, fearlessness and irreverential behaviour), he spoke polite and soothing words as if to pour water<sup>1</sup> to douse this fire. (Doha no. 276)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The comparison is very apt. The 'sun' is responsible for producing rain because it first helps in the evaporation of water from oceans and seas. This evaporated water vapour transforms into a cloud which then pours 'rain water' on the 'heated' earth below.

Lord Ram has a 'dark' complexion, which is also the colour of rain-bearing clouds.

The idea is that when the people started feeling the heat of Laxman's and Parashuram's anger and they feared that this verbal duel between the two might turn ugly and result in open battle, like the 'heat on earth that torments its inhabitants', Lord Ram metaphorically poured 'rain water' to calm it down by speaking politely and humbly so that the anger of sage Parashuram, which was like a raging fire, would subside. Meanwhile, he stopped Laxman from adding more fuel to this fire by asking him to keep quiet.]

चौ०. नाथ करहु बालक पर छोहू । सूध दूधमुख करिअ न कोहू ॥ १ ॥

जौं पै प्रभु प्रभाउ कछु जाना । तौ कि बराबरि करत अयाना ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

nātha karahu bālaka para chōhū. sūdh dūdhamukha kari'a na kōhū. 1.
jaurṁ pai prabhu prabhā'u kachu jānā. tau ki barābari karata ayānā. 2.

[Lord Ram tried to assuage sage Parashuram's ruffled feelings and hurt ego by using a soothing balm of polite words, requesting him to forgive Laxman and neglect his rash behaviour as the latter was merely a child and does not have any experience of interacting with a great personality of Parashuram's stature. Indeed it is expected that elders should overlook the mischief created by inexperienced youngsters.]

Lord Ram said to sage Parashuram—‘Oh Lord! Be gracious upon this child<sup>1</sup>; have mercy on him. He is simple-hearted (i.e. he has no real intention of insulting you or hurting your ego and prestige). He is literally so young that he still drinks milk for survival<sup>2</sup>. So you must not become angry on him. (1)

Say, if he had any inkling of your glories and achievements, would he have imagined or thought of ever comparing himself with you, and behaving the way he did?

[He is ignorant of everything, because as I have told you and as you have yourself acknowledged, he is still a ‘child’, and a wise person does not expect much from children as they are supposed to be innocent at heart though their action seems to be naughty. Laxman indeed is unaware of your true potentials and prowess, as well as your exalted stature as renowned sage of repute. He does not know your background or your stupendous achievements, like your doing severe Tapa, your practicing Yoga, and about your performing various sacrifices. He does not know the astounding mystical powers you possess. He thinks that you are merely some ordinary sage or hermit who is prone to becoming angry at trifles, and when you indeed become angry you lose control over your senses and your behavior makes you seem to be a clown in a child's eye who then tries to emulate you as a fun exercise.

Besides, being a prince, Laxman is not accustomed to anyone threatening him, or of boasting in front of him. But he does not know the reality about you. That is why he has answered back at you and behaved such irreverentially with you. Yes indeed, if he had known of your great mystical powers, your martial achievements, your spiritual abilities and your exalted lineage, he certainly wouldn't have dared talk with you the way he did.

He was misled by your physical appearance and behaviour. You hold fierce weapons such as a battle-axe, a bow and arrows. Then, you started shouting and threatening the moment you came here. These are not the characteristics of sages and hermits. So this boy thought that you are some warrior, and as is the wont of brave princes who are taught not to be cowed down by adversaries, he stood up against you.

But then, as I've told you, he is inexperienced, and yet a child. You have also accepted this fact that he is child, a “Baalak”. Oh holy sage, fighting with children never gives any honour to an adult, especially to a sage of your stature. By quarrelling with him you are only inviting ridicule on yourself.

Laxman can be excused for his misdemeanours because he is a child, but how will you excuse yourself for your ruckus and boastful behaviour?] (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Parashuram has himself conceded that Laxman is a ‘child’, a “Baalak”. He has also said that he spares Laxman just because he is a child. Refer: Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 272. So Lord Ram has wisely reminded the sage of his own statement which he can’t deny; the sage can’t say now that Laxman is not a child.

<sup>2</sup>The Lord implied that a warrior should feel ashamed of himself by fighting with a child who still has not learnt how to eat solid food, who still drinks his mother’s milk. It is merely in a literal sense that it is said that “Laxman still has milk in his mouth”. It is observed that children who are very young drink a lot of milk which is their staple food, and thus their mouths smell of milk. It is a figure of speech to mean that the person concerned has not grown up mentally; he still acts, behaves and thinks like a child though he may have grown up in physical age.

Elders also refer to their beloved younger ones as still being a child; it shows that they have great affection for them like a father would have for his child, and therefore are ready to forgive or overlook their misdemeanours.

So we finally see that like a true guardian who would step forward to protect his ward, Lord Ram uses his wit and calm manners to diffuse the tense situation by assuaging the furious sage’s hurt ego and self-respect by reminding him of his exalted stature and greatness that obliges such illustrious sages to be kind and forgiving, especially when their offender is a child who does not know or understands how to behave properly with such exalted souls.

Hence, Lord Ram begs for forgiveness from sage Parashuram on behalf of his younger brother Laxman to settle the matter and peacefully and bring this unsavoury episode to a safe conclusion. The outcome was definitely positive, as we shall soon see. The Lord’s calm and apologetic manner quietened the sage, who was internally happy that after all a safety valve was finally found that would help him to save his face with dignity and honour, as now he will have an excuse of leaving Laxman unharmed because his elder brother, Lord Ram, has asked for forgiveness, and as a great sage it was obligatory for him to forgive anyone who surrenders and asks for grace.]

जौं लरिका कछु अचगरि करहीं । गुर पितु मातु मोद मन भरहीं ॥ ३ ॥

करिअ कृपा सिसु सेवक जानी । तुझ सम सील धीर मुनि ग्यानी ॥ ४ ॥

jauṁ larikā kachu acagari karahīm. gura pitu mātu mōda mana bharahīm. 3.
kari'a kṛpā sisu sēvaka jānī. tumha sama sīla dhīra muni gyānī. 4.

If a child or an innocent young lad plays some kind of prank or talks in a playful and nonsensical way as is the wont of children, his elders, such as his teacher and parents (“gura pitu mātu”), take it lightly and are filled with joy (instead of getting annoyed and taking umbrage at the child’s behaviour).

[To wit, you are a senior and exalted sage, and for you he is like a child. You have yourself said it that you are restraining yourself because Laxman is a mere child or a “Baalak”—chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 272. You must understand that some children are mischievous, and therefore you must neglect his behaviour and calm your anger down.] (3)

Treating him as a child and a humble servant (of sages and hermits), have compassion and mercy on him. You (being an exalted sage and hermit) have the auspicious virtues of equanimity, good manners, forbearance and patience; you are a self-realised sage. [So you must behave like one, and should not be sucked into an unpleasant confrontation with a child because it would undermine your exalted stature.]’ (4)

[Note—Lord Ram has talked very cleverly and diplomatically. On the one hand he has defended Laxman’s behaviour, and on the other hand he has politely told sage Parashuram that his behaviour does not suit him.

It will be noted here that Parashuram had become so stupid in his anger that he took Lord Ram’s statement that “Laxman does not know about the sage’s glories and achievements” so literally that he forgot that he had already boasted of them a while ago—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 272 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 6-8.

So, Parashuram decided to make more boast of his famous deeds. He will brag about himself again in Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 283.

We shall read in a while that Lord Ram has to repeat this plea once again when Laxman started annoying sage Parashuram once again. Refer: Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 279 below.]

राम बचन सुनि कछुक जुड़ाने । कहि कछु लखनु बहुरि मुसुकाने ॥ ५ ॥
हँसत देखि नख सिख रिस व्यापी । राम तोर भ्राता बड़ पापी ॥ ६ ॥
गौर सरीर स्याम मन माहीं । कालकूटमुख पयमुख नाहीं ॥ ७ ॥ सहज टेढ़ अनुहरइ न तोही । नीचु मीचु सम देख न मोही ॥ ८ ॥

rāma bacana suni kachuka juṛānē. kahi kachu lakhanu bahuri musukānē. 5.
hamśata dēkhi nakha sikha risa byāpī. rāma tōra bhrātā barā pāpī. 6.
gaura sarīra syāma mana māhīm. kālakūṭamukha payamukha nāhīm. 7.
sahaja ṭēṛha anuhara’i na tōhī. nīcu mīcu sama dēkha na mōhī. 8.

Parashuram felt a bit reassured and comforted by the pleasant and soothing words of Lord Ram<sup>1</sup>.

But his peace was short-lived as Laxman smiled sarcastically once again, mocking the sage even as he made some new taunting and disparaging remarks targeting him (that spited sage Parashuram, and further stoked his anger and vehemence)<sup>2</sup>. (5)

Meanwhile, when Parashuram saw Laxman sneering at him, anger was reignited and pervaded his entire being. Rage surged within his body, flushing him with anger from the tip of his toe-nail to the top of his head.

Thus, the infuriated sage turned to Lord Ram and said—‘Hark Ram, your brother is very sinful. [That is, he is not only insulting towards me but is also seemingly defying you. Look, while you are pleading with me to excuse him for being a child, and while you behave so politely with me, this fellow does not even understand that if his elder brother wishes to bring the issue to rest than he should not do anything to raise dead corpses again, and that if his elder brother is showing so much respect to me than there must be some reason. He should have withdrawn by now, but is very defiant. He is hell-bent on insulting me, and probably he also gives a damn to you.

Well, this is exactly what he is doing by sneering at me and uttering nonsense once again even while you have not finished speaking. For that matter, who knows he may be sneering at your words, and not at me. What could be more impertinent and sinful than this? (6)

He may be fair in complexion (i.e. appears to be good), but his heart is very dark (i.e. internally he is pervert and full of spite). He has poison in his mouth, and not milk (as you claim him to be—refer: Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 277 herein above). (7)

Look, he is a very wicked, impolite and impertinent fellow. He is not like you; he does not follow your example. This rascal treats me with utter contempt, and hates me like one hates death.<sup>3</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Parashuram was burning with anger and spite. So Lord Ram's soothing words calmed him down "a bit". When the earth has been scorched by the heat of summer, then it is observed that the first round of rains do not cool it down completely. In fact, if the rain is not sufficient, the heat is felt more intensely than how it was felt previously because the little amount of rain-water that falls cannot cool the heated surface of the earth, but, instead, it itself turns hot as soon as it touches the earth's surface.

It is like sprinkling some cold water on a hot iron plate; it begins to sputter and hiss, and emanates heat. It is also well known that one gets scalded if one comes in direct contact with steam escaping from the spout of a kettle. So, insufficient rain creates more heat than cooling down the earth. Often it becomes stifling hot after the first shower of rain during severe summer than what one had experienced before the rain had come.

In other words, sage Parashuram was beginning to get calmer and regain control over himself when Lord Ram spoke to him politely, seeking forgiveness and expecting a compassionate attitude. But as it happened, Laxman smiled sarcastically once again, uttering some caustic words which stoked the sage's anger once again.

Laxman wanted to ensure, as it were, that the sage vents his full steam here and now so that when later on he goes to do Tapa (austerity and penances) or Yoga (meditation), he will be able to do it properly with a calm head! Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 285.

<sup>2</sup>Laxman was at it again. He did not like his brother, Lord Ram, surrendering to this haughty and boastful sage, trying to pacify him by asking for forgiveness on Laxman's behalf. Laxman wanted to teach this arrogant sage a lesson of his life, but his elder brother, whom he revered so much, was pleading and submitting before Parashuram. This did not go down well with Laxman.

Later on in the story we shall read other incidents also where Laxman has not approved of Lord Ram's dealing with his adversaries in a polite manner. For instance—

(i) When Bharat came to the forest with his army and citizens of Ayodhya in an attempt to take Lord Ram back to Ayodhya, Laxman apprehended that Bharat had some ill intentions; he also did not approve of Ram's welcoming him with an open arm. So, Laxman stood up to fight with Bharat. Lord Ram had then calmed him down. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 227—to Doha no. 232.

(ii) When the ocean was not providing a passage to Lord Ram's army to cross over to Lanka, the Lord had first prayed to the ocean to let him go, but finally he got angry. The Lord pulled out his arrow to dry the ocean. This was liked by Laxman. In other words, Laxman had not approved of Lord Ram begging the ocean to give him a passage, but preferred strong action. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 58.

In essence, Laxman did not approve that Lord Ram should plead before sage Parashuram to either excuse Laxman or even himself for breaking the bow. So he could not resist himself and said something more that caused further irritation to the sage. This will be clear in the following verses.

Now, what did Laxman say this time? It is not clear from the text. So we can make assumption. Perhaps he said, "You (Parashuram) is known as a killer of your mother and brother at the instructions of your father; you are known as a killer of innocent kings to please your mother; you are famous as the killer of unborn babies with your cruel axe. Well, this is the great fame you have. How nice of you indeed; how praise-worthy are your deeds indeed!" Obviously, this sent the sage into a fit of anger like he probably never had experienced in his life earlier.

<sup>3</sup>We have read earlier that when Parashuram could not bear Laxman's heat, he had turned to sage Vishwamitra in order to find an escape route. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 274. At that time also, Laxman has shot back with caustic comments. Refer: from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 274—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 275.

Once again, when things seemed to go out of hand, sage Vishwamitra had intervened and requested Parashuram to excuse Laxman as elders and wise men do not pay heed to ignorant children. Refer: Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 275. And once again, Laxman retorted boldly, taunting Parashuram with very caustic comments. Refer: Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precede Doha no. 276.

The same thing is repeated here. Lord Ram is trying to pacify the angry sage Parashuram, and Laxman goes on adding fuel to the fire of sage's anger.]

दो०. लखन कहेउ हँसि सुनहु मुनि क्रोधु पाप कर मूल ।
जेहि बस जन अनुचित करहिं चरहिं बिस्व प्रतिकूल ॥ २७७ ॥
dōhā.

lakhana kahē'u haṁṣi sunahu muni krōdhu pāpa kara mūla.
jēhi basa jana anucita karahiṁ carahiṁ bisva pratikūla. 277.

Laxman smiled wryly and advised Parashuram mockingly—'Oh sage, anger is at the root of all sins. A living being commits errors and does wrong things under its spell. It is anger that drives them against the whole world, making them enemies of everyone. [Anger creates unnecessary ill-will and hatred that robs one of his peace of mind. It generates animosity that leads to a feeling of insecurity because an angry man begins to look at others with suspicion and scepticism.] (Doha no. 277)

[Note—This is in response to Parashuram telling Lord Ram that Laxman is a great sinner in Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes this Doha no. 277. So Laxman tells sage Parashuram that it is the latter who is a sinner because he has become inappropriately angry and vengeful for a minor issue such as the breaking of an old and creaking bow, and not Laxman who is calm and smiling.

It is Parashuram who is angry, and not Laxman. It is an established doctrine that anger is a bad thing; a man loses his wisdom, his mental bearing and rationality when he becomes angry. An angry man's actions cause him more harm than good. He creates enemies all around him, and no one comes forward to help him in his times of need. This makes life hell for an angry man. Besides this aspect, he acquires infamy and ill-will.

Laxman means that Parashuram is a sage of high repute. All his religious merits and spiritual achievements are turned into a naught by his anger. Whatever mystical powers he manages to gather by doing severe Tapa and Yoga are dissipated and neutralized by his becoming angry.

This Doha summarizing the bad effects of anger is a message for all of us—that we must endeavour to overcome our anger if we want to have peace and happiness in our lives. The ill effects of anger are summarised in Valmiki Ramayan, Sundar Kand, Canto 55, verse nos. 5-6 also.

This said, we shall note below that Laxman has taken a cue from his elder brother Lord Ram and has changed his tone of speaking. Instead of using scorching words, he now talks mildly and seeks forgiveness from sage Parashuram. He advises the sage that instead of fretting and fuming in anger at breaking of Lord Shiva's bow, it will be wiser to plan as how to undo the damage that has already been done by calling some expert craftsman and getting the bow repaired. Refer: Chaupai line no. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 278 below.

But even while Laxman's words seemed to be polite, his general expressions were no less than being hostile and his tone of speech smacked of taunting sage Parashuram. So, instead of getting calmed down, Parashuram became more furious. This will be clear when we read Chaupai line nos. 4-6 that precede Doha no. 278 herein below.]

चौ०. मैं तुझार अनुचर मुनिराया । परिहरि कोपु करिअ अब दाया ॥ १ ॥
 टूट चाप नहिं जुरिहि रिसाने । बैठिअ होइहिं पाय पिराने ॥ २ ॥
 जौं अति प्रिय तौ करिअ उपाई । जोरिअ कोउ बड़ गुनी बोलाई ॥ ३ ॥
 caupāī.

mair̥ tumhāra anucara munirāyā. parihari kōpu kari'a aba dāyā. 1.
 ṭūṭa cāpa nahim̐ jurihi risānē. baiṭhi'a hō'ihim̐ pāya pirānē. 2.
 jaur̥m̐ ati priya tau kari'a upāī. jōri'a kō'u barā gunī bōlāī. 3.

I (Laxman) am your “Anuchar”, meaning that I am junior to you by all accounts, am like one of your followers, a subordinate and a servitor of yours. Abandon your anger and have mercy upon me now (for, truly, a senior person must show leniency on his junior, and forgiveness and tolerance are virtues and not signs of weakness)<sup>1</sup>. (1)

The broken bow would not be mended by getting angry; it needs repair. Please sit down; your legs must be tired and aching.<sup>2</sup> (2)

If this bow is so dear to you (and its breaking has offended you so much), then it is nary a problem because we can find out a practical way to get it repaired by summoning some expert craftsman who can do the job.’ (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Primia-facia, Laxman’s words were welcoming, polite and soothing. He seems to be trying to comfort the angry sage and help him to find a solution of the vexed problem that has caused him so much anger in the first place, and the problem still exists. Getting angry and fighting won’t help. The real solution to this perplexing problem is to get an expert to mend the broken bow and restore it to its original state.

By saying that he was an “Anuchar” of sage Parashuram, Laxman means that since he is born as a Kshatriya prince, he will always remain submissive to a person who is born in the Brahmin race. Brahmins are always shown great respect by Kshatriya kings; the latter are always afraid of and submissive to the former. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 284.

So Laxman meant that the sage is unnecessarily getting worked-up as he (Laxman) has no intention of either insulting the sage or hurting him. The way he reacted was because the sage himself behaved in a manner unfit for a Brahmin—he became angry, shouted at him, and called him names. Then, the sage wielded weapons, such as an axe, a bow and arrows, which a Brahmin is not supposed to. The sage boasted about the way he went about killing kings, something abhorable to the extreme and completely at odds with the nature of a Brahmin who is supposed to be forgiving and compassionate—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 282.

Anger only harms the person who exhibits this negative character, and no one else; anger burns his inner self like the fire burns the external body—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 39.

A sage and a saintly person must have a calm and compassionate temperament; he must show mercy towards the humble and those who are junior to them—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 38.

Parashuram has exhibited none of these auspicious virtues of a Brahmin or a sage. Then, Laxman seems to subtly ask him, how can he expect respect and politeness from the former?

Lord Ram uses the same logic later on when Parashuram was unwilling to relent, and the Lord had to assume a stern posture to subdue him at last. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Doha no. 283—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 284.

Hence, in essence, what Laxman said to Parashuram in these verses was a sort of subtle admonishment of the latter for his bad behaviour that does not behove of a good Brahmin and an exalted sage of Parashuram’s stature. It gives a bad name also to his ancestors. Laxman indirectly told the sage that he should first see the way he has behaved before accusing the former of any misdemeanour.

<sup>2</sup>Laxman told Parashuram that merely getting angry would provide no solution. The main issue at stake is the broken bow, and so we must direct our attention to it instead of wasting time on pouring vitriol on each other.

Parashuram must have been exhausted by now, because, first, he had come a long way from the shores of the southern ocean, and second, he was angry, and anger saps one's energy more than anything else. So his legs must be tired; he must sit down to relax a bit. Meanwhile, they will call some expert craftsman and get the bow repaired.]

बोलत लखनहिं जनकु डेराहीं । मष्ट करहु अनुचित भल नाहीं ॥ ४ ॥
थर थर काँपहिं पुर नर नारी । छोट कुमार खोट बड़ भारी ॥ ५ ॥

bōlata lakhanahim janaku dērāhīm. maṣṭa karahu anucita bhala nāhīm. 4.
thara thara kām̐pahim pura nara nārī. chōṭa kumāra khōṭa baṛa bhārī. 5.

As Laxman spoke, king Janak was feeling uneasy and afraid. [Because he feared that Laxman would suddenly say something which would ignite Parashuram's wrath, and the latter may wreak vengeance upon him.]

So Janak said softly, 'Stop; it is not good to speak unnecessarily; it is wrong to provoke things.'<sup>1</sup> (4)

The men and women folk of the city (who had assembled at the venue to witness the bow-breaking ceremony) shivered in anticipation of some disastrous consequences (of Laxman's persistence with speaking up to the angry sage Parashuram).

They muttered amongst themselves that the younger of the two princes is indeed very naughty<sup>2</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Laxman had already annoyed sage Parashuram, and the latter loathed the former. Anything Laxman said, no matter how harmless and innocent, the angry sage would take it in the wrong sense. It is to be noted here that Lord Ram has said almost the same thing as what Laxman has said in the above verses. Compare what Lord Ram said in Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 277, with what Laxman said in Doha no. 277—to Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 278.

But the difference is apparent in Doha no. 277 which says that Laxman 'smiled'. Of course this smile was less of a gesture of politeness, and more in the nature of a sneer. Janak was an experienced king; he could feel the heat of the fire of anger in Parashuram that Laxman's body language was generating.

So, the king muttered that enough was enough, and now Laxman must be stopped.

<sup>2</sup>Earlier also, the citizens had disapproved of the way Laxman had answered sage Vishwamitra. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 276.]

भृगुपति सुनि सुनि निरभय बानी । रिस तन जरइ होइ बल हानी ॥ ६ ॥
बोले रामहि देइ निहोरा । बचउँ बिचारि बंधु लघु तोरा ॥ ७ ॥
मनु मलीन तनु सुंदर कैसें । बिष रस भरा कनक घटु जैसें ॥ ८ ॥

bhṛgupati suni suni nirabhaya bānī. risa tana jara'i hō'i bala hānī. 6.
 bōlē rāmahi dē'i nihōrā. baca'um̐ bicāri bandhu laghu tōrā. 7.
 manu malīna tanu sundara kaisēm̐. biṣa rasa bharā kanaka ghaṭu jaisēm̐. 8.

As Bhṛigupati (the chief of the Bhṛigu's race; sage Parashuram) continued to hear Laxman's fearless and bold words, he became more and more exasperated; the sage's body kept literally burning with anger, and as time passed in this manner of attrition, he progressively lost his energy and strength, becoming exhausted, weary and worn-out<sup>1</sup>. (6)

[Unable or unwilling to talk with Laxman and face the latter—] Parashuram turned to Lord Ram and said with complaint in his voice—‘I am sparing this fellow because I know that he is your younger brother. [Otherwise, I would have punished him most severely. But since you are civil and cultured, and you have shown respect to me, I am inclined to overlook as this boy's mischief in deference to your request to forgive him—refer: Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 277.] (7)

He has a pervert and dark heart. I wonder how he has got such a charming body. It is like having a harsh poison in a golden pitcher<sup>2</sup>.’ (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This verse teaches us the bad effects of anger. Anger burns one's strength, vitality and energy so much so that when the anger subsides, the person is left exhausted and worn-out and completely drained, as if he has done some greatly strenuous work and wishes the thing comes to an end as soon as possible to give him some respite from sufferings.

In the present context we shall see that by and by the sage lost all his stamina and vigour. A stage would come when he felt like a punctured balloon.

Now, if we examine this episode closely in the context of this principle that one is drained of his energy and vitality by becoming angry, we discover that Laxman's verbal duel with Parashuram was part of a strategy. It caused the sage to become wild and excessively angry, shouting, threatening and gesticulating violently, thereby dissipating all his reserve of strength and energy, making him incapable to actually fight in a battle.

Eventually, therefore, when Lord Ram would face him and crack the whip in the final showdown, the sage would be like a deflated balloon. The same Parashuram who had boasted of the strength of his arms and his battle-axe would submit in a docile manner as if he had been drugged. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Doha no. 283—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 285.

<sup>2</sup>Here, Laxman is compared to the golden pitcher because of his fair complexion, and his nature, temper and behaviour, his way of speaking in a scorching manner, to the poison stored in the golden vessel.]

दो०. सुनि लछिमन बिहसे बहुरि नयन तरेरे राम । गुर समीप गवने सकुचि परिहरि बानी बाम ॥ २७८ ॥
 dōhā.

sunī lachimāna bihasē bahurī nayana tarērē rāma.
gura samīpa gavanē sakuci parihari bānī bāma. 278.

Hearing these words of sage Parashuram, Laxman smiled in a teasing manner once again. [But now he was transgressing limits of decent behaviour, and the assembly was not taking the developments lightly. Even king Janak disapproved of Laxman's behaviour as much as the rest of the citizens. So, Lord Ram wished to put a stop to it before the thing became too nasty. Hence—] Lord Ram intervened and looked at Laxman sternly from the corner of his eyes (signaling the latter to behave himself and call it quits).

At this warning from the Lord, Laxman stopped talking in a bold and fearless manner that was irritating sage Parashuram. He then withdrew himself and abashedly went close to his Guru (sage Vishwamitra). (Doha no. 278)

[Note—Lord Ram could sense that the people as well as their host, king Janak, were annoyed at Laxman's behaviour. Being the elder brother it was his duty to rein-in his younger sibling if the latter was doing something wrong in the eyes of the world.

When Lord Ram looked sternly at Laxman and hinted him to stop with a winking gesture from the corner of his eyes and furrowed eyebrows, Laxman became 'abashed' because he realized that his actions had embarrassed his beloved brother. Laxman had never intended to do anything that would put Lord Ram in a sticky situation, but unwittingly he had done exactly that. So he felt ashamed of himself, and shyly withdrew to go to the place where sage Vishwamitra was sitting.

One important reason of Laxman's withdrawing to a spot near sage Vishwamitra was that he would be very safe there should things go out of hand and Parashuram becomes determined to hit him. This is because sage Vishwamitra was not less powerful than Parashuram, and the latter would have to think a thousand times to harm someone who was protected by Vishwamitra. So, Laxman was safer near sage Vishwamitra than at any other place.

Normally he should have stood with Lord Ram to give him moral support and help him if things became bad. But Laxman was sure that Lord Ram was competent to look after himself.

Another reason of moving away from the spot of the confrontation was that his (Laxman's) presence at the side of Lord Ram would never have allowed sage Parashuram to calm down, because his mere sight infuriated the sage, stoking his anger further.

Refer also to Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 279 along with their appended notes herein below.]

चौ०. अति बिनीत मृदु सीतल बानी । बोले रामु जोरि जुग पानी ॥ १ ॥

सुनहु नाथ तुह सहज सुजाना । बालक बचनु करिअ नहिं काना ॥ २ ॥

बरै बालकु एकु सुभाऊ । इन्हि न संत बिदूषहिं काऊ ॥ ३ ॥

caupāī.

ati binīta mṛdu sītala bānī. bōlē rāmu jōri juga pānī. 1.

sunahu nātha tumha sahaja sujānā. bālaka bacanu kari'a nahim kānā. 2.

bararai bālaku ēku subhā'ū. inhahi na santa bidūṣahim kā'ū. 3.

Lord Ram spoke in a voice that was polite, sweet and pleasant, using words that were cool, soothing and comforting. He also brought together his hands and joined his palms in his front as a gesture of polite request and submission before the angry sage<sup>1</sup>.
(1)

Lord Ram said to sage Parashuram—‘Listen oh Lord! You are inherently wise and very learned. You must not give your ears (i.e. pay attention to) the words of a boy.
(2)

The reason being that wasps (“bararai”) and boys (“bālaku”)<sup>2</sup> are of the same nature. [Just as a wasp has the habit to sting anyone who touches it even inadvertently, without meaning any harm to it, a boy too has the habit to respond in an irritating manner to anyone who provokes him. So, it is always better to keep a safe distance with a wasp as well as a child because their behaviour is very unpredictable, they are very quick in their response without any thought of its long-term effects, and they tend to show no respect to their offender.]

Therefore, those who are wise and saintly never accuse them or find fault with them because it is their natural, inborn habit. [A wise man knows that a wasp would sting if touched, and so if the insect stings and causes pain to him, he would not feel angry. Rather, he would find a remedy for the burning and the swelling caused by the sting and take precaution to avoid that wasp in future. Similarly, a wise man knows that it makes no sense in accusing a naughty child for its demeanours because it is its natural habit; the child’s responses are always unpredictable because it does not know how to interact with others. Hence, it is futile in getting angry at their behaviour. A wise man would make a fool out of himself at taking a child seriously as he would take the response from an adult.] (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>After signalling Laxman to withdraw from confrontation with the gesture of his eyes, Lord Ram spoke very politely to sage Parashuram. He will ask the sage to excuse his younger brother because all children are prone to commit mistakes and are usually naughty—refer the verses that follow below.

This is the second time however that Lord Ram has had to intervene and try to calm down the angry sage. The first occasion was in Doha no. 276—to Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 277.

<sup>2</sup>The word “bararai” also means one who is out of one’s mind; one who behaves like a mad person; a person who does not know how to speak, behave and do anything in a proper way. In other words, a boy of young age or a child does not know what to say to whom, how to behave decently with others, and what to do and what not to. There is not much of a difference between a child and a mad man—the behaviour of both of them is not only irrational, unpredictable and erratic but also, more often than not, it is stinging and irritating, and a constant cause of worry and annoyance for the other person, just like being near to a wasp.

If we take this meaning into consideration, then verse no. 3 should be read as follows—“A mad man and a child have the same nature and mental state. A wise and intelligent man should not pay any attention to them (because both act irrationally, erratically and unpredictably; their behaviour makes no sense and so they should be completely neglected).”

Lord Ram has invoked sage Parashuram's own admission that Laxman is a boy ("bālaku"—refer: Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 272) to request him not to take the latter's behaviour seriously and become annoyed; it is not worth it.

The Lord has compared Laxman's words with the vicious sting of a wasp ("Barrai"). In other words, the Lord could judge the mood of the sage and the way he has felt exceedingly hurt by Laxman's words which had stung the sage so viciously that his entire being was shaken as if a wasp had bitten him.

This is why verse no. 1 above says Lord Ram spoke to Parashuram with words that were cool, soothing and comforting as if the Lord was applying a balm on the sage's ruffled ego which was wounded by Laxman's harsh words, just like a man applies an ointment on the wound created by a wasp's sting.]

तेहिं नाहीं कछु काज बिगारा । अपराधी मैं नाथ तुझारा ॥ ४ ॥
 कृपा कोपु बधु बँधब गोसाई । मो पर करिअ दास की नाई ॥ ५ ॥
 कहिअ बेगि जेहि बिधि रिस जाई । मुनिनायक सोइ करौं उपाई ॥ ६ ॥ tēhīm nāhīm kachu kāja bigārā. aparādhi maim nātha tumhārā. 4.

 kṛpā kōpu badhu bamdhaba gōsā'īm. mō para kari'a dāsa kī nā'īm. 5.
 kahi'a bēgi jēhi bidhi risa jā'ī. munināyaka sō'i karaurū upā'ī. 6.

Besides this, he (Laxman) has not done any harm to anyone. In fact, it is me whom you should treat as the one who has offended you; it is me who is the culprit (because it is me who has broken the bow, the offence which has angered you so much). (4)

Treating me as one of your humble servants or someone who has submitted himself before you, you can decide to have mercy upon me (to show that you are highly gracious and fit to be called an exalted sage), or you can decide to wreak your anger at me by killing me or putting me in shackles (as punishment for the offence that I have done to you by breaking the bow)<sup>1</sup>. (5)

Meanwhile, oh the leader of sages ("munināyaka"), tell me quickly how your anger would subside, and I will endeavour to find a solution to it<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Ram tells Parashuram: "Oh great sage! You must first keep in mind that Laxman is not the real offender; it's me. So, in whatever way you want to deal with the offender, you should deal with me. But at the same time, before deciding on your course of action, you must keep in mind that I have submitted myself before you, and being an exalted sage and a learned Brahmin of high pedigree because you belong to the race owing its origin to the renowned sage Bhṛigu, you must watch your actions. The world is closely watching you.

The world would forgive Laxman because, as I have said, children are like mad men or wasps whom a wise man pays no attention to, but you are a grown-up and responsible sage, an acclaimed hermit. You can't find excuses for your misdemeanours, especially when I have surrendered before you. A sage gains honour in forgiveness, and not in bloodshed or seeking revenge. So be careful with how you decide to deal with my error. The best course of action for you would be to have mercy upon me and forgive me. But should you decide to vent your anger at me, you can either kill me as you have been threatening all along, or put me in shackles like a prisoner to punish me for breaking the bow.

Whatever you do, do it with me. Why involve Laxman who is not guilty of any crime?

<sup>2</sup>Lord Ram has played his cards well, and diplomatically. He has first given Parashuram a choice of either showing mercy that a sage is expected to show, or exhibiting cruelty by killing or shackling him that is never expected from a sage. Then Lord Ram addresses him as a “leader of sages”, or someone who must lead by example how a sage acts and responds to any given unfortunate situation, especially when the offending person is seeking forgiveness with all the humility he can command, and is also ready to undo the damage.

Any reckless action of revenge that sage Parashuram may be inclined to take would only give him a bad name, and would not serve his purpose of getting the bow repaired.

Both Laxman and Lord Ram have expressed their desire that they wish to surrender before sage Parashuram; both have asked for forgiveness independently so that the angry sage could overcome his anger. If the broken bow is the cause, then Laxman suggested that they should call an expert and get it repaired. If Parashuram wants something else, then Lord Ram here asks him to make a suggestion so that his wishes can be fulfilled. Either way, anger is no solution; it aggravates matters instead of ameliorating them.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 278 with respect to Laxman’s plea, and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 279 with respect to Lord Ram’s submission.]

कह मुनि राम जाइ रिस कैसें । अजहुँ अनुज तव चितव अनैसें ॥ ७ ॥
एहि केँ कंठ कुठारु न दीन्हा । तौ मैं काह कोपु करि कीन्हा ॥ ८ ॥ kaha muni rāma jā'i risa kaisēm. ajahum' anuja tava citava anaisēm. 7.

ēhi kēm kaṇṭha kuṭhāru na dīnhā. tau maim kāha kōpu kari kīnhā. 8.

The sage (Parashuram) said to Lord Ram—‘Ram, how can my anger go away (subside)? Even now, while you are trying to please me and ask for forgiveness and finding a solution for the vexed problem, your younger brother (Laxman) is looking at me with a sneer and mischief in his eyes. (7)

If I can’t or do not put my battle-axe on his neck (i.e. if I can’t or do not chop-off his neck), then all my anger goes in vain. What was the use for me to become angry if I can’t punish him by chopping-off his head with my sharp axe? (8)

[Note—Parashuram had become obsessed with Laxman. He could not divert his attention away from this naughty prince whose every move, no matter how innocuous it may have been, was interpreted by the offended sage as being directed at him to taunt him. If Laxman looked even causally at his direction, the offended sage thought that he is sneering at him. Laxman was by nature of a cheerful disposition; smile was part of his normal facial expression. But the sage interpreted this harmless smile as a taunting smirk directed at him to tease him.

Even when Lord Ram was speaking to him, sage Parashuram's gaze was fixed on Laxman; so annoyed was the sage with him that Laxman's mere presence was intolerable for him! Since he hadn't been able to punish Laxman, his anger at the latter could not be requited, and so no matter what Lord Ram said, the sage's anger would not subside as long as Laxman was in sight. And to the chagrin of Parashuram, he could not force Laxman out of the venue as the latter was standing next to sage Vishwamitra. Had Laxman been standing next to Lord Ram, perhaps the angry sage would have done exactly that—demand that Laxman be thrown out of the venue.

In fact, he has demanded from Janak that “Laxman be removed from his sight” as we shall read shortly in Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 280 below. But since Laxman was standing near sage Vishwamitra and not near Lord Ram, Parashuram couldn't force that his demands be met.

Now do we see how clever Laxman was when he decided to withdraw and go near his Guru, sage Vishwamitra when Lord Ram gestured him to stop his exchange of rancour with Parashuram as narrated in Doha no. 278 herein above.]

दो०. गर्भं स्रवहिं अवनिप रवनि सुनि कुठार गति घोर । परसु अछत देखउँ जिअत बैरी भूपकिसोर ॥ २७९ ॥

dōhā.

garbha sravahim avanipa ravani suni kuṭhāra gati ghōra.
parasu achata dēkha'um'ji'ata bairī bhūpakisōra. 279.

[The sage boastfully said: ] It is an irony that I am forced to see this ‘young son of a king’ (“bhūpakisōra”; meaning a prince), who is inimical towards me, alive, inspite of having my fierce battle-axe with me, the axe that is so formidable, relentless, powerful and merciless that when pregnant queens hear about it, they are so terrified that they abort automatically. (Doha no. 279)

[Note—Refer also to Baal Kand, Doha no. 272 in this context.

The infuriated sage was so highly incensed and exasperated that he does not realise the gravity of what he is saying. Lord Ram has just addressed him as a “leader of sages” (“Muni-naayak” in verse no. 6 that precedes this Doha), implying that Parashuram should be careful with what he says and does because he is supposed to exemplify the virtues of great sages and hermits as he is a ‘leader amongst them’. Who would expect that a great “Muni” goes on killing people and causing women to abort? It is a most shameful act. But Parashuram has lost his mental bearing because of his anger. This is exactly what Laxman had hinted to him in Doha no. 277 when he said that “anger is at the root of all sins”. Say, will anyone kill embryos while he is sober? It is a wild act of an equally wild mind.

Parashuram does not realize that he is willy-nilly inviting scorn and infamy by boasting about his killing sprees.

Nevertheless, the angry sage feels frustrated that he has not been able to vent his anger at Laxman. The same frustration is expressed again in Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 280 below when he is astonished why his hands do not move to strike at Laxman.]

चौ०. बहइ न हाथु दहइ रिस छाती । भा कुठारु कुंठित नृपघाती ॥ १ ॥
 भयउ बाम बिधि फिरेउ सुभाऊ । मोरे हृदयँ कृपा कसि काऊ ॥ २ ॥
 आजु दया दुखु दुसह सहावा । सुनि सौमित्रि बिहसि सिरु नावा ॥ ३ ॥

caupāī.

baha'i na hāthu daha'i risa chātī. bhā kuṭhāru kuṇṭhita nṛpaghātī. 1.
 bhaya'u bāma bidhi phirē'u subhā'ū. mōrē hṛdayam' kṛpā kasi kā'ū. 2.
 āju dayā dukhu dusaha sahāvā. suni saumitri bihasi siru nāvā. 3.

I am astonished and flustered as I wonder why my hands are not moving forward (to strike at Laxman). This inability to take revenge is causing me heart-burn. It is equally ironic that my merciless axe, that is famed as the killer of kings ("Nrip-Ghaati", because it had always shown thirst for blood of kings, and was eager to take revenge from kings and princes), too has been paralysed now<sup>1</sup>. (1)

It appears that Vidhi (the Creator) has become hostile towards me (as he is not letting me fulfill my wishes). Otherwise, how can my nature and temperament suddenly take an about turn? How can there be mercy in my heart? (2)

Today, the Creator has forced me to suffer the great agony of having to show mercy<sup>2</sup>!
 [I have never learnt to refrain from hitting my opponent immediately. But it is such a big mystery for me that I am unable to avenge my insult and punish Laxman. This is obviously because the Creator has become hostile towards me; he wishes to humiliate me and force me to go against my wishes and nature.]

When Saumitri (i.e. Laxman; literally, 'the son of queen Sumitra') heard this (funny) regret of Parashuram, he smiled once again and bowed his head.

[Laxman laughed subtly at this queer regret of Parashuram, because a sage should regret when he becomes angry but here we have a person who claims himself to be a sage and a Brahmin and regretting for showing mercy! He 'bowed his head' so as to prevent Parashuram from looking at him and observing the smile on his face as it would make the sage jump out of his skin with a fresh dose of anger.]<sup>3</sup> (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Parashuram explains in this verse the statement that he made in Doha no. 279 above where he says that he regrets that he is unable to put the axe on Laxman's neck. It is because his hands and his axe have both become paralysed. He wonders why it is so. Being unable to punish the offender for the first time in his life, Parashuram's inner being seems to get roasted in anger.

In the following verse no. 2 he blames the Creator, the "Vidhi", who has turned against him because the Creator is the one who determines each second of a person's life, and if the Creator does not want that Laxman be killed at the hands of Parashuram, then no matter what the latter does he won't be able to kill Laxman.

Therefore, in order to prevent Parashuram from killing Laxman, the Creator whom Parashuram considers as being unfavourable towards him has paralysed his hands and axe so that Laxman is not harmed.

This surprises Parashuram very much because it is at odds with his nature and temperament to let go of his enemy so easily.

As regards his hands it must be noted carefully here that he has been able hold his battle-axe in a menacing form in his hands, but this hand refuses to move forward and make a swiping movement so that the axe can strike at Laxman whom Parashuram has begun to wholesomely loathe as if the former was the latter's greatest and inveterate enemy.

We shall read below in Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 281 that when Parashuram challenges Lord Ram for a duel to prove that the Lord is worthy of being called "Ram", i.e. is worthy of being shown respect due to a warrior, his hand is raised and it holds the axe, but it isn't to strike at the Lord who stood with a bowed head.

<sup>2</sup>What a pity! A sage should wonder why he has lost his cool and become angry at any given time, but here we have a 'sage' who wonders "why he has not become sufficiently cruel and kill his opponent instantaneously"!

<sup>3</sup>How ironical it is that Parashuram feels ashamed to show mercy and compassion! He should, on the other hand, have been ashamed at showing anger as well as his boastings about his merciless killings. This is the reason why Laxman smirked and sneered once again at the ridiculous way Parashuram is behaving under the influence of anger. Parashuram has indeed made a clown of himself in the full assembly.]

बाड कृपा मूरति अनुकूला । बोलत बचन झरत जनु फूला ॥ ४ ॥
जौं पै कृपाँ जरिहि मुनि गाता । क्रोध भएँ तनु राख बिधाता ॥ ५ ॥ bā'u kṛpā mūrati anukūlā. bōlata bacana jharata janu phūlā. 4.

jauṁ pai kṛpām̐ jarihiṁ muni gātā. krōdha bha'ēm̐ tanu rākha bidhātā. 5.

Amused and unable to restrain himself, Laxman scoffed at Parashuram in a derisive manner, saying with open sarcasm in his words—"Oh sage! Your kind words that are spoken with a lot of wind (i.e. spoken aloud; spoken with a lot of boasting and haughtiness) are in accordance with your gracious image (form; countenance; appearance). [A lot of pun and mockery is involved here.]

When you speak it appears that flowers (that symbolize acidic words, rancour, vengeance, wrathfulness, bad temper etc.) are showering down from a tree symbolized by your image (that is like a ugly tree with a hard bark, with thorns sticking out everywhere from its trunk and branches, with red hot carnivorous flowers which trap insects and kill them, and that is so short of green leaves that it gives no shade to anyone who comes near it).<sup>1</sup> (4)

Oh sage, if your being benevolent and merciful has made your body burn as if it on fire, well then what would have happened if you would be angry; surely your body would burn to ashes!<sup>2</sup> (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Laxman is at his sarcastic best once again. He uses harmless words, but their hidden meaning and implication are very caustic. The reference to the "wind" has two meanings here—one, it means a boastful talk, and two, it means that when Parashuram says anything it appears that the wind or a strong breeze is causing bitter flowers to fall down from the tree that is symbolized by his body.

The wind will make the flowers fall down only when it is strong enough to shake the branches of a tree. So Laxman means that Parashuram is so angry that when he speaks his whole body shakes with anger; he gesticulates wildly and throws up his arms in the air as if punching someone there!

Laxman scoffs at Parashuram and says in effect that—“When Parashuram lets out his steam and begins to blow hot and cold, his words seem to be in consonance with his menacing appearance and fearful countenance. Is he not holding an axe, a bow and arrows? Why, say, has anyone ever seen a hermit, a sage and a Brahmin with these weapons?”

In this verse, Parashuram is compared to a tree that is hard and wild. This tree has dry and rough bark that would cut the skin of anyone trying to touch it. It does not provide any relief by way of shade to others, and instead it has sharp pointed thorns sticking out of its sides which will hurt anyone who wants to take a little rest by leaning his back against it. Its flowers are killers of insects, and foul smelling. Even the wind that grazes this tree becomes foul and hot.

<sup>2</sup>Parashuram has spared Laxman because the latter is a boy. This is tantamount to his showing mercy which is against his nature and reputation. Laxman taunts the sage by recalling his own admission that “his heart is burning with anger because he could not punish Laxman for whatever reason” as conceded by him in Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 280 herein above by saying that if having mercy causes his body to get so heated that his inner being is roasted, then if he did get actually angry in the way he is accustomed to be, then obviously he would be reduced to ash!

If the virtue of having mercy which always has soothing effect on the nerves and the mind causes the body to be hot as if being roasted in fire, then actual anger and being merciless would surely reduce Parashuram to ash because its heat is many times more intense.]

देखु जनक हठि बालकु एहू । कीन्ह चहत जड़ जमपुर गेहू ॥ ६ ॥
बेगि करहु किन आँखिन्ह ओटा । देखत छोट खोट नृप ढोटा ॥ ७ ॥
बिहसे लखनु कहा मन माहीं । मूढ़ें आँखि कतहुँ कोउ नाहीं ॥ ८ ॥ dēkhu janaka haṭhi bālaku ēhū. kīnha cahata jaṛa jamapura gēhū. 6.

bēgi karahu kina āṁkhinha ōṭā. dēkhata chōṭa khōṭa nrpa ḍhōṭā. 7.
bihasē lakhanu kahā mana māhīm. mūdēm āṁkhi katahum kō'u nāhīm. 8.

(Hearing the mocking words of Laxman, the frustrated sage Parashuram, who was out of wits, not knowing how he could tame Laxman, finally sought succour by turning to king Janak and saying in an exasperated tone—) ‘Look Janak! This stubborn boy (“Hati-Baalak”) wants to go to the abode of Jampur, the god of death*. [In other words, Laxman is constantly irritating me; and if I lose my cool I will kill him and send him to the abode of the god of death known as Jampur.]

*[This verse can be read in another way also: “Look Janak at this stubborn boy. It appears that he wishes to make the abode of the god of death, known as Jampur, as his home. In other words, don’t blame me if I kill him and send him to hell.] (6)

So, remove this son of a king (i.e. a prince; “Nrip Dhota”) out of my sight. He appears diminutive in size and very humble in his appearance, but actually he is highly pervert and wicked.<sup>13</sup> (7)

[Laxman was so mischievous that he still did not relent, but had a ready-made retort for Parashuram's asking Janak to remove him from sight and earshot. So—]

Laxman muttered to himself and said, 'Well, if one closes one's eyes, no one would be seen by him, and for all practical purposes he is left alone. [In other words, why is Parashuram not closing his eyes instead of asking him to leave the venue? If he does so, he will have an additional benefit—he won't be able to see the broken bow, the mere sight of which is keeping his anger alive.]<sup>2</sup>' (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In his exasperation, sage Parashuram turned to Janak in order to ensure that Laxman is made to keep quiet somehow, and not aggravate the already bitter feeling between them any further, because he thought that the king, being the host of the ceremony, would be able to restrain Laxman more effectively than either his elder brother Ram or his Guru sage Vishwamitra for till now they seem to be helpless in taming Laxman and prevailing upon him to shut up.

Lord Ram had attempted to quieten Laxman (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha nos. 276 and 278), but it had little impact on the latter. Perhaps this is because Laxman and Lord Ram shared a very congenial brotherly relationship with each other that kept them very close and made them love each other so dearly that neither of them was afraid that he would physically be harmed by the other. After all, Laxman had become angry because sage Parashuram was unnecessarily throwing a spanner in the wheel by trying to obstruct Lord Ram's marriage ceremony and insulting him by threatening to kill him for breaking the bow. It was a duty of Laxman to give moral and physical support to his brother when he is alone to face an angry and powerful adversary as the sage. Laxman just could not tolerate someone saying unpleasant words to Lord Ram or acting in a hostile manner with the Lord whom he loved most dearly.

Instead of strongly admonishing Laxman for his insolent behaviour in public, Lord Ram had sought his pardoning from Parashuram. The same thing was done by sage Vishwamitra when he too asked Parashuram to excuse Laxman, instead of scolding the latter to behave with respect with the renowned sage—refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 275.

Neither Lord Ram nor sage Vishwamitra had condemned Laxman for his misbehaviour. On the contrary, king Janak had declared that "Laxman must stop; his behaviour and words are very inappropriate"—refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 278. Therefore, Parashuram had some hopes from Janak that he may sternly pull up Laxman for his persistent impertinent and insolent behaviour because, being the host of the ceremony, it was the duty of Janak to maintain order and decency in the assembly.

The stunned Parashuram was left with no option but to seek Janak's help and intervention, with the hope that he, being the host and the ruler of the realm, would be in a better position to prevail upon his guest (Laxman) to mind his behaviour at least till the time he resides within the boundaries of his rule, for any irreverent behaviour shown to a great sage of Parashuram's stature by his guest, with the host (Janak) looking the other way and not taking any action, would be a very-very bad thing to happen, an event that would have a long-term ignominious consequences for the host king and his reputation.

So, what should Janak do to avoid the situation from slipping out of hand? He must remove Laxman from the site; send him out of sight by telling him to leave the arena and sit down somewhere else, out of sight and earshot of Parashuram.

<sup>2</sup>Earlier we have read that sage Vishwamitra had also muttered under his breath to say in essence that Parashuram seems to be hallucinating—refer: Baal Kand, Doha no. 275.

Laxman smiled at Parashuram's loss of sense and mental bearing because he is babbling incoherently, saying inconsistent things. First he had said that he would kill Laxman with his battle-axe (refer: Baal Kand—Doha no. 272 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 4-8; Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 274; again Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 275). Then he said that he is unable to lift his hands to kill Laxman and his axe has become stupefied (refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 280). And now he says that he will send Laxman to hell, i.e. to 'Jampur' which is the abode of the god of death (refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 280).

In other words it is clear that Parashuram won't be able to do anything that he threatens to do. He is making a clown of himself by such nonsensical statements. Unable to carry out his threats, he now wants Laxman out of the venue.

Not only this; he lost hopes from Lord Ram and sage Vishwamitra. So he has now turned for help to king Janak. He is behaving in a ridiculous manner like a man not certain of himself.

So, Laxman made the comments as narrated in the present verse no. 8 in a low voice ostensibly to himself, but with a sharp smirk and a sneer on his face, and loud enough so that Parashuram could hear it!]

दो०. परसुरामु तब राम प्रति बोले उर अति क्रोधु।

संभु सरासनु तोरि सठ करसि हमार प्रबोधु ॥ २८० ॥

dōhā.

parasurāmu taba rāma prati bōlē ura ati krōdhu.

sambhu sarāsanu tōri saṭha karasi hamāra prabōdhu. 280.

Then, Parashuram turned to Lord Ram in a very angry mood and said—'Oh you wicked fellow! You have first broken the (revered) bow of Lord Shiva, and now you give me a lecture, you teach me wise lessons! (Doha no. 280)

[Note—It is obvious that Parashuram's anger is directed more at Laxman than at Lord Ram because he had just overheard the former saying that "if one closes his eyes, no one would matter to him" when the angry sage wanted Laxman out of sight and earshot—refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 280. Parashuram took this statement of Laxman as a preaching, as if Laxman was teaching him a lesson as to how one can avoid someone who irritates him. Unable to face the irritating younger brother for fear of further insult, Parashuram preferred to deal with the elder brother who appeared to be docile, polite and more decent as compared to his younger sibling.

Besides this above conclusion we may also say that Parashuram was directly referring to Lord Ram's advice that the Lord had given him earlier. For instance, in which Lord Ram had essentially advised the sage that "he should forgive Laxman as the latter is merely a child, and children do not have the proper sense to decide how to behave with whom, and that elders should overlook mischief of innocent children".

Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 277; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 279.

This Doha also shows that by this time Parashuram had become fully aware that the bow had been broken by Lord Ram.]

चौ०. बंधु कहइ कटु संमत तोरें । तू छल बिनय करसि कर जोरें ॥ १ ॥
करु परितोषु मोर संग्रामा । नाहिं त छाड़ कहाउब रामा ॥ २ ॥ छलु तजि करहि समरु सिवद्रोही । बंधु सहित न त मारउँ तोही ॥ ३ ॥

caupāī.

bandhu kaha'i kaṭu sammata tōrēm. tū chala binaya karasi kara jōrēm. 1.
karu paritōṣu mōra saṅgrāmā. nāhiṁ ta chāṛa kahā'uba rāmā. 2.
chalu taji karahi samaru sivadrōhī. bandhu sahita na ta māra'um' tōhī. 3.

Your brother has your hidden (subtle) consent when he says such irritating and scorching words, and makes such scathing remarks at me. [For, otherwise, he wouldn't have dared to say things that he has said, and you wouldn't have taken his side by asking me to forgive him.]

And you are so cunning that you pray to me by holding your hands together as if to show how nice and submissive you are.<sup>1</sup> (1)

Satisfy me in a battle, or stop calling yourself a 'Ram'.<sup>2</sup> (2)

You, the enemy of Lord Shiva, must fight with me without employing any cunning tricks; otherwise I would kill you along with your brother.<sup>3</sup> (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Sage Parashuram assumed that Laxman had his elder brother's tacit support in confronting him and using scathing remarks for him. In Parashuram's views, Lord Ram has used Laxman as a front-man to rebuke the sage, and still pretend to be innocent and very polite. Otherwise, it is just not possible that Laxman would go on and on with his obtrusive and insolent behaviour without his elder brother telling him to shut up.

Parashuram in effect tells the Lord that he is very cunning and mischievous like his younger sibling. While he has given his subtle nod to Laxman to confront the sage, he himself pretends to be the holy-cow, docile and submissive, asking for mercy and forgiveness.

<sup>2</sup>By saying "stop calling yourself 'Ram' if you can't defeat me in an honest battle", Parashuram means that if Lord Ram can't defeat him in an even fight where no dirty tricks are played and only valour and skill are employed, then he will lose the right to call himself a warrior of this name, i.e. a warrior whose name incorporates the word "Ram", and thereby demean the greatness that is inherently attached with the word "Ram".

In other words, Parashuram says that the word "Ram" has great importance and it cannot be taken lightly; it is associated with someone who is the invincible conqueror of the world, the Supreme Lord of the world. A weak, wicked, pretentious and imbecile person has no right to use this great word as his name. In fact, the word "Ram" is called the 'Tarak Mantra', the spiritual formula which gives liberation, deliverance, emancipation and salvation to the soul of a creature. This is a universal doctrine accepted in the Upanishads, and an entire Upanishad known as the Ram Tapini Upanishad, having two elaborate divisions, is dedicated to it.

Lord Ram is the personified form of the Supreme Being, known in the Upanishads as “Brahm”, and in the Purans as the “Viraat Purush” or Lord Vishnu. It is only the Lord who has the right to call himself with this great name that has divinity and supremacy in this creation attached to it in a natural way.

So, Parashuram tells Lord Ram that it would be a matter of great shame and an issue that would need an immediate remedial action in the form of severe punishment if the latter can’t prove himself to be the original “Ram” as implied by the name. If that happens then clearly he is an imposter who is deceiving the world by using such a holy name, and therefore he (Parashuram) would punish him with death.

An interesting deduction can be made here. Sage Parashuram was not an ordinary Brahmin sage; he was very learned and well-versed in the scriptures. He must have known what the word “Ram” refers to in the scriptures. He must have also read in the Purans that time and again Lord Vishnu had taken the form of a human to overcome evil forces represented by the demons, and one such incarnation of Lord Vishnu was named “Ram”.

So he had become suspicious about who this particular prince calling himself ‘Ram’ was—because, by his own admission, he was surprised that his axe and his hand have refused to obey him when he tried to lift them to punish Laxman, and so he was forced to let-off the offender though it was completely against his nature. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 280.

Besides this, he was fully aware that to break the mighty bow of Lord Shiva was not a joke; only the Supreme Being himself could do it because no living being, either of the mortal world where humans live, or of the world where Spirits such as the various categories of gods and demi-gods live, can ever dare to destroy anything belonging to Shiva who himself is the “Maha Deva”, the Great God who is superior to all the gods in creation.

Therefore there must be surely some mystery in the whole episode of the breaking of the bow by this young prince. Parashuram was curious to find out what it was. Hence, he used this ploy of a battle to find out the truth, because if this prince was the real “Ram”, an incarnation of Lord Vishnu, it was sure that his identity would be revealed. Perhaps even Lord Shiva, Parashuram’s Guru, would intervene to restrain the sage from raising his weapons against the Supreme Lord of creation as it would be a horrendous sin that would be unpardonable. On the other hand, if this prince was an imposter, then Parashuram was determined to avenge his insult as well as the implied insult of Lord Shiva when the Lord’s bow was broken.

<sup>3</sup>This is what sage Parashuram meant when he said he would kill the two brothers if Lord Ram can’t ‘satisfy’ him in battle—i.e. if Lord Ram can’t convince him that he is indeed Lord Vishnu.]

भृगुपति बकहिं कुठार उठाएँ । मन मुसुकाहिं रामु सिर नाएँ ॥ ४ ॥
 गुनह लखन कर हम पर रोषू । कतहुँ सुधाइहु ते बड़ दोषू ॥ ५ ॥
 टेढ़ जानि सब बंदइ काहू । बक्र चंद्रमहि ग्रसइ न राहू ॥ ६ ॥ bhṛgupati bakahiṁ kuṭhāra uṭhā'ēṁ. mana musukāhiṁ rāmu sira nā'ēṁ. 4. gunaha lakhana kara hama para rōṣū. katahum' sudhā'ihu tē baṛa dōṣū. 5.

 tēṛha jāni saba banda'i kāhū. bakra candramahi grasa'i na rāhū. 6.

Bhṛigupati (sage Parashuram) was ranting and raving angrily with his raised hands that held the axe. [Parashuram continued to adopt a hostile posture, threatening to hit Lord Ram with his battle-axe.]

Meanwhile, Lord Ram smiled and politely lowered his head.<sup>1</sup> (4)

[Lord Ram said to Parashuram—] ‘The fault is of Laxman’s (that he has spoken out boldly before you, whose words and behaviour has provoked you so much because you took them as an affront, but upon whom you could not carry out your threats of severe punishment of killing him with your axe), and ironically now you are venting your anger upon me, and making me a scapegoat for your inability to punish him who has actually stoked the fire of wrath in you by boldly confronting you with impunity, and that too in full court, under full public scrutiny.

Indeed, sometimes it is true that politeness, humbleness and civility is a bane instead of being a virtue for the person who practices it<sup>2</sup>. (5)

Verily, if a person is wicked and crooked, (if people know that annoying or irritating him even slightly would invariably invite bitter scorn and a ‘bite like that of a wasp’—refer: Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 279), everyone would show him respect, everyone would be courteous towards him (though this show of respect and courteousness is superficial and done just to avoid any direct confrontation with him.

Indeed it is true as reflected in the case of the moon. Rahu (the mythological demon) does not devour a crooked (crescent) moon (for the fear of it getting stuck in its throat, lacerating it as well as causing suffocation)<sup>3</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Why did Lord Ram ‘smile’? It was a sarcastic smile because by now Parashuram’s boast had been exposed, and he could do nothing to punish Laxman though the latter had boldly confronted the sage and unrelentingly answered him back in the same tone as the sage threatened him. The sage had himself conceded a moment ago that he is astonished why his hands are not moving ahead to strike his opponent with the axe (refer: Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 280 above), and he has till now threatened in vain to kill the two brothers umpteen numbers of time. He has lost all sense of self-respect and propriety because in spite of proving himself in vain and incompetent to harm the two brothers he continues to make a mockery of himself by once again raising his axe as if to strike Lord Ram with it.

Why did Lord Ram lower his head? Well, the Lord lowered his head for two reasons. One was to tell the sage that instead of threats he should go ahead and use his axe on him by bringing it down on the Lord’s neck, if he can do it, that is. This will be clear from Chaupai line no. 7 herein below. And if he can’t do it, then it is high time that he stops this rubbish of boastful talk, and behave in a responsible manner like a sage of his stature should.

The second reason was to placate the angry sage and show him that the Lord does not want to confront and insult Parashuram in any way at all because he was a respectable sage as well as a Brahmin who was born in the illustrious race of an ancient and respected sage by the name of Bhṛigu. Lowering the head or bowing it before someone is a sign of respect and submission, and a gesture of seeking forgiveness and grace.

Lord Ram wished to reply to Parashuram's accusation that he was pretending to be humble and submissive while not only condoning his younger brother's misbehaviour but also giving a tacit support to the latter and signalling him secretly to go ahead and teach Parashuram a lesson. We have read that the angry sage has called Lord Ram 'cunning and pretentious' because on the one hand the Lord pretends to ask for forgiveness and on the other hand he signals Laxman to tease and insult the sage. Refer: Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 281 herein above.

Now, even Lord Ram would adopt a stern posture as we shall find out in the following verses because he feels that Parashuram understands only one language—and it is the language of toughness, rebuke, tit-for-tat, and hard talk. The sage won't yield to politeness; he thinks that a polite man is a coward. Being polite and civil with Parashuram would not stop him from continuing with his ranting and raving, his fretting and fuming, though it serves no purpose and shows him in a very poor light.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Ram said: "Oh sage, it is Laxman who has offended you, but unable to get square with him, you seem to avenge your hurt ego by directing your wrath at me because I am submitting myself before you and show politeness to you in deference to your exalted stature as being a Brahmin sage. My gesture of politeness and respect towards you is being misinterpreted by you as my weakness. So you have decided to seek revenge with me after you have failed miserably to settle your accounts with Laxman who was a proper match for you and a perfect antidote for your inflated ego.

I am polite with you unlike Laxman, so you have decided to be harsh with me. I have discovered to my dismay the truth of the adage that more often than not, good manners lead a man to more discomfiture than his being rude and ill-humoured in certain situations, for it scares the adversary away."

<sup>3</sup>Rahu is a demon who has a boon that he can eat the moon to squeeze out its nectar in order to derive his nourishment because his trunk had been severed by Lord Vishnu's discus during an event dating back to the churning of the celestial ocean by the gods and the demons. This story is narrated earlier as note no. 3 that accompanies Chaupai line no. 2 which precedes Doha no. 238 of this chapter known as Baal Kand of this book Ram Charit Manas.

Though Rahu devours a full moon, which according to mythology is the cause of the lunar eclipse, he is scared of eating the moon that has a carved-out edge, the edge which is curved like a sickle, or in other words 'an edge that is not perfectly rounded as during the night of the full moon', i.e. the 'crescent moon', because Rahu is afraid that this shape of the moon will cut his mouth, lacerate his throat, and cause grave injury to him, even leading to suffocation and death.

This metaphor is employed by Lord Ram to mean that the angry sage Parashuram has started avoiding Laxman now because he has discovered to his dismay and chagrin that Laxman would retort viciously and sting him like a wasp if the sage says anything more to the latter. But it's such an irony that finding Lord Ram polite and submissive and civil, Parashuram has decided to vent his anger at him.]

राम कहेउ रिस तजिअ मुनीसा । कर कुठारु आगें यह सीसा ॥ ७ ॥

जेहिं रिस जाइ करिअ सोइ स्वामी । मोहि जानिअ आपन अनुगामी ॥ ८ ॥

rāma kahē'u risa taji'a munīsā. kara kuṭhāru āgēm yaha sīsā. 7.
jēhīm risa jā'i kari'a sō'i svāmī. mōhi jāni'a āpana anugāmī. 8.

Lord Ram said to sage Parashuram—‘Oh sage, get rid of your anger and calm down. You have your axe in your hand, and my lowered head is in front of you. (7)

Oh Lord (svāmī), do anything you wish by which your anger may subside. [To wit, if you want to use your axe upon me, go ahead and do so.] But remember that I am your humble follower, and have submitted myself before you, before you take any impulsive action.

[In other words, be careful that the world is watching you and it knows that I have surrendered before you. Remember: If you harm me in any way by taking any reckless action in the context of your inability of harming my younger brother Laxman who had stood up against your threats and rantings, the world would not forgive you; you will invite the harshest of scorn and the greatest of ignominy by harming me. It would clearly mean that Laxman was right in beating you in your own game; he was right in giving you the bitter dose of medicine that you deserve.

And be warned also that Laxman is watching you. Be careful with your actions and hands. Remember: If you do decide to hurt me with your axe, Laxman would pounce upon you and cut-off your hands even before they reach my neck. Don't blame me later on for being instrumental in dismembering your body!]

 (8)

[Note—Parashuram was itching to strike with the axe though he has himself admitted that he won't be able to do so. Refer: Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precedes Doha no. 280.

So Lord Ram knew that Parashuram won't be able to harm him. But the Lord did not wish to give Parashuram a chance to say that he had not used his axe at him because he the Lord had begged for mercy and requested to spare his life. Instead, Lord Ram has invited Parashuram to use his axe on his neck as the Lord has lowered his head before Parashuram and told him to do anything he likes.

Hence, Parashuram could no longer boast of showing mercy or pity. He will have to admit in open court that he could not hurt either Laxman or Lord Ram as he was indeed 'full of wind' (i.e. boastful and pretentious) as Laxman has said earlier in Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 280.

So we see that Parashuram's anger has made him red-faced and an object of pity himself. Whatever dignity and respect he had for himself in the eyes of the people were crushed to pieces by his own anger and haughty nature. Indeed what Laxman had said in Doha no. 277 earlier has proved itself to be true in case of Parashuram—“that anger is at the root of all evil, that one loses his senses and wisdom under its evil influences, thereby inviting ill name for himself by behaving in an evil manner”.]

दो०. प्रभुहि सेवकहि समरु कस तजहु बिप्रबर रोसु।

बेषु बिलोकें कहेसि कछु बालकहू नहिं दोसु ॥ २८१ ॥

dōhā.

prabhuhi sēvakahi samaru kasa tajahu biprabara rōsu.
bēṣu bilōkēm kahēsi kachu bālakahū nahim dōsu. 281.

Why, there is no question of a battle or any kind of confrontation or a showdown between a humble servant and his lord (prabhuhi sēvakahi samaru kasa); it's unthinkable and ridiculous. So, oh exalted sage, discard your anger and be calmed down.

[Here, Lord Ram has compared sage Parashuram with the 'lord', and himself with a 'servant'. A servant always obeys his master; he cannot imagine of fighting with his lord.]

This boy (i.e. Laxman) has said something that has irritated you, but even then it is not entirely his fault. He has said whatever he said when he saw your appearances and your demeanours.

[Laxman in effect said, "Oh sage! Your appearance is more like a warrior than like a sage or hermit. Had your demeanours been like a sage and hermit who is expected to be calm, serene, munificent, smiling, friendly, contented and welcoming, one who inspires confidence and warmth and invites automatic respect and reverence from the person in front, instead of spreading terror and affright among the masses like you have done, I would naturally have treated you with the greatest of respect that would have surpassed what others may have shown to you.

But the problem is that your behaviour, visage and countenance give a signal that is quite the contrary. You had started shouting and threatening as soon as you stepped here. Tell me honestly then, is this becoming of a person who claims himself to be a respectful sage and a hermit and a Brahmin? Say then, how can you expect an inexperienced boy like me, who does not even recognise you, or knows who you actually are and about your exalted pedigree, to show respect to you in the light of your wielding the battle-axe threateningly at me and the rash way you are behaving, hopping and jumping madly here and there?

Therefore, the fault of this meeting turning so sour and dour, getting more hostile and bitter by the passage of each moment, with the accompanying verbal spat between you and me, actually lies with you and not with me!'] (Doha no. 281)

[Note—Refer: (i) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 268 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 4-8; (ii) Doha no. 273 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8; and (iii) Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 282 that follows herein below.]

चौ०. देखि कुठार बान धनु धारी । भै लरिकहि रिस बीरु बिचारी ॥ १ ॥

नामु जान पै तुहहि न चीन्हा । बंस सुभायँ उतरु तेहिं दीन्हा ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

dēkhi kuṭhāra bāna dhanu dhārī. bhai larikahi risa bīru bicārī. 1.

nāmu jāna pai tumhahi na cīnhā. bansa subhāyam̐ utaru tēhim̐ dīnhā. 2.

When he (Laxman) saw your battle-axe, the arrow and the bow, he thought that you were some warrior, and in his childishness<sup>1</sup> he became annoyed and angry. (1)

Inspite of coming to know your name<sup>2</sup>, he could not recognise you and your potentially fully, and therefore he replied to you in a way to which he is accustomed to in accordance with the race to which he belongs<sup>3</sup>.

[To wit, Laxman replied to you in a way that all princes belonging to the Kshatriya race are accustomed to. They cannot tolerate anyone threatening them and trying to brow-beat them into submission with boastful talk and pretensions, wielding weapons at them and raving boastfully about their killing sprees. When you claimed that you had killed Sahastrabaahu and the Kshatriya kings at random, it simply meant that you were threatening Laxman with the same fate. Why, couldn't you have said calmly at the outset that you had immense mystical powers by doing severe Tapa, that you had pleased Lord Shiva, that since you regard Lord Shiva as your patron deity it is annoying to you that the Lord's bow should be broken by someone, and that it is the prime reason of your getting hurt and angry and you wish to know why this Shiva's bow was broken, before you started yelling and threatening us with death.

Why, even without acquainting yourself with the facts and the ground realities in a calm manner, even without determining whether the bow was broken to willfully insult Shiva or because Shiva himself had disliked it so much that he did not want to keep it with him and had intended it to get rusted and perish in due course of time so as to get rid of its memory, and therefore it was just incidental that it got broken as soon as I (Ram) touched it, you have behaved in an irrational manner that is hostile, belligerent and aggressive, ranting and raving from the instant you had put your feet in the arena? You ought to have clarified matters first and then taken appropriate action, oughtn't you?

Say oh sage, what do you expect from others if you don't behave in a dignified manner befitting your own stature as a great sage, a revered hermit and an honourable Brahmin. In that case, I say in all sooth, Laxman would have paid his obeisance to you for we are taught to show the greatest of respects to elders, especially Brahmins, sages, seers and hermits. If you have any doubts, please ask sage Vishwamitra; he will vouch for every word I am uttering.

But instead of it if you act like a boastful warrior, menacingly threatening vengeance at others for no fault of theirs, then obviously you must be prepared to get a corresponding response from them like the one that Laxman gave you.] (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 273, Laxman has himself said that he has spoken rudely with Parashuram because he saw the axe, the bow and the arrow, ensembles of a warrior and not of a sage or a hermit. Therefore, being a warrior prince, Laxman says he replied to Parashuram in a manner befitting a warrior. In this present verse, Lord Ram reiterates the same thing.

Earlier also, Lord Ram had requested the angry sage to pardon Laxman because he was a 'child' ("Sisu") and a 'servant' ("Sevak") of the sage—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 277.

Sage Parashuram has himself accepted that Laxman is a mere child, or an immature boy, and it is because of this that he does not hit him—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 272.

<sup>2</sup>Laxman had said himself that he knew that Parashuram was a son in the family of sage Bhrigu, and therefore a Brahmin—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precedes Doha no. 273.

So, what Lord Ram meant was that though Laxman knew about Parashuram being a son of the family of Bhrigu, he wasn't aware of the sage's rare personal spiritual achievements and mystical powers that he had acquired by doing severe Tapa and Yoga (penances and meditation). Laxman treated Parashuram as an ordinary son of some sage, because in ancient times many sages used to marry and have families. One good instance is that of sage Vasistha, the royal priest of the kingdom of Ayodhya to which the two brothers, Lord Ram and Laxman, belonged.

So Laxman thought that Parashuram was some spoilt son of Bhrigu's family who is accustomed to boast and go around throwing his weight on others, threatening them of punishment by invoking his Brahmin race.

Laxman might have also deduced that since Parashuram was a mass murderer of kings and possessed many negative traits such as a short temper, ego, haughtiness, arrogance, recklessness etc., perhaps his father (Jamdagni) was so disgusted by his behaviour that he had thrown him out of his hermitage, disowning him and disinheriting him from the legacy of sage Bhrigu.

<sup>3</sup>Parashuram had loudly boasted about his many rarities. But these achievements were all of a negative nature, such as for instance his slaying of Sahastrabaahu (Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 271), his famed anger as well as his renown as a perpetual enemy of the Kshatriya race so much so that he had mercilessly killed countless numbers of kings over time and again (Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 272).

This claim of Parashuram—that he had killed Kshatriya kings many times over—had only led to Laxman being enraged as the latter thought that Parashuram was citing these killings to threaten him. And any brave prince worth his name won't tolerate this behaviour; he won't be cowed down by a person who thinks random bloodshed is something of credit and worthy of boasting about.

So, therefore, Laxman replied to Parashuram in a way that is appropriate for a brave and fearless prince.]

जौं तुह्म औतेहु मुनि की नाई । पद रज सिर सिसु धरत गोसाईं ॥ ३ ॥ छमहु चूक अनजानत केरी । चहिअ बिप्र उर कृपा घनेरी ॥ ४ ॥

jauṁ tumha autēhu muni kī nā'īṁ. pada raja sira sisu dharata gōsā'īṁ. 3.
chamahu cūka anajānata kērī. cahi'a bipra ur kṛpā ghanērī. 4.

Oh sage! Had you appeared to be like a sage and a hermit ("Muni"), this child ("Sisu") would have put his head on the dust of your feet (or, he would have put the dust of your feet to his head) as a mark of showing great respect to you.<sup>1</sup> (3)

So, whatever he has done was done inadvertently and out of ignorance. You should therefore forgive him. Oh sage, a Brahmin ought to have a lot of mercy, grace and kindness in his heart (as this is their special quality that sets them apart from the rest of the society, making them respected and honourable).<sup>2</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Ram means to tell Parashuram that if the latter had been polite and affable like one expects a learned Brahmin and a renowned sage and hermit to be, Laxman would have shown the greatest respect by putting his head to Parashuram's feet.

This is what they have been taught—to show great respect to elders, to sages and Brahmins. There are ample proofs of it—for instance, when sage Vishwamitra came to Ayodhya to request king Dasrath to send the two brothers with him to his hermitage so that the demons who had been defiling his fire sacrifice could be eliminated, the king had summoned his four sons, i.e. Lord Ram and his other three brothers, and made them bow at the feet of the sage. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 207.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Ram has subtly and politely chided Parashuram with this observation. Parashuram has become so angry at Laxman because he feels insulted by the latter's behaviour. But for this behaviour of Laxman, it is Parashuram who himself is responsible as has been clearly said in Chaupai line nos. 1-3 herein above. Laxman was a Kshatriya prince, so his behaviour is understandable.

But what defense has Parashuram for his own rowdy behaviour? He has not at all acted in a decent and polite manner like a learned Brahmin or a wise sage, or even a responsible adult should have. Instead, his behaviour reminds one of street urchins, hooligans and pervert ruffians itching for creating nuisance and raucous.

Hence, Lord Ram urges Parashuram to exhibit noble virtues of a Brahmin by showing grace and compassion.]

हमहि तुहहि सरिबरि कसि नाथा । कहहु न कहाँ चरन कहँ माथा ॥ ५ ॥

राम मात्र लघु नाम हमारा । परसु सहित बड़ नाम तोहारा ॥ ६ ॥ hamahi tumhahi saribari kasi nāthā. kahahu na kahām̐ carana kham̐ māthā.

5.

rāma mātra laghu nāma hamārā. parasu sahita barā nāma tōhārā. 6.

Say, how can there be any comparison between me* and you<sup>1</sup>?

[*The first word used in this verse is “Hamahi” which has a singular as well as a plural connotation. If the singular meaning is taken, then it would mean ‘me’, a reference to the speaker, which in this case is Lord Ram. However, the plural would be ‘we’, and in this case the verse would mean that Lord Ram includes Laxman when he says that the sage is so exalted and great that there can be no comparison between the two brothers and him. All the anger and fire have no ground, and are raging without any cause.]

Say, how can one compare the feet with the head<sup>2</sup>?

[This part of the verse may also be read as—“Wherever your holy feet are, I am (or ‘we’ are) ready to put my (or ‘our’) head (s) there to show you respect”.] (5)

My name is a small one, consisting of only one word ‘Ram’, but yours is a big one because it has the prefix ‘Parashu’ attached to it<sup>3</sup>.

[Parashu + Ram = Parashuram, the name of the sage. Lord Ram means that even in their names, the sage's name is ‘bigger’ as compared to the Lord's name. So, as the Lord has said above, ‘There is no comparison between you and me. Your name has a prefix attached to it, and this prefix, the word ‘Parashu’ meaning an axe, instantly makes you so distinguished amongst all the warriors on this earth. I am merely a humble person with no distinguishing title attached to my name. So oh sage, how can I ever deem myself to be equal to you. Perish the thought and calm down.’]

(6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Ram has indirectly hinted to sage Parashuram that there is no comparison between them because the Lord is a personified form of the Supreme Being, and Parashuram symbolizes an ordinary creature engulfed in worldly delusions and attachments. Otherwise, if Parashuram is a true hermit and renunciate, why is he so bothered about a gross thing such a bow? Does he not know that Lord Shiva had himself felt disgusted with this bow, and hating to keep it with him he had kept it with the ancestors of king Janak? Notwithstanding the history of this bow, a hermit and a renunciate sage should be detached and dispassionate towards everything related to this mundane gross world; he should be of a loving and compassionate temperament, and not vengeful and acerbic like Parashuram.

Even if Lord Ram’s sublime form as the Supreme Being is overlooked, the Lord has exhibited all the noble virtues and exemplary characters that a good human being should possess. On the other hand, Parashuram has all the negative characters one ought to avoid. So, naturally and obviously there is no comparison. But Parashuram’s anger had so much the better of him that he still could not understand the hidden suggestions in Lord Ram’s statements, and continued with his earlier acrimonious posture.

<sup>2</sup>The ‘feet’ is the lowest part of the body and is a metaphor for someone who is humble and lowly. On the other hand, the ‘head’ stands for an exalted stature, a high position and of learning. After all, Ram was a Kshatriya prince, and Parashuram was a Brahmin. A Brahmin is always more respectable as compared to any other class in the society. How can a very junior man compare himself to one who is very senior to him in the social hierarchy and pedigree as the feet is to the head?

Lord Ram makes these observations to somehow assuage the sage’s ruffled ego and calm him down. Parashuram was accustomed to outright submission from his opponents, expecting people to fall down at his feet wherever he went, and it was the first time in his life he faced the treatment that Laxman had meted out to him. So, by these polite and prayerful words of humility and humbleness, Lord Ram tries to sooth the sage’s anger and sort of apply an ointment on his wounded ego.

He essentially tells Parashuram that he as well as his brother Laxman fall down at his feet because he is a Brahmin, and so Parashuram should also behave like a true Brahmin by forgiving them and discarding his anger and smitefulness.

<sup>3</sup>There is a profound spiritual message here. Lord Ram’s name “RAM” (pronounced as “Raam” or “Rāma”) is a great Mantra, a spiritual formula that provides liberation, deliverance, emancipation and salvation to a creature’s soul. It is therefore known as a ‘Tarak Mantra’, one that takes the living being across the ‘Bhava-Sagar’, the ocean represented by this world of delusions, miseries, birth and death.

Here, the Lord has advised his devotees not to dilute the holiness and divinity of his Tarak Mantra by adding unnecessary letters or words or phrases to it. Let the Holy Name retain its pristine glory by being plain and simple “RAM”.

Another interpretation of this verse is that if someone acts smart by tampering with this holy name by adding letters to it in his enthusiasm to make it look more attractive and effective, he is not only making a fool out of himself but also poisoning the name “RAM” because any addition to it would make it have the same effect as the word “Parashuram” has. That is, just like sage Parashuram possessing all the characters that are opposite of Lord Ram inspite of having the word “Ram” as part of his name, any tweaking of the Holy Name “RAM” by additions of any kind would make it spiritually ineffective and dangerous for the person who uses it for his spiritual practices. This is because instead of being of any help, it would only create problems for the practitioner just like the prefix ‘Parashu’, which means an ‘axe’, had changed the entire nature and character of a sage from being someone worthy of respect and showing exemplary virtues, to someone who is foul mouthed, someone who is full of rancour, spite and haughtiness, someone who is despised by the world at large.]

देव एकु गुनु धनुष हमारे । नव गुन परम पुनीत तुझारे ॥ ७ ॥

सब प्रकार हम तुझ सन हारे । छमहु बिप्र अपराध हमारे ॥ ८ ॥

dēva ēku gunu dhanuṣa hamārēm. nava guna parama punīta tumhārēm. 7.
saba prakāra hama tumha sana hārē. chamahu bipra aparādha hamārē. 8.

*Oh Lord! (Another reason why no comparison can be made between your exalted stature and me is as follows—) While I have only one quality, and it is that I have a bow which makes me a warrior, you have nine divine qualities<sup>1</sup>. [So, obviously you are much senior to me in every respect.]

[*This verse can be read as follows also—“Oh Lord! While my bow has only one quality, and it is to win wars, your bow has nine divine qualities in it, so where is a comparison between the two of us?”<sup>2</sup>] (7)

Nevertheless, I* have accepted defeat in every possible way (or, I am inferior to you in all possible way, and I as well as my younger brother Laxman have no intention whatever either to show any disrespect to you or confront you).

So oh Brahmin! I apologise to you and request you to please forgive my faults (by showing tolerance, fortitude, understanding, magnanimity, graciousness and maturity of thought befitting your exalted stature).<sup>3</sup>] (8)

[*Once again, if the word “Hama” used in the text is technically interpreted to mean a plural pronoun, then Lord Ram includes Laxman in requesting sage Parashuram to pardon them. So, the Lord says—“We have accepted that we are much inferior to you in all possible way and means. Now respected Brahmin, please pardon us for our inadvertent mistakes, for we are but children before you and expect a fatherly treatment from your exalted self.”] (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The ‘nine divine qualities’ mentioned by Lord Ram are the nine auspicious and noble virtues that are inherently present in a Brahmin as well as in a sage. They are the following—Sham (equanimity; evenness of mind; tranquility), Dam (self-restraint), Tapa (penance and austerity), Shauch (cleanliness and purity, external and internal), Kshama (forgiveness, forbearance), Aarjav (straightforwardness; honesty in behaviour and talk), Gyan and Vigyan (knowledge and self-realisation), and Vishwas (belief in God; faith and conviction). Refer: Krishna’s Gita, 18/42.

Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 284 also.

So in essence, Lord Ram told sage Parashuram that he (Ram) is merely a warrior, but Parashuram is a warrior who is a Brahmin as well. So Parashuram should keep in mind his exalted position and act accordingly. Whatever had happened till now was justified in the light of the fact that it was a face-off between two brave warrior, but Parashuram must realize that his position was unique because besides being a warrior he is also an exalted Brahmin. As a warrior it is alright that he threatened his adversary and opponent (Laxman and Lord Ram) with severe punishment by killing them with his axe for their supposedly misdeeds, but being a Brahmin it is now expected of him that he would put all bitterness behind when his purported enemy has surrendered before him and is ready to put his head on his feet (refer: Chaupai line nos. 3 and 5 that precede Doha no. 282).

Now, Parashuram must exhibit the noble characters of a sage and a Brahmin by forgiving the two brothers and bless them instead.

<sup>2</sup>The second interpretation would be as follows—For a warrior, his bow is his identity, his insignia and a symbol of his authority. Similarly, for a Brahmin and a sage, his nine noble virtues listed above are his identity, a sign of his moral authority and superiority in society. So, Lord Ram praises sage Parashuram by telling him that he, being a sage and a Brahmin, has as many as nine good qualities in him in addition to his abilities as a warrior which is evident in the form of his axe, bow and arrow.

<sup>3</sup>Lord Ram has asked Parashuram to forgive him and his younger brother by giving two independent reasons. For Laxman the Lord says he should be forgiven because he is an inexperienced child who does not know what to say to whom, and who could not recognize who truly Parashuram was. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 279; (ii) Doha no. 281; and (iii) Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 282.}

For himself Lord Ram says that he has always respected Parashuram, never teased him, and considers himself very junior as compared to the exalted stature of the Brahmin sage. Lord Ram even hinted that he has admonished Laxman for his behaviour which is anyhow excusable given his basic nature not to submit to threats and his level of maturity which is still like a child. So he deserves, and must be, pardoned. {Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Doha no. 276; (ii) Doha no. 278; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 279; (iv) Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 279; (v) Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 281; and finally (vi) Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 282.}]

दो०. बार बार मुनि बिप्रबर कहा राम सन राम ।

बोले भृगुपति सरुष हसि तहूँ बंधु सम बाम ॥ २८२ ॥

dōhā.

bāra bāra muni biprabara kahā rāma sana rāma.

bōlē bhr̥gupati saruṣa hasi tahūṁ bandhu sama bāma. 282.

Lord Ram addressed his namesake (i.e. Parashuram) by using honourable epithets such as calling the latter ‘a sage and a hermit’ (“muni”) or an ‘exalted Brahmin’ (“biprabara”) in order to show respect to Parashuram and try to calm his anger down.

But unfortunately Parashuram took even this show of reverence as an affront and a taunt. So he smiled wryly, and angrily said to Lord Ram—‘You are also as wicked as your brother.’ (Doha no. 282)

[Note—Parashuram has become so biased and devoid of rational thinking due to his anger that even harmless gestures are taken in the wrong light by him. This episode teaches us that when one is angry, no matter what we do to make him see reason and overcome his anger, the angry person won't understand anything because of his prejudices.

Parashuram has earlier also accused Lord Ram of being wicked and cunning as the latter purportedly has given his tacit support to Laxman when the latter was answering him back, while pretending to be nice and humble by asking for forgiveness—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 281.

Angry as he was, he took every gesture and every harmless word as a taunt and insult. Now he has gone beyond limits by interpreting such innocuous words as a 'Brahmin' and a 'sage' as teasing.]

चौ०. निपटहिं द्विज करि जानहि मोही । मैं जस बिप्र सुनावउँ तोही ॥ १ ॥
चाप स्रुवा सर आहुति जानू । कोपु मोर अति घोर कृसानू ॥ २ ॥
समिधि सेन चतुरंग सुहाई । महा महीप भए पसु आई ॥ ३ ॥
मैं एहिं परसु काटि बलि दीन्हे । समर जग्य जप कोटिन्ह कीन्हे ॥ ४ ॥

caupāī.

nipaṭahiṁ dvija kari jānahi mōhī. maiṁ jasa bipra sunāva'um' tōhī. 1.
cāpa sruvā sara āhuti jānū. kōpu mōra ati ghōra kṛsānū. 2.
samidhi sēna caturaṅga suhāī. mahā mahīpa bha'ē pasu āī. 3.
maiṁ ēhiṁ parasu kāṭi bali dīnhē. samara jagya japa kōṭinha kīnhē. 4.

[Parashuram ego was so hurt by now that instead of grasping at the opportunity to quit the futile confrontation that leads him nowhere and only causes him more and more embarrassment, he started boasting about his achievements and valour once again in an attempt to bolster his self-esteem and assuage his ruffled ego. So, the sage outlined his achievements as a fearless and invincible warrior when he told Lord Ram—] 'You know me to be merely a Brahmin. What sort of Brahmin I am, I will tell you now.

[To wit, you (Ram) underestimate my potentials and powers, thinking that I am an ordinary Brahmin, and you say you give me respect just by the virtue of my being a Brahmin. But you don't know that I am not an ordinary Brahmin, but someone who stands apart from the run-of-the-mill Brahmins you are talking about. I have certain special qualities in me which I shall enumerate now, and which has set me apart from the rest of the Brahmin race. Therefore, I deserve special treatment even in the community of Brahmins. How dare you show disrespect to me?]<sup>1</sup> (1)

[I, Parashuram, will now describe to you the symbolic fire sacrifice that I do as a Brahmin.] You (Lord Ram) must know and understand that my bow is like the ladle used to offer oblations to the sacred fire, while my arrows are the offerings themselves. My formidable anger is equivalent to the blazing fire of the sacrifice. (2)

The firewood used in this sacrifice (known as the "Samidha") consists of the four wonderful wings of the army of kings (represented by the horses, the chariots, the elephants and the foot-soldiers, the infantry). The sacrificial animal of the great fire sacrifice that I do is represented by great kings whom I slay in battle. (3)

I have used this battle-axe of mine to kill them to complete my sacrifice, and in this way I have completed countless such sacrifices in the form of battles and wars, all the while muttering sacrificial Mantras (i.e. doing ‘Japa’ or repetition of sacred hymns or formulas) in the form of war cries as part of the ritual.<sup>2</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We see that Parashuram is still not satisfied and wants to brag more of his achievements. A Brahmin’s main duty in ancient times was to perform fire sacrifices. A fire sacrifice involves many basic steps. Parashuram uses these steps as metaphors to emphasise that he is a ‘Warrior Brahmin’, and not one who merely sits around a sacred fire chanting abstract Mantras. When we read the following verse nos. 2-4 we will see that he regards his martial skills and maneuverings in battle as being equivalent to the skills a normal Brahmin has in completing rituals of a fire sacrifice successfully.

Hence, Parashuram wishes to tell Lord Ram that he deserves double respect—one as a Brahmin, and other for being a great warrior, a respect that is usually reserved for a Kshatriya king. In other words, he wants to stress that in the human race he is perhaps the only person who embodies the greatness of a Brahmin as well as of a Kshatriya. Therefore, he deserves to be revered, shown respect to and honoured both as a learned Brahmin who leads the society in religious matters, as well as a Kshatriya who gives protection to the society from being harmed by others.

This observation by Parashuram is motivated by Lord Ram’s statement that “in all respects, sage Parashuram is senior to him”. Parashuram wants to make it known that he is senior not only because he is born a Brahmin, but also because he possesses grand qualities of great warriors. A born-Brahmin may not always deserve a high degree of respect if he does not live up to the expectations one has from him by the virtue of his birth in the exalted race in which he is born, as is true in the case of Parashuram—because he shows many negative traits that are unwelcome in a Brahmin. For instance, he is notorious for his anger, intolerance, lack of restraint, desire for revenge, haughtiness, boastfulness, killing sprees etc., nothing that behoves of a noble Brahmin. Even Lord Ram has hinted at it in Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 282.

So, sage Parashuram tries to defend himself here that he may lack in some of the eclectic qualities of a Brahmin, but he has compensated for them by possessing some other grand qualities that also invite equal respect and honour—such as the qualities and abilities of a great warrior. A warrior is highly respected by the entire society because he is the one under whose protective umbrella even the Brahmins live in peace.

So in effect Parashuram snubs Lord Ram and scoffs at his statements that he (Ram) is junior to Parashuram—refer: Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 282. ‘Yes indeed it is so; what’s new in it’—the angry sage implies to tell the Lord. ‘While you (Lord Ram) are merely a ‘Kshatriya’ prince, I, Parashuram, combine the goodness of a Brahmin as well as a Kshatriya. So how can you compare yourself with me?

‘Yes indeed’, Parashuram wishes to declare to the assembly while speaking to Lord Ram, ‘I am definitely senior to Lord Ram because I possess the qualities of a warrior, and therefore twice as much honourable and worthy of respect too because I am a Brahmin also! If this is the case, then aren't the two brothers ashamed of themselves for humiliating me in the way they have done?'

<sup>2</sup>This statement of sage Parashuram is an answer to Laxman and to Lord Ram who have independently told him that his martial appearances as evidenced by his holding of an axe, a bow and an arrow had led Laxman to believe that he was a 'warrior'. Refer: Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 273; (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 282; and (iii) Doha no. 281 respectively.

Meanwhile, Lord Ram has treated him as a mere 'Brahmin'. Refer: Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 279; (ii) Doha no. 281; (iii) Doha no. 282 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8.

Besides this, Lord Ram's advice to Parashuram to discard anger and show mercy at them was also taken in the wrong light by the sage. He regarded this advice as a lecture to him. He wants to justify why he is reluctant to show mercy at anyone whom he challenges for a duel. It is because like other normal run-of-the-mill Brahmins who perform fire sacrifices as part of their religious duty, he too performs a fire sacrifice, but with a difference. He uses his bow as a ladle, his arrow as the offering, his anger as the raging fire, and the killing of Kshatriya kings with their huge armies as the sacrifice of the animal done during a routine fire sacrifice. Since sacrificing of an animal is a routine part of a fire sacrifice which cannot be completed without this ritual, Parashuram deems it obligatory to 'sacrifice Kshatriya kings' in order to complete the type of sacrifice he has chosen to do.

A very interesting thing is to be observed here. Though Parashuram has not mentioned here in explicit terms, perhaps because he was too agitated to think coherently, a fire sacrifice remains incomplete without the final donation that is to be given to the priests, the Brahmins, who participate in the performance of the fire sacrifice. Well, Parashuram does that too—after the sacrificial ritual in which he chopped-off the heads of kings in the place of animals, he 'donated the earth to Brahmins as gift'—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 272.

So Parashuram seems to defend himself from the charge leveled against him that he has been rampaging around the earth killing kings just because he had become arrogant, haughty, blood-thirsty and mad, or because he found sadistic pleasure in it. He gives this justification for his actions by saying that he treats it as a 'religious obligation because for him it is equivalent to doing a fire sacrifice in the conventional way it is done'.

This being the case, he is not sinful or guilty of mass murder or bloodshed by killing Kshatriya kings on the one hand, and of being short-tempered and spouting vitriol, fire and brimstone on the other hand. It is a part of his religious vows; it is the way he has chosen for himself to do the fire sacrifice that a Brahmin must do.

After all, a Brahmin is also guilty of killing an innocent animal during the final rituals of a fire sacrifice when the animal is killed by cutting-off of its head in the name of 'offering of sacrifice'; obviously it is technically a murder of an innocent and helpless creature who is not even given a chance to defend itself. At least Parashuram gives the kings whom he 'sacrifices' a level playing field when he wages a war against them, for they are openly given a chance to either defend themselves or defeat him. In this context any neutral observer would agree that Parashuram was less sinful than other Brahmins who performed fire sacrifice involving killing of animals.

One more important thing comes to the mind in this context. The fire sacrifice was of two types—one that the Brahmins did in their households as a regular form of personal worship of the Fire God, and the other that was organized by kings on large scale as a state affair. Animals were sacrificed in the second type of fire sacrifices—i.e. the one that was organized by kings. The Brahmins were the ones who actually did the rituals, and the king was the patron. The rewards of such sacrifices were deemed to accrue to the kings, and only a minute fraction went to the Brahmin priests because they received monetary rewards in lieu of their efforts. The killing of an innocent animal is a heinous crime and a sinful act by all accounts, and no amount of justifications can condone this act. Since animal sacrifice was a part of such fire sacrifices, those who participated in it, those who actually killed the animal, those who ordered it to be killed, those who financed this crime—in short, everyone involved in this heinous crime was guilty of snuffing out an innocent life. That is, both the patron king as well as the Brahmin priest was equally guilty of murder and bloodshed in the false premise of doing something religious. The king was doubly guilty—because he was instrumental in making the Brahmins commit this crime. Left to themselves, the Brahmins wouldn't have done it, as they do not kill any animal in the personal fire worship they do regularly in their individual households.

If the reward of the fire sacrifice went to the king, the punishment of the crime of killing an innocent, helpless and harmless creature, shrieking for mercy and compassion, too should be of the king. This is one prime reason why Parashuram, on the behalf of the entire Brahmin race, went on killing the kings to punish them for luring the Brahmins to commit the grave crime of killing an animal in the name of a sacrificial ritual.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 272.

One wonders that if Parashuram had killed the Kshatriya kings repeatedly, how come the two great dynasties of the time, i.e. the Raghu dynasty of Ayodhya and the Nimi dynasty of Janakpur survived?

The answer is found in Padma Puran, Uttar Khand, Canto 242, verse no. 159 where Parashuram has himself told Lord Ram that the descendants of the 'Ikshwaku dynasty' belonged to the line of kings tracing its origin to Parashuram's maternal grandfather. Therefore, he can't kill them. Both these two dynasties, i.e. the Raghu dynasty to which Lord Ram belonged, and the Nimi dynasty to which Sita belonged, were off-shoots of the Ikshwaku dynasty.

In Srimad Bhagwat Maha Puran, Skandha 9, Canto 9, verse nos. 4-5, and Canto 10, verse nos. 1-2, sage Shukdeo says that when Parashuram was on the mission of eliminating all the kings from the surface of earth, a son named 'Moolak' was born to king Ashmak. The ladies hid the son and so he escaped being killed by Parashuram. Later on, he became the progenitor of the new generation of kings. After four-five generations in his line, king Raghu was born. Raghu's son was king Aja, and the latter's son was Dasrath. Lord Ram was Dasrath's son.]

मोर प्रभाउ बिदित नहिं तोरें । बोलसि निदरि बिप्र के भोरें ॥ ५ ॥

भंजेउ चापु दापु बड़ बाढ़ा । अहमिति मनहुं जीति जगु ठाढ़ा ॥ ६ ॥

mōra prabhā'u bidita nahim tōrēm. bōlasi nidari bipra kē bhōrēm. 5.
bhanjē'u cāpu dāpu baṛa bāṛhā. ahamiti manahum̐ jīti jagu ṭhāṛhā. 6.

You (Lord Ram) are totally unaware of my astounding powers and glories. You call me merely a 'Brahmin' (or, you talk with me as I was merely an ordinary Brahmin). (5)

By breaking the bow you have become very haughty and stand here thinking that you have done some stupendous deed, making you behave as if you have conquered the world!' (6)

[Note—Parashuram means to say that Lord Ram thinks he is a great warrior by breaking a creaky bow, and it has led him to become bold enough to dare to take a stand against the mighty sage by speaking out fearlessly to him and giving excuses for the misdemeanours of his brother, instead of prostrating before the sage and touching his feet, and shaking with fear like the rest of the kings had done when Parashuram had entered the arena—refer: Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 268; and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 269.

That is why Parashuram lists his exploits in the battle-field and says that he has used his 'bow' as the ladle for performing the fire sacrifice symbolized by countless wars.

Parashuram was obliquely hinting at Janak who had got this declaration made by his heralds at the beginning of the bow-breaking ceremony—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 250.]

राम कहा मुनि कहहु बिचारी । रिस अति बड़ि लघु चूक हमारी ॥ ७ ॥
छुअतहिं टूट पिनाक पुराना । मैं केहि हेतु करौं अभिमाना ॥ ८ ॥ rāma kahā muni kahahu bicārī. risa ati baḍi laghu cūka hamārī. 7.

chu'atahiṁ ṭūṭa pināka purānā. maiṁ kēhi hētu karaūṁ abhimānā. 8.

Inspite of all the provocations, Lord Ram maintained his poise and calmly said to the angry sage—'Oh sage, say anything after giving due thought to what you say. Your anger is out of all proportions to the small error that I made.'<sup>1</sup> (7)

The old and worn-out bow broke at my mere touch. Why should or how can I boast of having done anything great, of being brave or valiant?<sup>2</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Ram says—"Oh Sage, my small error was that I touched this already fragile, worn-out and rusty bow. I shouldn't have done it. But since it appeared to be extremely sturdy and hard as was evident when even thousands of kings could not move it a bit, I thought there was no harm in my touching it to get a feel of it and to see how it looks from the underside. But I agree that this was an error, for unfortunately the lifespan of the bow was over and it was I who was to be assigned the infamy of being guilty of breaking Shiva's bow. Say, oh sage, how can I ever think of causing insult to Lord Shiva by purposely breaking his bow?

But even as I accept that I did make a mistake of touching this antiquated rusty bow and should have exercised prudence by avoiding it altogether or coming too close to it, your anger is totally uncalled for and out proportion to the damage that was done inadvertently by me. I have repeatedly been pleading with you to forgive us, but you continue to rant and rave. Is this good for you as a Brahmin who needs to practice forgiveness and compassion? There is after all, no cause for creating such a fuss over an old and decrepit bow. Refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 282.

<sup>2</sup>Since I don't claim to have broken the bow, so where is the question of my boasting of breaking it or of having conquered the world in a symbolic manner by this feat as you accuse me of? The bow was rusty and creaking; it was so fragile that when I touched it to examine it out of curiosity, it just crumbled in my hands, split into two and fell down from my hands. So, I can't brag of any great deed. Rather, it was a mistake on my part of not being careful enough while handling an antique item; I should have been more careful and alert while examining it. In fact, I should not have touched it at all. I regret it and apologise for it. What more can I do? My brother has also suggested that let us call an expert and get it repaired, but anger is no solution—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 278.

Inspite of all this, you continue to be angry and vengeful. What should I do; tell me how to calm you down and bring this ugly situation to an end?"']

दो०. जौं हम निदरहिं बिप्र बदि सत्य सुनहु भृगुनाथ ।
तौ अस को जग सुभटु जेहि भय बस नावहिं माथ ॥ २८३ ॥

dōhā.

jaur̥ṁ hama nidarahiṁ bipra badi satya sunahu bhr̥gunātha.
tau asa kō jaga subhaṭu jēhi bhaya basa nāvahiṁ mātha. 283.

Listen oh lord of the Bhrigu's race, I am telling you the truth. If, as you claim, I am insulting you because you are a Brahmin<sup>1</sup>, then tell me which warrior in this world is so great and gallant that I would bow my head before him just out of fear (Brahmin or no Brahmin)? (Doha no. 283)

[Note—Lord Ram now became a bit serious and stern in his approach to warn the sage not to take things too far from where there is no return. For the sage must be warned that politeness and submissiveness on the part of the Lord is not a sign of weakness or defeat, but merely an attempt to diffuse the situation and avoid a showdown, as well as to show due respect to the sage. So, let the sage not draw the Lord into an ugly situation that would be detrimental to the sage's own good.

Lord Ram addresses sage Parashuram's misplaced belief and grievance that the former is speaking so boldly with the latter, which the latter has incidentally taken as a deemed affront and an insult to him, because the Lord knows that Parashuram can cause no harm to him as he (Parashuram) is a Brahmin who cannot stand a fight with a well-trained Kshatriya (the warrior race; here referring to Lord Ram), and also because a Brahmin has the habit of not harming his opponent no matter what the provocation is. This assurance of no personal harm from a Brahmin, in this case sage Parashuram, perhaps has encouraged Lord Ram to be bold enough to speak before the sage. Otherwise, he and his brother Laxman would have outright submitted themselves before the sage without the daring verbal duel that had happened just a while ago.

It is not the case at all, points out Lord Ram. ‘I am not insulting you, nor have I even the remotest intention to do so. Now that I have submitted before you and beg you for forgiveness is because you are a Brahmin, and not for any other reason whatsoever. For verily and in all sooth, I am not afraid of you or your might because no warrior worth his salt would bow before his opponent without a fight, no matter how powerful and mighty he may be, and even if he is the God of death himself personified. Therefore, all the hue and cry you have caused are totally uncalled for and irrational. Be sure sage that being a Kshatriya prince I am not scared of you that you might kill me, but I bow before you because you are a revered Brahmin. This being the case, there is no ground for assuming that I am insulting you in any remotest way. So please calm down. Any warrior worth his name will never cowardly submit himself before anyone out of fear. If he does submit and lowers his head, then it is out of respect for the other person.’

This was a subtle hint for Parashuram that enough was enough. The sage must not treat Lord Ram’s humility and politeness as a sign of weakness, and thereby go on and on with his angry tirade. The time has come to call it quits, and the sage must be practical and stop this nonsense before it is too late.

Well, does the sage not know who Lord Ram actually was? Did he not know that Lord Ram was a personified form of Lord Vishnu? Why, talking of the breaking of Shiva’s bow and punishing the person who has broken it, was Parashuram not aware that his Guru, Lord Shiva—whose purported insult caused by breaking of the bow had so much infuriated the sage—had himself been defeated at the hands of Lord Vishnu when the two had fought, and ironically this very bow could not save Shiva from defeat?

Parashuram has gone over his head boasting of his many successes in the battle-field, but if he does not stop then Lord Ram would be forced to recount that incident when he, as Lord Vishnu, had trounced Shiva, and this very bow which has become the bone of contention, could not save Shiva from this humiliating defeat.

This story is narrated in a note appended to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 250.]

चौ०. देव दनुज भूपति भट नाना । समबल अधिक होउ बलवाना ॥ १ ॥

जौं रन हमहि पचारै कोऊ । लरहिं सुखेन कालु किन होऊ ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

dēva danuja bhūpati bhaṭa nānā. samabala adhika hō'u balavānā. 1.
jauriṁ rana hamahi pacārai kō'ū. larahiṁ sukhēna kālu kina hō'ū. 2.

Whether our opponent is a god, a demon, a king or any warrior of whatever denomination, whether he is equivalent to us in strength or superior to us [1], if anyone challenges us in battle then we will gladly face him, even if he is Kaal (the god of death) himself personified the form of the opponent [2]. (1-2)

[Note—Uptil now, Lord Ram has assumed a conciliatory and submissive posture in order to off-set Laxman’s bold answers to sage Parashuram, something which had added fuel to the fire of sage’s wrathfulness. But unfortunately, Parashuram has treated this as a weakness on the part of the Lord. This is amply proved by the fact that the sage could not either harm Laxman or force him to keep quiet by his threats.

Laxman had retorted word-by-word to Parashuram. Vexed and frustrated, Parashuram had to himself quit facing Laxman because he felt that the more he incited the latter the more rebukes will he get. As we have seen in the forgoing narrative, Laxman became quiet not because of any fear of Parashuram but because Lord Ram had ordered him to do so—refer: Doha no. 278.

On the other hand, Lord Ram had been polite towards the sage from the very beginning, so Parashuram vented his suppressed wrath on the Lord. Hence, Lord Ram decided that the sage understands only one language, the language that Laxman had spoken—the language of boldness, fearlessness and harsh retorts, the language of a true warrior. That is, it was useless to be polite and submissive with Parashuram, and the only way to rein him in is to be bold, stand up to him and call off his bluff.

These verses, from Chaupai line no. 1 to 5, were the Lord's stern warning to Parashuram to call it a day and bring this acerbic exchange to an end, because it is a mere waste of time and energy. Parashuram should not think that either Lord Ram or Laxman are afraid to face him in battle; rather they are too willing to teach this haughty sage who happens to have blood of countless kings on his hand and conscience the best and the last lesson of his life! But they are exercising restraint just because he is a Brahmin (Chaupai line no. 5 below).

This answer of Lord Ram is a reply to the brag that Parashuram had made in Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 283 herein above. Lord Ram has in effect told Parashuram that he (Ram) does not fear the 'gods' representing the invincible warriors of the heaven, the 'demons' who represent the invincible warriors of the nether world, and the 'kings' etc. who represent the brave warriors on earth.

Parashuram had boasted of defeating the 'kings' who rule over earth (refer: Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 272; and Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 283), but here Lord Ram tells him that he does not fear any warrior in creation, and not merely the 'kings'. In other words, Lord Ram pokes fun at Parashuram that the latter could go around wielding his axe on human beings, but was terrified of the demons and the gods upon whom he knew his boast won't work and they would smother him to a past should he challenge any one of them. Parashuram found the human kings an easy target of his blood-thirsty, pervert and revengeful mind because all humans are inherently mortal and under the sway of Kaal, the death god, and have a short lifespan. So, armed with this basic knowledge, he went around sledge-hammering them at will. Besides this, the human kings were easy to defeat because when he fought them they were already demoralized at having to fight a Brahmin, and therefore because they did not want to physically harm Parashuram as he was a 'Brahmin sage', the latter swung his axe on their neck. Lord Ram indirectly tells Parashuram to be ashamed of his disgusting career; it's something to bury one's head in shame than to go about shouting and boasting about it!

If Parashuram was so powerful and strong and invincible, why did he not fight the demons and their king, who in the time of Lord Ram was the famous king of Lanka, the demon king Ravana, or even others such as Banaasur. Again, why did not Parashuram go and fight Indra, the selfish and highly jealous king of gods? It is because Parashuram feared for his own life.

So Lord Ram tells him to keep quiet and stop boasting. The Lord does not fear either the gods or the demons if they dared to challenge him in battle—quite unlike the pretentious Parashuram.

We shall read below (in Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 284) that these subtle hints given by Lord Ram led Parashuram to think over the matter, and like all boastful and pretentious persons who are full of wind, he surrendered abjectly at the end, almost as suddenly as a balloon which has been punctured. In this context, refer to what Laxman has said in Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 273, and Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 280.]

छत्रिय तनु धरि समर सकाना । कुल कलंकु तेहि पावर आना ॥ ३ ॥
 कहउँ सुभाउ न कुलहि प्रसंसी । कालहु डरहिं न रन रघुबंसी ॥ ४ ॥
 बिप्रबंस कै असि प्रभुताई । अभय होइ जो तुम्हहि डेराई ॥ ५ ॥ chatriya tanu dhari samara sakānā. kula kalaṅku tēhi pāvamā ānā. 3.

 kaha'um' subhā'u na kulahi prasansī. kālahu ḍarahim na rana raghubansī. 4.
 biprabansa kai asi prabhutāī. abhaya hō'i jō tumhahi ḍērāī. 5.

A person who is a Kshatriya by birth (i.e. who is born in a warrior race) and who fears from entering (fighting in) a battle, such a person is a scar on this (Kshatriya) race and is deemed to be sinful (because he is not living upto his expectations as a warrior, and fulfilling his moral duty as a protector of the society and dignity of its members). (3)

I am not heaping false praises on either this Kshatriya race or my own family known as the Raghu dynasty, but a member of this family (Raghu dynasty to which I belong) does not fear even the 'god of death' known as Kaal if he faces the latter in battle.<sup>1</sup> (4)

But the Brahmin race has such superiority (i.e. glory, mystical powers and majesty) that if someone (i.e. a member of the Kshatriya race) fears or submits himself before one of its members (i.e. any member of the Brahmin race), such as 'you' in the present case, that person becomes fearless; he becomes free from any danger or harm to himself.<sup>2</sup> (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Parashuram had been boasting of his status as being a special class of Brahmin—a 'warrior' Brahmin. These three verses are reply to this brag. Lord Ram essentially tells him that he thinks that the Kshatriya kings whom he had killed all along were afraid of his strength, were weak or something else, but it is not so. They had submitted themselves before him just because he happened to be a Brahmin.

Unfortunately, he (Parashuram) had misinterpreted their submission as their weakness, and instead of pardoning them he had chopped-off their heads. And he thinks that it was an act of bravery and gallantry. What nonsense it is. Lord Ram wants to remove this illusion of gallantry and grandeur from the haughty sage's mind that he is invincible, very powerful and strong, and that the Kshatriya kings are weak and imbecile, that they are impotent and incapable. None of it; a Kshatriya can face even the god of death if the latter challenges the former in battle. The Kshatriya is fearless and strong.

<sup>2</sup>Here, Lord Ram explains why the members of the Kshatriya race surrendered themselves to sage Parashuram. It was because the latter was a 'Brahmin'. Earlier, Laxman had also said the same thing—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precede Doha no. 273. Even Lord Ram had said a similar thing in Chaupai line nos. 4 and 8 that precede Doha no. 282.]

सुनि मृदु गूढ़ बचन रघुपति के । उघरे पटल परसुधर मति के ॥ ६ ॥
 राम रमापति कर धनु लेहू । खैंचहु मिटै मोर संदेहू ॥ ७ ॥
 देत चापु आपुहिं चलि गयऊ । परसुराम मन बिसमय भयऊ ॥ ८ ॥

sunī mṛḍu gūṛha bacana raghupati kē. ugharē paṭala parasudhara mati kē. 6.
 rāma ramāpati kara dhanu lēhū. khaincāhu miṭai mōra sandēhū. 7.
 dēta cāpu āpuhiṁ cali gaya'ū. parasurāma mana bisamaya bhaya'ū. 8.

When the ‘holder of the axe’, i.e. sage Parashuram (“parasudhara”), heard these words of Lord Ram, words that were spoken in a sweet tone but which were grave and had a hidden connotation, his mind underwent a dramatic change, with his sub-conscious telling him that there was something very serious and mysterious that does not meet the eye. [That is, the statement of Lord Ram made Parashuram think over the matter seriously, and his sub-conscious warned him that his bluff won’t work here, and therefore it is high time to withdraw before it’s too late for him.]<sup>1</sup> (6)

Parashuram addressed Lord Ram and said—‘Oh Ram! Take this bow of ‘Ramaa-pati’ (Lord Vishnu). Hold it and pull its string so that the doubts in my mind are removed. [In other words, I have begun to have doubts about your true identity. I thought that you were some ordinary prince like the rest of the crowd assembled here. But my mind warns me that there is something deeper than what is apparent on the surface. I have this bow of Lord Vishnu with me. Take it and pull it; let me see if you can do it. If you can, then my suspicion is correct—that you are Lord Vishnu, because no one else would be able to hold this bow. Let me find out the truth.]’ (7)

Even as Parashuram extended his hands to give the bow that he had held with him to Lord Ram, the bow slid out of his hands and migrated (went) to Lord Ram out of its own accord.

Parashuram was exceedingly amazed and perplexed; his mind was numbed and unable to fathom the import of the developments (for it was now clear to him that Lord Ram was not an ordinary human prince, because had it been so the bow of Lord Vishnu wouldn’t have gone willingly to him)<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We make an interesting discovery here: and it is that the ‘bow’ which Parashuram had held (as mentioned in Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 268) was Lord Vishnu’s bow.

Lord Ram had subtly hinted to Parashuram about the special quality of the bow the latter held. In other words, Lord Ram told him that he knew about that bow. In all probabilities, this observation of Lord Ram made Parashuram think that something was mysterious in the entire episode—because otherwise how could Lord Ram know that the bow which Parashuram held had some special quality in it. Parashuram began to wonder—‘Why had Lord Ram singled out the ‘bow’ for such praise, while he Parashuram had all the while been praising his ‘axe’ as his invincible weapon-of-pride?’ Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 282.

In the current verses we read that Parashuram’s mind underwent a dramatic change because he had developed doubts about the real identity of Lord Ram. Well, though Parashuram had been shouting and jumping all this time, his mind was working fast behind the scene; he was thinking that it is not an easy thing for someone to break Lord Shiva's bow. Besides this, even after knowing about his horrifying reputation that he mercilessly slays Kshatriya kings, and more importantly that he was a Brahmin, none of the two brothers, Lord Ram and Laxman, were afraid of him. So surely there must be something fishy; definitely there must be some hidden reason.

Remember: Sage Parashuram was not an ordinary angry Brahmin sage; he belonged to a line of sages that traces its origin to sage Bhrigu who has been highly praised in the scriptures. Though he is depicted as being haughty and short-tempered, but that does not mean that he was stupid and illiterate. He had studied the scriptures as all Brahmins were expected to do. Therefore, he must have heard or known that Lord Vishnu would come down to earth to eliminate the cruel demons. When the bow of Lord Vishnu that Parashuram had with him was given to him in some ancient time, it was clear to him that it was to serve certain purpose.

Remember: Parashuram had never used this bow of Lord Vishnu; he had waged wars and killed kings by his 'axe' alone. This is absolutely clear at a number of places in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand. For instances, refer: (i) Doha no. 272; (ii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 273; (iii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 275; (v) Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 276; (vi) Doha no. 279 and its preceding Chaupai line no. 8; and (vii) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 283.

The story of this bow is narrated briefly below:—

Vishwakarma, the gods' craftsman, built two bows. One was for Vishnu and the other for Shiva. When Parashuram began learning how to use the bow from his teacher ("Guru"), Lord Shiva, none of the ordinary bows that Parashuram used could withstand his strength; all of them broke when he pulled their strings.

Pleased with his disciple, Lord Shiva gave him his own bow known as 'Pinaak'. But this bow was too strong for Parashuram who couldn't pull its string, and neither did the bow break no matter how hard he pulled at it. So Parashuram did severe Tapa (penance) on Mt. Mahendraachal to propitiate Lord Vishnu. Pleased with his Tapa, Vishnu gave him his own bow called 'Shaarang'.

At that time Lord Vishnu had told him that when he (Vishnu) takes the form of Lord Ram, the purpose of Parashuram's birth will be over, and that this bow would go automatically (migrate; get transferred on its own) to Lord Ram. So, Parashuram was waiting for that moment when Lord Vishnu would come down on earth as Lord Ram to take his bow back.

That is why when Lord Ram referred to this bow as being special, as having nine divine qualities (in Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 282), Parashuram's ears stood up on their edges. He became alert that something mysterious is there.

In order to test whether Ram was an ordinary prince of Lord Vishnu in a human form, he asked the Lord to take the bow known as 'Shaarang'—refer: verse no. 7.

<sup>2</sup>As has been narrated in the note herein above, this was the test that proved to Parashuram that Lord Ram was indeed Lord Vishnu.

With the passage of the of Lord Vishnu's bow from Parashuram to Lord Ram, all the divine powers that the former possessed migrated to the latter. Remember: Parashuram himself is regarded as one of the many incarnations of Lord Vishnu. When Lord Vishnu decided to descend from his heavenly abode at Vaikuntha to earth, his weapon, the Shaarang bow with which he was to kill and eliminate the demons from earth, had to come down somehow. So the Lord devised this clever method—he first gave it to Parashuram who also was one of his many forms, thereby ensuring that the divine bow did not reach wrong hands, and got it back now.

The going of the bow automatically from the hands of Parashuram to Lord Ram is a symbolic transfer of mystical and divine powers from the former to the latter. After this incident, Parashuram remained a humble sage for the rest of his life on earth; all his anger and killing sprees ended.

After this transfer of the bow, Parashuram lost all his glories and strength for which he had boasted so much, becoming a fallen Brahmin who was burdened with a guilty conscience. This is mentioned in Padma Puran, Uttar Khand, Canto 242, verse nos. 163-164.

So, finally with this development of Lord Vishnu's bow migrating on its own accord from the hands of sage Parashuram to the hands of Lord Ram, the sage realised that the two brothers, Lord Ram and Laxman, were not ordinary human princes but the Divine Being in their forms. The sage realised that Lord Ram was a manifestation of Lord Vishnu, because had it been otherwise the bow of Visnu wouldn't have gone on its own to Lord Ram. The divine bow has cheerfully gone to its rightful owner and Lord just like a child cheerfully goes in the arms of its parent from the arms of a stranger.

Regretting his confrontationist attitude and the rude way he had behaved with Lord Ram and Laxman, sage Parashuram prayed to the two brothers and asked for forgiveness. We shall read about it in the following verses.]

दो०. जाना राम प्रभाउ तब पुलक प्रफुल्लित गात ।

जोरि पानि बोले बचन हृदयँ न प्रेमु अमात ॥ २८४ ॥

dōhā.

jānā rāma prabhā'u taba pulaka praphullita gāta.

jōri pāni bōlē bacana hr̥dayam̐ na prēmu amāta. 284.

When the bow went automatically to Lord Ram, Parashuram realized the divinity of the Lord. As soon as he understood the reality, his body was thrilled in ecstasy and joy. For now he had realized that he had the good fortune to see Lord Vishnu first hand, right in his front.

He (Parashuram) immediately went into a prayerful mode. He brought together his hands and joined their palms as a gesture of submission and great respect. Then he said (prayed) with a heart bubbling with love and affection for the Lord. (Doha no. 284)

[Note—Parashuram had great respect for Lord Vishnu. Remember: He had done Tapa to please Vishnu, and therefore he knew the might and divinity of the Lord. He was well aware that Vishnu is the cosmic form of the Supreme Being known as Brahm. This cosmic form is known as the Viraat Purush. So here he was—standing before the very Lord for whom he had done severe Tapa on Mt. Mahendraachal to get this bow. What more would any devotee want if his revered deity stands before him, so close and unpretentious as Lord Ram had vis-à-vis Parashuram.

Hence, Parashuram considered himself extremely lucky and privileged. He prayed to Lord Ram because now he had realized that the Lord was Vishnu himself.]

चौ०. जय रघुबंस बनज बन भानू । गहन दनुज कुल दहन कृसानू ॥ १ ॥
जय सुर बिप्र धेनु हितकारी । जय मद मोह कोह भ्रम हारी ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

jaya raghubansa banaja bana bhānū. gahana danuja kula dahana kṛsānū. 1.
jaya sura bipra dhēnu hitakārī. jaya mada mōha kōha bhrama hārī. 2.

[Sage Parashuram prayed to Lord Ram as follows—] ‘*Glory to the Lord (Ram) and hail him who gives joy and happiness to the dynasty of king Raghu (of Ayodhya) just like the sun delights a cluster of lotuses<sup>1</sup>.

Glory to the Lord (Ram) and hail him who is like a raging fire for the purpose of destruction of the cruel demon race<sup>2</sup>. (1)

Glory to the Lord (Ram) and hail him who is a well-wisher and provider of well-being to the Gods, the Brahmins, and the cows (representing all the docile and humble creatures of the world)<sup>3</sup>.

Glory to the Lord (Ram) and hail him who eliminates the negative traits such as ‘Mada’ (arrogance; haughtiness), ‘Moha’ (wordly attachments and engrossments), ‘Krodha’ (anger; wrathfulness), and ‘Bhram’ (delusions; misconceptions; falsehoods) that may be present in a creature<sup>4</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The lotus flower opens up its petals as soon as the sun appears in the sky at daytime. It is a sign that the lotus feels cheerful at the sight of the sun, it welcomes the sun, and its delight is seen in the form of the opening of its closed petals. Similarly, Lord Ram gives glory to the exalted dynasty of the kings of Ayodhya.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Vishnu had incarnated as Lord Ram at the request of the gods and mother earth to eliminate the demons who had become extremely cruel and blood-thirsty. These demons were ruled by Ravana, their king based at the island of Lanka. Just as a fierce fire completely destroys a wild forest, Lord Ram would ultimately eliminate all the cruel demons who had been terrorising innocent creatures of the world.

*The word “Jai” is used as an exclamation to laud someone, to give him praise and honour, to applaud his rare achievements and qualities. The nearest English phrase would be either ‘glory to you’ or the word ‘hail’. Both of them have been used here to completely convey the idea incorporated in the Hindi word “Jai”.

It will be noted that this word “Jai” has been used eight times between verse nos. 1-7, and its derivative word “Jayati” once (in verse no. 3), bringing the total to ‘nine’. This figure is significant in the context of Lord Ram telling sage Parashuram that he (Ram) has only one Guna (quality or virtue) and it is that he is a warrior who holds a bow, while the sage has nine of them or that his bow has nine grand qualities—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 282.

Now, once Parashuram recognised who Lord Ram actually was, he wished to express his regrets at the way he had been behaving with the Lord till now on the one hand, and on the other hand he wished to express his reverence for the Supreme Being in the form of Lord Ram. So the sage used the laudatory word “Jai” nine times to imply that the Lord too has ‘nine’ eclectic qualities for which the Lord had praised him earlier. It’s an indirect way of saying ‘thanks’ to Lord Ram by Parashuram.

Remember: Sage Parashuram is regarded as the sixth incarnation of Lord Vishnu, and therefore if he has ‘nine Gunas’ then surely Lord Ram also has them because the latter is the seventh incarnation of Vishnu. The transfer of Lord Vishnu’s bow, that was with Parashuram till now, to Lord Ram (refer: Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 284) is a subtle indication of this fact—that the ‘baton has been passed on from the sixth generation to the seventh one’!

In this context, sage Parashuram praising Lord Ram is a symbolic way of saying that—‘Oh Lord Ram, from now onwards, it is you who will have to take care of those who become unruly and torment the subjects of the kingdom of God. I have kept cruel and selfish kings under tight leash till now, but the situation has changed drastically over period of time. Instead of those tormentor kings, there are new ones in the form of cruel demons. These demons are beyond my means to control. Hence, please take charge of the earth from now onwards!’

Another reason for Parashuram saying “Jai” nine times is to ask Lord Ram not only to forgive him (refer: Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 285) but also to bless him that the nine Gunas which he had possessed till now (refer: Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 282), and which had passed on to Lord Ram along with the transfer of Lord Vishnu’s bow (refer: Doha no. 284 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 7-8), can be restored back to him.

The fact that all the great powers and strength that Parashuram possessed had left him and migrated to Lord Ram is evident when we closely analyse the sage’s behaviour and postures that have undergone a dramatic transformation. Whereas till this point he has been bold and aggressive, flaunting his axe and battle prowess, he has now suddenly become crestfallen, docile, polite, submissive and humble like a true saint. Whereas earlier he was unforgiving, uncompromising and hell-bent for revenge (refer: Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 281), now he himself begs to be forgiven (refer: Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 285).

<sup>3</sup>The elimination of the demons would certainly delight the Gods, the Brahmins and mother Earth who had assumed the form of a ‘cow’ to approach Lord Vishnu to protect her from the terror unleashed by the demons—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda line nos. 1-2 that precedes Doha no. 184, and Doha no. 186 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that follow it.

<sup>4</sup>Sage Parashuram means that he was so grateful to Lord Ram that the Lord had removed these four negative qualities that had eclipsed his mind and heart till now. Parashuram had all these four negativities in him—(i) he was arrogant and haughty; (ii) he was attached to the gross things of the world as evident from his affection for the bow and his getting so annoyed at its breaking that he wanted to kill the person who had done it, without taking into account that this killing would make the would-be bride a widow in a premature manner because the groom would be killed; (iii) he was anger personified; and (iv) he was gravely under the influence of delusions, not realising that breaking of Lord Shiva’s bow cannot be the job of a human being.]

बिनय सील करुना गुन सागर । जयति बचन रचना अति नागर ॥ ३ ॥

सेवक सुखद सुभग सब अंगा । जय सरीर छबि कोटि अनंगा ॥ ४ ॥

binaya sīla karunā guna sāgara. jayati bacana racanā ati nāgara. 3.
sēvaka sukhada subhaga saba aṅgā. jaya sarīra chabi kōṭi anaṅgā. 4.

Oh Lord, you are an ocean of the great virtues (“Guna Sagar”) of politeness, good manners, courteousness, mercy, compassion, and all other good qualities in this world<sup>1</sup>.

I praise the glory of the Lord (Ram) and hail him who is an expert in the use of proper words and whose speech is extremely well thought of and sweet<sup>2</sup>. (3)

Oh Lord, you give delight, happiness and joy to all your followers and servants (the literal meaning of the word “Sevak”, but in practice it refers to the devotees of the Lord)<sup>3</sup>. Your whole body, i.e. your physical form with all its parts<sup>4</sup>, is divine and auspicious.

Glory to the Lord (Ram) and hail him whose body embodies the beauty and magnificence of millions of Kamdeos (cupids)<sup>5</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The sage has now realised how calm Lord Ram had remained throughout the episode. So the great sage now praises Lord Ram for the dignified and responsible way the latter had behaved and tackled the situation.

In spite of all provocations, Lord Ram had maintained his dignity, had spoken with great respect for the sage, and had been very polite and courteous towards him (for instance, refer: Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 279; Doha no. 281 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 7-8; Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede Doha no. 282; and Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 283).

Lord Ram had even asked for forgiveness on behalf of his naughty brother Laxman (refer: Doha no. 276 and Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that follow it), and instead of using stern words to ask Laxman to stop confronting the sage, the Lord had politely signalled him to keep quiet by mere furrowing of his eyebrows (refer: Doha no. 278).

<sup>2</sup>In this praise, Parashuram refers to the diplomatic way Lord Ram had tackled him and his anger (for instance, refer: from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 281—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 282), and at the same time had informed him who he (Ram) actually was (refer: Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 282; Doha no. 283; and Doha no. 284 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8).

<sup>3</sup>When Ravana’s brother Vibhishan decided to go and surrender before Lord Ram, he was sure that the Lord would accept him as he always gives happiness to his followers and devotees—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 42.

When king Manu and his wife Satrupa had done Tapa, and Lord Vishnu revealed himself before them, Manu had also prayed to the Lord saying that “the Lord is like a evergreen tree for his servants and followers”—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 146.

<sup>4</sup>This observation refers to the principle advocated by the scriptures that all gross visible forms of this creation have some kind of worldly fault in them. If this is the established norm then one will be inclined to believe that even the gross form of a human being that the Supreme Being had assumed in the form of Ram must also have some or the other negative traits that are universally present in all the living beings who have a gross body.

To remove this misgiving regarding Lord Ram, sage Parashuram says that inspite of the Lord having a physical body like all other human beings, his form is nevertheless divine and holy like a consecrated image in a temple. This image that is worshipped in temples is made of a gross material, such as a piece of stone, wood or precious metal. But for the worshipper it represents the Supreme Lord, the Holy God before whom the whole world bows. Likewise, Lord Ram's physical form as a human being does not have the worldly grossness that is universally associated with all living beings in this mortal world.

<sup>5</sup>The physical form or image of Lord Ram is so attractive and captivating because it embodies in its self the beauty of Nature. All those who see him are simply charmed by his form. There are countless instances spread throughout Ram Charit Manas eulogizing the magnificence of the Lord's image or form. Some of the instances in Baal Kand are the following—(i) Doha no. 218 where sage Vishwamitra endorses this fact when he gives permission to Lord Ram and Laxman to go and see the city of Janakpur; (ii) Doha no. 233 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8 where Sita is swept off her feet by the Lord's fabulous image; (iii) from Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 220—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 221 which narrate how the women folk of Janakpur were enchanted by the beauteous sight of the two brothers, Lord Ram and Laxman; (iv) Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 50 where even Lord Shiva was enthralled by the lovely beauty of Lord Ram; and (v) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 199 that refers to the beauty of Lord Ram as a child, a beauty that was like an image formed from millions of Kamdeos.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-10 that precede Doha no. 327 that describe the fabulous beauty of Lord Ram as a groom.

Even the demons had accepted that Lord Ram's charm was matchless—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 19 where the demons Khar and Dushan were simply stunned at the Lord's beauty and did not initially want to harm him.

And finally we may cite another example of how the crow saint Kaagbhusund, who had gone to Ayodhya to play with Lord Ram as a child, was exceedingly delighted by the Lord's charming form, filling his eyes full with this wonderful image—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 75.

Further, sage Kaagbhusund also reiterates that Lord Ram's form embodies the charm of millions of Kamdeos (cupids)—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 76.

When king Manu and his wife Satrupa did Tapa (penance) to have Lord Vishnu as their son, they had visualized the divine form of the Lord which was exceptionally charming and enthralling for the heart—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-6 that precede Doha no. 146.]

करौं काह मुख एक प्रसंसा । जय महेस मन मानस हंसा ॥ ५ ॥

अनुचित बहुत कहेउँ अग्याता । छमहु छमामंदिर दोउ भ्राता ॥ ६ ॥

karaurñ kāha mukha ēka prasansā. jaya mahēsa mana mānasa hansā. 5.
anucita bahuta kahē'um' agyātā. chamahu chamāmandira dō'u bhrātā. 6.

Oh Lord! How can I praise you with a single mouth? [That is, even if I had thousands of mouths I won't have been able to sufficiently praise you and your glories.]<sup>1</sup>

Glory to the Lord (Ram) and hail him who floats like a divine Swan in the lake of Lord Shiva's heart<sup>2</sup>. (5)

I (Parashuram) have said many inappropriate things out of my ignorance and delusions.

Oh you two brothers (Lord Ram and Laxman), please forgive me because both of you are like oceans of forgiveness and forbearance; I sincerely regret and apologise for my irreverent behaviour and rudeness.*

[*This verse can be read differently also as follows—"You two brothers are like oceans of the virtues of forgiveness and forbearance. Hence, I request you (or, plead with you) to forgive me for my impertinence and irreverence because I have said many things to you out of my utter ignorance and delusions that I should not have uttered at all otherwise."]<sup>3</sup> (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When Lord Ram was going to the marriage venue for the formal rituals of marriage, the same idea is conveyed there also. Lord Shiva feels privileged that he can see the Lord with his fifteen eyes (5 heads x 3 eyes in each = 15); Brahma the creator is happy that he can see the Lord with his four heads (i.e. 4 heads x 2 eyes in each = 8 eyes); Indra, the king of gods, is very happy that he has thousands of holes on his body through which he can see the Lord. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-7 that precede Doha no. 317.

At the time of Lord Ram's birth, the patron goddess of speech, known as Saraswati, had failed to find words to describe the celebrations of the time—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, 2nd half of Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 195.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 246 where the good kings have declared that the two brothers, Lord Ram and Laxman, live in the heart of Lord Shiva.

As regards comparing Lord Ram and Laxman with Swans, refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 221 where this fact is also endorsed by the women folk of Janakpur.

<sup>3</sup>Parashuram's anger and bad temper, his vanity, ego, arrogance and haughtiness, his habit of boasting of his exploits, especially of the negative sort—after all, going around killing kings indiscriminately is definitely an abhorable thing to do for someone who calls himself a 'sage' belonging to an illustrious family of luminary sages descending from the legendary sage Bhṛigu—had all contributed to delude his mind and make him hallucinate. It led to his final downfall so much so that not only he became an object of ridicule in the world but he also decimated all the religious merits he had accumulated till now by doing various types of Tapa (austerities and penances) and Yagya (fire sacrifices).

This episode teaches us a lesson as to how anger forces even a wise man to act in an irresponsible manner and say things which only go against him. Had Parashuram not lost his temper, and instead had acted wisely, patiently and in a practical way, he would not have had to reach a piquant situation where he will be forced to surrender suddenly and abjectly before someone whom he had been threatening with a kill just a few moments earlier. What more humiliation can a person face than to submit himself abjectly, to surrender unconditionally, and to ask for forgiveness from a person whom he had declared as his arch enemy and had publicly threatening to kill him.

When Lord Ram and Laxman were begging Parashuram to forgive them and calm down, the latter had been scornful and pouring fire and brimstone at them. And now the same Parashuram has asked for forgiveness. What a ‘turn-of-tables’!

We have read earlier that Laxman had warned Parashuram that anger is a bad thing because it impels a person to commit sins or get involved in wrongdoings for which he has to regret later on. Here we see that Parashuram accepts that he had said many inappropriate things out of ignorance and delusions. But why did he say such things? It was because he was ‘angry’ at the person who had broken the bow. He wanted retribution; he wanted revenge. In anger he lost control over himself. He acted in a rash manner, shouting, threatening, wielding his axe, using abrasive language, and so on.

The angry sage had threatened to kill both the brothers. For Laxman he had a justification—and it was that he (Laxman) had all along adopted a confrontationist attitude—refer for instance, (i) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 274 where Parashuram points out this fact to sage Vishwamitra, (ii) Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 275 where Parashuram addresses the assembly to point out that he has been sparing Laxman but the latter continues to tease him; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 277, and Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 279 where the sage clearly told Lord Ram that Laxman is misbehaving with him.

But even while rebuking Parashuram, Laxman had a smile on his face, and did not have a bitter scowl like Parashuram had sported. A smile acts as a sweetener that blunted the sharpness of the words Laxman had used. Refer: Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 272; (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 273; (iii) Doha no. 277; and (iv) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 280.

Earlier, Laxman had even offered to get the bow repaired by calling in experts— Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 278.

The sage, meanwhile, had been continuously threatening Laxman with murder, and had used insulting words for him. For instance, refer: (a) Baal Kand—(i) Doha no. 271; (ii) Doha no. 272; (iii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 274; and (iv) Doha no. 279 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 7-8 which describes Parashuram threatening Laxman with murder.

Then, in the following instances we find that Parashuram has used abrasive language for Laxman—refer: (i) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 272 (the use of the word “Satha”); (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 274 (many words that essentially describe Laxman as very wicked, pervert, a taint for his family, in the jaws of death, unruly, reckless, stupid and ignorant); (iii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 275 (one who speaks scorchingly, whose words are biting and corrosive); (iv) Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precedes Doha no. 277 (having a mouth full of poison; very crooked); (v) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 278 (having a pervert heart and mind; being like a golden pitcher filled with the most ferocious poison); and (iv) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 280 (“Khot”—defective, faulty, ill-humoured and ill-witted, pervert and corrupted).

But there was no justification for Parashuram threatening Lord Ram repeatedly in spite of the Lord’s submission that he was sorry for what had happened, begging for forgiveness, using of polite words, praising the sage’s glory, and even signalling Laxman to keep quiet. Lord Ram had been extremely courteous with the sage; he was very apologetic for the breaking of the bow, saying that he had no intention of breaking it, but that it split into two on its own when he (Ram) was examining it because it was old and worn-out. Refer: Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 283—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 284.

The result was that sage Parashuram had made a joke of himself in a crowded assembly.

One important point to note here is that sage Parashuram's prayer is the only one in the whole book of Ram Charit Manas where the two brothers, Lord Ram and Laxman, are offered prayers together.]

कहि जय जय जय रघुकुलकेतू । भृगुपति गए बनहि तप हेतू ॥ ७ ॥
अपभयँ कुटिल महीप डेराने । जहँ तहँ कायर गवँहि पराने ॥ ८ ॥

kahi jaya jaya jaya raghukulakētū. bhr̥gupati ga'e banahi tapa hētū. 7.
apabhayaṁ kuṭila mahīpa ḍērānē. jaham̐ taham̐ kāyara gavam̐hiṁ parānē. 8.

Saying, 'Hail Lord Ram who is like a 'flag' (i.e. the most prominent member; one who stands out from the rest; one who gives glory to others; one who is the flag-bearer of the family's glory, name and fame) in the illustrious dynasty of king Raghu! Glory to Lord Ram who is the flag-bearer representing the greatness of the dynasty of king Raghu!! Hail Lord Ram, and glory to him!!!'*

[*Sage Parashuram has hailed Lord Ram and his glory three times to emphasise the greatness of the Lord. He has addressed the Lord as "Raghu-kul-ketu" to stress that Lord Ram is the most illustrious member of the great family of kings descending from Raghu.]

After thus praying to Lord Ram and begging for forgiveness from him, 'Bhr̥gupati'<sup>1</sup> (sage Parashuram) went away to the forest to do Tapa (to do penance for his misbehaviour with the Lord, as well as to regain his lost mystical powers and glory that were decimated by his unholy behaviour).<sup>2</sup> (7)

The wicked kings were seized with imaginary fears, while the coward amongst them stealthily fled away from there<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It is to be noted here that in both the cases of Lord Ram as well as sage Parashuram, the great families to which they belonged has been cited. For Lord Ram, the 'Raghu dynasty' is invoked, and for sage Parashuram the luminary sage 'Bhr̥gu and his family' are referred to.

Hence, while Lord Ram is said to be like a 'flag', i.e. the most prominent member, one who represents the dignified status of the family of king Raghu, sage Parashuram is said to be the 'chief' of sage Bhr̥gu's exalted family. Both the terms 'flag' and 'chief' imply the same thing—that the concerned person is superior to others in the family.

There were so many kings in the Raghu dynasty, but Lord Ram's life and deeds stood out as being exemplary, and the Lord was remembered for all times to come by all the living beings in this world. Similarly, sage Parashuram had made himself famous on two counts—one was by his earlier deeds about which he had himself boasted in the aforesaid episode, and two by his meeting Lord Ram and transferring his mystical powers to the Lord by the symbolic transfer of Lord Vishnu's bow (Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 284).

In other words, of all the numerous members of these two families, the ones who are remembered even today by a common man are Lord Ram and sage Parashuram.

Refer also to (a) Dohawali, verse nos. 431-433; (b) Janki Mangal, verse no. 178; (c) Kavita wali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 22.

<sup>2</sup>It is not mentioned here where sage Parashuram had gone to do Tapa. But according to sage Valmiki's epic 'Ramayan', Parashuram had gone to a mountain named 'Mahendra'—refer: Valmiki Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 76, verse no. 22.

In Padma Puran, Uttar Khand, it is mentioned that Parashuram went to the abode of Lords Nar-Narayan, now known as Badrinath, in the Himalayas.

It is to be noted that though it is not explicitly mentioned that Lord Ram and Laxman had forgiven Parashuram, but it is deemed to be so. This is based on the premise of sage Parashuram himself when he says that the two brothers are "oceans of forgiveness and forbearance"—refer: Chaupai line no. 6 herein above.

Remember: Lord Ram has a unfaltering nature of showing grace and mercy upon his "Sevaks", i.e. those who surrender themselves before him like a servant does to his master. There are numerous instances of this: for example, Hanuman tells this fact to Vibhishan when the two met in Lanka where Hanuman had gone to search for Sita—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 6.

Another important question is this: How was Parashuram's sins overcome or neutralised? Lord Ram has himself declared that when anyone surrenders himself before the Lord and asks for his protection and refuge, the Lord forgives all his sins and misdeeds, and the person becomes free from all the evil consequences of his wrong-doings. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 44, and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precede Doha no. 48. Here, the Lord has made these observations when Vibhishan had come to seek refuge with the Lord after being kicked out of Lanka by his own brother, the demon king Ravana.

<sup>3</sup>What was their fear? Well, before sage Parashuram had arrived, these wicked and pervert kings had threatened to capture Sita and put the two brothers in shackles. They had threatened to defeat king Janak in battle if he took their side. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 266 herein above.

So now they were terrified out of their wits. They thought that Laxman would divert his suppressed anger for Parashuram towards them, and would single-handedly punish them for what they had said earlier as referred to above.

More than anyone else—and that includes even Lord Ram whom they had observed to be very polite and civil during the confrontation with Parashuram—they feared the wrath of Laxman who had shown publicly that he fears not even the mighty sage Parashuram before whom these kings had trembled and prostrated out of fear for their dear lives as is clear in Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 269.

Some of these kings preferred to show a brave face by pretending that they had conceded defeat and had remained behind to witness, to participate in and enjoy the grand marriage of Lord Ram with Sita. But some of them were totally cowards; they scampered out quickly, fearing reprisals.

These wicked kings had felt happy when they had earlier watched the angry sage Parashuram threatening king Janak to divulge the name of the person who had broken the bow, and if he failed to do so the sage would turn his kingdom upside down—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 270.

Now when the tables were turned in favour of Lord Ram and Laxman, these pervert kings ‘imagined’ that they would be captured and thrown into prison. But their fears were unfounded because both Lord Ram and Laxman were “oceans of forgiveness”—refer: 2nd half of Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 285 above. Hence it is said that they had ‘imaginary fears’.]

दो०. देवन्ह दीन्हीं दुंदुभीं प्रभु पर बरषहिं फूल । हरषे पुर नर नारि सब मिटी मोहमय सूल ॥ २८५ ॥

dōhā.

dēvanha dīnhīm dundubhīm prabhu para baraṣahīm phūla.
haraṣē pura nara nāri saba miṭī mōhamaya sūla. 285.

[Festivities, rejoicing and celebrations resumed in right earnest once again as soon as sage Parashuram went away.] The gods immediately sounded their musical instruments known as the kettle-drums and showered flowers on the Lord (from the sky).

All the citizens of Janakpur, the men and the women folks, became delighted and happy. All their consternations, fears, agonies and perplexities having their origin or basis on ignorance were eliminated. [There was cheer and joy everywhere, both in the heaven as well as in the city.] (Doha no. 285)

[Note—Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 270 that says the same thing.

Now, what were the citizens and the gods afraid of? They were afraid of what Parashuram may do in his fit of anger. Remember that the sage had threatened to “turn the earth upside down as far as the kingdom of Janak extended”—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 270. It would mean a catastrophe of an unprecedented scale. Everything would be reduced to rubble.

Then they also feared for the security of Lord Ram and Laxman whom the citizens had begun to love, admire and adore very much by now. Sage Parashuram’s reputation as an angry and merciless killer was well known. The fear was aggravated by the fact that Laxman was pouring fuel to the sage’s fire of anger by his rebukes.

So when the sage surrendered and offered his apologies to the two brothers, the gods and the humans alike felt as if the brilliant sun has emerged from behind the thick veil of dark doomsday cloud, removing the foreboding darkness symbolizing death and destruction to give a fresh light of happiness and joy to the world.]

चौ०. अति गहगहे बाजने बाजे । सबहिं मनोहर मंगल साजे ॥ १ ॥
जूथ जूथ मिलि सुमुखि सुनयनीं । करहिं गान कल कोकिलबयनीं ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

ati gahagahē bājanē bājē. sabahim manōhara maṅgala sājē. 1.
jūtha jūtha mili sumukhi sunayanīm. karahim gāna kala kōkilabayanīm. 2.

There was a thunderous noise of musical instruments of all sorts being played together. Everyone (i.e. the citizens as well as the members of the royal household) enthusiastically displayed their happiness by putting out whatever charming and auspicious things that they had (to celebrate the occasion and to rejoice that the last vestiges of hurdles created by malignant stars were removed when sage Parashuram had surrendered and went away to the forest after praying to Lord Ram)<sup>1</sup>. (1)

A large number of ladies gathered together and formed groups to sing auspicious songs with pleasant voices. They had sweet faces and beautiful eyes<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When Lord Ram had broken the bow, there was universal rejoicing and playing of musical instruments—refer: Ram Charit Mans, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 262—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 263.

Again, when Sita had put the victory garland around the neck of Lord Ram, there was a repeat of the tumult of musical instruments, singing and dancing—refer: Ram Charit Mans, Baal Kand, from Doha no. 264—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 265.

But soon this atmosphere of merriment and rejoicing turned sombre and grave because of two reasons—(i) the first was that the wicked and frustrated kings had created a ruckus and were readying for battle, and then (ii) immediately thereafter the angry sage Parashuram burst in, threatening menacingly to spill blood. Refer respectively to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 266—to Chaupai line 7 that precedes Doha no. 267; and (ii) from Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 268—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 270.

Now the situation had once again turned favourable, and it did so with a bang—because not only the danger posed by the determination of sage Parashuram, who had the notorious reputation of killing anyone who annoyed him in the least, to punish Lord Ram and Laxman had passed away, the other danger that was posed by the would-be trouble makers, the wicked kings who were earlier getting restive for a bloody showdown to avenge their humiliation and defeat, also vanished when they scampered out of the arena in a hurry to save their lives after they watched sage Parashuram surrendering before the Lord.

Hence, with all dangers and obstacles to the marriage of Lord Ram with Sita being finally removed, the rejoicing and celebrations resumed with renewed vigour.

<sup>2</sup>Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, 2nd half of Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 263 where it is narrated that the women folk sang auspicious songs as soon as the bow was broken.]

सुखु बिदेह कर बरनि न जाई । जन्मदरिद्र मनहुँ निधि पाई ॥ ३ ॥

बिगत त्रास भइ सीय सुखारी । जनु बिधु उदयँ चकोरकुमारी ॥ ४ ॥

sukhu bidēha kara barani na jā'ī. janmadaridra manahum' nidhi pā'ī. 3.
bigata trāsa bha'i sīya sukhārī. janu bidhu udayam' cakōrakumārī. 4.

The happiness and delight of Janak was so great that it is not possible to describe it. His ecstasy and joy was like that of a man who had been a pauper since birth but has suddenly found an unexpected trove of treasure<sup>1</sup>. (3)

All mental and emotional torments, perplexities and uncertainties that Sita was suffering from were also instantly dispelled, and she was very happy and exhilarated just like the case of a young female Chakor bird feeling delighted when the full moon rises<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 263 where another analogy of a man in water suddenly finding land is cited to give an idea of the happiness of Janak. Well, this was expected because he was the father of Sita, and any father would naturally be happy when his daughter's marriage goes to completion smoothly and according to his wishes.

<sup>2</sup>Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 263 where another analogy of the female bird known as 'Chataki' feeling contented when a rain drop falls in its open beak during the asterism of Swati.

The Chakor is the Indian red-legged partridge. It is said to be so enamoured of the moon that as soon as the moon rises in the eastern sky, the bird fixes its gaze on it and goes on looking at the disc of the full moon as it travels across the sky and sets in the west. The bird feels extremely ecstatic when it sights the moon. This analogy means that Sita had got what she had been longing for: that all hurdles are removed and she is happily married to Lord Ram. In this context, refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 257—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 259.]

जनक कीन्ह कौसिकहि प्रनामा । प्रभु प्रसाद धनु भंजेउ रामा ॥ ५ ॥

मोहि कृतकृत्य कीन्ह दुहुँ भाई । अब जो उचित सो कहिअ गोसाई ॥ ६ ॥

janaka kīnha kausikahi pranāmā. prabhu prasāda dhanu bhanjē'u rāmā. 5.
mōhi kṛtakṛtya kīnha duhum' bhā'īm. aba jō ucita sō kahi'a gōsā'īm. 6.

Now, king Janak bowed before sage Vishwamitra ("Kaushik") and said cheerfully—
'Oh sage! It is by your grace and blessings that Ram has broken the bow. (5)

The two brothers had done me a great favour and have obliged me a lot. [In other words, I thank them very much and feel grateful to them.]

Now, oh lord, tell me what is the proper thing to do (so that I can take the next step and prepare for the finalization of the marriage between Ram and Sita as per your advice). (6)

[Note—King Janak has shown his respects to the sage as it is a tradition as well as courteousness that one must honour elders for any achievements. Remember: It was sage Vishwamitra who had expressly ordered Lord Ram to go and break the bow so that the grief and worries of Janak are removed—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 254. So Janak must thank the sage first before he thanked Lord Ram for removing his worries by breaking the bow.

Besides this expression of formal courteousness by Janak, the fact remains that even Lord Ram had also sought sage Vishwamitra's blessings 'three times' before he broke the bow because the sage was his Guru. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 254; (ii) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 255; (iii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 261.

He expressed his thankfulness to Laxman because the latter had stood up and objected to Janak declaring the competition closed when none of the kings had been able to move the bow, claiming the right to break the bow. With his bold initiative, Laxman had saved the day for Janak when the latter had lost all hopes of getting Sita married. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 251—to Doha no. 253.

Not only this, when the angry sage Parashuram had threatened to turn the earth upside down and punish the person who had broken the bow, Laxman had faced him boldly and with his stance had put the sage on the backfoot. This entire episode is narrated above in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 270—to Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 284.]

कह मुनि सुनु नरनाथ प्रबीना । रहा बिबाहु चाप आधीना ॥ ७ ॥

टूटतहीं धनु भयउ बिबाहु । सुर नर नाग बिदित सब काहु ॥ ८ ॥

kaha muni sunu naranātha prabīnā. rahā bibāhu cāpa ādhīnā. 7.
ṭūṭatahīm dhanu bhaya'u bibāhū. sura nara nāga bidita saba kāhū. 8.

The sage (Vishwamitra) told the king—'Listen oh wise and expert king<sup>1</sup>. The marriage was tied to the bow (i.e. it was subject to and dependent upon the breaking of the bow). (7)

As soon as the bow was broken, the marriage was deemed to have taken place. This is an open fact, and is known to all—the gods (in the heaven), the humans (on earth), and the serpents (underground). [In other words, the fact that the marriage between Lord Ram and Sita was finalized at the instant the bow was broken is an established fact. Everyone is aware of it; all the three worlds represented by the gods in the heaven, the human beings on earth, and the serpents representing the subterranean world, are aware of it.]<sup>2</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The sage has called king Janak 'wise and expert' ("Praveena") to mean that though the king knew what to do, what was proper, and so on and so forth, he still was seeking advise from the sage just to show respect to him. Besides this, Janak had his own priest by the name of Satanand (pronounced 'Sataa-nand'). The latter was a competent priest and must have already advised king Janak on every minute detail of the preparations for marriage. So, if Janak seeks advice from sage Vishwamitra in this context then it is surely a formality and an expression of respect for him.

Janak was wise also because he knew how to interact with a 'guest sage', because Vishwamitra was his guest.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 261; (ii) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 262; and (iii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 265 which is very explicit on this point.]

दो०. तदपि जाइ तुह करहु अब जथा बंस व्यवहार ।
बूझि बिप्र कुलबृद्ध गुर बेद बिदित आचारु ॥ २८६ ॥

dōhā.

tadapi jā'i tumha karahu aba jathā bansa byavahāru.
būjhi bipra kulabr̥d'dha gura bēda bidita ācāru. 286.

(Sage Vishwamitra told Janak--) In spite of this (that the marriage has already taken place as soon as the bow broke), you can go ahead with the formal preparations and follow the traditions of your family and race.

Consult the Brahmins of your kingdom, the elders in your family, and your Guru (Satanand), and after that do according to their advice, keeping in mind the norms laid down in the Vedas and other scriptures for such occasions. (Doha no. 286)

Note—Acknowledging the king's gracefulness, sage Vishwamitra too reciprocated with equal graciousness by thanking Janak for seeking his advice but then telling him politely that he must ask the seniors in his family, the Brahmins of the kingdom, and his Guru, and act according to their advice. This simple gesture of Vishwamitra made him friendly to all other seniors in Janakpur.

But since Janak has sought his advice, sage Vishwamitra gave one personal one—that the king must send a messenger to Ayodhya and call king Dasrath, the father of Lord Ram, to attend the marriage ceremony, because it is a norm that the groom's parents must be present during his marriage.

Why did Vishwamitra choose to give this advice which is very obvious? Well, he had doubts that in the sort of marriage devised for Sita, the winning competitor is married-off immediately as soon as the condition set for the marriage is fulfilled, even if none of the family members of the groom can attend. If it is found necessary, the formality of doing various rituals and elaborate ceremonies is observed at a later date. This is clearly hinted when Vishwamitra says “the marriage had taken place as soon as the bow was broken”. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes this Doha no. 286; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes this Doha no. 265.

It was also possible, thought sage Vishwamitra, that the bride's side would insist that since he was present on the occasion, he should assume the role of Lord Ram's father and complete the rituals on king Dasrath's behalf. The sage wouldn't have been able to deny this role, especially because Dasrath had himself told him, at the time of handing over the two brothers to the sage, that for all practical purposes he (Vishwamitra) was their father—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 10 that precedes Doha no. 208.

But sage Vishwamitra was so gracious that he did not wish that king Dasrath be denied the privilege and joy of witnessing the marriage of his beloved son, Lord Ram.

Besides the above reason, the majesty, pomp, pageantry and ceremony of the occasion would be enhanced manifold times when two great kings joined hands and stood side-by-side to participate in the festivities. Otherwise this rare occasion would lack in its glamour and magnificence by half.

So, in order to pre-empt this possibility, he specifically asked Janak to send a messenger to Ayodhya and call king Dasrath—refer: Chaupai line no. 1 herein below.]

चौ०. दूत अवधपुर पठवहु जाई । आनहिं नृप दसरथहि बोलाई ॥ १ ॥

मुदित राउ कहि भलेहिं कृपाला । पठए दूत बोलि तेहि काला ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

dūta avadhapura paṭhavahu jāī. ānahim nrpa dasarathahi bōlāī. 1.
mudita rā'u kahi bhalēhim krpālā. paṭha'e dūta bōli tēhi kālā. 2.

(Sage Vishwamitra advised king Janak—) ‘Send a messenger to Ayodhya with an invitation for king Dasrath, and let that messenger bring the king here (to attend the marriage of his son Ram).<sup>1</sup> (1)

The king (Janak) was delighted, and he responded—‘Very well, oh merciful Lord! It will be done.’

The king summoned his messengers immediately and sent them to Ayodhya (with the message as well as the invitation)<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—1 Refer note of Doha no. 286 herein above.

Besides the reason given in the above referred note, there were other considerations in the mind of sage Vishwamitra also which prompted him to make this specific request to Janak.

One consideration was that Dasrath was a ‘bigger’ king as compared to Janak. With ‘bigger’ we mean that Dasrath that he was a “Charavarti King”, a king who was equivalent to an Emperor because he had a number of kings under his dominion—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 295 which explicitly honours Dasrath as being a ‘Chakravarti King’.

There are other instances also where it is clearly stated that the majesty of Dasrath as a great king, one who possessed the same honour that an emperor possesses, was unmatched in the whole world. For instance, in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 2 it is said that “all the kings were eager to have his favour and sought his blessings; they were all desirous or being in his good looks; and that there was no one more privileged and fortunate in the whole world consisting of three levels (heaven, earth and nether worlds) than Dasrath”. The same idea is repeated in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-7 that precede Doha no. 173.

In Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-7 that precedes Doha no. 320 it is declared that the gods acknowledged that both Janak and Dasrath were of equal stature and glory.

The other consideration was that may be Janak would not like to give Dasrath the trouble of coming to Janakpur because of the great distance involved in travelling between the cities of Ayodhya and Janakpur.

The third reason of why Janak had not invited Dasrath to attend the bow breaking ceremony that was organised to solemnise the marriage of Janak's daughter Sita seems to be very stark. It is this: The chances were high that Dasrath would refuse to come to attend the same marriage ceremony because he might have felt offended by not being invited along with other great kings of the earth. So, sage Vishwamitra wanted to ensure that this omission on the part of Janak should not act as a thorn and mar the future of cordial relationship between Janak and Dasrath, especially when Janak's daughter is married to Dasrath's son. When Dasrath would come to know that the invitation to come to Janakpur had the backing of sage Vishwamitra, he would never refuse to come—though of course he might have thought twice if only Janak had invited him at this late stage.

This understood, we shall now discuss why Janak apparently avoided or refrained from inviting Dasrath to attend the bow-breaking ceremony.

Well, the answers to this question are easy to deduce by application of simple logic based on the events mentioned in the Ramayan, though nowhere in the epic a precise reason is to be found that would address this query.

(i) First and foremost is that Janak had not sent any specific invitation to any particular king, prince or emperor to come and attend the bow-breaking ceremony. He had made a general proclamation to the effect that his daughter would be married to anyone who would lift and break the bow, and had sent heralds to all the seven continents to make known this intention of his so that all those interested could come. This is clear in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 251 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 7.

Of course he may have sent specific letters of invitation to those kings or princes with whom he had personal ties, such as his relatives etc., or official ties such as some sort of strategic diplomatic or military alliances. But surely such invitations must have been limited. This fact is borne out when we closely scrutinize the verses of Ram Charit Manas that tell us about the guests and competitors who had assembled at the venue of the bow-breaking ceremony, and Janak's own declaration at that time. Those who came included 'demons' and 'gods' besides human kings and princes—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 251. Then we learn that even the demon kings Ravana and Banasur had also come—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3 that precede Doha no. 256.

Any human father in his senses would not invite 'demons' and 'gods' to come and marry his daughter. Marrying 'gods' was tantamount to sending his daughter to premature death because gods do not live on earth; they live in heaven where one goes only after death. Besides this, gods do not have a physical body whereas the bride is a human being. Similarly, 'demons' as a race are evil, cruel, sinful, ugly, blood thirsty and hated by the world, and say which father would ever imagine that his loving daughter would become a wife of such a person?

Then we also find that bad, immoral and pervert kings had come to attend—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 245; (ii) Doha no. 250 and its following Chaupai line no. 1; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 266; (iv) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 285. Obviously, no father would willingly invite such people

Therefore in all probabilities his heralds had gone to the kingdom of Ayodhya but its king, Dasrath, decided not to come.

(ii) Even if we assume that Janak had purposely not invited Dasrath to the bow-breaking ceremony or had instructed his heralds not to go to Ayodhya, then there must have been a reason behind this decision of Janak. What was that reason? Let us now analyze them.

(a) Dasrath had a severe curse dangling on his head like a deadly sword. This curse essentially said that 'he would die pitifully grieving for his son'. This curse was cast on him by a blind hermit couple whose son named Srawan-kumar had been mistakenly killed by an arrow shot by Dasrath when he had gone out hunting. This episode is briefly mentioned in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 155, and in detail in Veda Vyas' narration of this epic story in his 'Adhyatma Ramayan', Ayodhya Kand, Canto 7, verse nos. 19-47, especially in verse no. 45 where Dasrath mentions this curse.

This rang an alarm bell in the mind of Janak, and he was afraid that if he invites Dasrath and the latter sends his son to attend the bow-breaking ceremony, or brings him along if he decides to come personally himself, and then this prince successfully breaks the bow, then Janak would have to marry his daughter Sita with him according to his own declaration. With a strong possibility of some danger coming to the would-be groom in the context of the aforesaid curse on Dasrath which meant that he would have to die a death while grieving for his son, it would be willfully creating a situation on the part of Janak where his daughter would be surely widowed. Naturally this very thought made Janak decide not to take any risk, and therefore not to invite Dasrath altogether.

This is the primary reason also why Janak had refrained from inviting Lord Ram to try his luck at breaking the bow, especially when all the other kings had failed to do so and his daughter's future was doomed because now she would have to live unmarried throughout her life, something that was no less than a severe curse both for the girl as well as for her father and his family. Janak had gone to the extent of declaring that he would prefer that his daughter remain unmarried because no one could break the bow than invite ridicule and ignominy by breaking his words and marrying her in violation of his declaration. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 252.

Now well, this was the same Janak who was so charmed by Lord Ram and Laxman when he first met them at the time of welcoming sage Vishwamitra that he minced no words in praising them and accepting that his mind and heart are overwhelmed with a surge of affection for the two princes—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 215—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 216, and once again in Chaupai line nos. 2-5 that precedes Doha no. 217.

But when Vishwamitra introduced the two brothers to him as princes of the kingdom of Ayodhya and sons of Dasrath (refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 216), Janak suddenly developed cold feet and was on the horns of a dilemma. Should he or should he not ask them to participate in the bow breaking event? As the event eventually unfolded we learn that he decided against it and kept mum on this issue, though he had invited the sage to the venue of the ceremony.

The next question is—'if this is the case, then why did he not object to Lord Ram finally going up to break the bow?' The clear-cut answer is that sage Vishwamitra had intervened and he was the one who had instructed Lord Ram to go and break the bow—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 254. Obviously king Janak did not object because he did not wish to oppose a great sage of the stature of Vishwamitra as this would not only be a highly irreverent thing to do that would unnecessarily burden him with unwarranted punishment that accompanies committing of a great sin of insulting a sage who is his guest-of-honour at that moment, but also there was the fear of inviting the sage's wrath. This obviously was another reason why Janak calmly bore with Laxman's insinuations and angry outburst directed straight at Janak as described in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 252—to Doha no. 253. Janak knew that both the brothers, Lord Ram and Laxman, had the loving patronage of sage Vishwamitra, and it would be wise for him to keep quiet because Laxman must surely have had a silent nod from the sage to speak so angrily in public, for otherwise it is unimaginable to think that he could behave in such an insulting and angry manner if the sage did not give his consent.

(b) The other reason of Janak not inviting Dasrath to the bow-breaking event is this—Janak observed the strict rule of having one wife to whom he was loyal throughout his life, his queen Sunayana. In fact, even his younger brother Kushdwaj had only one wife. But on the other hand, Dasrath was lustful and had gone wayward because he had married more than once—he had three well-known wives, Kaushalya, Sumitra and Kaikeyi. Not only this, whereas Janak was a highly spiritual man with a high level of metaphysical knowledge and detachment from materialistic world, one who used to hold conclaves of great scholars on a regular basis where great metaphysical and theological debates took place and had the renowned scholar-sage Yagyawalkya as one of his moral preceptors with whom he used to have thorough discussions on spiritual matters (refer: Brihad-Aranyak Upanishad of the Shukla Yajur Veda, Cantos 3-4), king Dasrath is depicted as a lustful man who had fallen so low in terms of self-restraint of his passions that he had become a virtual servant of one of his wives, Kaikeyi, so much so that he had been forced by her to send Lord Ram to 14 years of forest exile. Instead of standing up like a bold, brave and courageous king who could defeat the mightiest of enemies in battle, Dasrath succumbed to her, fell at her feet and wept like a child before her, pleading with her to spare his life and excuse Lord Ram from going to the forest! This episode is narrated in graphic detail in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 25—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 40.

Though this incident occurs after the marriage, but the ill-reputation of Dasrath as being a lustful and passionate man who preferred the company of women had spread far and wide. Then say, given this, how would Janak wish that his daughter should marry either such a king who already has three wives, or even in his discredited family?

(c) The third reason that is usually cited by scholars is that Dasrath was a 'Chakravarti king', i.e. an Emperor whose realm stretched to far-off places on earth that covered a wide circle ('Chakra' = a circle). Since king Janak, meanwhile, was merely a 'king' and not an Emperor of the stature of Dasrath, so he feared that if he sent an invitation it would be turned down, and that would be insulting and humiliating for Janak as well as for his kingdom. But this argument does not hold water because it is clearly said in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-7 that precedes Doha no. 320 that the gods who never speak a lie declared that both the kings were of equal stature and majesty.

<sup>2</sup>King Janak was delighted because sage Vishwamitra had given him an advice that was most appropriate and welcomed by him. He had wanted to send the invitation to Dasrath nevertheless, but now with the stamp of approval from sage Vishwamitra he was exhilarated that whatever doubts that he had in his mind as to whether Dasrath would like to accept the invitation or not were now dispelled. As the father of Sita he would certainly have liked to welcome and make sure that the father of the groom, Lord Ram, attended the marriage ceremony, especially when the groom's family had an equal stature as that of the bride's. On the other hand, it would have been a matter of scandalous gossip if the groom's family had abstained from the marriage for whatever reason.

Janak was a wise king. Marriages were, and are still, used in traditional societies as great bonding factors, uniting two great families and forging ties that stand in good stead for both the families. If for some reason the marriage was solemnized without the presence of Dasrath then it would have created a situation of bitterness between two mighty kingdoms that no amount of sweetener would ever let its affects be overcome later on.

The king wasted no time in sending the messenger. This messenger had two briefs: One was an 'invitation' from king Janak for king Dasrath, requesting the latter to come to Janakpur to attend the marriage ceremony of his son, Lord Ram, with Sita, the daughter of Janak. The other was a 'message' from sage Vishwamitra to the same effect.

The wise sage wished to tell Dasrath that his two sons were hale and hearty, that they had given their father and his family great glory and honour, and that the sage has fulfilled his moral obligations towards Dasrath by ensuring that his two sons, whom he had entrusted into the care of the sage, had achieved rare distinction in the world and gained the sort of fame that they would not have attained if they had remained at Ayodhya.]

बहुरि महाजन सकल बोलाए । आइ सबन्हि सादर सिर नाए ॥ ३ ॥

हाट बाट मंदिर सुरबासा । नगरु सँवारहु चारिहुँ पासा ॥ ४ ॥ bahuri mahājana sakala bōlā'ē. ā'i sabanhi sādara sira nā'ē. 3.

hāṭa bāṭa mandira surabāsā. nagaru samvārahu cārihum' pāsā. 4.

The king then summoned leading citizens (of Janakpur), all of whom came immediately and bowed their heads before him. ['Bowing the head' had two purposes: one obviously was to show their respect to their king, and the other was to say that they are ready to follow his instructions.] (3)

The king instructed them, 'Decorate the city from all sides—be it the market places, the streets, the homes or the temples.' (4)

[Note—The city was already decorated as it had been spruced up for the bow-breaking ceremony where thousands of kings from far away lands were invited. No one would want his home dirty and unkempt when he has invited guests. So it was natural that all arrangements had been made to give a positive impression of the kingdom to the invited kings. Besides these special arrangements, the city of Janakpur was well-planned and had been bestowed with natural beauty. There is ample evidence of it in its description in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 212—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 214.

In this context the present instruction of the king means that if there were any shortcomings then they must be looked into and fixed, and fineness must be added to the décor. Now that the marriage has been finalized, and fortunately the groom's family is one of the most reputed and well-known families on earth, then an appropriate welcome should be granted to it by erecting gates and arches for instances, and all resources must be used to make the guests as comfortable and happy as possible.

Whereas earlier the exterior of the city was decorated, now preparations must be made to decorate it more closely, with each individual home and temple given special attention to give the whole city a pristine look of glamour and magnificence from one end to the other that will make it appear like a decked-up bride from foot to head, so to say.

For instance, fresh flowers and plants should replace the stale ones put many days ago; the streets should be washed clean with scented water; the homes and public buildings should be adorned with festoons and hangings; the temples decorated wonderfully; the public parks and market places should bear a festive atmosphere as well as one of opulence and prosperity.

That is why the wise king had invited “all leading citizens of the city” instead of only state employees and professionals such as decorators, carpenters, plumbers, smiths, florists, craftsmen and engineers etc. He wanted each individual citizen of the city to feel that he is a part of the celebrations, to make them participate in a team spirit, to feel that it was his responsibility to contribute his might in the whole effort because it was a common celebration for all citizens, big and small. Thus, each man went home and started decorating his own home, leaving the royal employees free to take care of public places such as markets, streets, squares, parks and temples.

This observation will be very clear in the following verse nos. 5-7 herein below. Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 289 below. There we shall read that “each household and building of the city was so decorated that they had the same beauty and splendour, the same glamour and grandeur as the palace of king Janak”.]

हरषि चले निज निज गृह आए । पुनि परिचारक बोलि पठाए ॥ ५ ॥

रचहु बिचित्र बितान बनाई । सिर धरि बचन चले सचु पाई ॥ ६ ॥

haraṣi calē nija nija gr̥ha ā'ē. puni paricāraka bōli paṭhā'ē. 5.
racahu bicitra bitāna banā'ī. sira dhari bacana calē sacu pā'ī. 6.

The leading citizens (such as chiefs of families, businesses, traders, noblemen, grandees, knights and councillors) were very happy and glad to hear this instruction, and all of them cheerfully went away from there and arrived at their homes (to carry out the wishes of the king).

The king then summoned his royal attendants and senior members of his royal staff. (5)

He instructed them—‘Erect a wonderful pavilion which should be uniquely decorated.’ [Though not specifically mentioned, the pavilion probably would be the one where the marriage ritual was to be performed. It may also mean that the king ordered his craftsmen to erect a number of beautiful pavilions around the city at many important places to act as shelters or resting place for guests who would like to visit the city for the purpose of sight-seeing could relax and take rest.]

All of them (i.e. the royal employees and personal staff of the king) gladly accepted the king’s words, literally keeping the king’s instructions on their heads as a gesture of obeying them without any question or doubt, and they cheerfully proceeded forthwith to accomplish the task assigned to them. (6)

[Note—Refer also to note appended to verse nos. 3-4 herein above.

So we see that the king summoned the senior citizens as well as his personal staff members who were also state employees. The first group was to take care of the decorations at the micro level, and the second group was to take care of the preparations at the macro level. Whereas the citizens were asked to decorate their own homes and neighbours, the royal employees were instructed to start working on public projects by making suitable arrangements and inviting expert craftsmen. The wise king knew very well how to organize things on a massive scale while ensuring the willing participation of all involved.

A good servant is one who cheerfully obeys his master's commands—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 301. This is exemplified here in both the cases of the citizens as well as the state employees because all of them were glad when they heard the instructions of their king to go and decorate the city glamorously.]

पठए बोलि गुनी तिन्ह नाना । जे बितान बिधि कुसल सुजाना ॥ ७ ॥

बिधिहि बंदि तिन्ह कीन्ह अरंभा । बिरचे कनक कदलि के खंभा ॥ ८ ॥ paṭha'e bōli gunī tinha nānā. jē bitāna bidhi kusala sujānā. 7.

bidhihi bandi tinha kīnha arambhā. biracē kanaka kadali kē khambhā. 8.

Now, the royal staff members summoned many skilled artisans and craftsmen who were experts in erecting beautiful pavilions and canopies of different forms and sorts, with varying sizes and designs. (7)

All of them first sought the blessings of the Creator (“bidhihi bandi”) (so that the work is accomplished perfectly without a hitch), and then got on with their assigned jobs in right earnest. The pillars and supports they made for the pavilions and canopies were of gold and designed like plantain trees. (8)

[Note—These artisans were experts in their respective fields. Some would build the pillars, some the gates, some the arches, some the platforms and seats, some would design the canopy and the parasol, some would take care of the central part where the sacred fire would be lit, and there was an army of such skilled craftsmen who would take care of many other finer details of the different features of the pavilion that was to be erected.

So we see that there was a clearly marked hierarchical set up in the kingdom. The king ordered the senior members of his royal staff, and they passed on the instructions to the artisans, the workers and the labourers.]

दो०. हरित मनिन्ह के पत्र फल पदुमराग के फूल ।

रचना देखि बिचित्र अति मनु बिरंचि कर भूल ॥ २८७ ॥

dōhā.

harita maninha kē patra phala padumarāga kē phūla.
racanā dēkhi bicitra ati manu biran̄ci kara bhūla. 287.

Green gems (i.e. the emerald) was used to craft leaves and fruits out of them, and the red gem (i.e. the ruby) was used to shape blooming flowers from them. [To wit, these gems were carefully chiseled and given the shape of leaves, fruits and flowers that would be used to decorate the various parts of the pavilion, such as its pillars which were designed like the stem of the plantain tree.]

The craftsmanship was so wonderful and the creation was so fabulous that even the Creator (who has created such a beautiful world with so much diversity and wonderful sights) was awed when he saw them. His mind was bewildered at this magical sight which he couldn't imagine to be true, and thus he thought that his mind was making a mistake by wrongly interpreting the sight. [To wit, the pavilion was so magically beautiful that the Creator himself was deluded. He thought that he was seeing a mirage because his mind could not imagine or visualize of such a wonderful creation.] (Doha no. 287)

[Note—The Creator had been very proud of his craftsmanship. He had hitherto thought that no one can ever create anything more wondrous than what he had created in the form of this majestic world. The design of this pavilion was beyond his conception or imagination. He had never dreamt of anything of such a magnificent beauty. So he was stunned at its sight. He rubbed his eyes in amazement and thought that he was hallucinating because the pavilion was beautiful beyond his imagination.]

चौ०. बेनु हरित मनिमय सब कीन्हे । सरल सपरब परहिं नहिं चीन्हे ॥ १ ॥

कनक कलित अहिबेलि बनाई । लखि नहिं परइ सपरन सुहाई ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

bēnu harita manimaya saba kīnhē. sarala saparaba parahim̄ nahim̄ cīnhē. 1.
kanaka kalita ahibēli banāī. lakhi nahim̄ para'i saparana suhāī. 2.

Emerald, the green gem, was used to craft all the bamboo sticks out of them, complete with its straight part and its knots. These artificial bamboo sticks made of emerald were so natural in their appearance that it was impossible to distinguish them from the real ones<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Creepers of the Piper-betel (that were twined around the pillars and the thin rafters) were made from gold, complete with their leaves, and fashioned so expertly and perfect in shape and design that they did not appear to be artificial (i.e. they appeared to be natural creepers of a golden colour)<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The roof of the marriage pavilion is traditionally made of green and fresh bamboos. For this particular pavilion however, emeralds were used, but the craftsmanship was so fine that it was impossible to say whether the finished product was made of gems or real bamboo stems.

<sup>2</sup>The Piper-betel is regarded as very auspicious in Indian households, and the leaf of this creeper is used in all religious occasions when offerings are made to different gods and goddesses. The leaves are also used as mouth freshners, and chewed along with fillings of areca-nut slivers or scrappings, condiments such as cardamom and clove, and garnished with a dash of thin paste consisting of calcium and catechu.

The pavilion's pillars and other straight components were decorated with long threads of gold which were designed like creepers of the Piper-betel. The leaves of this creeper were also made from gold plates.]

तेहि के रचि पचि बंध बनाए । बिच बिच मुकुता दाम सुहाए ॥ ३ ॥
मानिक मरकत कुलिस पिरोजा । चीरि कोरि पचि रचे सरोजा ॥ ४ ॥

tēhi kē raci paci bandha banā'ē. bica bica mukutā dāma suhā'ē. 3.
mānika marakata kulisa pirōjā. cīri kōri paci racē sarōjā. 4.

These creepers were intricately intertwined to make fine ropes (or cords which were used as strings to tie together and hold in position the various components of the pavilion). Here and there, precious pearls were either tucked (inserted) in these ropes (to look like dew or rain drops), or hung in clusters or as strings from them (resembling either garlands or pendants made of gold)<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Gems such as rubies, emeralds, diamonds and turquoises were cut, scooped, carved and inlayed to fashion beautiful lotus flowers with open petals from them<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The pearls added beauty to the golden creepers and made a wonderful contrast because the gold is yellow in colour while the pearl is white. Individual pieces of the pearl that were tucked here and there on the golden creepers gave the impression of dew or water drops clinging to these creepers. The strings of pearls were also used as garlands hung from the pillars and rafters. Some of the pearls that were hung in the form of a free-hanging string gave the impression of a decorative hanging or a pendant which swayed in breeze.

<sup>2</sup>Large pieces of these gems were used to make lotus flowers. All religious ceremonies are deemed to be incomplete without this flower. Like the betel leaves, the lotus flowers too are necessary in all religious ceremonies.]

किए भृंग बहुरंग बिहंगा । गुंजहिं कूजहिं पवन प्रसंगा ॥ ५ ॥
सुर प्रतिमा खंभन गढ़ि काढ़ीं । मंगल द्रव्य लिएँ सब ठाढ़ीं ॥ ६ ॥ ki'ē bhr̥ṅga bahuraṅga bihaṅgā. guṅjahim kūjahim pavana prasaṅgā. 5.

sura pratimā khambhana gaḍhi kāḍhī. maṅgala drabya li'ēm̐ saba ṭhāḥīm. 6.

[To complete the ambience created by the bamboo stalks, the lotus flowers and the creepers, it was necessary to make the following additions—] Black-bees and various kinds of birds of colourful feathers were also made. They buzzed and whistled when they were rustled by the breeze blowing past them<sup>1</sup>. (5)

Images of gods were sculpted on the pillars. These images depicted all the gods in a standing posture with auspicious things in their hands<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The ‘black-bee’ is associated with the lotus flower because this insect hovers around the flower in search of nectar as soon as it opens. The birds chirp and hop around trees and creepers, in search of fruits and insects to feed themselves. Without these creatures the picture would have been incomplete.

Though it is not mentioned here what gem or precious stone was used to craft the bee or the bird, but one can fairly easily guess that every precious thing that was used to make pillars, rafters, sticks, flowers, fruits and creepers was also used to fashion birds and bees out of it.

<sup>2</sup>What were the ‘auspicious things’ these images held in their hands? An indicative list of things that are regarded as ‘auspicious and providers of good omen’ is given in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precedes Doha no. 346. They are the following—turmeric, blades of Durba grass, curd, ordinary leaves (especially mango leaves), flowers of different kinds, betel leaves, areca-nuts, auspicious edible roots, unthrashed rice, sprouts of barley, gorochan (a yellow pigment), puffed paddy, and buds of the basil plant.

In other words, these images of gods had many such things in their hands to mark auspiciousness of the occasion.

It is to be noted that the images depicted the gods in a ‘standing posture’ as a sign of showing respect to Lord Ram who was an incarnate Supreme Being, and all other guests who had come to attend the divine union of the Lord with his Shakti known as Sita.]

चौकें भाँति अनेक पुराई । सिंधुर मनिमय सहज सुहाई ॥ ७ ॥

caukēm bhām̐ti anēka purā'īm̐. sindhura manimaya sahaja suhā'īm̐. 7.

Decorative squares and geometric designs based on religious themes (i.e. patterned on various ‘Yantras’ or geometrical designs as prescribed for different rituals) were drawn on the ground (which were either painted on the floor, or made by making lines on the ground by pouring a thin layer of powder of different colours or even flours of different cereals and pulses that were mixed with various colours).

They were beautifully designed and decorated with ‘elephant pearls (sindhura mani)<sup>1</sup>’. (7)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A special class of wild elephants are said to exude a white sap from the skin of their heads. It is very rare, and when solidified each drop of this sap appears in the shape of natural pearl. It is known as ‘Gaja-Mukta’, or “the pearl of the elephant; pearl produced by the elephant”.

The ‘squares’ and other geometrical patterns were designed like worship ‘Yantras’ that are ancient worship instruments used in occult forms of religious practices to invoke the divine powers of gods and goddesses who stand for the cosmic energy that is sought to be harnessed.]

दो०. सौरभ पल्लव सुभग सुठि किए नीलमनि कोरि । हैम बौर मरकत घवरि लसत पाटमय डोरि ॥ २८८ ॥

dōhā.

saurabha pallava subhaga suṭhi ki'ē nīlamani kōri.
hēma baura marakata ghavari lasata pāṭamaya ḍōri. 288.

Leaves of the mango plant were made by cutting the edges of sapphire and engraving the design of leaves on them, while its small flowers were made from gold, and bunches of its fruits (the mango) were crafted from emerald. These fruits were made to hang with the help of short strings made of silk. (Doha no. 288)

[Note—“Saurabha” = mango. “Neelmani” = the blue gem; the sapphire. “Hema” = gold. “Markat” = emerald. “Dhavari” = cluster of flowers. “Paat” = silk; “Paatmaya” = silken.

This Doha describes the way the mango fruits, leaves and flowers were designed. These were added to the other items that were used to decorate the pavilion.]

चौ०. रचे रुचिर बर बंदनिवारे । मनहुँ मनोभवं फंद सँवारे ॥ १ ॥
मंगल कलस अनेक बनाए । ध्वज पताक पट चमर सुहाए ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

racē rucira bara bandanivārē. manahum̐ manōbhavam̐ phanda sam̐vārē. 1.
maṅgala kalasa anēka banā'ē. dhvaja patāka paṭa camara suhā'ē. 2.

The artisans made fascinating festoons that were hung on all entrance and exit points such as the doorways, the gateways and the archways. These hangings were so charming and intricately woven that they appeared to be like snares put up by Kamdeo (cupid) (to captivate the mind and the heart of all the guests who would attend the marriage ceremony of Lord Ram and Sita)<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Many auspicious vessels (“Kalas”) were crafted and put up. Similarly, beautiful flags, banners, curtains and whisks were also made and hung up at appropriate places (for the purpose of decoration and to give the whole arena an image of a huge grand palace)<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In the foregoing verses, from Doha no. 287—to Doha no. 288, we have read about the special features of the pavilion where the marriage of Lord Ram and Sita was to be solemnised with respect to its design and the materials used to make it. Now in these verses we shall read about the external features of this pavilion. The present verse no. 1 deals with the entrance and exit points of the huge pavilion itself as well as the arena in general.

Remember: It was the venue of the marriage of a ‘princess’, and therefore the construction was done on a grand and extensive scale. The venue had many entrance and exit points, and each was extensively decorated. The metaphor of the Kamdeo is commonly cited in Indian scriptures and other literature to stress on the beauty and charm of the object referred to. Kamdeo is the god of beauty and physical charm, and hence wherever and whenever he is invoked, the intent is to show that the thing in question has remarkable beauty and charm.

In this context, refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 346 that also invokes Kamdeo with respect to the auspicious pitchers filled with scented liquid as if Kamdeo had squeezed the virtue of auspiciousness to extract its essence and then filled these pitchers with it.

The entrance points of the venue had to be especially attractive because they were like the face of the main venue. They would hint to the guest what was to be expected inside. These gateways, archways and doorways had to be so wonderful that the guest would feel warmly welcomed even before he entered the main venue.

It is just like the case of a 'beautiful and attractive face' of the body; when one meets someone it is the face which he sees and appreciates first before anything else. If the face is ugly and gloomy, the rest of the interaction becomes unattractive and lacking in charm. The beautiful interior is often marred by an ugly or unsuitable exterior. For instance, we remember a person with a lovely face more favourably than a person with an ugly face. The same thing applies here: all efforts were made to deck-up the exterior of the pavilion as well as the arena in general so that the immense efforts invested in the construction of the magnificent pavilion itself do not go to waste, so that the visitor carries with him a permanently sweet memory of what he has seen and witnessed.

<sup>2</sup>The "Kalases" are pitchers and other vessels that are ordinarily made of clay, but those who can afford them they can also be made from precious metals such as gold and silver, or of lesser valuable materials such as copper, brass etc. On auspicious occasions they are placed at strategic points such as all entrances and exits of a place where a religious ceremony is to be held. They are painted colourfully and decorated with leaves, fruits etc.

The previous verse no. 1 deals with the entrance points, and so now this present verse no. 2 elaborates on it to tell us more about how these entrances were decorated: there were auspicious pitchers placed on either side of the entrances which were wonderful decorated with flags, banners, curtains and whisks that were put up on them to give them the appearance of the gates and doors of a royal palace.

Besides being placed at the entrance and exit points, these auspicious vessels are placed on the ceremonial 'squares' that are painted or made from coloured powder on the ground as mentioned in Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 288 above.

In this context, refer to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 296 which tell us how the citizens of Ayodhya decorated their households when the good news of Lord Ram's marriage reached the city. Here also we shall read that the decoration made by them had all the components mentioned in the present verse: there were flags, banners, curtains, whisks, golden pitchers, festoons and nets made from gems and precious stones of many kinds. Then there were garlands and hangings made from blades of fresh green grass.]

दीप मनोहर मनिमय नाना । जाइ न बरनि बिचित्र बिताना ॥ ३ ॥

जेहिं मंडप दुलहिनि बैदेही । सो बरनै असि मति कबि केही ॥ ४ ॥

dīpa manōhara manimaya nānā. jā'i na barani bicitra bitānā. 3.
jēhim maṇḍapa dulaḥini baidēhī. sō baranai asi mati kabi kēhī. 4.

Many kinds of oil-lamps made from gems of different varieties were so beautiful to look at that they virtually stole the mind and the heart of the onlooker (i.e. these lamps held the attention of the viewer so much so that he was captivated by their fabulous beauty).

In this way, the extensive pavilion was erected in such a magnificent way that it looked most wonderful and awe-inspiring, and it defied description<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Say, which poet has the expertise and acumen, literary as well as poetic, sufficient enough to describe the grandeur, opulence and elegance of the pavilion in which “Vaidehi” (the daughter of king Videha, another name of king Janak) was to be present as a bride<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The lighted lamps are placed at different locations of such a pavilion. Some are placed on leaves that cover the mouth of the ceremonial vessels like the ones described in the previous verse no. 2, some are placed at the sides of the gate itself, others along the walls and steps leading upto the platform, and still others at nooks and corners of the pavilion to give the whole place a glittering and romantic look.

The lighted lamps are also used for formal worship rituals, and are placed on and around the altar, at the foot of the image of the deity to be worshipped, and etc.

<sup>2</sup>This verse answers the question ‘which pavilion was especially decorated by the expert artisans of Janakpur?’ Does it mean that no other pavilions were erected? No; certainly many other pavilions were erected all over the city, such as along main city thoroughfares and around public parks and squares for the purpose of giving a place to rest for the visitors and guests who would like to roam around the city. But the focus of attention was the pavilion where the marriage was to be held.

The use of the word “Vaidehi” for Sita is very significant here. It is used to remove any misgivings about who Sita actually was, because marriages are worldly events that unite one mortal human being to another mortal human being. One must not be misled by this story of Sita marrying Lord Ram to get an impression that an ordinary princess is being married to a prince. Because if this misconception creeps in then the very purpose of narrating this event would lose its element of divinity and holiness, and it would be reduced to the narration of the marriage of king’s daughter by one of the royal bards! It is not to be allowed to be so.

Remember: Both Sita and Lord Ram are not ordinary human beings who have a gross body that will become old and die one day. They are not ordinary human princess and prince who are marrying each other. These two are divine Beings—Sita being goddess Laxmi and Sri Ram being Lord Vishnu—who have willingly assumed the form of human beings for some great work of the gods that was pending to be done. In other words, they are the ‘disembodied supreme Self’, an image that has no physical aspect other than a mere reflective form of the original—as clearly meant by the word “Vaidehi” which means ‘one without a physical gross body’.]

दूलहु रामु रूप गुन सागर । सो बितानु तिहुँ लोक उजागर ॥ ५ ॥
जनक भवन कै सोभा जैसी । गृह गृह प्रति पुर देखिअ तैसी ॥ ६ ॥

dūlahu rāmu rūpa guna sāgara. sō bitānu tihum<sup>1</sup> lōka ujāgara. 5.
janaka bhavana kai sōbhā jaisī. gr̥ha gr̥ha prati pura dēkhi'a taisī. 6.

The canopy under which Lord Ram—who is an ocean<sup>1</sup> of all Gunas (auspicious virtues) and Roop (beauty)<sup>2</sup>—will appear as a groom, is definitely the one that shines<sup>3</sup> (occupies a privileged and special place) in the entire world consisting of three dimensions<sup>4</sup>. (5)

The beauty and splendour that was seen at the royal palace of Janak was also replicated in all the homes of the city. [In other words, each individual household of the city was decorated in the best possible way as each householder regarded himself as a part of the grand celebration of Sita's marriage. Hence, each household and building of the city was so decorated that they had the same beauty and splendour, the same glamour and grandeur as the palace of king Janak.]<sup>5</sup> (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word “ocean” is a figure of speech to mean that the Lord's goodness and his virtues are countless and immeasurable just like the vastness of the ocean.

<sup>2</sup>Good and auspicious virtues give glory and fame to the one who possesses them. They are a person's adornment just like the beautiful clothes and ornaments he wears. The good qualities and exemplary characters that a person possesses give his personality an intrinsic beauty and enduring charm that are more meaningful than merely possessing artificial good-looking paraphernalia that are pleasant for the eyes but hollow from the inside as well as transient.

So, here it is meant that Lord Ram's beauty (“Roop”) is not merely limited to his lovely physical appearances but goes deep down to mean the inherent good nature and excellent qualities that he possesses. His beauty is not skin-deep, but it is as ‘deep as the ocean’, because it is represented by the wonderful qualities and characters that the Lord possesses in a natural way.

<sup>3</sup>This canopy is distinct from all other such canopies. It has a unique place or distinction of its own; it stands out; it occupies a place of pride; it has an outstanding glory of its own.

Now, the use of the word “canopy” and then describing it as being “unique” is very significant here. It subtly refers the cosmic form of Lord Ram because he indeed is the Supreme Being in a manifested form. From the cosmic perspective of this world, the ‘sky’ is the canopy! So, when the Lord of the world stands below a canopy it implies that it symbolises the ‘sky’ that covers the whole world.

In this context one must refer to the previous verse no. 4 where Sita is addressed as “Vaidehi”. The two verses, nos. 4 and 5, together intend to convey the message that the reader must not treat this marriage as between to human beings, but as a divine event that would bring together two unique cosmic forces of Nature—one is ‘Brahm’, the Supreme Being represented by Lord Ram, and the other is ‘Shakti’, the cosmic forces of Nature.

<sup>4</sup>The three worlds referred to here are the heaven, the earth and the nether world. It may also mean the past world, the present world and the future world.

In other words, the canopy under which Lord Ram would stand as a groom was so magnificent that its like had never been erected before, would never be erected in future, and has never been erected in the present time also.

<sup>5</sup>Earlier, in Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 287, we have already read that Janak had called the senior citizens and requested them to decorate their individual homes and neighbourhoods. This present verse is an extension of it.

So, while the army of royal artisans and craftsmen engaged themselves to erect the marriage pavilion and other public pavilions, the citizens got down to the task of cleaning and beautifying their individual homes as well as their neighbourhoods.

It was a sort of community effort, and the result was that the entire city looked spick and span, glittering in every corner and appearing like heaven on earth.]

जेहिं तेरहुति तेहि समय निहारी । तेहि लघु लगहिं भुवन दस चारी ॥ ७ ॥
जो संपदा नीच गृह सोहा । सो बिलोकि सुरनायक मोहा ॥ ८ ॥

jēhim tērahuti tēhi samaya nihārī. tēhi laghu lagahim bhuvana dasa cārī. 7.
jō sampadā nīca grha sōhā. sō bilōki suranāyaka mōhā. 8.

Anyone who happened to look at ‘Tirhooti’ (the city of Janakpur) at that time found it so magnificent and glamorous that all the fourteen Bhuvans (i.e. the 14 mythological worlds; or the fourteen levels of the existing world) appeared to fade away in glory and look humble when compared to it (Janakpur)<sup>1</sup>. (7)

The prosperity and wealth that even the humblest of householder possessed in the city of Janakpur amazed the king of gods (Indra). [That is, Indra had not expected that such uniform distribution of prosperity and wealth would be witnessed on earth. He was also astonished at the immensity of wealth in Janakpur as it surpassed even the wealth of his heavenly kingdom.]<sup>2</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer to a note appended to Baal Kand, Chanda line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 261 above which lists the names of the fourteen Bhuvans referred to here.

A pertinent question arises here: who has seen these ‘fourteen Bhuvans’ that he would be able to compare them with Janakpur and find that the latter is more beautiful than any or all of them? Of course it is not possible for humans to do so. Then who were they who did the comparison?

The answer is this: Lord Ram’s marriage was witnessed by all the gods, including the chief amongst the gods, such as Brahma the creator, Shiva the concluder, and Indra who is the king of gods. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 289 herein below; as well as (ii) Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede Doha no. 314.

<sup>2</sup>How this unique achievement was made possible is explained by Lord Shiva in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 314 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that follow it by advising the stunned gods, including the creator Brahma who was dazed at the fabulous beauty he saw in Janakpur and began to doubt whether the city was his creation, by telling them to realise that—“It is the place where the supreme Lord Vishnu in the form of Lord Ram is present along with his divine consort Laxmi in the form of Sita, so how can it lack anything? The Lord is the one who grants all wishes by merely taking his holy name, whose name is an eternal treasury of auspiciousness and well-being, and it can bestow the four legendary fruits obtained by doing meritorious deeds to the person who repeats this holy name.” The four fruits are ‘Artha’ = wealth and prosperity; ‘Kaam’ = fulfilment of desires; ‘Dharma’ = honour as an upholder of laws and doer of duties in an ethical manner; and ‘Moksha’ = spiritual liberation and deliverance.

Goddess Laxmi is the patron goddess of material wealth. This being the case, there is no wonder that there was extensive opulence and prosperity in Janakpur because Laxmi is present here in the form of Sita. Refer: Doha no. 289 herein below.

The beauty of the city of Janakpur has been described earlier also in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 212—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 214.]

दो०. बसइ नगर जेहिं लच्छि करि कपट नारि बर बेषु । तेहि पुर कै सोभा कहत सकुचहिं सारद सेषु ॥ २८९ ॥

dōhā.

basa'i nagara jēhiṁ lacchi kari kapaṭa nāri bara bēṣu.
tēhi pura kai sōbhā kahata sakucahiṁ sārada sēṣu. 289.

The magnificence, the grandeur, the opulence and the splendour of a city where goddess Laxmi (the patron goddess of material wealth and prosperity; the divine consort of Lord Vishnu) herself lived in an illusionary form as a woman (i.e. as Sita, the daughter of Janak) was so great that even Sharda (goddess Saraswati who is the patron goddess of speech and learning) and the Sesha (the thousand-tongued celestial serpent) failed to describe it, they were reluctant to attempt to describe it (because they knew they won't be able to do it). (Doha no. 289)

[Note—As noted above in the note appended to previous verses, this Doha explains why the city looked so wonderful that there was no comparison between it and the rest of the world.]

चौ०. पहुँचे दूत राम पुर पावन । हरषे नगर बिलोकि सुहावन ॥ १ ॥
भूप द्वार तिन्ह खबरि जनाई । दसरथ नृप सुनि लिए बोलाई ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

pahumcē dūta rāma pura pāvana. haraṣē nagara bilōki suhāvana. 1.
bhūpa dvāra tinha khabari janāī. dasaratha nrpa suni li'ē bōlāī. 2.

The messengers<sup>1</sup> (of king Janak) reached the auspicious (“pāvana”; holy and sacred) city of Lord Ram (i.e. Ayodhya). They were thrilled to behold the beautiful and pleasant city<sup>2</sup>. (1)

When the messenger reached the gates of the palace of king Dasrath, he sent in a message for the king, who called him as soon as he heard of his arrival<sup>3</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to (i) Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 102; and (ii) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 296 also.

Now we pick up the narration that was paused in Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 287 herein above. Janak had sent his messengers to Ayodhya on the instructions of sage Vishwamitra. Both the cities of Janakpur as well as Ayodhya were wonderful to look at. We have already read about the pleasantness of the city of Janakpur and its suburbs in Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 212—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 214. Though not specifically mentioned here but we can comfortably assume that the city of Ayodhya as well as its suburbs were equally pleasant and wonderful to look at. This present verse no. 1 hints at it.

One important point is to be noted here. Ayodhya has been called “Rampur”, the ‘city of Ram’. This is done purposely to sum-up its glory—i.e. it is a city where the supreme Lord Vishnu has decided to come down to earth and live in the human form as Lord Ram. This being the case, there is no need for further elaboration on the city’s grandeur and beauty. Any intelligent person can arrive at a logical conclusion of the city’s magnificence based on common-sense when he reads about the beauty and grandeur of Janakpur where the divine consort of Lord Vishnu, i.e. goddess Laxmi, lives in the form of Sita. If the city of Sita (Janakpur) is grand, then obviously and naturally the city of her divine spouse, Lord Vishnu as Sri Ram, must at least be equal to the former if not more so.

Another important point to note is this: When the city was referred to as the “city of Lord Ram”, i.e. ‘Rampur’, in the first half of the verse, it was described as being ‘auspicious, holy and sacred’—i.e. as “Paawan”. But in the second half when it is merely referred to as a ‘city’ or “Nagar”, it is described as being pleasant and wonderful to look at. Well, the subtle idea is that a place where the Lord God lived was equivalent to a pilgrim place, a holy site. The arrival of the messengers here is equivalent to a person arriving at any holy site where one goes for pilgrimage. In other words, the messengers were very lucky to have gone on a pilgrimage to the holy city of Ayodhya.

Once inside the city, like any other normal pilgrim, they looked at its sights, its temples and other buildings, its parks, gardens, market places and streets as they were making their way to the palace of king Dasrath. Hence, this view of the city in general is being described in a normal way—as consisting of pleasant sights.

<sup>2</sup>It ought to be noted here that ‘more than one person was sent as messenger’, though of course there was a chief amongst them. This fact is clearly mentioned in Valmiki’s Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 67, verse no. 27.

They were sent on the instructions of sage Vishwamitra as well as on the advice of Satanand, the royal priest of Janakpur—refer: Valmiki’s Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 68, verse no. 13.

<sup>3</sup>King Dasrath was like an Emperor; many kings had to wait for their turn to meet him. There must have been a hierarchical setup in the palace as well as the royal court, and those senior to others were given quicker audience with the king. This is clear in the following verses of Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand: (i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 2 that says “the kings were anxious to be in the favour of Dasrath, and they performed their respective duties keeping in mind that Dasrath is pleased and approves of their actions”; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 25 that says “the kings of this world sought the goodwill and lived at the pleasure of king Dasrath on the strength of whose arms even the king of gods (Indra) lived without any hindrance to his authority”.

These arriving messengers must have seen a number of important persons waiting at the gates for their turn to meet king Dasrath. So they informed the guards that they have come with a special message from sage Vishwamitra, and it concerns Lord Ram and Laxman. This message was to be delivered to the king immediately. This gave them a ‘green flag’ and a preferential treatment at the hands of the guards who rushed inside the royal palace to inform the king of their arrival.

So, as soon as the king heard the news that messengers have arrived with the news of the two princes, and they carry a message from sage Vishwamitra, he immediately ordered that they be ushered in.]

करि प्रनामु तिन्ह पाती दीन्ही । मुदित महीप आपु उठि लीन्ही ॥ ३ ॥
बारि बिलोचन बाँचत पाती । पुलक गात आई भरि छाती ॥ ४ ॥

kari pranāmu tinha pātī dīnhī. mudita mahīpa āpu uṭhi līnhī. 3.
bāri bilōcana bām̐cata pātī. pulaka gāta āī bhari chātī. 4.

The messengers bowed before the king and gave him the letter with due respect. The king was exhilarated and he himself got up and took it with his own hands<sup>1</sup>. (3)

As he (Dasrath) read the letter, tears (of joy and affection) gushed out of his eyes. His body was filled with thrill, and so was his heart that was overwhelmed<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Usually any message or letter was given to the king through his attendants. But in this case, the king stood up himself to receive it. He was very anxious to learn about his two sons who had gone away with sage Vishwamitra for quite some time now. This was the first time any news about them has arrived. So naturally as a father the king was extremely eager to read it.

Another reason for Dasrath getting up himself to receive the letter was that it had a message from the revered sage Vishwamitra. Now do we see why king Janak had been reluctant to send messengers to Ayodhya before sage Vishwamitra specifically instructed him to do so? Janak was aware that kings have to wait for their turn to meet Dasrath, as the latter was an Emperor. So he feared that if he sent the messenger in an ordinary routine way like a king’s letter-bearer, then perhaps he will have to wait in a queue for getting a chance to present himself before king Dasrath. But if he bore a message from sage Vishwamitra, then he will get prompt response.

The king was exhilarated upon receiving the letter because it was the first time, after a long gap, that any news has come about his beloved two sons, Ram and Laxman, and that even through sage Vishwamitra. In this context, the following verses are very explicit: (i) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 291; and (ii) Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 101.

<sup>2</sup>Dasrath was so overwhelmed with emotions that his throat was virtually choked as tears flowed from his eyes, a current of thrill shot through his entire body, and his heart literally skipped a beat. He perhaps read some lines and stopped for a while to recover himself. This will be clear in verse nos. 5-6 herein below where it is said that: “He was virtually dumbfounded upon remembering Lord Ram and Laxman so much so that and could not read the letter long enough to learn any good or bad it contained. However, he regained his composure and once again read it with patience”, after having recovered from the emotional ecstasy that accompanied his initial euphoria.]

रामु लखनु उर कर बर चीठी । रहि गए कहत न खाटी मीठी ॥ ५ ॥
पुनि धरि धीर पत्रिका बाँची । हरषी सभा बात सुनि साँची ॥ ६ ॥ rāmu lakhanu ura kara bara cīṭhī. rahi ga'e kahata na khāṭī mīṭhī. 5.

puni dhari dhīra patrikā bām̐cī. haraṣī sabhā bāta suni sām̐cī. 6.

With the image (memory) of Lord Ram and Laxman in his heart and the letter in his hand, the king stood dumbfounded so much so that he could not utter anything and say whether there was good news or bad one in it (i.e. in the letter)<sup>1</sup>. (5)

However, recollecting himself and regaining his composure, the king read the letter again patiently. [This time he read it fully and aloud so that everyone could hear its contents.]<sup>2</sup>

The royal court was exhilarated and overjoyed upon hearing the correct news (and truthful information about the two princes, news that was trustworthy, news that conveyed Lord Ram's great achievement of breaking the formidable bow which not only established his name and glory in the whole world but also entitled him to marry Sita, the most beautiful girl of her time)<sup>3</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The king was an extremely busy person, and he had no time to brood about his two sons who had been away from him for quite some time now. So when he saw the letter, the pleasant and fond memories of Lord Ram and Laxman flooded his heart and mind and virtually drowned him in a surge of emotion. He choked; tears gushed out of his eyes; his body was thrilled. He stood like a statue for some time. He could not even tell anything to the royal court that had its ears standing erect to hear what that letter contained, so overwhelmed he was.

Those moments must have been certainly very anxious for all those attending the court at that time when they saw tears rushing out of the king's eyes. His ministers and other courtiers must have kept their fingers crossed, hoping for good news as they watched their king in a stunned state!

To underline the dramatic effect of the letter and to emphasise the uncertainty and anxiety of the moment, this verse says that the king “could not utter anything, whether it was good news or bad news”.

<sup>2</sup>As we have read in the foregoing verses, Dasrath could not read the letter initially as he was overwhelmed with surging waves of emotions. Soon however, he regained his composure and read the letter aloud. How do we know that he “read it aloud?” Well, this is evident because it is said that the “court heard it and everyone felt joyous”.

We shall soon see that Dasrath had read this letter “twice”—once it now, and then once again when Bharat asked him about its contents. Refer: Doha no. 290 herein below.

<sup>3</sup>It is to be noted that it is said in the second part of this verse that “everyone in the assembly was over-joyed to hear the ‘truthful’ news”. The emphasise is on “hearing of truthful news” (bāta suni sām̐cī). This is because the letter had come with the signature of sage Vishwamitra, and it therefore had true, ‘trustworthy and genuine’ news about Lord Ram and Laxman, that the invitation to come to Janakpur was genuine, and that there was no trap in it.

In ancient times, it was quite common to trap a king’s army in an ambush by first inviting him to attend some sort of ceremony and then laying out a trap for him mid-way. Against this backdrop, the use of the word “true news” assumes significance as it implies that the court of king Dasrath was reassured that the news was ‘genuine’ and ‘trustworthy’, and not some kind of foul play to cheat the king.

In this context, refer to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 291 herein below. ]

खेलत रहे तहाँ सुधि पाई । आए भरतु सहित हित भाई ॥ ७ ॥
पूछत अति सनेहँ सकुचाई । तात कहाँ तें पाती आई ॥ ८ ॥ khēlata rahē tahām̐ sudhi pāī. ā'ē bharatu sahita hita bhāī. 7.

pūchata ati sanēham̐ sakucāī. tāta kahām̐ tēm̐ pātī āī. 8.

When this news reached the place where Bharat was playing with his friends and brother Shatrughan, he (Bharat) immediately came (to his father, king Dasrath) along with his playmates and brother. (7)

He (Bharat) hesitantly asked the king most affectionately—‘Dear father, please tell me from where has the letter come?’ (8)

[Note—Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 102, stanza no. 1 also.

Bharat’s question clearly indicates that he had only heard that some good news has come, but wasn’t aware of either its contents or from where it has come.

Bharat was “hesitant” because he was not sure if he was observing royal protocol by bursting excitedly into the royal court with his playmates and directly asking the king about the contents of the letter and from where it had come. It was alright that Bharat was the son of king Dasrath and therefore a prince, but still he was expected to observe the rules of protocol when in the court. He could not be as informal with his father in an open court that was a formal place bearing the authority of state as he was with him inside the royal palace which was his home. But Bharat was so excited that he could not wait for formal permission from the king to ask questions or speak with him.

Besides this, the king had not summoned Bharat in this case; Bharat had heard the news from someone and had come on his own accord. May be the letter had to do with official matters of the kingdom and if that is the case then Bharat had no right to ask such questions as he did.

Even if everything else is neglected, we read here that Bharat was accompanied by his “playmates” when he came to king Dasrath’s court. Now, a royal court is certainly not a play-ground or palace courtyard where the prince can collect his friends and playmates around him. Certain basic level of court decorum and royal dignity had to be maintained, and a crowd of excited children in a court is certainly not acceptable.

These are some of the plausible reasons why Bharat was “hesitant” in asking his father about the letter that the messengers had brought.

Bharat asked “affectionately” because the letter contained news about Lord Ram and Laxman whom not only Bharat but also his brother Shatrughan, as well as all other friends loved very much. All the boys were terribly excited to know more about Lord Ram and Laxman, their best friends and brothers.

Remember: Though the four brothers, Lord Ram, Laxman, Bharat and Shatrughan, were royal princes, yet they never lived a life that would create a wall between them and the subjects of the kingdom, so that all the boys of the city who were of their age were treated as equal friends, and the four princes would regularly interact with these citizen-boys without any hint of superiority complex or displaying any taint of snobbishness in their behaviour. In this context, refer to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 205.]

दो०. कुसल प्रानप्रिय बंधु दोउ अहहिं कहहु केहिं देस ।

सुनि सनेह साने बचन बाची बहुरि नरेस ॥ २९० ॥

dōhā.

kusala prānapriya bandhu dō'u ahahim kahahu kēhim dēsa.
suni sanēha sānē bacana bācī bahuri narēsa. 290.

Bharat asked his father king Dasrath—‘Are my brothers, who are very dear to my heart, happy and doing well? Say, where are they at present, and in which country?’

When the Emperor (“narēsa”) heard these honestly affectionate words, he read aloud the letter once again (so that Bharat and the others could hear it once again for clarifications). (Doha no. 290)

[Note—The word “narēsa” here endorses the view that Dasrath was an Emperor as expressed earlier in our discussion of how easily the messengers of Janak had been ushered in to meet Dasrath whereas other kings had to wait in a queue.

Now, this was the third time the letter was read by Dasrath. On the first occasion he was so overwhelmed that he couldn’t read it fully, and on the other occasion he did read it fully but Bharat was not present—refer: Chaupai line nos. 4 and 6 herein above respectively.

The king decided to read the letter fully once again because he realized that Bharat won’t be satisfied unless he hears the contents fully. Besides this, the king wanted to train his sons on the way such invitations should be written, because such occasions do not come frequently.

Refer also to Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 102 also.]

चौ०. सुनि पाती पुलके दोउ भ्राता । अधिक सनेहु समात न गाता ॥ १ ॥

प्रीति पुनीत भरत कै देखी । सकल सभाँ सुखु लहेउ बिसेषी ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

sunī pātī pulakē dō'u bhrātā. adhika sanēhu samāta na gātā. 1.
prīti punīta bharata kai dēkhī. sakala sabhām' sukhu lahē'u bisēṣī. 2.

Upon hearing the letter the two brothers were overjoyed, and were so excited with happiness that it seemed their bodies were unable to contain their emotions of happiness, thrill and excitement. (1)

Seeing the undiluted, unpretentious, and sincere affection of Bharat (for Lord Ram and Laxman)<sup>1</sup>, the whole court was extremely delighted<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Bharat shared a special bond of love and affection with Lord Ram, and the Lord reciprocated it in full measure. Both the brothers acknowledged each other's love on every occasion in the epic story of Ram Charit Manas as we shall see below.

For instance, let us see the following verses of Ayodhya Kand:--

(i) In Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 169 of Ayodhya Kand, mother Kaushalya tells Bharat that "Ram is dearer to you than your own Pran (life), and likewise you are dearer to Ram than his own self".

(ii) In Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 205 of Ayodhya Kand, the holy rivers at Triveni (i.e. river Ganges, Yamuna and Saraswati) had together praised Bharat's devotion and love for Lord Ram in an unequivocal term by assuring him that no one is more dear to Lord Ram than Bharat is.

(iii) A little later, even sage Bharadwaj has declared in an un-ambiguous language that Bharat has a special place in the heart of Lord Ram and the Lord loves him more than anyone else—refer: Ayodhya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 208—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 210.

(iv) Even the creator Brahma had acknowledged the bond of undiluted and robust love and affection that Lord Ram and Bharat shared with each other when he had advised the gods—who wanted to prevent Bharat from persuading Lord Ram to return to Ahodhya because then the demons won't be eliminated—to leave everything to Bharat and never attempt any dirty tricks with him, because while on the one hand Lord Ram will never defy Bharat's wishes, Bharat too will never do anything that goes against the wishes of the Lord. This observations are ratified in the following verses of Ayodhya Kand:—(a) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 259; (b) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 266; (c) from Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 265—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 266; (d) Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 266; and (e) Doha no. 269 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 6-8.

(v) In Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 289 of Ayodhya Kand, king Janak has affirmed that the mutual love that Lord Ram and Bharat shared for each other was so immense and honest that neither can one describe it nor it can be ever be subjected to doubts.

(vi) Not only this, the glory and purity of love as well as devotion that Bharat had were so immense and deep that even Lord Ram was unable to fathom them—this was stated by king Janak in Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 289.

(vii) When we read this magnificent story we find that Bharat has himself acknowledged Lord Ram's great love and affection for him when he tells the Lord at Chitrakoot that when they were young the Lord used to voluntarily lose a game so that Bharat could win it—refer: Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 260.

(viii) Earlier in the story, when Bharat learnt that Lord Ram, Laxman and Sita had gone to the forest and his mother had been instrumental in this most unfortunate development because she wanted to make him (Bharat) the king of Ayodhya instead of Lord Ram, Bharat had not only rebuked and insulted his mother sternly, and refused to accept the crown at any cost, but had also considered himself as a great sinner because his beloved brother had to go to the forest due to him, and had told the full court that his best welfare lied in serving Lord Ram and in nothing else whatsoever—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand—(a) Doha no. 160; (b) from Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 161—to Doha no. 162; (c) from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 167—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 169; and (d) from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 177—to Doha no. 183.

<sup>2</sup>This idea that the assembly was delighted to observe that there was a strong bond of love and affection between Bharat and Lord Ram is reflected twice again in the story—(i) once when Bharat had declared his decision not to accept the crown of Ayodhya that rightfully belonged to Lord Ram, and therefore he would go to the forest to bring the Lord back (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 183—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 185), and (ii) the second time when Bharat had accepted Lord Ram's instructions to wait patiently till the time of the Lord's exile is over (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 306—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 307).

Even the gods as well as the sages and holy men approved of this mutual acceptance of each others will by the two brothers—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 269—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 270.]

तब नृप दूत निकट बैठारे । मधुर मनोहर बचन उचारे ॥ ३ ॥
भैया कहहु कुसल दोउ बारे । तुहू नीकें निज नयन निहारे ॥ ४ ॥ taba nrpa dūta nikaṭa baiṭhārē. madhura manōhara bacana ucārē. 3.

bhaiyā kahahu kusala dō'u bārē. tumha nīkēṁ nija nayana nihārē. 4.

Then the king called the messengers and made them sit cordially near (i.e. close to) him<sup>1</sup>. He then spoke to them with a pleasant voice, using sweet friendly words<sup>2</sup>. (3)

The king said—‘Brother(s)<sup>3</sup>, tell me about the well-being of the two children. Have you seen them personally and close enough to know about their welfare*?’

[*This half of the verse can be also read as follows—“You are so fortunate that you have been able to see them from close.”] (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The messengers were till now standing at a distance from the king's throne while he read the letter and when Bharat had come in to learn what the news was. Since the news was exceptionally good and welcome, the messengers now got a special treatment, were accorded a treatment reserved for dignitaries and special guests as they were called near the king and made to sit close to him so that he can talk with them privately and on a one-to-one basis.

When one is very pleased with someone he calls the latter close and talks with him pleasantly. When Hanuman had come back from Lanka with the good news that Sita has been found, Lord Ram too had sat him close to him and had talked with him affectionately—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 33.

Further on in the story we read that Lord Ram had summoned Angad, one of the chief commanders of Lord Ram's army consisting of monkeys and bears that had attacked Lanka, and made him sit close to him to ask Angad about the news he has brought of the city when he had been sent by the Lord as an emissary to try to make truce with Ravana, the demon king. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 38.

Earlier in the story we have already read that when Lord Ram and Laxman arrived at the place where king Janak had gone to meet sage Vishwamitra at the time of the latter's arrival at Janakpur, the sage had made the two brothers sit close to him—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 215.

The idea is that when one wishes to show special treatment to someone, or when he wants to discuss something confidentially, the other person is invited to come and sit close.

<sup>2</sup>The king was pleased to hear the good news, and that is why he spoke very politely and pleasantly with the messengers. The situation hypothetically would have been radically different if the messengers had brought some bad news—then the king's tone would have been stern and scathing.

In the next verse we read that the king addresses the messengers with the friendly term of "Brother", which is usually used when one speaks informally with someone very close, such as a friend or a close associate, someone of importance and an equal.

<sup>3</sup>It is to be noted that king Dasrath has addressed the messengers with an affectionate term "Brother". This fits in well with his calling them close and making them sit near him like they were very close to him, or were well-known to him, or were his friends.

This also shows the good nature of king Dasrath—that inspite of him being an Emperor he had no ego in him and he did not feel ill-at-ease in giving others their due respect. After all, the messengers were employees of king Janak and not royal members of his family. But Dasrath gave them the same respect he would have given some royal guest.]

स्यामल गौर धरें धनु भाथा । बय किसोर कौसिक मुनि साथ ॥ ५ ॥

पहिचानहु तुह कहहु सुभाऊ । प्रेम बिबस पुनि पुनि कह राऊ ॥ ६ ॥

syāmala gaura dharēm dhanu bhāthā. baya kisōra kausika muni sāthā. 5.
pahicānahu tumha kahahu subhā'ū. prēma bibasa puni puni kaha rā'ū. 6.

[The king then identifies the two brothers so that the messengers can understand about whom the king was talking.] They have a dark and fair complexion respectively, and hold a bow and arrow each. They are young in age, and are in the company of Kaushik (sage Vishwamitra). (5)

If you recognize them then please tell me about their nature and behaviour.’

The king was so overwhelmed with love and affection (for his two sons) that he repeatedly asked the messengers this question<sup>1</sup>. [To wit, the king asked them to tell him more about Lord Ram and Laxman. The king was not contented and felt that he still didn’t have enough of the good news about his two sons, so he prodded the messengers to say more each time they stopped speaking.] (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Now the question arises—why did Dasrath repeatedly ask about the welfare of the two brothers? The answer is that Lord Ram and Laxman had gone with sage Vishwamitra to fight ferocious demons, and this was a matter of grave concern for Dasrath. Though he could not defy sage Vishwamitra’s request and the advice given by his own royal priest Vasistha, but internally he was very uneasy and upset while sending the two brothers away to the forest to face demons, as he apprehended danger for them. This is abundantly clear in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 207—to Doha no. 208.

So Dasrath wanted to be certain he was hearing right, that he was not dreaming. The news was like music for his ears, and he wanted to hear it again and again as it gave him comfort and pleasure and happiness.

There was no news of the two brothers ever since they had gone away with sage Vishwamitra. This fact has been expressly mentioned in the next verse no. 7 that follows herein below, as well as in Tulsidas’ another classic book known as “Geetawali Ramayan” in its Baal Kand, verse no. 101. This was the first time the people of Ayodhya had heard of the welfare of the two brothers.

The ladies of the royal household at Ayodhya had regretted the king’s decision to send the two young inexperienced princes with sage Vishwamitra to fight with demons. The queen mothers and others were extremely worried about the welfare of Lord Ram and Laxman. This is clearly brought out in ‘Geetawali Ramayan’, Baal Kand, verse nos. 99—101.

Therefore in this context, the king felt as if his two beloved sons have been re-born when the messengers told him that they were hale and hearty. Like any loving father who hasn’t heard about his sons who had gone away for a long time, Dasrath wanted to hear this pleasant news again and again because it was like music for his ears.

There was another reason for the king to ‘repeatedly ask the messengers about the welfare of Lord Ram and Laxman’. For this, please read note of verse no. 8 herein below.]

जा दिन तें मुनि गए लवाई । तब तें आजु साँचि सुधि पाई ॥ ७ ॥

कहहु बिदेह कवन बिधि जाने । सुनि प्रिय बचन दूत मुसुकाने ॥ ८ ॥

jā dina tēm muni ga'e lavā'ī. taba tēm āju sām̐ci sudhi pā'ī. 7.
kahahu bidēha kavana bidhi jānē. suni priya bacana dūta musukānē. 8.

Ever since the day the sage (Vishwamitra) had taken them away, this is the first time that I have got an authentic news about them (and their well-being)<sup>1</sup>. (7)

Tell me, how did king Janak come to know about them (Lord Ram and Laxman)?<sup>2</sup>,

Hearing these pleasant words of Dasrath, the messengers smiled.<sup>3</sup> [What they replied is narrated in the following Doha no. 291 and the verses that follow it.] (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 290 above. As has been observed in a note appended thereto, the news was deemed to be ‘true, trustworthy, authentic and correct’ because it bore the signature of sage Vishwamitra. We have read earlier that it was he who had instructed Janak to send the messengers—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 287.

In the present verse no. 7, Dasrath acknowledges the authenticity and trustworthiness of this letter.

In Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse nos. 1/99—1/101 we read that mothers Kaushalya and Sumitra were very worried about the welfare of Lord Ram and Laxman because ever since sage Vishwamitra took them away with him there was no news of the two brothers. It was at this juncture that the messengers arrived from Janakpur with the letter of king Janak. When Bharat heard the good news he rushed to inform his mother Sumitra—refer Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 1/101, stanza no. 4.

<sup>2</sup>Refer to note of verse no. 6 herein above. It should be noted here that the letter had come from the king of Janakpur, whereas the two brothers had gone with sage Vishwamitra to his forest hermitage to protect his fire sacrifice. Under normal circumstances the two brothers, Lord Ram and Laxman, were supposed to come back, escorted by one of the sage’s disciples, after having completed the assigned task of eliminating the demons who were tormenting the sages. Sage Vishwamitra had not mentioned about taking them anywhere else.

So king Dasrath was amazed at the invitation from king Janak saying that Lord Ram is to marry his daughter Sita. It was not expected by him and beyond his imagination. That is why the king asked the messengers repeatedly about the news because he could not believe his ears, and then he wanted to cross-examine facts by seeing that the messengers’ information is consistent when they are made to repeat it again and again.

<sup>3</sup>Why did the messengers “smile”? Well, the messengers were smart and clever. They could gauge the wonderment in Dasrath’s mind. They were amazed that such a big king would become so dazed with the news that he would find it necessary to tell the messengers about the physical characteristics of the two princes as if they needed identification—refer: Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 291 above.

After all, the very purpose of the messengers coming to Dasrath was related to the two brothers, and this being the case it was absolutely unnecessary to ask them if they had recognized Lord Ram and Laxman as Dasrath had indeed done in Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 291 above.

So, this is why the messengers “smiled”. They were astonished that such a mighty king as Dasrath would act like an ordinary man of low intellect.]

दो०. सुनहु महीपति मुकुट मनि तुझ सम धन्य न कोउ ।
रामु लखनु जिन्ह के तनय बिस्व बिभूषन दोउ ॥ २९१ ॥

dōhā.

sunahu mahīpati mukuṭa mani tumha sama dhan'ya na kō'u.
rāmu lakhanu jinha kē tanaya bisva bibhūṣana dō'u. 291.

The messengers said—‘Listen oh great king! You are like a crown-jewel in the community of kings. [That is, you are not only an ordinary king and simply an emperor but you are like a ‘gem’ of the community of kings and emperors. You are indeed a great Emperor.]

[Now, the messengers give the reason why Dasrath was so special a king.] There is no one more fortunate and privileged than you in this world because Lord Ram and Laxman—who are like two magnificent adornments of the entire world—are your sons. (Doha no. 291)

[Note—King Dasrath is great because he has two wonderful sons, Lord Ram and Laxman. These two boys give glory to this world: the world has many glorious sons and fantastic heroes, but if all of them are to be compared to a king’s crown then Lord Ram and Laxman are like the two crown-jewels. Their presence in the world makes the world worth living in. Just like even a beautiful woman shorn of her ornaments would look dull and unattractive, the two brothers adorn the world and shine in it like the sun and the moon do in the sky.

In other words, Lord Ram and Laxman are one of their own kind, having no one to match them.

This statement of the messengers is an answer to Dasrath’s query in Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 291 where the king has asked: “do tell me about their nature and behaviour”.

Dasrath is honoured and feted for his great good fortune that he has Lord Ram and Laxman as his two sons elsewhere also in Ram Charit Manas. Refer: (i) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 294 where the king is praised by his learned Guru, sage Vasistha, precisely for this reason; (ii) Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 173 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 5-7 where once again sage Vasistha repeats the same idea when he lauds king Dasrath after his death while trying to persuade Bharat to accept the crown of Ayodhya.

Dasrath’s immensity of love and devotion for Lord Ram, the incarnate Supreme Being, had been so intense, so profound that it compelled the Lord who is the Supreme Father of this entire creation, who has a cosmic presence that is transcendental and beyond the grossness of the physical world to assume the form of a human being and become Dasrath’s son. In this context, refer: Ram Charit Manas—(i) Baal Kand, from Doha no. 149—to Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precedes Doha no. 150; (ii) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 4; and (iii) Ayodhya Kand, the 1st line of Doha no. 209.

So definitely Dasrath was not an ordinary king or emperor: it is not easy and almost impossible to have the Lord of the world to come and become one’s son. Hence, certainly king Dasrath was praiseworthy.]

चौ०. पूछन जोगु न तनय तुझरे । पुरुषसिंघ तिहु पुर उजिआरे ॥ १ ॥

जिन्ह के जस प्रताप कें आगे । ससि मलीन रबि सीतल लागे ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

pūchana jōgu na tanaya tumhārē. puruṣasiṅha tihu pura uji'ārē. 1.
jinha kē jasa pratāpa kēm āgē. sasi malīna rabi sītala lāgē. 2.

The messengers replied—‘No enquiry is needed about your (king Dasrath’s two) sons, for their glory and goodness are so excellent and profound that they don’t need someone to highlight them as they make their presence self-evident. [In other words, no introduction is needed about the two brothers even as no introduction is needed for the sun as it rises in the sky at dawn.]

In fact, they occupy a unique position in the human race as if they were lions in the whole of humankind (puruṣasiṅha), and they are so celebrated that their glory virtually illuminates and shines in the whole of the three worlds (consisting of the heaven, the earth and the nether world)<sup>1</sup>. (1)

The moon looks dim and the sun seems cold when compared the immensity, the stupendity, the vastness, the quality and the dimension of their (Lord Ram and Laxman) glory, majesty and renown<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This introductory praise of Lord Ram and Laxman by the messengers is in response to king Dasrath’s outlining the physical characteristics of the two brothers, that one of them is dark complexioned and the other is of a fair complexion, and that they hold a bow and an arrow each in their hands (refer: Chaupai line no. 4-6 that precede Doha no. 291), to help the messengers understand about whom the king is asking.

So they reply that there is no need to identify the the two brothers just as one does not need to be told who is a lion in a large group of animals because the lion stands out apart from the rest of them by the virtue of its majesty, its bearing and its authority as the mighty and unquestioned king of the jungle. Similarly, one need not be told about the sun in the sky because its presence is self-evident, because its light illuminates the whole world like no other celestial body.

There were thousands of kings and princes in the royal arena where the bow-breaking ceremony was held. But Lord Ram and Laxman were the cynosure of all eyes. Here, their physical well-built and muscular body as well as their general demeanours and bearing are compared to the lion. Just like the lion which is fearless and is not cowed down by any other animal, Lord Ram and Laxman were bold and fearless so much so that the renowned sage Parashuram, who is famous for his anger and ability to subdue even the mightiest of opponents, had to finally bow before them. Besides this feat, Lord Ram had so easily broken the bow of Lord Shiva that it appeared to me made of clay, and this feat was especially significant because thousands of kings could not muster enough combined strength to as much as move the same bow by an inch.

Lord Ram and Laxman have been compared to a ‘lion’ elsewhere also in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—e.g. (i) Sorth/Doha no. 208 Kha; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 234.

When the bow broke with a thunderous roar that was heard in all corners of the world, it literally declared to the entire living world consisting of the heaven, the earth and the nether world, in an unambiguous term, the stupendous glory of Lord Ram. The glory of the Lord was thus established by this single event in even the remotest corners of the world. This is clear in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 8 and its following Chanda line nos. 1-4 that precede Sortha/Doha no. 261; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 4-7 that precede Doha no. 262.

It is just like the case of the sun rising at a specific spot with a limited area in the eastern horizon but spreading its illumination throughout the world so much so that even the remotest corners of the earth till the western horizon are lighted by its rays.

Comparing Lord Ram with the ‘sun’ as an illuminator of the world: refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 31.

<sup>2</sup>The moon is the brightest object in the night sky, and the sun the brightest in the day sky. This is because there is no other object brighter than them in the sky at that time. But just as the moon would pale into insignificance if it remains in the sky after sunrise, as it often happens, and the heat of the sun would look inconsequential if one were to stand close to a raging fire during the day, the virtues, the glory and the majesty of Lord Ram and Laxman were so great and profound that even the most majestic and powerful of kings and princes faded away when compared to them.

This observation of the messengers invoking the moon and the sun draws on the ideas reflected earlier during the actual bow-breaking ceremony.

Citing the metaphor of the ‘moon’: The royal heralds had declared that the bow was like a ‘Rahu’ vis-à-vis the strength of the kings which was compared to the ‘moon’, because the kings would be unable to resist being humiliated at the hands of the bow just as the moon cannot resist being darkened by the Rahu during the lunar eclipse. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 250.

Citing the metaphor of the ‘sun’: When sage Parashuram had arrived angrily in the assembly, he has been compared to the ‘sun’ vis-à-vis the exalted family of sage Bhrigu which is compared to the lotus flower which opens its petals as soon as the sun rises. In other words, Parashuram gives glory to the entire family descending from sage Bhrigu. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 268.

The messengers chose these two heavenly bodies, the moon and the sun, because they shine in the heaven, and therefore are more exalted than any other illuminated object in the world. So the messengers imply that the two brothers, Laxman and Lord Ram, are not only like the moon and the sun respectively but even far better than them.]

तिन्ह कहँ कहिअ नाथ किमि चीन्हे । देखिअ रबि कि दीप कर लीन्हे ॥ ३ ॥

सीय स्वयंबर भूप अनेका । समिटे सुभट एक तें एका ॥ ४ ॥

tinha kaham̐ kahi'a nātha kimi cīnhē. dēkhi'a rabi ki dīpa kara līnhē. 3.
sīya svayambara bhūpa anēkā. samīṭe subhaṭa ēka tēm ēkā. 4.

Oh lord (a respectful way of addressing king Dasrath)! For such outstanding princes who have no parallel in this world, you say “how we recognised them?”!

Say, oh respected king, does one need a lamp to see the sun? [In other words, just like the sun does not need an introduction for its self, the two brothers, Lord Ram and Laxman need no introduction for themselves; their presence itself is a sufficient introduction for these two noble brothers.]<sup>1</sup> (3)

On the occasion of the marriage ceremony known as a ‘Swayambar’ in which the would-be groom of Sita was to be selected via the medium of an open competition<sup>2</sup>, countless strong warrior-princes had assembled, each one of them a champion in his own right and better (stronger, more powerful, well-built, handsome, dynamic, energetic, enthusiastic, youthful, having a grand personality, an aura of authority and majesty, and so on and so forth) than his competitor.

[To wit, all those who participated in the Swayambar ceremony organised to select a groom for Sita, all the competitors or participants who had come, were great and majestic. All of them had great reputation and were renowned in their own right as famous kings and renowned warriors who were proud of their reputation and greatness as kings, princes and warriors. It was therefore an assembly of the mightiest and the greatest of kings and princes and warriors of the time on earth.] (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The messengers are responding to king Dasrath's query in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-6 that precede Doha no. 291.

In verse no. 2 that precedes this present verse, the messengers have already compared Lord Ram and Laxman to the moon and the sun. Both these celestial bodies have their place of pride in the sky—i.e. the moon is the brightest object in the night sky, and the sun in the day sky. Millions of lamps lighted simultaneously would not be able to match the illumination of the sunlight.

Here in this verse the messengers want to stress that even as it is ridiculous and laughable for anyone to attempt to see the dazzling, splendorous sun with help of the light of the lamp, it is impossible for anyone not to acknowledge the presence of the two wonderful, matchless, grand and glorious sons of king Dasrath, i.e. Lord Ram and Laxman, anywhere in the world, let alone only in Janakpur.

Just like the sun that makes its presence felt even without anyone specifically paying attention to it, for the sun's presence in itself is responsible for vanishing of the darkness of the night and revival of worldly activity in its full zest and dynamism, Lord Ram and Laxman do need to tell others about themselves to make the world realise who they are, or acknowledge their majestic presence.

Lord Ram and Laxman invite automatic attention and invoke natural reverence of all living beings. The aura of divinity and holiness, of graciousness and dignified presence that effuses from both of them is as inspiring and as dynamic as the life-giving energy and warmth of the sun. Given this, what more introductions do they need?

Now, the messengers would elaborate upon what they say in this verse in the following verses, from Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede Doha no. 292—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 293.

<sup>2</sup>The "Swayambar" was a system prevalent in ancient India wherein a groom was selected for the girl to be married. The word "Swayambar" literally means "self-selection of the would-be groom". Now, this meant either "the would-be bride's self-selection of her groom", or "the candidate's self-selection by meeting certain declared criterion to become the groom".

The process therefore had two primary variations: (i) In one option, the girl was allowed to choose a groom for herself by either walking down the row of invited candidates and putting a garland on the one she chose, or by any other means she preferred for such selection. (ii) In the other option, the parents of the girl declared a condition, and anyone who fulfilled this condition was selected as the groom.

In the case of goddess Laxmi, the divine consort of Lord Vishnu, the first process was followed. In the case of Sita, the second option was followed.

Thus, in Sita's case the condition set for her marriage was the breaking of the formidable bow of Lord Shiva which was kept since a long time in the family of kings belonging to the Nimi dynasty.

Now, not only was Sita renowned for her magnificent beauty, but her family, i.e. king Janak's kingdom, was also very well known, had a great reputation, and was established in the world as one of the great dynasties of the time. So naturally, when her father king Janak declared his intention to marry her and invited the great kings and princes of the time to participate in the competition known as Swayambar, all the kings who had marriageable sons, and even those wished to take in more than one queen, came to Janakpur to try their luck.

The fact that there was a huge and unprecedented rush of competing kings and princes that ran into thousands of them vying with each other to marry Sita by meeting the condition of breaking of the bow is clearly mentioned in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 251 which says that "ten thousand kings (and princes) tried together to lift the bow (when individuals and small groups failed to move it a bit), but the bow did not move from its position". This fact is reiterated in verse no. 5 below also.]

संभु सरासनु काहुँ न टारा । हारे सकल बीर बरिआरा ॥ ५ ॥
तीनि लोक महँ जे भटमानी । सभ कै सकति संभु धनु भानी ॥ ६ ॥ sambhu sarāsanu kāhum' na ṭārā. hārē sakala bīra bari'ārā. 5.

tīni lōka maham' jē bhaṭamānī. sabha kai sakati sambhu dhanu bhānī. 6.

But none of them was able to move Lord Shiva's bow even for a fraction of an inch. All the mightiest and greatest of warriors, who had prided themselves for their strength, invincibility, power and valour, were defeated in this competition<sup>1</sup>. (5)

The might and self-respect of all those who were proud of their strength, power, invincibility and valour in the whole of the three worlds (i.e. who thought that there was no one more strong, powerful and valourous than them in the heaven, on the earth and in the nether world) were crushed (and reduced to dust) by the determined bow of Lord Shiva<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 251—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 252. Here, king Janak has sternly chided all the thousands of competing kings and princes for their failure to move the bow. In the present verses, the messengers reiterate what their own king Janak had said earlier.

<sup>2</sup>To wit, the bow was literally determined to show these haughty and pretentious kings and princes their right place in the pecking order of great and noble warriors renowned for their valour and strength of arms in the entire world, not only on earth but even in the heaven and the nether worlds included, by defeating them, because this proved to them how hollow was their boastful claim to be great warriors for they could not even move an old and rusted bow, what to talk of them lifting and stringing it.]

सकड़ उठाइ सरासुर मेरू । सोउ हियँ हारि गयउ करि फेरू ॥ ७ ॥
जेहिं कौतुक सिवसैलु उठावा । सोउ तेहि सभाँ पराभउ पावा ॥ ८ ॥ saka'i uṭhā'i sarāsura mērū. sō'u hiyam̐ hāri gaya'u kari phērū. 7.

jēhim̐ kautuka sivasailu uṭhāvā. sō'u tēhi sabhām̐ parābha'u pāvā. 8.

Even he (a reference to Banasur)<sup>1</sup> who could easily lift the celestial mountain known as Mt. Meru, which is the abode of the king of gods (known as Indra), had lost heart and courage to even attempt to lift the bow. So, preferring to save his face by instead of being defeated openly by the bow, he circumambulated it (i.e. went round it in a circle)<sup>2</sup> and went away, implying that he has accepted defeat. (7)

Even he who had lifted the mountain of Lord Shiva (a reference to the demon king Ravana) had accepted defeat in that assembly (like Banasur had)<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 250.

<sup>2</sup>The bow belonged to Lord Shiva who was a deity universally worshipped by the entire demon race, including Banasur and Ravana, the king of Lanka as well as of the demon race. The process of going round anything in a circle is to show respect to it.

In this particular case of Banasur, we can make two assumptions:--

(i) One is that when he learnt that the bow belonged to Lord Shiva, he did not want to show his disrespect to it by attempting to break it. So he decided to pay homage to it by circumambulating it, and then going away.

(ii) The second assumption is based on what the messengers said in this verse—that when Banasur learnt that the marriage was linked to the breaking of the bow of Shiva, he realized that it was beyond his means to do so. He thought to himself that if he made an attempt and failed then two negative things would happen simultaneously:—One, he will become a laughing stock in the community of demons as well as the rest of the world as his inability to break the bow would puncture his reputation of being an invincible and a mighty warrior who was so strong that he could lift even the mountain where the king of gods lives, i.e. Mt. Meru. And two, he would unnecessarily antagonize Lord Shiva by showing disrespect to the Lord's bow in spite of knowing fully well that he won't be able to move, lift and break it.

Therefore, Banasur thought that no purpose would be served in making a joke of himself by making a futile attempt to break the bow.

In an assembly of great warriors which was called 'not to offer worship to the bow' but to 'break it', such an abject surrender by Banasur and his quietly going away was tantamount to accepting defeat.

Now the question arises that there were other kings also in the assembly who had desisted from attempting to break the bow—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Sortha/Doha no. 245; (ii) From Sortha/Doha no. 245—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 246. Does this mean that they too had accepted defeat? Well, the answer is found in the verses themselves: these kings had the vision of the Supreme Father and the Holy Mother of creation in the physical forms of Lord Ram and Sita respectively (refer: Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precedes Doha no. 246).

Further, the same idea is reiterated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1, 4-5 that precede Doha no. 242.

Why was it so? The reason is given in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 241 that essentially says that “everyone looked at Lord Ram according to his liking, spiritual status, and mental setup”.

In other words, the good and noble kings who had come just to oblige king Janak and honour his invitation—because refusal would mean a rebuke for Janak and a show of discourtesy to him besides being an undiplomatic gesture for them—but had no intention to participate in the competition of breaking the bow, did not feel defeated and humiliated at all. This is proved because they cheerfully preferred to remain seated and witness the full event like neutral observers. They had even tried to dissuade the greedy kings to refrain from trying to make a mockery of themselves by trying to break the bow because they won’t be able to do so—refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 246.

So we see the difference between Banasur and these kings—whereas Banasur had ‘gone away’ from the assembly out of fear that Janak might invite him to come on stage and try his luck, these kings would have cheerfully told Janak that they had come as a friend and guest of the king, and not as competitors or suitors for his daughter! This therefore answers the question ‘whether the good kings too were defeated’? The answer is: ‘no’.]

<sup>3</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 250.

Later on in the story we shall read how Ravana has boasted about the mighty strength of his muscular and invincible arms, in Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, (i) Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 25; and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 28.

Refer also to the note appended to verse no. 7 herein above.]

दो०. तहाँ राम रघुबंस मनि सुनिअ महा महिपाल ।

भंजेउ चाप प्रयास बिनु जिमि गज पंकज नाल ॥ २९२ ॥

dōhā.

tahām̐ rāma raghubansa mani suni'a mahā mahipāla.

bhanjē'u cāpa prayāsa binu jimi gaja paṅkaja nāla. 292.

Listen oh great king (“mahipāla”)! In that assembly (as mentioned in Chaupai line nos. 4-8 above), Lord Ram, who is a jewel in the dynasty of king Raghu, had broken the bow without any effort just like an elephant breaks the soft stem of the lotus flower. (Doha no. 292)

[Note—Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 255 that says a similar thing. In this reference, the citizens of Janakpur are praying to the gods etc. to make it possible that Lord Ram can break the bow as easily as if it was a soft stalk of the lotus flower.

An elephant obviously won’t have the slightest trouble in breaking the delicate and soft stem of the lotus flower when it is so mighty that it can uproot huge trees by the immense strength of its muscular body. Likewise, Lord Ram had no problems lifting and breaking the bow of Lord Shiva.]

चौ०. सुनि सरोष भृगुनायकु आए । बहुत भाँति तिन्ह आँखि देखाए ॥ १ ॥
देखि राम बलु निज धनु दीन्हा । करि बहु बिनय गवनु बन कीन्हा ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

suni sarōṣa bhr̥gunāyaku ā'ē. bahuta bhām̐ti tinha ām̐khi dēkhā'ē. 1.
dēkhi rāma balu nija dhanu dīnhā. kari bahu binaya gavanu bana kīnhā. 2.

Hearing about the breaking of the bow (of Lord Shiva), the chief in the family of sage Bhṛigu (i.e. sage Parashuram) came angrily to the venue to avenge the bow's breaking. He was furious and tried his best to brow-beat and scare them off (i.e. Lord Ram and Laxman) into submission. (1)

But by and by he (Parashuram) realised the innate strength, self-confidence, courage and invincibility of Lord Ram, and therefore he gave his own bow to the Lord, prayed to him in many ways (to ask for forgiveness), and finally retreated to the forest (to do penances). (2)

[Note—These two lines sum-up the entire episode related to sage Parashuram as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 268—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 285.

Treating the version of the messengers as representative of the way the masses would remember the incident in future, we can safely say that only two points were important—one, that a furious sage Parashuram had come to punish anyone who had dared to break Lord Shiva's bow, and two, that he realised that the individual who broke the bow was not an ordinary person but someone with supreme powers inasmuch as it was not at all possible for a human being to play fools with the mighty bow of Lord Shiva who is known as a 'Maha-deva', a 'Great God'.

This leads us to an interesting conclusion: If sage Parashuram could not harm either of the two brothers, then it was established beyond doubt that they were indeed 'invincible and unconquerable' in this world. The might and strength of Parashuram was well-documented and well-known; he had spared none who ever dared to confront him. This was the first time in his career as a valiant and gallant warrior who had never understood the meaning of the words defeat or surrender that he not only had to submit himself unconditionally before his adversary but also had to 'pray for forgiveness'.

What more was needed to announce the arrival of the Supreme Lord on earth as this entire episode unfolded before the watchful eyes of the entire community of great kings and princes who ruled the earth and lorded over it at that time. What better opportunity could ever be found to declare to the whole world about the arrival of a Supreme Authority and Power on earth? The incident of sage Parashuram was deftly devised by the wise Creator to make this solemn declaration to the world at one go—that the Lord has finally arrived in flesh and blood to helm the affairs of the mortal world as the latter's Emperor and King, and therefore all the mischief mongers should be wary of their behaviour now as indiscipline and breaking of the laws of Nature would no longer be tolerated, and that a new era would emerge which would go down in history as “Ram Rajya” which would be a stellar example of ideal good governance, good behaviour, good virtues, good character, ethics, morality, righteousness, propriety, probity and so on and so forth—in brief, the practical observance of the grand principles of ‘Dharma’. This is described in detail in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 20—to Doha no. 26.]

राजन रामु अतुलबल जैसे । तेज निधान लखनु पुनि तैसें ॥ ३ ॥

कंपहिं भूप बिलोकत जाके । जिमि गज हरि किसोर के ताके ॥ ४ ॥

rājana rāmu atulabala jaisēm. tēja nidhāna lakhanu puni taisēm. 3.
kampahim bhūpa bilōkata jākēm. jimi gaja hari kisōra kē tākēm. 4.

Oh King! Lord Ram has unparalleled dynamism, energy, strength, powers and valour, and Laxman too is a mine of equal glory and radiance. (3)

Laxman’s glory, courage, strength, self-confidence and dynamism are of such stupendous proportions that all the kings tremble when he looks at them just like the case of an elephant getting frightened when a young lion looks at it angrily.<sup>1</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This verse refers to two events: (i) The first was when all the frustrated kings who had failed to break the bow had stood up in revolt to capture Lord Ram and Laxman, grab Sita and fight Janak if he sides with the two brothers. At that time Laxman had looked at them with red angry eyes, prepared to face and punish them single-handedly like a lion fearlessly attacks a herd of wild elephants and kills any one of them who dares to fight the lion. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 267.

(ii) The other occasion was when king Janak had expressed his anguish and frustration by declaring that the earth seems to be devoid of real brave and strong warriors when none of the invited kings could as much as move the bow even a fraction of an inch let alone lifting it and breaking it. At that time also, Laxman had publicly used stern language to denounce king Janak and strongly objected to his uncalled-for observations that the earth was devoid of warriors when Lord Ram is personally present in the assembly and was not even given a chance to lift the bow. Normally this public display of disrespect for the host king was punishable by immediate imprisonment, but Janak did not have the courage to face Laxman, and so he humbly kept quiet. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 251—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 254.

That is, even as a junior king gets frightened when the emperor or another more powerful contemporary king looks at him with annoyance, the entire assembly of kings could not muster strength to stand up against the angry tirade of Laxman. Even king Janak, who was the host king and elderly, did not dare to reprimand Laxman for his impertinence for saying angry words in front of the whole assembly attended by a huge gathering of great and mighty kings of the time.

This metaphor of an elephant getting terrified at the sight of an angry lion looking at it—because the latter would surely kill the former if it decides to do so, notwithstanding the physical size and strength of the elephant—has also been used earlier in the same context as it is used in the present verse. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 267.]

देव देखि तव बालक दोऊ । अब न आँखि तर आवत कोऊ ॥ ५ ॥
दूत बचन रचना प्रिय लागी । प्रेम प्रताप बीर रस पागी ॥ ६ ॥ dēva dēkhi tava bālaka dō'ū. aba na ām̐khi tara āvata kō'ū. 5.

dūta bacana racanā priya lāgī. prēma pratāpa bīra rasa pāgī. 6.

Oh Lord! Now that we have seen your two sons (Lord Ram and Laxman), no one catches our eyes (attention) any longer.

[During our travels across the world as messengers of king Janak, we have had the opportunity to see, observe, meet and interact with countless kings and princes of varied denomination and stature, but now we can say with certainty that we have never seen anyone who will match your two sons, Lord Ram and his brother Laxman. These two brothers are one of their only kind, being unparalleled and peerless in the whole world.]<sup>1</sup> (5)

The words of praise and the way the messengers extolled the virtues of the two brothers by using metaphors and laudatory words for Lord Ram and Laxman) were liked very much by everyone present there.

The messengers' cheerful expressions and the eloquent words used by them to praise the two brothers, lauding their exemplary glory and honouring them for their matchless qualities, were both sincere as well as deeply soaked in emotions of love, affection, respect and honour for the two brothers<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The messengers have already told the kings how incomparable the two brothers were in Doha no. 291 and Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that follow it. They have been called 'the jewel of the world', 'a lion amongst men', as well as 'to the brilliant sun and the moon before which all other heavenly bodies fade into insignificance'.

The messengers had capped their observance by asking 'if anyone would need a earthen lamp to search for the sun whose presence is self-evident?'

<sup>2</sup>The messengers were not falsely flattering Lord Ram and Laxman just to please king Dasrath and his court. What they said came straight from their hearts. They were honest to the core in their observation about the two brothers.]

सभा समेत राउ अनुरागे । दूतन्ह देन निछावरि लागे ॥ ७ ॥
कहि अनीति ते मूदहिं काना । धरमु बिचारि सबहिं सुखु माना ॥ ८ ॥ sabhā samēta rā'u anurāgē. dūtanha dēna nichāvari lāgē. 7.

kahi anīti tē mūdahiṁ kānā. dharamu bicāri sabahiṁ sukhu mānā. 8.

The king (Dasrath), along with his entire court, was overwhelmed with gratitude towards the messengers for brining so good a news to them. All of them began showering lavish gifts upon the messengers to express their happiness and joy as well as to honour these guests who have brought in good news. (7)

But the messengers, however, closed their ears<sup>1</sup>, protesting that it was improper for them to be so honoured and gifted because they had simply answered the query of the king in a dispassionate and honest manner. Hence, they do not deserve any special treatment or honour.

When the messengers thus refused to accept the gifts and largesse, everyone liked their attitude because it was in line with the principles of Dharma<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When the gifts were being showered and praises being heaped on the messengers, they raised their hands in astonishment because they, being ordinary messengers sent by one king to another to convey a message, had not expected such great honour that is generally reserved for special royal guests of the kingdom. They had also not expected such effulgent outburst of emotional affections when even the king himself joined his court to honour the messengers. So they raised their hands to avoid accepting any gift. It's like them exclaiming—"Oh my god! Please do not show such honour to us. We are not royals but ordinary messengers just carrying out our assigned duties. We told you the truth as we saw and witnessed it. It was not intended to gain honour or special treatment. We are overwhelmed with the warmth you are showing, but please refrain from honouring us because we are just doing our duties as messengers should."

The expression "closed their ears" is a gesture that means two things here—(i) One is that the messengers were so taken aback by the unexpectedly grand and warm treatment that was accorded to them that they raised their hands to their ears or heads in utter astonishment. (ii) The other reason is that perhaps the king and his courtiers were simultaneously praising these messengers with laudatory words of honour along with the showering of material gifts so much so that the messengers felt very embarrassed and humbled. They expressed their surprise and gratitude by lifting their hands because messengers are not supposed to accept such honour.

<sup>2</sup>This is also the reason why no one took offense at their refusal to accept these gifts because this refusal was in accordance with the standard practice of messengers not accepting any honour or gift from the person whom they meet to convey a message on behalf of their master. If the messengers had accepted any gift then it would indicate that they were either greedy or ill-paid because it is only in these situations that any person would accept material things from anyone inspite of it being improper to do so.]

दो०. तब उठि भूप बसिष्ट कहूँ दीन्हि पत्रिका जाइ ।

कथा सुनाई गुरहि सब सादर दूत बोलाइ ॥ २९३ ॥

dōhā.

taba uṭhi bhūpa basiṣṭa kahum̐ dīnhi patrikā jā'i.
kathā sunāī gurahi saba sādara dūta bōlā'i. 293.

The king got up from his seat and went to his royal priest, sage Vasistha, and gave him the letter (that was sent by Janak and countersigned by sage Vishwamitra).

He told his Guru (moral preceptor; royal priest Vasistha) the whole story (about the arrival of the messengers and the news they had brought about the two brothers).

Then he summoned the messengers with due respect. (Doha no. 293)

[Note—The “showing of respect to the messengers” means that the king treated them as royal guests instead of as servants of another king. These messengers were given the same respect and treatment that another royal guest would have been accorded.

It should be noted that the king has ‘given the letter’ to Vasistha instead of reading it aloud for him as he had done earlier on three occasions when he had read the letter aloud himself in his court. This is to show respect to his Guru, sage Vasistha. The Guru is learned and wise; he does not need anyone to explain to him the matter from a written text.

The king summed up the news in his own words and then called in the messengers so they can describe the details for the benefit of the Guru, besides answering any questions that the latter may ask.]

चौ०. सुनि बोले गुर अति सुखु पाई । पुन्य पुरुष कहूँ महि सुख छाई ॥ १ ॥
जिमि सरिता सागर महुँ जाहीं । जद्यपि ताहि कामना नाही ॥ २ ॥
तिमि सुख संपति बिनहिं बोलाएँ । धरमसील पहिं जाहिं सुभाएँ ॥ ३ ॥

caupāī.

sunī bōlē gura ati sukhu pāī. pun'ya puruṣa kahum' mahi sukha chāī. 1.
jimi saritā sāgara mahum' jāhīm. jadyapi tāhi kamanā nāhīm. 2.
timi sukha sampati binahim bōlā'ēm'. dharamasīla pahim jāhim subhā'ēm'. 3.

The Guru (sage Vasistha) was highly pleased on hearing the wonderful news. He told king Dasrath—‘For a virtuous man (like you, oh king) who has accumulated religious merit by his noble life as well as righteous deeds and actions, one who is committed to upholding the laws of Dharma, the earth is rich with the boon of happiness, joy and pleasures; there is no shortage of this boon for such a man anywhere in this world<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Just as countless rivers voluntarily flow into the ocean though the latter does not ask them to come to it or has no desire to take-in their waters (to replenish its stock of water with that of the rivers’ as the ocean has an endless supply of it) [1], ---

--- Various types of happiness, joy, prosperity, affluence, success and well-being go un-invited and unasked for to a man who follows the path of Dharma, or the path of virtuousness, righteousness, auspiciousness, nobility, probity and propriety [2]<sup>2</sup>. (1-2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The sage praises king Dasrath for being a “Punya Purush”. The word “Punya” means merit that is accrued when a person does something good and righteous. It is opposite to doing “Paap”, which in effect means committing sins and indulging in unethical and unlawful activities that go against the principles of good conduct as envisioned in the scriptures.

The very fact that the Supreme Being decided to become a son of Dasrath in the form of Lord Ram proves that he was not an ordinary soul, not an ordinary king, but one who had accumulated such a huge treasury of religious merit that the Lord could not refuse the king's wish to have him as his son. So in effect, sage Vasistha was merely stating a fact, and not flattering Dasrath. Refer Chaupai line nos. 2-8 that follow herein below.

Sage Vasistha has heaped praises on Dasrath once again later on in a different context. When he died and the royal assembly was called to anoint Bharat, the younger brother of Lord Ram, on the throne of Ayodhya (because Lord Ram had gone to the forest exile for fourteen years to honour his father's word-of-honour that was pending for redemption with Kaikeyi, the Lord's step-mother, which she had exploited to get her own son Bharat on the throne), Vasistha had minced no words in profusely praising king Dasrath while he tried to persuade Bharat to accept the crown in the absence of Lord Ram. This is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 172—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 174.

<sup>2</sup>This idea of rivers symbolising happiness, joy, prosperity, affluence, success and well-being flowing in constantly into the ocean represented by a man who follows the path of Dharma is also reiterated in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 1 which describes the glorious state of the kingdom of Ayodhya where Lord Ram has come to live. It essentially says that “the fourteen divisions of the world were like a huge mountain with as many peaks, the clouds symbolising meritorious deeds showered rain symbolising all-round joy and happiness; and the water of this rain formed into gorgeous rivers overflowing with the water of happiness, joy, success, prosperity and well-being that cascaded down from the lofty heights of the mountain upon the plains of the earth, frothing and boiling over with these aforesaid virtues, to finally find its way into the ocean represented by the city of Ayodhya”.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, stanza no. 2 of Doha no. 39 Kha which refers to the fact that the days of a person who follows the path of Dharma are passed happily and cheerfully, with all sorts of successes and prosperity being accessible by him.]

तुह गुर बिप्र धेनु सुर सेबी । तसि पुनीत कौसल्या देबी ॥ ४ ॥
 सुकृती तुह समान जग माहीं । भयउ न है कोउ होनेउ नाहीं ॥ ५ ॥ तुह ते अधिक पुन्य बड़ काकें । राजन राम सरिस सुत जाकें ॥ ६ ॥ tumha gura bipra dhēnu sura sēbī. tasi punīta kausalyā dēbī. 4.

 sukr̥tī tumha samāna jaga māhīm. bhaya'u na hai kō'u hōnē'u nāhīm. 5.
 tumha tē adhika pun'ya barā kākēm. rājana rāma sarisa suta jākēm. 6.

You diligently and devotedly serve your Guru (moral preceptor)<sup>1</sup>, Vipra (Brahmins and other elderly and learned members of the society), Dhenu (cows regarded as holy), and the Surs (gods). The honourable queen Kaushalya follows your example and is no less devout than you. (4)

A person has not taken birth till now nor would ever take birth in this world in the future also who has greater spiritual merit and religious credit than what you have gotten<sup>2</sup>. (5)

Say indeed oh great king, who else can be said to be more spiritually meritorious, religiously creditworthy and fit for the highest honour reserved for a pious soul than you are because you have the good fortune to have Lord Ram (the Supreme Being in a personified form) as your son<sup>3</sup>! (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 129 in which sage Valmiki tells Lord Ram that he, in his original form as the cosmic Lord known as Brahm, the Supreme Being, should dwell in the Mana (heart and inner-self) of a person who, inter alia, adores his Guru more than the Lord himself.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6 and 8 that precede Doha no. 172 which say that a person who does not respect Brahmins and obeys his Guru is regrettable.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 173; (ii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 209.

<sup>3</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas—(i) Baal Kand, Doha no. 291; and Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 310; (ii) Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 209.]

बीर बिनीत धरम ब्रत धारी । गुन सागर बर बालक चारी ॥ ७ ॥

तुह कहँुँ सव काल कल्याण । सजहु बरात बजाइ निसाना ॥ ८ ॥

bīra binīta dharama brata dhārī. guna sāgara bara bālaka cārī. 7.
tumha kahum̐ sarba kāla kalyānā. sajahu barāta bajā'i nisānā. 8.

Who is more fortunate than you who has four sons (Lord Ram, Laxman, Bharat and Shatrughan) who are epitomes of the grand virtues of valour, courage, strength, politeness and civility, and at the same time are diligent followers of the laws of Dharma (righteousness, auspiciousness, probity, propriety, nobility, ethics and morality).

In fact, your four sons are like oceans of these grand and glorious virtues (i.e. they do not lack in any of these great qualities just like the ocean which does not have shortage of water in it)<sup>1</sup>. (7)

Well-being and good fortunes are always yours in all phases of time and life!

Well now, first of all make arrangements for assembling a grand marriage party with proper fanfare, and secondly, order that the kettle-drums be played (to celebrate the auspicious news of Lord Ram's marriage with Sita as well as the well-being of the two brothers, Lord Ram and Laxman). (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 173.

Three great virtues have been listed in verse no. 7 as follows—(i) “bīra” meaning a person who is brave, strong, courageous and valiant; (ii) “binīta” meaning one who is polite, courteous and civil in spite of possessing great powers and authority; one who never shows himself or boasts of his authority, powers, strength, abilities, stature or prowess; and (iii) “dharama brata dhārī” meaning who has taken the vow to uphold the laws of Dharma. In other words, all the four brothers possessed these auspicious and laudable qualities in them in great abundance like the ocean which has no dearth of water in it.]

दो०. चलहु बेगि सुनि गुर बचन भलेहिं नाथ सिरु नाइ । भूपति गवने भवन तब दूतन्ह बासु देवाइ ॥ २९४ ॥
dōhā.

calahu bēgi suni gura bacana bhalēhiṁ nātha siru nā'i.
bhūpati gavanē bhavana taba dūtanha bāsu dēvā'i. 294.

Hearing the instructions of the Guru (sage Vasistha) to proceed to Janakpur with the marriage party as soon as possible, the king thanked and bowed his head before him, saying—‘Alright Lord, it will be done.’

The king then went to his palace after giving suitable lodging place to the messengers (of king Janak). (Doha no. 294)

[Note—The next series of verses will narrate the preparations for the grand marriage party that will leave Ayodhya for Janakpur to attend the royal marriage of Lord Ram.]

चौ०. राजा सबु रनिवास बोलाई । जनक पत्रिका बाचि सुनाई ॥ १ ॥ सुनि संदेसु सकल हरषानीं । अपर कथा सब भूप बखानीं ॥ २ ॥
caupā'i.

rājā sabu ranivāsa bōlā'i. janaka patrikā bāci sunā'i. 1.
suni sandēsu sakala haraṣānīm. apara kathā saba bhūpa bakhānīm. 2.

The king summoned all the ladies of the royal palace and read aloud the letter of king Janak to them. (1)

Hearing the message (contained in the letter), every one of them were overjoyed. The king then narrated other related good news that he had heard orally from the messengers. (2)

[Note—The messengers had arrived in the royal court where the invitation letter of king Janak was presented by them to king Dasrath. Obviously, no ladies of the royal household were present there.

The king has first read out the letter of invitation from Janak which contained the brief message that Lord Ram had broken the bow and was automatically selected as suitable groom for Sita, Janak's daughter. King Dasrath was invited to come and join in the celebrations. Other details of what had really happened, such as the incident of sage Parashuram, and the general news of the two brothers were narrated orally by the messengers.

It must be noted here that when Dasrath had met his Guru, sage Vasistha, the messengers were summoned in person to enable the Guru to interview them if he so wished and clarify any doubts he may have in his mind. It was necessary to do so as a principle of state policy because a wise king always consulted his close advisors and allowed them to analyse any given situation before any decision is reached by him to ensure that no crucial point is missed. When the wise Guru was satisfied with the letter of king Janak as well as by his interaction with the messengers, and ordered Dasrath to make preparation for the marriage party, the king was doubly sure that everything was alright and there was no subterfuge in anything. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 293.

Thus assured of the authenticity of the letter and its contents, as well as of the integrity of the messengers, the king had given the guest messengers proper lodging place to relax and feel comfortable after the long journey they had travelled from the far away land of Janakpur. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 294.

It is natural to assume that Dasrath had met the royal ladies, the queens and other members of the royal household, in his palace, rather than in the royal court, because ladies traditionally stayed inside palaces. A reading of the following verses will also endorse this view where we shall see that females are being referred to in the narration instead of males.

In Tulsidas' another classic book titled "Geetawali Ramayan" we read that the mothers were very worried about the well-being of Lord Ram ever since he had gone to the forest with sage Vishwamitra. So when the exceptionally good tidings were brought in by the messengers—that not only were the two brothers happy and fine but that Lord Ram has achieved a rare feat by breaking a formidable bow which none of the bravest and the mightiest of kings and princes that lived on earth at that time could move even an inch, and the icing on the cake was that this has entitled him to get the hand of Sita in marriage, an achievement for which all these kings and princes had staked their reputation and had failed—a spontaneous eruption of joy and exhilaration was natural and expected. Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse nos. 99—101.]

प्रेम प्रफुल्लित राजहिं रानी । मनहुँ सिखिनि सुनि बारिद बानी ॥ ३ ॥
मुदित असीस देहिं गुर नारीं । अति आनंद मगन महतारीं ॥ ४ ॥

prēma praphullita rājahim rānī. manahum' sikhini suni bārīda bānī. 3.
mudita asīsa dēhim gura nārīm. ati ānanda magana mahatārīm. 4.

The king and the queen(s)<sup>1</sup> were overjoyed and ecstatic with emotions of love and affection just like pea-hens feel exhilarated when they hear the rumblings of the rain-bearing cloud in the distant sky<sup>2</sup>. (3)

The Guru's wife (named Arundhati) was very delighted and she liberally blessed them (the queens as well as the king), which in turn made the mother(s)<sup>3</sup> exceedingly happy and cheerful (because blessings from one's Guru's wife is a harbinger of good fortunes and all round well-being) (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>King Dasrath had many queens, but we read about only three who were the chief ones. They were—(i) Kaushalya who was the chief queen and the mother of Lord Ram, the eldest of the four brothers; (ii) Sumitra, the second queen and the mother of Laxman; and (iii) Kaikeyi, the third queen and the mother of Bharat and Shatrughan.

All these queens lived like sisters, and they treated all the four brothers equally as if all of them were their own sons. Later on unfortunately however, we shall read that Kaikeyi became selfish and prevailed on the king to send his eldest son, Lord Ram, to the forest so that her own elder son Bharat could ascend the throne. But that happened much later on in the story after the four brothers were married and settled down in Ayodhya, and hence it is not a matter to be discussed at this juncture when we are reading about the days when celebrations are underway and preparations are being undertaken for Lord Ram's marriage.

So, when the happy tidings arrived from the far away land of Janakpur, all the mothers were very jubilant with excitement. It is not that the king wasn't worried about the welfare of his two beloved sons, Lord Ram and Laxman, but he used to be so pre-occupied with affairs of the kingdom that he didn't find time to brood and unnecessarily disturb the peace of his mind because he knew very well the abilities and mystical powers of sage Vishwamitra in whose custody he had put the two brothers. Therefore, king Dasrath hadn't worried too much about the well-being of the two brothers because he was sure that they are well-protected under the patronage of the mighty sage Vishwamita. But the queens were a worried lot, like all mothers usually are, about the welfare of their sons Lord Ram and Laxman. While a father would rather be stern with his sons and prefer to train them to face the realities of the harsh life in this world, a mother would wince at such a thought and would rather like her son to be physically comfortable than endure any hardship. So we see here in Geetawali Ramayan verses referred to herein above that only the mothers are shown to be worried, and not king Dasrath.

<sup>2</sup>The peacock is so happy when it hears the rumbling of the clouds that it opens its plumes and begins to dance. The metaphor is so apt because the queen-mothers were eagerly waiting to hear some good news about the two brothers who had gone away to a distant land just like this bird, which keeps its ears open during the hot summer days, eagerly waiting to hear the sound of the rumbling cloud which would mean that rains are round the corner. Rains are harbingers of life, greenery and vibrancy on earth; they bring cheer to all the living beings because not only do they provide nectar in the form of rains to cool the hot surface of the earth but they also ensure that life is not extinguished for want of water, the elixir of life. The peacock celebrates this event on behalf of Mother Nature.

So, when the exceptionally good news about the two brothers, Lord Ram and Laxman, arrived from a faraway land, the queen-mothers were as happy and exhilarated as the pea-hen when she hears the rumble of the rain-bearing clouds.

<sup>3</sup>The Guru's wife would bless the queens just as the Guru would bless the king. So, Arundhati, sage Vasistha's wife, blessed all the queens for their own happiness and the happiness of their beloved sons, which naturally made them feel grateful to the Guru's wife, and become cheerful.]

लेहिं परस्पर अति प्रिय पाती । हृदयँ लगाइ जुड़ावहिं छाती ॥ ५ ॥

राम लखन कै कीरति करनी । बारहिं बार भूपबर बरनी ॥ ६ ॥

lēhiṃ paraspara ati priya pātī. hr̥dayam<sup>ḥ</sup> lagā'i jurāvahiṃ chātī. 5.
rāma lakhana kai kīratī karanī. bārahiṃ bāra bhūpabara baranī. 6.

They took the lovable letter one by one, and held it close to their bosoms (as a token of their appreciation for the news it contained as well as the warmth of feeling and ecstasy that it ignited). By doing so, all of them felt contented. (5)

The king repeatedly narrated and lauded the great deeds of the two brothers, Lord Ram and Laxman, and the resultant fame and reputation that they had acquired for themselves as a reward of their astounding successes and stupendous achievements. (6)

[Note—The letter of king Janak was a sort of a marriage invitation card, and therefore it had limited itself to mentioning only about the bow-breaking ceremony where Lord Ram had successfully broken the bow and had got the reward in the form of marriage with Sita, the daughter of king Janak.

The rest of the developments were narrated orally by the messengers. They told Dasrath about the liberation of Ahilya, the slaying of the ferocious demoness Tadka, and the successful protection of sage Vishwamitra's fire sacrifice which entailed the killing of other ferocious demons led by their chiefs Subahau and Marich. These incidents are narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 209—to Doha no. 211.

Refer also to—(i) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 264; (ii) from Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 292—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 293.

There are verses in “Geetawali Ramayan” which also say the same thing: refer—Baal Kand, verse nos. 102, stanza nos. 3-7.

The king was so overwhelmed with joy at the news of the great deeds and the stupendous achievements of his two noble sons that he couldn't have enough of it; he was so excited that he kept repeating the news again and again to express his boundless joy and unfettered happiness on receiving this good news. Like any other father, he felt exceedingly proud and exhilarated to learn of the magnificent achievements of his beloved sons that had established their glories throughout the world in a single go.]

मुनि प्रसादु कहि द्वार सिधाए । रानिन्ह तब महिदेव बोलाए ॥ ७ ॥
दिए दान आनंद समेता । चले बिप्रबर आसिष देता ॥ ८ ॥

muni prasādu kahi dvāra sidhā'ē. rāninha taba mahidēva bōlā'ē. 7.
di'ē dāna ānanda samētā. calē biprabara āsiṣa dētā. 8.

Thanking their Guru (sage Vasistha) for his blessings that has made this good fortune come true, the king proceeded towards the palace's gate (to give orders and start preparations for the marriage party, as well as to make an official announcement to start celebrations in the city of Ayodhya).

Meanwhile, the queens summoned the ‘Mahi-Devas’ (the “gods of the earth”, an epithet used for the Brahmins because they are shown the same respect that one reserves for the gods in the heaven) [7], and cheerfully made gifts to them (by way of liberal donations). The Brahmins went away contented, blessing the queens liberally [8]. (7-8)

[Note—Giving alms and donations and making charities are regarded as meritorious and religious deeds, and when any good event takes place in a household or some good news comes, it is normal practice in Hindu households to make gifts to Brahmins.]

सो०. जाचक लिए हँकारि दीन्हि निछावरि कोटि बिधि ।
चिरु जीवहुँ सुत चारि चक्रबर्ति दसरत्थ के ॥ २९५ ॥
sōraṭhā.

jācaka li'ē hamkāri dīnhi nichāvari kōṭi bidhi.
ciru jīvahum'suta cāri cakrabarti dasarat'tha kē. 295.

[After the Brahmins were gone—] The beggars were the next to be summoned. Liberal alms of various types were given to them in abundance. All of them blessed the royal household of the king, saying in unison—‘Long live the four sons of Emperor Dasrath (“cakrabarti dasarat'tha”).’ (Sortha 295)

[Note—When one's wishes are fulfilled one is inclined to open up his heart and loosen up his purse strings to celebrate the occasion, to commemorate the event. Even an ordinary man with limited means at his disposal would become very magnanimous and charitable on such rare occasions. And here we are talking about a ‘great king’ who was no less than an Emperor—“Chakravarti”.

So it is natural to expect huge and liberal donations and charities being made by Dasrath, largesse that should be befitting of his exalted stature as a great Emperor of the time, to celebrate the arrival of the wonderful news of the marriage of his eldest son Lord Ram along with the astounding deeds that he and his younger brother Laxman had done to bring great laurels and honour to Dasrath's present family as well as to the dynasty to which he belonged. Any father would be proud of this development.]

चौ०. कहत चले पहिरें पट नाना । हरषि हने गहगहे निसाना ॥ १ ॥
समाचार सब लोगन्ह पाए । लागे घर घर होन बधाए ॥ २ ॥
caupāī.

kahata calē pahirēm paṭa nānā. haraṣi hanē gahagahē nisānā. 1.
samācāra saba lōganha pā'ē. lāgē ghara ghara hōna badhā'ē. 2.

As they (i.e. the Brahmins as well as other alms-seekers who were invited by the queens and the king to accept gifts and donations) left the palace adorned in fine clothes and other decorations of various kinds that were given to them, they were jubilant and excited as they enthusiastically proclaimed the glory of the king and his sons in loud and cheerful voices.

As soon as the auspicious news spread in the city, there was a spontaneous eruption of the sound of musical instruments such as the kettle-drums<sup>1</sup>. (1)

When the citizens (of Ayodhya) heard the auspicious news (of the forthcoming marriage of their beloved prince Lord Ram with Sita, the daughter of king Janak), festivities and thanks-giving started in each individual household of the city<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The news of the arrival of the messengers and the letter they had brought from Janak, along with a summary of its contents, had already percolated down in the city. The air was filled with excitement as everyone waited for an official announcement of the good news from their king. So as soon as the Brahmins and alms-seekers returned from the palace, terribly excited and literally jumping with joy, showing off their newly acquired robes of honour and magnificent clothes and other decorations that the king and the queens had granted them, an uproarious cheer spread like the thunder of lightening throughout the city of Ayodhya, and the enthusiasm was so profound that the citizens could not desist themselves from playing the musical instruments even before the king could summon his official heralds and make any announcement to start celebrating.

This deduction will be very clear when we read the next verse no. 2 herein below which says that “when the people got the news, there was celebration in each household---”. In other words, the playing of the kettle-drums as mentioned in the present verse no. 1 was prior to the point of time when the news that the king has ordered to start celebrations had reached the common man.

There was a sudden surge of vibrant and pulsating energy of happiness and joy that was palpable throughout the city, and the thunderous roar of the kettle-drums that was sounded all of a sudden was an audible and an external sign of it.

<sup>2</sup>As soon as the kettle-drums started playing, their loud sound alerted even those who lived on the outskirts of the huge city that some good news has arrived because such musical instruments were played only during royal celebrations. Since there was no prior news of any special event that was to be organized by the king, and the word had already spread that some messengers have come with the news of the two princes, Lord Ram and Laxman, from some far away land, so the mere sound of the vigorous beating of the kettle-drums as mentioned in verse no. 1 was sufficient to make the citizens correctly guess that it definitely means that some good news about the two brothers has arrived. And this surely means that it is time to celebrate.

One will not miss this opportunity to observe that the entire population of the kingdom of Ayodhya had loved their king Dasrath as well as Lord Ram. The fact is that the people loved Lord Ram profoundly, passionately, and more than anything else in this world, even more than their own families and households. The extent of their dedication and love for the Lord will be starkly clear later on in Ayodhya Kand of this great epic ‘Ram Charit Manas’ when we read how the whole city, overwhelmed with grief and its inability to live without their beloved Lord Ram, had followed the Lord from behind as he went out of the city for his forest exile. The citizens determined that their welfare lies only where Lord Ram is present, and that the wild forest would be more comfortable for them than the barren city of Ayodhya which the Lord has left. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, from Chaupai line nos. 3 that precedes Doha no. 83—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 85.

In Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 204 it is expressly stated that “the merciful Lord Ram was dearly loved by all the citizens of Ayodhya, whether they were old or young, men or women”.

This point is highlighted here to stress that the celebrations in Ayodhya to mark the marriage of Lord Ram were spontaneous, voluntary and enthusiastically undertaken by the citizens, rather than just to follow the orders of the king, Dasrath, and show loyalty to him as subjects of his kingdom. This is the reason that the festivities and celebrations were so full of colour, life and vibrancy because the people had enthusiastically and voluntarily participated in them.]

भुवन चारि दस भरा उछाहू । जनकसुता रघुबीर बिआहू ॥ ३ ॥
सुनि सुभ कथा लोग अनुरागे । मग गृह गलीं सँवारन लागे ॥ ४ ॥ bhuvana cāri dasa bharā uchāhū. janakasutā raghubīra bi'āhū. 3.

sunī subha kathā lōga anurāgē. maga gr̥ha galīm samvārana lāgē. 4.

As the auspicious good news spread far and wide about the forthcoming marriage of Raghubir (i.e. the brave warrior of the Raghu dynasty, Lord Ram) with the daughter of king Janak (i.e. with Sita), all the fourteen divisions of the world (known as the “14 Bhuvans”)<sup>1</sup> were filled with festivities, and there was mass celebration everywhere. (3)

The people were filled with exceptional joy upon hearing the auspicious good news so much so that they affectionately began to decorate and spruce-up their individual homes as well as the streets and lanes of the city enthusiastically<sup>2</sup>.

[Does this line mean that the city of Ayodhya not properly kept and cleaned earlier in a routine manner? No, this is not so as would be clear in the next line.] (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The 14 Bhuvans—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, note appended to Chanda stanza no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 261.

The heavenly world as well as the nether world is included in the term “14 Bhuvans”, and this obviously means that the gods and the inhabitants of the other side of the heaven, the nether world, too had joined in the celebrations that were taking place in Ayodhya which was located on earth.

Refer a similar observation in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 265.

<sup>2</sup>Good news may have been coming to Ayodhya on a regular basis because Dasrath was a noble and righteous Emperor in whose empire there was a perpetual atmosphere of all-round prosperity and well-being. But this was a different occasion—because a prince was getting married, and this marriage was not an ordinary one as it had simultaneously established the prince’s glory and fame throughout the world because it was made possible after success in a great feat that entailed the breaking of a formidable bow of Lord Shiva which none of the mighty kings and princes of that time could as much as move an inch. So this achievement gave the citizens a special reason to celebrate—as their beloved prince, Lord Ram, had been declared the winner in an open world-wide competition (like the modern-day Olympics) where even the strongest warriors in the whole world at that time had bitten the dust.

The festivities were all the more colourful and vibrant and undertaken with vigorous enthusiasm because the participants, the citizens of Ayodhya, loved Lord Ram from the deepest corners of their hearts. Refer note of Chaupai line no. 2 above that precedes this present verse.]

जद्यपि अवध सदैव सुहावनि । राम पुरी मंगलमय पावनि ॥ ५ ॥

तदपि प्रीति कै प्रीति सुहाई । मंगल रचना रची बनाई ॥ ६ ॥

jadyapi avadha sadaiva suhāvani. rāma purī maṅgalamaya pāvani. 5.
tadapi prīti kai prīti suhāī. maṅgala racanā racī banāī. 6.

Though the city of Ayodhya (known colloquially as “Avadh”) was always very pleasant and fine to behold because it was the eternally divine, holy and sacred city (abode) of Lord Ram (who was a personified form of the Supreme Being)<sup>1</sup> [5], ---

--- Yet it was especially decked up and colourfully adorned with special auspicious signs to depict in visible form the dimension of the extensive love and affection that the people had for their beloved Lord, Sri Ram [6]. (5-6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Ayodhya was deemed to be eternally divine, holy and sacred because it was here that the Supreme Lord of creation, Lord Vishnu, had decided to live when he took a human form as Lord Ram. For all practical purposes, the terrestrial city of Ayodhya had become a ‘Vaikuntha’, the heavenly abode of Lord Vishnu, for the time when Lord Ram lived here.

Lord Ram has himself praised Ayodhya, saying it is very dear to him—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 4.

The magnificence and grandeur of Ayodhya has been described in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precede Doha no. 27—Doha no. 29.

But the special decorations and celebrations underway in Ayodhya were a gracious gesture undertaken by the beloved devotees of the Lord, the citizens of Ayodhya in this case, to express, in an affectionate and practical manner, their strong bond of love, dedication and devotion for their loving Lord, Sri Ram.]

ध्वज पताक पट चामर चारू । छावा परम बिचित्र बजारू ॥ ७ ॥

कनक कलस तोरन मनि जाला । हरद दूब दधि अच्छत माला ॥ ८ ॥

dhvaja patāka paṭa cāmara cārū. chāvā parama bicitra bajārū. 7.
kanaka kalasa tōrana mani jālā. harada dūba dadhi acchata mālā. 8.

[Now we shall read how the city was decorated.]

Beautiful flags, banners, hangings, festoons, curtains and canopies of various designs and shapes were put up throughout the city and its market-places in a very fascinating and tasteful manner. (7)

Golden vases, festive arches, festoons and hangings with intricate nets interlaced with a wide variety of gems and precious stones along with the use of green grass, curd, unbroken grains of rice and garlands or wreaths of flowers were used to colourfully deck-up the city. (8)

[Note—The golden vases and pots, festoons and hangings, and the garlands and wreaths were used not only to decorate public places but also for the individual households. The green grass, curd, unbroken rice grains and garlands are used during any kind of auspicious activity and religious ceremonies. In effect it means that religious functions were held both publicly as well as privately.

Earlier we have already read how the city of Janakpur was magnificently decorated when Lord Ram had broken the bow and married Sita—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 287—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 289.

Meanwhile, the present Chaupai line no. 8 that we are currently reading can be linked to Doha no. 296 herein below as well to complete the picture of celebrations that assumed the dimensions of a religious event.]

दो०. मंगलमय निज निज भवन लोगन्ह रचे बनाइ ।
बीथीं सींचीं चतुरसम चौकें चारु पुराइ ॥ २९६ ॥

dōhā.

maṅgalamaya nija nija bhavana lōganha racē banā'i.
bīthīm sīncīm caturasama caukēm cāru purā'i. 296.

The people made their homes an abode of auspiciousness and celebrations even as the city as a whole was cleaned and liberally sprinkled with scented water in all its four directions (i.e. everywhere, in its northern, southern, eastern and western corners), and then ceremonial squares were designed (painted) on the ground at public places using colourful paste(s) made up of grounded sandalwood, saffron, musk and camphor. (Doha no. 296)

[Note—As has been observed in the note of verse no. 8 above, the auspicious things mentioned therein were used to decorate individual homes as well as public squares.

First the city was scrubbed clean and washed with scented water. Then colourful pastes made of individual items such as sandalwood, saffron, musk and camphor or a mixture of these things were used paint designs of ceremonial squares on the ground at various locations in the city. These painted squares were then decorated by the items mentioned in verse no. 8 that precedes this Doha, i.e. golden pots, festoons, hangings, wreaths, garlands, green grass, curd, and unbroken rice grains.

Taken all in all, the whole city took an image of a grand arena where some huge auspicious ceremony was being performed. Everyone participated as if it was his personal celebration.]

चौ०. जहँ तहँ जूथ जूथ मिलि भामिनि । सजि नव सप्त सकल दुति दामिनि ॥ १ ॥
बिधुबदनीं मृग सावक लोचनि । निज सरूप रति मानु बिमोचनि ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

jaham̐ taham̐ jūtha jūtha mili bhāmini. saji nava sapta sakala duti dāmini. 1.
bidhubadanīm mṛga sāvaka lōcani. nija sarūpa rati mānu bimōcani. 2.

Groups of beautiful ladies collected here and there, everywhere, in the city<sup>1</sup>. They were well adorned by all the sixteen legendary adornments that noble ladies are supposed to sport (that make them respectable in a society)<sup>2</sup>, and this made their presence as brilliant and outstanding as the dazzle of lightening.

[To wit, when the women-folk of the city stepped outside of their homes to gather together in different groups at various places, they looked wonderful and well groomed. All of them had properly cleaned and dressed themselves before they stepped out of their homes; all of them looked dignified and noble. They were decorated in their best finery with an adorned body wearing a young and fresh look; they sported new colourful clothes, beautiful ornaments, wreaths of flowers on their heads, coloured lips and glowing body. They were all very jubilant, bubbling over with youthful energy and enthusiasm. That is why their presence has been compared to the dazzle of lightening as they assembled in cheerful groups on the streets of the city of Ayodhya.] (1)

These women-folk had beautiful faces like that of the moon, and had eyes resembling that of the fawn<sup>3</sup>. They were literally putting to shame the beauty of Rati, the consort of Kamdeo, the patron god of passion and love, who is traditionally regarded as the most beautiful entity in creation. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 286 that describes a similar scene at Janakpur when large groups of women-folk had joined hands to sing auspicious and laudatory songs to celebrate the marriage of Sita with Lord Ram.

<sup>2</sup>Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 318.

According to ancient poetic tradition of India, the sixteen adornments with which a noble lady is supposed to adorn herself to get respect in the society are basically related to practicing principles of personal hygiene and grooming that would make her physical presence appealing and pleasant for others. She is expected to practice these sixteen steps in her daily life; they make her look naturally attractive and subtly beautiful.

These “sixteen adornments” of a woman are the following—(1) Rubbing and cleaning the body with a scented water to which herbs that refresh the skin are added (dissolved); (2) Ablution or taking a daily bath to clean the body thoroughly; (3) Changing clothes daily and dressing herself afresh with properly cleaned garments; (4) Applying a red-coloured ointment made from lac on the sides of the sole of the two feet; (5) Combing and properly pleating the hair on the head; (6) Applying ‘Sindoor’ or red vermilion powder on the head along the vertical line marking the partition of the hairs on either side of the skull, starting from the middle point of the hairline above the root of the nose and going upto the point on the top of the skull (the cranium); (7) Applying a thin paste of sandalwood on the forehead; (8) Making a dot on the tip of the chin with some pigment; (9) Colouring the palms of the hand and soles and sides of the feet with a paste made from the leaves of the Mehadi plant (the myrtle plant); (10) Rubbing the body with a light massage of some scented ointment made of various condiments and spices to make the skin glow and look young; (11) Wearing ornaments that look sober on her body, instead of making her look pretentious and ugly; (12) Decorating the hairs with individual flowers or with small wreaths; (13) Keeping the mouth clean and refreshed by using mouth-freshners such as by chewing condiments and spices alone or by stuffing them in leaves of the betel plant; (14) Colouring the lips by chewing leaves of the betel plant stuffed with spices, instead of using artificial pigments; (15) Either keeping the teeth sparkling white by proper care, or if that is not feasible due to any reason then at least applying some colouring to the teeth to camouflage stains; and finally (16) Applying 'Kaajal' or collyrium on the edges of the eyelids.

Earlier on in this epic story of the Ram Charit Manas we have read that when Lord Ram was born, there was mass celebration in Ayodhya. At that time also the ladies of the city had formed big and small groups, and had decorated themselves in their best finery. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 194.

<sup>3</sup>It is a standard practice in ancient literature to compare the beauty of the face with the moon, and that of the eye with the eyes of a fawn.

An exactly similar comparison is made later on in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 318 when ladies of Janakpur had come out in hordes to offer Arti (ceremonial showing of lighted lamps to an honourable guest) to Lord Ram who arrived as the palace gates of Sita as a bridegroom.

Even Lord Ram has invoked the moon when he was praising the beauty of Sita—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 237.]

गावहिं मंगल मंजुल बानीं । सुनि कल रव कलकंठि लजानीं ॥ ३ ॥

भूप भवन किमि जाइ बखाना । बिस्व बिमोहन रचेउ बिताना ॥ ४ ॥

bhūpa bhavana kimi jā'i bakhānā. bisva bimōhana racē'u bitānā. 4.
gāvahim maṅgala maṅjula bānīm. suni kala rava kalakanṭhi lajānīm. 3.

These groups of beautiful women-folk sang equally beautiful and auspicious songs with a sweet voice and melodious tunes that were so wonderful and pleasing to hear that they put to shame the voice of the female cuckoo that is famed for its sweetness and charm<sup>1</sup>. (3)

How can one describe the beauty and glory of the royal palace<sup>2</sup> where a fabulous pavilion had been erected that attracted the attention of the whole world by its magnificence and grandeur<sup>3</sup>? (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The voice of the cuckoo is so pleasing to hear that it is traditionally used as a bench-mark to determine the sweetness of the spoken word, whether it is a song and its tune, or a general talk.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 286, (ii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 318, and (iii)

Chanda stanza no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 322 that describe a similar scene at Janakpur when large groups of women-folk had joined hands to sing auspicious and laudatory songs to celebrate the marriage of Sita with Lord Ram.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 345 that also says that the palace of king Dasrath looked fabulous at the time of arrival of the marriage party from Janakpur with the four grooms and their brides.

Further, in Doha no. 213 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 7-8 the magnificence of king Janak's palace is narrated.

<sup>3</sup>Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 287—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 289 where a 'pavilion' that was erected in Janakpur has been described in detail.

Now the question arises—why is the pavilion at Janakpur described in such fine detail whereas the one at Ayodhya is just briefly referred to in a single line? The answer is that the marriage of Lord Ram and Sita would be formalized under the pavilion at Janakpur and hence its glory and significance cannot be matched by any other pavilion. In this context, refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 289 which is explicit on this point.]

मंगल द्रव्य मनोहर नाना । राजत बाजत बिपुल निसाना ॥ ५ ॥

कतहुँ बिरिद बंदी उच्चरहीं । कतहुँ बेद धुनि भूसुर करहीं ॥ ६ ॥ maṅgala drabya manōhara nānā. rājata bājata bipula nisānā. 5.

katahum<sup>3</sup> birida bandī uccarahīm. katahum<sup>3</sup> bēda dhuni bhūsura karahīm. 6.

Countless articles that are used during auspicious occasions and which portend good omen<sup>1</sup> were arranged at different locations in the pavilion, the palace, as well as all over in the city. Meanwhile, numerous kettle-drums and other musical instruments were played loudly and enthusiastically in the city<sup>2</sup>. (5)

At some of the places the royal bards and minstrels were singing the glories of the royal dynasty, and at other places the Brahmins were chanting sacred hymns from the Vedas<sup>3</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 288 and its accompanying note which refer to the different auspicious things that are used during such celebrations.

<sup>2</sup>Refer Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 296 herein above which also talks about the playing of the kettle-drums. But at that time the good and auspicious news of Lord Ram's and his younger brother Laxman's welfare as well as the Lord's marriage had just begun to spread in the city, so the drums were sounded in those parts of the city where this initial round of news arrived. By and by the news had spread to all the corners of the huge city, and therefore at the point of time this present verse refers to there was a clamour of countless kettle-drums and other sorts of musical instruments being played throughout the length and breadth of the extended areas of the city, its different districts and boroughs, and individual households and community centers.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 286 where it is described that as soon as Lord Ram broke the bow there was a loud clamour of kettle-drums in the city of Janakpur.

<sup>3</sup>A similar situation prevailed in Ayodhya at the time of the birth of Lord Ram and his other three brothers. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 194.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 262, and Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 265 where it is narrated that the bards and the minstrels sang the glories of king Janak along with that of Lord Ram, and the Brahmins chanted sacred hymns.

It was customary for Brahmins to chant sacred hymns of auspicious occasions as will be evident later on in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 319 where we shall read that the Brahmins uttered hymns from the scriptures from time to time when the suitable occasion arose.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 323, and Doha no. 324 in this context of Brahmins chanting hymns from the Vedas.]

गावहिं सुंदरि मंगल गीता । लै लै नामु रामु अरु सीता ॥ ७ ॥

बहुत उछाहु भवनु अति थोरा । मानहुँ उमगि चला चहु ओरा ॥ ८ ॥ gāvahim sundari maṅgala gītā. lai lai nāmu rāmu aru sītā. 7.

bahuta uchāhu bhavanu ati thōrā. mānahum'umagi calā cahu ōrā. 8.

They (i.e. the women-folk referred to in verse no. 3, and the bards and minstrels mentioned in verse no. 6) sang beautiful and auspicious songs befitting this celebratory occasion of the marriage of Lord Ram and Sita by lacing their verses repeatedly with the individual names of the groom and the bride, i.e. Lord Ram and Sita respectively.

[To wit, the auspicious songs that they sang were tailored to suit the happy occasion of the marriage of Lord Ram with Sita. To make the marriage-songs specific to the occasion that marked the celebrations that accompanied the royal marriage of Lord Ram with Sita, the names of the groom and the bride were incorporated in the lyrics of the songs themselves. The effect was that though the songs had been composed by song-writers and poets in a general way, the inclusion of the name of Lord Ram and Sita as part of the lyrics made the songs sound as if they were written specifically for this auspicious occasion.]<sup>1</sup> (7)

The abundance of joy and happiness was of such a huge dimension that the palace of the king and all the households of the city taken together were not sufficient to contain it as it seemed to heave and surge in every direction and overflowed everywhere<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—1]It ought to be noted here that the ladies as well as the bards have put the name of Lord Ram before that of Sita. There are two reasons for it—(i) The first reason is that they are citizens of Ayodhya which was the capital of Lord Ram and not of Sita, and hence the citizens decided to afford the Lord precedence over Sita to show their loyalty for the royal family of king Dasrath. (ii) The second reason is that the glory of Sita was based on the glory of her spouse, Lord Ram. The king always gets preference over the queen. Even in the cosmic context, Lord Vishnu gets precedence, is more revered, and occupies a senior position as compared to his consort goddess Laxmi.

<sup>2</sup>The city of Ayodhya was eternally full of joy and happiness because of the simple fact that the Supreme Lord of creation had taken birth there in a human form as Lord Ram. In this context, refer to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 195, and more specifically to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 296 which explicitly asserts this point.

This present verse no. 8 means that there was so much joy and ecstasy in Ayodhya that it spilled over onto the streets of the city in as much as the people danced and sang in merry abundance not only within their own homes and community centers but even in open public places like gardens, intersections of main avenues, stadiums, streets, lanes, by-lanes and market-places.]

दो०. सोभा दसरथ भवन कइ को कबि बरनै पार । जहाँ सकल सुर सीस मनि राम लीन्ह अवतार ॥ २९७ ॥

dōhā.

sōbhā dasaratha bhavana ka'i kō kabi baranai pāra.
jahām̐ sakala sura sīsa mani rāma līnha avatāra. 297.

Say, which poet can be skilled enough to describe the glory, the greatness and the grandeur of the palace of king Dasrath where the Lord of the gods has incarnated himself in the form of Lord Ram?

[To wit, it is impossible to describe the glory of the household of king Dasrath where the Supreme Lord has decided to live in the human form of Lord Ram.] (Doha no. 297)

[Note—Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 195 that says “even the goddess of speech known as Saraswati, and the thousand-tongued celestial serpent known as Seshnath, cannot narrate the abundance of glory and happiness of the time when Lord Ram had taken birth in the household of Dasrath”.]

चौ०. भूप भरत पुनि लिए बोलाई । हय गय स्यंदन साजहु जाई ॥ १ ॥
चलहु बेगि रघुबीर बराता । सुनत पुलक पूरे दोउ भ्राता ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

bhūpa bharata puni li'ē bōlāī. haya gaya syandana sājahu jāī. 1.
calahu bēgi raghubīra barātā. sunata pulaka pūrē dō'u bhrātā. 2.

The king then called Bharat and instructed him as follows—‘Go and get the elephants, the horses and the chariots decorated and readied. (1)

Be quick to make proper preparations for the departure of the marriage part of Lord Ram as soon as possible.’

Hearing these instructions (of their father), the two brothers (Bharat and Shatrughan) became thrilled in their bodies. (2)

[Note—Prior to this verse we have read how celebrations were being undertaken in Ayodhya. Now, the king called his sons Bharat and Shatrughan, the younger brothers of Lord Ram, and instructed them to make preparations for the departure of a grand marriage party for Janakpur. This party should match the greatness of the kingdom of Ayodhya, and hence a large number of elephants, horses and chariots were to be decorated and got readied.

This news naturally made the two brothers excited.]

भरत सकल साहनी बोलाए । आयसु दीन्ह मुदित उठि धाए ॥ ३ ॥
 रचि रुचि जीन तुरग तिन्ह साजे । बरन बरन बर बाजि बिराजे ॥ ४ ॥
 सुभग सकल सुठि चंचल करनी । अय इव जरत धरत पग धरनी ॥ ५ ॥ नाना जाति न जाहिं बखाने । निदरि पवनु जनु चहत उड़ाने ॥ ६ ॥ bharata sakala sāhanī bōlā'ē. āyasu dīnha mudita uṭhi dhā'ē. 3.

 raci ruci jīna turaga tinha sājē. barana barana bara bāji birājē. 4.
 subhaga sakala suṭhi cañcala karanī. aya iva jarata dharata paga dharanī. 5.
 nānā jāti na jāhiṁ bakhānē. nidari pavanu janu cahata uṛānē. 6.

On his part, Bharat summoned the chief officers in charge of royal stables and issued necessary instructions. These officers were exceedingly delighted to hear these instructions and immediately got up cheerfully to implement them. (3)

The stable hands (keepers of horses who were assigned the duty to look after the royal stables) decorated numerous breeds of wonderful horses with colourful saddles and magnificent bridles, and collected these majestic horses at a place where all other components of the marriage party (procession) were to assemble. (4)

All these horses were wonderful to behold and dynamic in their movements. They were so swift that when they galloped it appeared as if they foot didn't touch the ground because the latter was like hot iron. [When these horses ran, their hooves touched and left the ground so rapidly in quick succession that it appeared to an observer that the animal is feeling scorched by touching a hot surface and so it wishes not to make any contact with it, and is thus trying to fly in the air.] (5)

These steeds and stallions belonged to so many different breeds that it is not possible to list or describe them. Their strides were so swift that they appeared to fly in the air when they galloped. (6)

[Note—There were countless steeds and stallions of different breeds in the royal stables. Some were war-horses, others used for games and ceremonial occasions, and some others for the purposes of making gifts. The stable-hands decorated the horses colourfully, using saddles, bridles and reins of different colours and design that would best fit with the type of the animal.

Some of these horses were brought in from the royal stables and others from the royal stud-farms. The following verses shall qualify these horses further.]

तिन्ह सब छयल भए असवारा । भरत सरिस बय राजकुमारा ॥ ७ ॥

सब सुंदर सब भूषनधारी । कर सर चाप तून कटि भारी ॥ ८ ॥

tinha saba chayala bha'ē asavārā. bharata sarisa baya rājakumārā. 7.
saba sundara saba bhūṣanadhārī. kara sara cāpa tūna kaṭi bhārī. 8.

Gallant princes, knights, grandees, nobles and other sundry members of the royalty in the kingdom<sup>1</sup>, who were roughly of the same age as Bharat, mounted these fully decorated horses. (7)

All of them were handsome to look at. They were fully decorated with the best of ornaments, held a bow and an arrow in their hands, and had quivers tied to their waists. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The “princes” referred to here may have been members of the extended royal family of king Dasrath, sons of other senior courtiers such as ministers and chiefs of the various wings of the army, as well as princes of nearby kingdoms who were friends of Bharat and Lord Ram. As soon as the news spread that Lord Ram is to be married and a grand party is preparing to leave for the bride’s place, all such princes and members of the royalty may have rushed to join the marriage party so that they can join it to attend the marriage ceremony.

Even in today’s time when the news spreads that the groom’s party is to leave for the bride’s place from a certain spot, all the friends of the groom assemble there and board the transport arranged by the groom’s family to ferry them to the venue of the marriage ceremony. In this particular instance however, the method of transport was the horses, the elephants and the chariots.]

दो०. छरे छबीले छयल सब सूर सुजान नबीन ।

जुग पदचर असवार प्रति जे असिकला प्रबीन ॥ २९८ ॥

dōhā.

charē chabīlē chayala saba sūra sujāna nabīna.

juga padacara asavāra prati jē asikalā prabīna. 298.

All these princes, knights, grandees, nobles and other members of the royalty who had mounted the horses were not only handsome and magnificent to look at in all their fine attire and other royal ensembles and paraphernalia, but were also maverick, brave and gallant warriors in their own right. [They looked wonderful and well heeled; their external appearances gave the impression that they since they lead a pampered life of comfort and pleasure they won't be able to stand against their enemies in the battle-field, but this was a wrong assumption as all of them were trained warriors known for their gallantry and valour.]

Each one of them was accompanied or attended by two foot-men (foot-soldiers) who held swords in their hands and were experts in wielding this weapon. (Doha no. 298)

[Note—Each horse-rider was attended by two helpers, one on each side. They were necessary to control the horses should the animals get distracted and go out of control due to the huge crowd and cacophony of musical instruments.

Besides this point, the riders needed their help to mount and alight from the horses—because one of the attendants would hold the horse and the other would assist his master to get down from the horse or mount it.

The third reason is that it was a matter of status for the princes and knights who were accustomed to being attended by servants at all times.]

चौ०. बाँधें बिरद बीर रन गाढ़े । निकसि भए पुर बाहेर ठाढ़े ॥ १ ॥

फेरहिं चतुर तुरग गति नाना । हरषहिं सुनि सुनि पनव निसाना ॥ २ ॥ caupāṭi.

bāṁdhēm birada bīra rana gāṛhē. nikasi bha'e pura bāhēra ṭhāṛhē. 1.

phērahiṁ catura turaga gati nānā. haraṣahiṁ suni suni panava nisānā. 2.

[The following verses would describe the marriage party of Lord Ram as it assembled outside Ayodhya in preparation for the departure of the procession for Janakpur.]

Brave and gallant warriors who prided themselves for their adherence to the vows of chivalry as well as for their bravery, gallantry and valour, had enthusiastically came out of the city and gathered together at a spot, readying themselves for departure<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Expert horse-riders and cavalymen put their horses through different steps and made them display various maneuvers (such as making the horses dance and prance in various ways) to exhibit their skills in handling the horses. They feel exhilarated and excited upon hearing the vigorous sound of the beating of the drums and kettle-drums.<sup>2</sup> (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Remember: We are dealing with events of ancient times when chivalry and gallantry were honourable traits expected from the warrior class known as the 'Kshatriyas' to which the royal family of Dasrath belonged.

Royal showmanship, regal demeanours, pomp and pageantry were the norms of the day for courts of kings and emperors.

<sup>2</sup>These expert horsemen made their horses dance and prance to the rhythmic beat of the musical drums. The more vigorous the sound of the musical instruments the more enthusiastically they prodded the animals to dance and prance energetically.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 302 which also allude to the dancing of the horses to the beat of musical instruments.]

रथ सारथिन्ह बिचित्र बनाए । ध्वज पताक मनि भूषन लाए ॥ ३ ॥
चवँर चारु किंकिनि धुनि करहीं । भानु जान सोभा अपहरहीं ॥ ४ ॥ ratha sārathinha bicitra banā'ē. dhvaja patāka mani bhūṣana lā'ē. 3.

cavam̐ra cāru kiṅkini dhuni karahīm̐. bhānu jāna sōbhā apaharahīm̐. 4.

Meanwhile, the charioteers had fabulously decorated the numerous chariots with flags, banners, curtains, gems and other ornamentations which they had brought especially for this occasion<sup>1</sup>. (3)

These chariots had beautiful canopies (under which the royal passenger would be seated) and were provided by elegant whisks (to fan them). The chariots were adorned with small tinkling bells (which made a pleasant sound resembling some musical instrument as the vehicle moved along).

The chariots were so gorgeous and opulent that they virtually stole (or put to shame; brushed aside; overrode; surpassed and eclipsed; made to pale into insignificance) the splendour and grandeur of the chariot of the Sun-God.<sup>2</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A king's army had the horse brigade on the foreground, which was followed by foot soldiers and the chariots, with the elephants on either flanks.

So, first the cavalry was described, and in this verse the chariots are being described.

<sup>2</sup>The young members of the royalty such as princes and brave knights would mount the horses, while the elders and other noble men would sit in these chariots.]

सावँकरन अगनित हय होते । ते तिन्ह रथन्ह सारथिन्ह जोते ॥ ५ ॥
सुंदर सकल अलंकृत सोहे । जिन्हहि बिलोकत मुनि मन मोहे ॥ ६ ॥ sāvam̐karana aganita haya hōtē. tē tinha rathanha sārathinha jōtē. 5.

sundara sakala alaṅkr̥ta sōhē. jinhahi bilōkata muni mana mōhē. 6.

Numerous horses of a special breed that had dark ears<sup>1</sup>, which were generally regarded as auspicious as they were used during horse-sacrifices, were yoked to the chariots. (5)

All these horses were magnificent to behold because they were beautifully decorated with a wide variety of ornamentations. They were so wonderful to behold that even sages and hermits became enchanted by their sight (though they are supposed to be immune to such worldly physical attractions). (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>These horses normally had milk-white skin and long dark ears. They were used exclusively for fire sacrifices and other religious events.]

जे जल चलहिं थलहि की नाई । टाप न बूड़ बेग अधिकाई ॥ ७ ॥
अज सज सबु साजु बनाई । रथी सारथिन्ह लिए बोलाई ॥ ८ ॥

jē jala calahiṁ thalahi kī nā'īm. ṭāpa na būṛa bēga adhikā'īm. 7.
astra sastra sabu sāju banā'ī. rathī sārathinha li'ē bōlā'ī. 8.

The swiftness and dynamism of these horses was so outstanding that when they moved on water (such as when crossing streams and rivulets) their foot touched the surface of the water as rapidly as they touched the ground when they galloped on dry land. They seemed to skim the surface of the water because they cantered away so fast that their hooves didn't seem to touch it<sup>1</sup>. (7)

Meanwhile, the charioteers had armed their vehicles with different kinds of weapons and armaments, and having finished their jobs they invited their masters to board them<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It ought to be noted that a lot of stress has been laid on the quality of the horses in these verses because mighty armies of those times were measured in their strength by the strength and ability of their cavalry wings.

<sup>2</sup>The natural query that comes to the mind is that this was supposed to be a “marriage procession” and not an army going to war. But it must be remembered that it was a party of a great king-emperor, and it had to match his stature. Wherever a king went he was always accompanied by a well-armed and equipped army. This was done to ensure that he is given due respect befitting his royal status wherever he goes, and also to provide for his security in case of an unexpected ambush.

After all, an Emperor can't be expected to arrive at the place where his son, the would-be emperor, is about to be married, astride on an ordinary chariot and accompanied by a mere handful of soldiers and servants. That would be a hilarious situation.]

दो०. चढ़ि चढ़ि रथ बाहेर नगर लागी जुरन बरात । होत सगुन सुंदर सबहि जो जेहि कारज जात ॥ २९९ ॥
dōhā.

caḍhi caḍhi ratha bāhēra nagara lāgī jurana barāta.
hōta saguna sundara sabahi jō jēhi kārāja jāta. 299.

The members of the marriage procession mounted the chariots and started collecting outside the city.

In the city itself, wherever anyone went to do any odd job, he would encounter auspicious omens. [To wit, the general atmosphere in the city of Ayodhya was one of auspiciousness, exuberance, vibrancy, joyfulness, delightfulness, cheer, festivities and celebrations.] (Doha no. 299)

चौ०. कलित करिबरन्हि परीं अँबारीं । कहि न जाहिं जेहि भाँति सँवारीं ॥ १ ॥

चले मत्त गज घंट बिराजी । मनहुँ सुभग सावन घन राजी ॥ २ ॥

caupāṭi.

kalita karibaranhi parīm amḃārīm. kahi na jāhirīm jēhi bhāmṭi samṡvārīm. 1.
calē matta gaja ghaṇṭa birājī. manahumṡ subhaga sāvana ghana rājī. 2.

[After describing the horses, it is now the turn of the elephants.]

On the back of magnificent elephants of the best breeds were put elegant seats that had canopies and other accoutrements that made them look so regal and splendid that it is not possible to describe their beauty and elegance in words.

[On these seats would be seated the chiefs of the various wings of the king's own army as well as those of the knights who were accompanying the marriage procession.] (1)

These young elephants that were charged with dynamic energy and in a state of rut, who had been well decorated with chiming bells (and other decorative paraphernalia such as garlands of pearls, banners with the royal emblem, bracelets of gold studded with gems that were tied around their legs, and so on and so forth), moved ahead majestically in a procession as if huge banks of rumbling and thundering dark clouds start ascending the horizon during the rainy season. (2)

[Note—There were two types of elephants in the royal procession—one that were used in ceremonial processions or other auspicious occasions, and others that were used as war-elephants. They represented the might, majesty and dignity of the king's huge army. Elephants and horses, as well as the chariots, were the main components of a king's army in those days.

It should be noted that the procession had the horses in the vanguard, behind them followed the chariots, and then came the elephants. They were mounted by warriors, princes and knights. This was the pattern followed by the royal army in ancient days.

Behind this army came the civilian component of the marriage procession consisting of the Brahmins, royal bards, minstrels, genealogists, servants and other attendants, as well as mules, oxen, camels etc. that were used to carry ration and other innumerable things of daily use that were needed to support such a huge assembly of people and animals.]

बाहन अपर अनेक बिधाना । सिबिका सुभग सुखासन जाना ॥ ३ ॥

तिन्ह चढ़ि चले बिप्रबर बृन्दा । जनु तनु धरें सकल श्रुति छंदा ॥ ४ ॥ bāhana apara anēka bidhānā. sibikā subhaga sukhāsana jānā. 3.

tinha caḍhi calē biprabara bṛndā. janu tanu dharēm sakala śruti chandā. 4.

Besides the horses, the chariots and the elephants there were various kinds of other means of conveyance such as grand palanquins, elegant sedans, and other such seats that were all elaborately decorated in an elegant style. They were all very comfortable to sit upon. (3)

On these vehicles were seated the Brahmins, who were like personified forms of the verses of the Vedas<sup>1</sup>, as they joined the other members of the marriage party. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This is a metaphor to indicate two things—one, the Brahmins were revered men just like the scriptures known as the ‘Vedas’, and two, that they were in their thousands just like the countless numbers of the verses of the Vedas.]

मागध सूत बंदि गुनगायक । चले जान चढ़ि जो जेहि लायक ॥ ५ ॥
बेसर ऊँट बृषभ बहु जाती । चले बस्तु भरि अगनित भाँती ॥ ६ ॥

māgadha sūta bandi gunagāyaka. calē jāna caḍhi jō jēhi lāyaka. 5.
bēsara ūm̐ṭa bṛṣabha bahu jāti. calē bastu bhari aganita bhāntī. 6.

The royal bards, heralds, minstrels and genealogists boarded different kinds of vehicles that were suited to their position in the social and royal hierarchy of the kingdom as they followed from behind the Brahmins. (5)

They were followed by animals such as mules, camels and oxen of various breeds that carried on their backs a huge supply of essential commodities of different kinds (that would be needed to sustain such a large party of men and animals for a long time). (6)

कोटिन्ह काँवरि चले कहारा । बिबिध बस्तु को बरनै पारा ॥ ७ ॥
चले सकल सेवक समुदाई । निज निज साजु समाजु बनाई ॥ ८ ॥ kōṭinha kām̐vari calē kahārā. bibidha bastu kō baranai pārā. 7.

calē sakala sēvaka samudāī. nija nija sāju samāju banāī. 8.

Behind these animals carting essential commodities came their keepers, as well as the porters and other bearers of goods of such a wide variety that no one can narrate or list them<sup>1</sup>. (7)

All the servants, servitors and attendants formed a huge crowd as they followed from behind in the form of large groups<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The animals mentioned in verse no. 6 were employed to carry heavier items such as ration and other raw materials needed for daily usage for the huge army and party of men, while the porters and bearers were employed to ferry other lighter things such as clothes, gifts, robes, ornaments, decorations, insignia and other royal paraphernalia that needed to be handled carefully by men.

<sup>2</sup>Amongst the servants, servitors and attendants there was a hierarchy, and each rung of this hierarchy had numerous members. So when they joined the marriage procession, they formed their own groups. And therefore, there must have been a large number of groups of servants, servitors and attendants of different status and designation that formed a huge crowd which followed from behind in the royal procession.]

दो०. सब कें उर निर्भर हरषु पूरित पुलक सरीर । कबहिं देखिबे नयन भरि रामु लखनु दोउ बीर ॥ ३०० ॥

dōhā.

saba kēm ura nirbhara haraṣu pūrīta pulaka sarīra.
kabahim dēkhibē nayana bhari rāmu lakhanu dō'u bīra. 300.

The hearts of all of them were bubbling over with excitement and their bodies were full of thrill, wondering when they will have the earliest chance to see to their eyes full the two brave warriors, Lord Ram and Laxman (who were very dear to them all). (Doha no. 300)

[Note—The citizens loved their princes from the depth of their hearts. Lord Ram had a special place in the heart of all men and women. This fact is explicitly mentioned in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 204.

This will also be abundantly evident later on when we read in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 83, as well as in Doha no. 83 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that describe how the citizens were overwhelmed with profound sorrow and grief upon learning that Lord Ram was going to the forest to live in exile, and had decided at the time that they can't live without the Lord. So they all followed him from behind in a huge mass of lamenting men and women who refused to stay back at Ayodhya as they were determined to follow the Lord wherever he went.

Not only the humans, but even the animals of Ayodhya had loved their lord dearly as would be evident when we read Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 83 which describes how the elephants, the horses, the cattle and other four-footed animals, as well as the birds represented by the sparrow hawk, peacock, cuckoo, parrot, ruddy goose, crane, swan and partridge were submerged in grief at the time Lord Ram left Ayodhya for his forest exile.

Again we read in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 99 that when Lord Ram sent Sumantra, the chief minister of the kingdom of Ayodhya who was sent by king Dasrath with a chariot to try and bring the Lord back after some initial days in the forest, back, the horses of the chariot became exceedingly sorrowful and neighed soulfully as they repeatedly looked back to glance at their beloved Lord whom they were forced to leave behind when Sumantra turned the chariot round and forced them to move on in the direction of Ayodhya.

Well so, therefore, it is the same natural and unbound affection and love that the citizens as well as the animals had for their beloved Lord Ram that had made them so thrilled and highly exhilarated when they joined the marriage procession of the Lord. They are very eager to have a glimpse of their beloved Lord Ram as soon as possible, and they are so impatient because they hadn't seen the Lord for quite some time, ever since he had gone with sage Vishwamitra to protect the latter's fire sacrifice.

If it was allowed and possible, they would have literally run or flown, as it were, to Janakpur to be with Lord Ram in the shortest possible time.]

चौ०. गरजहिं गज घंटा धुनि घोरा । रथ रव बाजि हिंस चहु ओरा ॥ १ ॥
 निदरि घनहि घुर्झरहिं निसाना । निज पराइ कछु सुनिअ न काना ॥ २ ॥
 caupāī.

garajahim gaja ghaṇṭā dhuni ghōrā. ratha rava bāji himsa cahu ōrā. 1.
 nidari ghanahi ghurmmarahim nisānā. nija parā'i kachu suni'a na kānā. 2.

There was a thunderous din that was caused by the trumpeting of elephants, the clanging of bells, the creaking sound of the wheels of chariots, and the neighing of horses in all the directions. (1)

To this cacophony was added the deafening sound of the vigorous beating of the kettle-drums that resembled the clap of thunder during the rainy season.

The combined effect of this loud din and clamour was that no one could hear anything, what others said or his own voice<sup>1</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>There was an electrifying excitement that pervaded at the place outside the gates of the city of Ayodhya where the marriage party had started assembling. There were animals as well as humans, and everyone was terribly happy.

There are other places also in Ram Charit Manas where it is said that the clamour of the musical instruments etc. was so loud that the resultant din made it impossible for one to hear what others were speaking. Refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 319, and Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 323.]

महा भीर भूपति के द्वारें । रज होइ जाइ पषान पबारें ॥ ३ ॥
 चढ़ी अटारिन्ह देखहिं नारीं । लिऐँ आरती मंगल थारीं ॥ ४ ॥
 गावहिं गीत मनोहर नाना । अति आनंदु न जाइ बखाना ॥ ५ ॥

mahā bhīra bhūpati kē dvārēm. raja hō'i jā'i paṣāna pabārēm. 3. caṛhī aṭārinha dēkhahim nārīm. li'ēm āratī maṅgala thārīm. 4.
 gāvahim gīta manōhara nānā. ati ānandu na jā'i bakhānā. 5.

[The previous verses had described the scene where the marriage party had assembled on the outskirts of the city. Now in the following verses, the scene within the city is being narrated.]

There was a huge crowd at the gates of the royal palace. The crowd was so thick and excited that if a stone were to be thrown on the ground at that place then it would be crushed to dust by the pressure of the feet of those who had gathered there.<sup>1</sup>
 (3)

The women-folk<sup>2</sup> of the city went to the balconies and terraces of their homes to watch the exuberant celebrations below. They carried platters with auspicious items to perform the ritual of 'doing of the Arti' (showing of lighted earthen lamps) when the king and his family members would move out of the palace and proceed towards the spot where the rest of the marriage party had assembled on the outskirts. (4)

These women-folk were singing pleasantly different kinds of songs that were both melodious as well as auspicious in their content. They were overjoyed, being overwhelmed with emotions of happiness and ecstasy. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The palace grounds were chock-a-block with a sea of citizens. Everyone wished to witness first hand the goings-on of that happy occasion.

<sup>2</sup>Whereas the men had moved out onto the streets and danced and sang in merry abundance, the women stayed behind as was the tradition of the time. They expressed their joy by singing and doing the Arti. A similar scene would be witnessed in Janakpur when Lord Ram would proceed towards the marriage venue. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chanda stanza no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 317—to Chanda stanza no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 318.

Earlier we have already read that when Lord Ram and Laxman had gone on a sight-seeing visit of Janakpur prior to the breaking of the bow, a huge crowd of women-folk of the city had watched them from the balconies and terraces of their homes. They were overwhelmed to see these handsome prince and had invoked their deities and prayed to them fervently to make it so happen that Sita gets married with Lord Ram. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 220—to Doha no. 223.]

तब सुमंत्र दुइ स्यंदन साजी । जोते रबि हय निंदक बाजी ॥ ६ ॥
दोउ रथ रुचिर भूप पहिं आने । नहिं सारद पहिं जाहिं बखाने ॥ ७ ॥
राज समाजु एक रथ साजा । दूसर तेज पुंज अति भ्राजा ॥ ८ ॥

taba sumantra du'i syandana sājī. jōtē rabi haya nindaka bājī. 6.
dō'u ratha rucira bhūpa pahim ānē. nahim sārada pahim jāhim bakhānē. 7.
rāja samāju ēka ratha sājā. dūsara tēja punja ati bhrājā. 8.

Then Sumantra, the chief minister of the kingdom, got two fabulous chariots ready. Horses that put to shame the wonderful horses of the celestial chariot of the Sun God, were yoked to these chariots<sup>1</sup>. (6)

Two such fabulous chariots were brought before the king (Dasrath)<sup>2</sup>. They were so magnificent and brilliant that even the patron goddess of speech and literary expertise, goddess Sarda (Saraswati), was unable to describe their beauty and magnificence. (7)

One of these chariots was bedecked with royal paraphernalia (such as whisks, arms, canopy, royal standard, a throne with its parasole and ceremonial umbrella, etc.), and the other was brilliant in its radiance as if it was a fount of splendour. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The Sun God's chariot has seven horses. This allusion means that each of the two chariots that Sumantra got readied for king Dasrath and his royal family had at least seven horses, and these horses were handpicked after thorough training and testing. The sort of horses that Dasrath had in his stables can be gauged by reading the previous verses, Chaupai line nos. 4-6 that precede Doha no. 298, and Chaupai line nos. 5-7 that precede Doha no. 299. If such wonderful horses were used by other princes and knights then one can guess the magnificence of the horses that were kept aside for the personal use of the king-emperor, Dasrath himself.

The brilliance of these horses is stressed by comparing them to the horses of the chariot of the Sun God and saying that there were far better than the latter.

<sup>2</sup>It is easy to guess who will sit in which chariot. The first was occupied by king Dasrath himself, while his royal priest, sage Vasistha, would sit in the second one. It will be clear in Doha no. 301 below.]

दो०. तेहिं रथ रुचिर बसिष्ठ कहूँ हरषि चढ़ाइ नरेसु ।
आपु चढ़ेउ स्यंदन सुमिरि हर गुर गौरि गनेसु ॥ ३०१ ॥

dōhā.

tēhiṁ ratha rucira basiṣṭha kahum̐ haraṣi caṛhā'i narēsu.
āpu caṛhē'u syandana sumiri hara gura gauri ganēsu. 301.

Sage Vasistha was made to board this (second) chariot, while the king himself boarded the first one after remembering and invoking Lord Har (Shiva), Guru (his moral preceptor), Gauri (goddess Parvati, the divine consort of Lord Shiva) and Ganesh (the son of Lord Shiva who provides auspiciousness and success in any endeavour, and is worshipped at the beginning of any exercise). (Doha no. 301)

[Note—It is a standard practice to invoke gods and one's personal deity before one embarks on a journey to ensure success in the objective of the trip as well as to remove any hurdles that may occur due to interference by malevolent stars. When Lord Ram had started on his journey for forest exile he too had prayed to Lords Ganesh and Shiva, and Sita had prayed to goddess Parvati to ensure their welfare and safety in the wilds. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand—(i) Doha no. 79; (ii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 81; (iii) Doha no. 85; and (iv) Doha no. 103 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 2-8.]

चौ०. सहित बसिष्ठ सोह नृप कैसैं । सुर गुर संग पुरंदर जैसैं ॥ १ ॥
करि कुल रीति बेद बिधि राऊ । देखि सबहि सब भाँति बनाऊ ॥ २ ॥
सुमिरि रामु गुर आयसु पाई । चले महीपति संख बजाई ॥ ३ ॥

caupāī.

sahita basiṣṭha sōha nr̥pa kaisēm̐. sura gura saṅga purandara jaisēm̐. 1.
kari kula rīti bēda bidhi rā'ū. dēkhi sabahi saba bhām̐ti banā'ū. 2.
sumiri rāmu gura āyasu pā'ī. calē mahīpati saṅkha bajā'ī. 3.

In the company of his Guru (sage Vasistha), the king (Dasrath) looked as majestic and grand as Indra (the king of gods) looks in the company of the Guru of the gods (known as Brihaspati)<sup>1</sup>. (1)

The king cheerfully and diligently observed all the traditional formalities ordained for such auspicious occasions in the Vedas and other scriptures as well as those that were established by tradition in the royal family.

After having completed these formalities, the king observed that everything was ready and all arrangements were in place for the grand departure of the marriage procession for Janakpur. (2)

So, the king remembered Lord Ram<sup>2</sup>, took final permission from his Guru (Vasistha), and announced his departure for Janakpur by blowing the conch shell with full blast<sup>3</sup>. (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A king's glory and majesty is enhanced when he is accompanied by his Guru. Both king Dasrath and Guru Vasistha were highly regarded in the world, the former having the rare distinction of being the worldly father of Lord Ram, an incarnation of the Supreme Being, and the latter being the Lord's preceptor and teacher, a privilege no one else got. In fact, it was this rare honour to become a Guru of the Lord in his human form that Vasistha, who was the son of the creator Brahma, had accepted to become a priest of the Raghu dynasty when his father, Brahma, explained this privilege to him. This has been specifically stated in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 48 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 6-8.

Therefore, these two honourable gentlemen, king Dasrath and guru Vasistha, standing side by side, looked as if two suns were shining in their fully splendour simultaneously. In the present verse they have been likened to the Indra, the king of the gods, and Brihaspati, their Guru.

<sup>2</sup>This observation is very significant here. It clearly shows that Dasrath knew that Lord Ram, whom he calls his 'son', is none else but the Supreme Being in a human form. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 193.

Therefore, at the time of departure of the huge marriage procession, king Dasrath had invoked the blessings of Lord Ram in the same manner as one would pray to his family deity or some universally worshipped deity such as Lord Shiva or Lord Ganesh.

It is also to be noted here that the wise king deemed that all other deities have been worshipped, and their blessings sought and received, if he had offered his prayers to one single deity in the form of Lord Ram—because Lord Ram, being the 'Supreme Being', incorporates all other forms of divinity in his single body. In fact, worshipping Lord Ram is equivalent to worshipping the entire pantheon of gods and goddesses. This notion is endorsed by sage Valmiki also when he says exactly this thing in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand—(i) Doha no. 129 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 4-6; (ii) Doha no. 130 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 5, 8.

Therefore, king Dasrath did not think it necessary to offer special prayers to any other traditional deity such as Lord Shiva or Lord Ganesh at the time of departure for Janakpur.

<sup>3</sup>The sound of the blowing of the conch shell is considered the most auspicious sound one can hear at the start of any endeavour. For instance, it is sounded at the start of all religious ceremonies and festivities, including the fire sacrifices and recitation of hymns, at the time of commencement of a journey or any other enterprise, even at the time of the commencement of a battle.

We shall read a little later on in this narration that when the Lord Ram's marriage party started from Janakpur back on its journey for Ayodhya, many musical instruments were played, and the conch shell was one of them—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 344.

Even on an earlier occasion we have read that when Lord Ram had broken the bow, a number of musical instruments were played, and at that time also the conch was blown. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 263.

Then again, the conch was sounded when king Janak invited king Dasrath to come to the venue of the marriage ceremony in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 313.]

हरषे बिबुध बिलोकि बराता । बरषहिं सुमन सुमंगल दाता ॥ ४ ॥

भयउ कोलाहल हय गय गाजे । व्योम बरात बाजने बाजे ॥ ५ ॥

सुर नर नारि सुमंगल गाई । सरस राग बाजहिं सहनाई ॥ ६ ॥

haraṣē bibudha bilōki barātā. baraṣahim sumana sumaṅgala dātā. 4.
bhaya'u kōlāhala haya gaya gājē. byōma barāta bājanē bājē. 5.
sura nara nāri sumaṅgala gā'īm. sarasa rāga bājahim sahanā'īm. 6.

The gods were jubilant when they saw the marriage procession. They showered flowers from the heaven upon this procession, symbolising their blessings as well as the auspiciousness and the sanctity of the occasion<sup>1</sup>. (4)

At that time (i.e. at the time of the departure of the marriage procession from Ayodhya) there was a loud din created by the neighing of horses, the trumpeting of elephants and the playing of different types of musical instruments, both in the heaven (played by the gods) as well as in the marriage procession itself (on the ground)<sup>2</sup>. (5)

On that occasion, the gods, the men and the women sang auspicious songs in melodious voices. The clarionets were played melodiously, set to various sweet tunes<sup>3</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>There are countless instances of the gods showering flowers and giving blessings from the heaven. For instance, refer Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 194 at the time of birth of Lord Ram; (ii) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 262 when the gods have showered flowers upon Lord Ram when the Lord broke the bow of Shiva; (iii) Doha no. 264 when Sita had put the victory garland on Lord Ram; (iv) Doha no. 285 after the angry sage Parashuram had to concede defeat at the hands of Lord Ram and left for the forest after seeking forgiveness from the Lord; (v) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 306, and Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 309 when the hosts, king Janak, had welcomed the guests, the marriage party of Lord Ram; (vi) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 314 when king Dasrath proceeded towards the site of the marriage ceremony along with his royal retinue and his four sons; (vii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 323, Doha no. 324 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 7, and Chanda stanza no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 327 when Sita came to the pavilion where the marriage rituals were to be held, as well as during the proceedings of the rituals.

In Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 319 it is clearly stated that the “gods showered flowers from the sky, and the Brahmins chanted hymns invoking peace and prosperity on various occasions when they found it fit to do so”.

<sup>2</sup>Again, like the numerous instances of the blowing of the conch shell and the showering of flowers, there are other instances also when musical instruments were played so loud that the din and the cacophony of sound made it impossible for a person to hear what others were speaking—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 301.

On each happy point of time, the gods had played their musical instruments in the heaven, the sky, and the citizens had done so on earth. Some of the instances are the following—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 262 when Lord Ram had broken the bow; (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 265 when Sita had placed the victory garland on Lord Ram; (iii) Doha no. 285 and its following Chaupai line nos. 1-3; (iv) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 306 when the marriage party arrived at Janakpur; (v) Chanda line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 317 at the time of Lord Ram riding the horse and going towards the venue of the marriage ceremony; (vi) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 318 at the time when the guests were welcomed at the venue; (vii) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 319 when the guests were seated in the pavilion; (viii) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 323 when Sita had arrived at the site to attend the marriage rituals; (ix) Doha no. 324 during the proceedings of the marriage rituals; and (x) Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precedes Doha no. 344 when the marriage party arrived at Ayodhya.

<sup>3</sup>Some of the other places where a reference is made of the playing of the “clarionet” are the following: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 263 when Lord Ram had broken the bow; (i) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 344 at the time of the arrival of the marriage procession at Ayodhya.]

घंट घंटी धुनि बरनि न जाहीं । सरव करहिं पाइक फहराहीं ॥ ७ ॥

करहिं बिदूषक कौतुक नाना । हास कुसल कल गान सुजाना ॥ ८ ॥

ghaṇṭa ghaṇṭī dhuni barani na jāhīm. sarava karahīm pā'ika phaharāhīm. 7.
karahīm bidūṣaka kautuka nānā. hāsa kusala kala gāna sujānā. 8.

There was a huge clamour of clinging of bells, small and big, that was accompanied by the boisterous noise made by acrobats and gymnasts who leapt and danced, showing their skills in such feats, as they moved alongside the procession. (7)

Jesters and clowns tried all the tricks of their trade in different ways.

There was cheer and merriment everywhere as auspicious songs were sung melodiously (as the procession wend its way to Janakpur). (8)

[Note—These skilled professional people, the clowns, the jesters, the acrobats and the gymnasts were taken along to keep everyone entertained during the long journey from Ayodhya to Janakpur.]

दो०. तुरग नचावहिं कुअँर बर अकनि मृदंग निसान ।

नागर नट चितवहिं चकित डगहिं न ताल बँधान ॥ ३०२ ॥

dōhā.

turaga nacāvahiṃ ku'amṛa bara akani mṛdaṅga nisāna.

nāgara naṭa citavahiṃ cakita ḍagahiṃ na tāla baṁdhāna. 302.

Gallant princes and brave knights astride horses made their respective animals dance in step with the beat of the tunes being played by the musical instruments such as the tabor and the kettle-drums.

They did this so expertly that professional dancers known as the “Nats”, who were well accomplished in the art of dancing to the rhythm of musical instruments, watched them in awe and were spell-bound by their expertise. (Doha no. 302)

[Note—We have already read about these gallant princes and knights riding magnificent horses that were young and swift to manauvere, making the animals dance and hop skillfully as they waited on the outskirts of Ayodhya in preparation for the departure of the marriage procession. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 298—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 299.

Now, when they watched the acrobats, the gymnasts, the clowns and the jesters perform tricks, they too joined in the celebrations, showing their skills in tackling the horses. Since making the animal dance perfectly in tune with the rhythm of the beat of the tabor and the kettle-drum was not a child's play but required expertise of the highest order, other professional dancers watched them in awe and amazement.

So we have a marriage procession where entertainment was galore—there was music, song and dance, there were jokers to crack wise jokes, there were acrobats and gymnasts performing great physical exercises, and there were elegantly attired princes and knights on horsebacks adding colour to the procession with their ostentious feats with the horses. In short, it was a scene resembling a great moving circus of sorts that kept all spectators fully engaged and entertained all along the long journey to Janakpur.]

चौ०. बनइ न बरनत बनी बराता । होहिं सगुन सुंदर सुभदाता ॥ १ ॥

चारा चाषु बाम दिसि लेई । मनहुँ सकल मंगल कहि देई ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

bana'i na baranata banī barātā. hōhiṃ saguna sundara subhadātā. 1.

cārā cāṣu bāma disi lēī. manahum̐ sakala maṅgala kahi dēī. 2.

The marriage party and the procession were so magnificent and grand that it is not feasible for anyone to describe them. Auspicious omens began to occur one after another. [These omens and signs would be described in the following verses.]<sup>1</sup> (1)

[Verse nos. 2-8 list the auspicious signs that appeared at that time as the marriage procession of Lord Ram moved away from Ayodhya on its onwards journey to Janakpur.]

The beautiful bird with the blue neck (i.e. the blue jay; “cārā cāṣu”) picked up its food that was on its left (i.e. by turning its face towards its left side instead of picking up the food on its right side) to indicate that everything is auspicious and fine. [This was the first auspicious omen.]<sup>2</sup> (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Remember: It was not an ordinary marriage procession, but one of the Lord of the world in his human incarnation. Besides this, it was a marriage procession of an Emperor’s son, so grandeur, magnificence, pomp and pageantry were naturally expected.

We have already read about the constituents of this marriage procession—chariots, horses, elephants, mules, oxen, camels, musicians, musical instruments and their sounds such as those of bells, kettle-drums and blowing of conch shells etc., elderly Brahmins, noble princes, gallant knights, expert acrobats, gymnasts and jesters, a huge retinue of faithful servants, palanquin bearers and porters, and so on and so forth.

Refer also to Tulsidas’ book “Kavitawali Ramayan”, Uttar Kand, verse no. 180 where a summary of signs that are considered auspicious has been given.

<sup>2</sup>It is believed, according to traditions, that when one sees a blue jay (or even a magpie) in the afternoon, it is a good sign, especially when one is about to start on a long journey or enterprise. This bird is habituated in making sweet calls with a pleasant voice. So, as it picked up its food on its left by turning the neck sideways and made a sweet call, whoever heard it regarded it as an auspicious sign.]

दाहिन काग सुखेत सुहावा । नकुल दरसु सब काहूँ पावा ॥ ३ ॥

सानुकूल बह त्रिबिध बयारी । सघट सबाल आव बर नारी ॥ ४ ॥

dāhina kāga sukhēta suhāvā. nakula darasu saba kāhūṁ pāvā. 3.
sānukūla baha tribidha bayārī. saghaṭa sabāla āva bara nārī. 4.

On the right-hand side of the procession one could see a crow (or, a group of crows; “kāga”) sitting quietly in a field that was pleasant to behold (i.e. the field where the crow was seen was green, cultivated, properly watered, had wonderful crops and was generally well kempt, instead of being a barren land that was infested with wild plants and shrubs). [This was the second auspicious omen.]

Everyone could see the mongoose (“nakula” which crossed the path of the marriage procession, and could also be seen running here and there in the fields). [This was the third auspicious omen.] (3)

A pleasant breeze blew that had all the three great qualities that are expected in a breeze to make a man feel happy, delighted, relaxed and comfortable during his good days—i.e. it was soft, it was fragrant, and it was cool. [This was the fourth auspicious omen.]

Then there came a beautiful, virtuous woman with a pitcher full of water and a child in her arms. [This was the fifth auspicious omen.] (4)

लोवा फिरि फिरि दरसु देखावा । सुरभी सनमुख सिसुहि पिआवा ॥ ५ ॥
मृगमाला फिरि दाहिनि आई । मंगल गन जनु दीन्हि देखाई ॥ ६ ॥

lōvā phiri phiri darasu dēkhāvā. surabhī sanamukha sisuhi pi'āvā. 5.
mṛgamālā phiri dāhini ā'ī. maṅgala gana janu dīnhi dēkhā'ī. 6.

A fox (lōvā) could be seen stopping midway while it ran to repeatedly look backwards over its shoulders at the marriage procession. [This was the sixth auspicious omen.]

A milch cow (surabhī) could be seen in the front, feeding its calf. [This was the seventh auspicious omen.] (5)

A group of deer, walking in a queue one behind the other just like the flowers are arranged one on the top of the other in a garland (mṛgamālā), went round the procession in a clockwise manner, and came to its right flank from the left side as if auspicious omens could be seen in a physical form in the guise of the herd of deer<sup>1</sup>. [This was the eighth auspicious omen.] (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The deer went to the rear of the procession, came onto its left flank, ran ahead of the procession, and then crossed the road from the left side to the right-hand side. This was equivalent to the herd making a circumambulation of the procession, which is an auspicious sign.]

छेमकरी कह छेम बिसेषी । स्यामा बाम सुतरु पर देखी ॥ ७ ॥ सनमुख आयउ दधि अरु मीना । कर पुस्तक दुइ बिप्र प्रबीना ॥ ८ ॥ chēmakarī kaha chēma bisēṣī. syāmā bāma sutaru para dēkhī. 7.

sanamukha āya'u dadhi aru mīnā. kara pustaka du'i bipra prabīnā. 8.

The auspicious bird known as 'chēmakarī' (which is a kite with a white neck and a red-tinged body)<sup>1</sup> was making a call symbolising a declaration of auspiciousness and all sorts of well-being. [This was the ninth auspicious omen.]

The black bird (syāmā)<sup>2</sup> could be seen on a beautiful tree to the left-hand side of the procession, which again was an auspicious sighting. [This was the tenth auspicious omen.] (7)

Then came two men—one holding a pot containing curd, and the other held a fish in his hand (dadhi aru mīnā). [These were the eleventh and the twelfth auspicious omens respectively.]

And finally came two expert Brahmins holding books (scriptures) in their hands (kara pustaka du'i bipra). [This was the thirteenth auspicious omen.] (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The Kshemkari bird is considered auspicious because of the two colours on its body—white and red. It is believed to represent the holy river Ganges and goddess Gauri, the divine consort of Lord Shiva. Refer: Tulsidas' "Kavitawali Ramayan", Uttar Kand, verse no. 180.

<sup>2</sup>The black bird is heard to sing in a melodious voice in the early hours of dawn, before sun-rise.]

दो०. मंगलमय कल्याणमय अभिमत फल दातार ।

जनु सब साचे होन हित भए सगुन एक बार ॥ ३०३ ॥

dōhā.

maṅgalamaya kalyānamaya abhimata phala dātāra.
janu saba sēcē hōna hita bha'e saguna ēka bāra. 303.

All the omens that are harbingers of auspiciousness, welfare, well-beings and fulfilment of all desires decided to appear simultaneously so as to prove that their reputation and qualities are indeed true and trustworthy. (Doha no. 303)

[Note—In other words, these omens wished to tell the world that their reputation as being signs of good fortunes whenever they appear is true and trustworthy and not something based on imagination or superstition. They knew very well that since it is a marriage procession of Lord Ram, the incarnate Lord Vishnu, the best of good fortunes and the best of good tidings are taken for granted to happen irrespective of whether they appear or not. So they thought to themselves—'Why not make our presence felt on this happy occasion to prove ourselves true and effective, because auspiciousness and fortunate events will nevertheless occur whether or not we mark our presence felt there. If we miss this golden opportunity to prove our trustworthiness and truthfulness as harbingers of good fortunes and well-being, then we won't get another sure-shot chance to do so again and overcome those who are sceptical about our abilities and potentials as harbingers of good times. We are shown respect and welcome by the world because the people think that our presence would give them happiness and joy, so let us use this opportunity to reinforce the people's faith and trust in us and our abilities to provide them with cheer and auspiciousness.'

Therefore, all sorts of auspicious omens assumed a personified form as enumerated in the foregoing verses to prove themselves true, trustworthy and effective.]

चौ०. मंगल सगुन सुगम सब ताकें । सगुन ब्रह्म सुंदर सुत जाकें ॥ १ ॥

राम सरिस बरु दुलहिनि सीता । समधी दसरथु जनकु पुनीता ॥ २ ॥

सुनि अस ब्याहु सगुन सब नाचे । अब कीन्हे बिरंचि हम साँचे ॥ ३ ॥

caupāī.

maṅgala saguna sugama saba tākēṁ. saguna brahma sundara suta jākēṁ. 1.
rāma sarisa baru dulahini sītā. samadhī dasarathu janaku punītā. 2.
suni asa byāhu saguna saba nācē. aba kīnhē biran̄ci hama sām̄cē. 3.

It is expected that all sorts of auspiciousness and good omens would willingly appear for him (Dasrath) who is blessed and fortunate enough to beget the invisible, attributeless, subtle and all-pervading cosmic form of the Supreme Being known as 'Brahm' in a 'Sagun form' (i.e. a form of the Supreme Being that is visible, and has a gross physical form with attributes) as his son<sup>1</sup>. (1)

In the marriage that was going to be solemnised soon, the groom would be none other than Lord Ram, an incarnate Lord of the world, the bride would be Sita, who is no one else but goddess Laxmi, the divine consort of Lord Vishnu, the Lord of the world, herself in a physical form, and the two kings, Dasrath and Janak, would be the parents of the groom and the bride respectively. (2)

When the personified forms of the good omens (visualised as different semi-gods who had assumed various forms as narrated above in Chaupai line nos. 2-8 that precede Doha no. 303) heard of this rarest of rare combination (as narrated in verse no. 2 herein above), they were so exhilarated and happy at their good luck that they danced with joy and excitement, thinking that finally a golden and once-in-a-lifetime opportunity has been created for them by 'Biranchi', the Creator Brahma, which would establish without doubt their reputation as true and effective harbingers of good fortunes and auspiciousness of all kinds.

So they exclaimed delightedly, 'It is now that the Creator has for once proved us, the Good Omens collectively, true to our names as harbingers of good fortunes and auspiciousness of all kinds.'<sup>2</sup> (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This 'Sagun form of Brahm' that is born as a 'son of king Dasrath' is known as Lord Ram. As to the question why the supreme Lord decided to become Dasrath's son, the answer is elaborately narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 141—to Doha no. 152; and (ii) from Sortha/Doha no. 183—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 193.

Brahm is the cosmic Consciousness of creation as envisioned by the Upanishads, and is therefore the Absolute Truth of creation, the Reality of existence. Anything that is the ultimate 'truth' is pure and divine, and the glorious virtues of truth, purity and divinity are 'beautiful virtues'. Anything else is 'un-beautiful' or 'ugly and untrue'.

The adjective 'Sundar' means beautiful in simple terms. This beauty is measured at two levels—the physical level that is visible to the eye, and the subtle level that is not visible to the eye. Lord Ram's physical magnetic personality that enthralled the whole world and held its attention captive with its matchless charm is the grosser, the physical aspect of the beauty of the Lord. The divine qualities, sublime virtues, the principles of Dharma (probity, propriety, ethics, morality, righteousness and nobility) for which the Lord stood and held in high esteem by the world, virtues that are commonly known as the different noble 'Gunas' that the Lord possessed, were symbolic of the beauty of the Lord at a subtle level.

So in essence, the ‘beauty’ that is being referred to here when we talk of Lord Ram is not merely the physical charm of the Lord but also, and more importantly, the combined charm of his noble character, his noble thoughts, his noble qualities and his noble life and deeds that were meant to be an example for others to emulate.

<sup>2</sup>Since it was such a rare occurrence that marked a divine union of the cosmic Lord in the physical form of Lord Ram with his cosmic counterpart, the Shakti, in the form of Sita, in the presence of two exceptionally fortunate souls in the bodies of kings Dasrath and Janak, good tidings and good fortunes were bound to be there on that occasion. In this scenario when all happiness, all joy, all goodness and all auspiciousness were compulsorily obliged to be present whether or not the omens make their presence felt, the latter decided not to miss this opportunity and make it a point to appear in their full forms, with their full regalia and splendour—because they did not want to lose this rare and god-sent chance to convince the world that if they are present on any occasion then good tidings, auspiciousness, happiness and joy were bound to be there.

On the contrary, if any one of them missed this chance and failed to make their presence felt on the auspicious occasion of Lord Ram’s marriage then the world would be convinced that the earlier belief that it held about a particular omen standing for some specific good happening was merely a hearsay and a false presumption because in spite of the relevant omen’s absence during the marriage ceremony of Lord Ram, that specific good happening did occur nevertheless.

In other words, the world would be convinced that it was wrong to link the happening of something good to any particular omen; it was a merely a chance that both—the good happening and the omen—coincided with each other. The world would think that actually the omen has no special ability to bring good tidings or make good things happen. The result would be disastrous for that particular omen as it would become irrelevant for the people who would stop giving it its importance and value. No one would pay any regards to it in the future, and the omen would forfeit the right to be sought out and honoured by the people of the world in general.]

एहि बिधि कीन्ह बरात पयाना । हय गय गाजहिं हने निसाना ॥ ४ ॥

आवत जानि भानुकुल केतू । सरितन्हि जनक बँधाए सेतू ॥ ५ ॥

बीच बीच बर बास बनाए । सुरपुर सरिस संपदा छाए ॥ ६ ॥

ēhi bidhi kīnha barāta payānā. haya gaya gājahiṁ hanē nisānā. 4.

āvata jāni bhānukula kētū. saritanhi janaka baṁdhā'ē sētū. 5.

bīca bīca bara bāsa banā'ē. surapura sarisa sampadā chā'ē. 6.

On this wise, amidst celebrations and festivities galore, the marriage party of Lord Ram proceeded from Ayodhya in a grand, royal procession that was attended by a thunderous noise created by the neighing of horses and the trumpeting of elephants as soon as the kettle-drums began to beat at the time of departure.

[To wit, as soon as the signal was given to start, musical instruments began playing, and their sound provoked the horses and the elephants to neigh and trumpet wildly, creating a cacophony of sound that was deafening. But everyone enjoyed this noise as it was a happy occasion.]<sup>1</sup> (4)

Meanwhile, when Janak heard the news that the chief of the solar race, i.e. king Dasrath, has embarked on his journey for Janakpur, he (hastily) ordered that all the rivers be bridged to facilitate their crossing by the huge marriage procession<sup>2</sup>. (5)

At convenient places en-route, Janak had got inns and rest-houses constructed. These places were so well organised and furnished that they provided all possible comforts that vied with the ones found in the city of the gods.

[To wit, these way-side resting places were made so comfortable and pleasant that they resembled heaven on earth in every respect. All imaginable paraphernalia and accoutrements of physical comfort and pleasure were provided for in ample terms at these places.]<sup>3</sup> (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In Chaupai line no. 3 that preceded Doha no. 302 we have read that “the king set forth from his palace to the accompaniment of the blowing of conch shells”. The marriage party had assembled outside the city, on its outskirts. Hence, this verse refers to the moment when the procession finally started off on its onwards journey to Janakpur from the suburbs of Ayodhya where everyone had collected independently to join the party.

<sup>2</sup>There is an interesting observation to be made here. This verse says that “Janak got the bridges constructed as soon as he heard that the marriage party was on its way to Janakpur”. This means that the bridges were not there till then. The rivers used to form natural boundaries between kingdoms, and also served as a natural barrier to prevent invasion from enemies. Janak had waited till the last moment because he was not sure how Dasrath, a senior king to him in stature, would treat the invitation to come down to Janakpur. The reason for this doubt was that Janak had not sent Dasrath an invitation to attend the bow ceremony, and now that the latter was being invited to the same place after the ceremony was over may not go down well with Dasrath, and though his son was successful in this competition and had won the hands of the kingdom’s princess in marriage but still his father may decline to come.

Should this happen there would be no need to construct the bridges, and the status quo would be maintained. Everything was kept ready, and as soon as the good news arrived through spies that the marriage party has departed from Ayodhya—or probably much earlier when the invitation was well-received by Dasrath and he had ordered the preparations to be made, the bridges were constructed on a ‘war-footing’.

Remember: Janak was a great king in his own right, and all kings maintained an army complete with its various wings. The ‘engineering corps’ responsible to maintain the army’s hardware and to look after other mechanical aspects, and to help the marching army overcome obstacles was obviously an integral part of any army worth its name. A great army on a campaign has to rapidly cross rivers and other natural barriers, and that wing of the army responsible to take care of logistics and other mechanical support is adept at tackling such things. So it’s not surprising that Janak’s army got the bridges over the rivers built ahead of the marriage procession of Lord Ram that was headed to Janakpur.

<sup>3</sup>Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 306—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 307 that describes how Sita, the maverick goddess Laxmi that presides over all material comforts and worldly prosperity in this creation, the goddess that takes care of all material needs and well-being of the creatures in this creation, had employed her magical powers to create a world resembling utopia and heaven-on-earth as soon as the party arrived at Janakpur. No one could understand the reality of the situation that the never-ending chain of grand royal comforts that were made available to them for their pleasure and convenience were super-human in nature, and hence were not the ones created by ordinary human beings but by the presiding goddess who is in-charge of providing material comfort to the world, i.e. by goddess Laxmi herself.

This being the case, it is easy to understand how and why these rest-houses were well-provided for with all imaginable items of physical comfort and convenience to make the marriage party as happy and comfortable as possible. The result was that no one felt the weariness of the long journey from Ayodhya to Janakpur.]

असन सयन बर बसन सुहाए । पावहिं सब निज निज मन भाए ॥ ७ ॥
नित नूतन सुख लखि अनुकूले । सकल बरातिन्ह मंदिर भूले ॥ ८ ॥ asana sayana bara basana suhā'ē. pāvahim̐ saba nija nija mana bhā'ē. 7.

nita nūtana sukha lakhi anukūlē. sakala barātin̐ha mandira bhūlē. 8.

These resting places provided excellent food, beds and clothings to all the guests according to their individual likings. [When anyone wished to have something, it was immediately made available to him.] (7)

When the members of the marriage party saw newer comforts being made available to them on each passing day, when they found that new pleasures of their individual liking readily available any time of the day when they wished, and for all the days en-route, they felt so delighted and contented that all of them forgot about the comforts and pleasures of their respective homes. (8)

[Note—It was a long journey, and as is usual with travelers, they could have felt weary and home-sick after a few days on the road. The citizens of Ayodhya were accustomed to enjoy the best of material comforts of the world, and so would have easily felt the discomfort of being away from home. But the rest houses constructed by king Janak were so exceptionally well-provided for that none of the members of the marriage party had anything to complain about; rather, all of them felt as if they had come out fresh of their homes to enjoy a pleasurable outing, or were going on some picnic to enjoy themselves.]

दो०. आवत जानि बरात बर सुनि गहगहे निसान ।
सजि गज रथ पदचर तुरग लेन चले अगवान ॥ ३०४ ॥

dōhā.

āvata jāni barāta bara suni gahagahē nisāna. saji gaja ratha padacara turaga lēna calē agavāna. 304.

When it was heard in Janakpur that the grand marriage procession has arrived, the kettle-drums were sounded enthusiastically. Immediately thereafter, decorated elephants, chariots and foot soldiers as well as attendants and horses proceeded forward to welcome the incoming guests. (Doha no. 304)

[Note—Royal messengers and lookouts were appointed at strategic locations all along the route within the territory of the kingdom of Janakpur. So, as soon as the marriage procession was near the city, celebrations started. The arrival of the marriage party was announced by the beating of the kettle-drums, and the advance party that was prepared before hand to go and receive the guests while they were still on the outer fringes of the sprawling city, was dispatched forthwith.

This advance welcoming party consisted of decorated elephants, horses and chariots, as well as foot soldiers and attendants in wonderful royal finery, and carrying the kingdom's insignia and other symbols of royalty to accord a warm welcome, with full state honours, to the privileged guests.

Refer also to Tulsidas' book "Janki Mangal", verse no. 120—121.]

[PAUSE 10 FOR A THIRTY-DAY RECITATION]

चौ०. कनक कलस भरि कोपर थारा । भाजन ललित अनेक प्रकारा ॥ १ ॥

भरे सुधासम सब पकवाने । नाना भाँति न जाहिं बखाने ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

kanaka kalasa bhari kōpara thārā. bhājana lalita anēka prakārā. 1.

bharē sudhāsama saba pakavānē. nānā bhām̐ti na jāhiṁ bakhānē. 2.

[Verse nos. 1-6 have to be read together to understand their meaning. All these verses collectively describe the refreshments and gifts that king Janak, the father of Sita, had sent to the arriving marriage party as a formal gesture of warm welcome.]

When the marriage party arrived, king Janak sent many types of delectable refreshments, both in the form of drinks that were sweet and cool and tasted like Amrit (ambrosia), as well as in the form of tasty and aromatic food (snacks) that were very delicious and cooked in a variety of ways (fried, baked, roasted, smoked, barbecued, boiled, steamed etc.). These drinks and eatables were contained in beautiful golden jars and large and small plates and platters respectively. The variety and form of these dishes and refreshing drinks were so huge and varied that it is not possible to describe them. (1-2)

[Note—These gifts and refreshments were carried by the advance party sent by king Janak to receive and welcome the guests as narrated in Doha no. 304.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 328 and its following Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that describe the elaborate feast that was organised to feed the marriage party after the marriage ceremony was over.]

फल अनेक बर बस्तु सुहाई । हरषि भेंट हित भूप पठाई ॥ ३ ॥

भूषन बसन महामनि नाना । खग मृग हय गय बहुबिधि जाना ॥ ४ ॥

phala anēka bara bastu suhā'īm. haraṣi bhēṇṭa hita bhūpa paṭhā'īm. 3.
bhūṣana basana mahāmani nānā. khaga mṛga haya gaya bahubidhi jānā. 4.

The king cheerfully sent as gifts many types of fruits (that were fresh and seasonal, as well as dry and had been canned for storage), as well as many other charming things (such as nuts, edible roots, leaves etc., both of the local variety as well as those that were exotic in nature). (3)

Many types of ceremonial robes and other wearing apparels and raiments suitable for the occasion, precious gems and stones, tamed animals such as birds, deer, horses and elephants etc. were also sent by the king as welcome-gifts for the marriage party. (4)

मंगल सगुन सुगंध सुहाए । बहुत भाँति महिपाल पठाए ॥ ५ ॥
दधि चिउरा उपहार अपारा । भरि भरि काँवरि चले कहारा ॥ ६ ॥ maṅgala saguna sugandha suhā'ē. bahuta bhāmṭi mahipāla paṭhā'ē. 5.

dadhi ci'urā upahāra apārā. bhari bhari kāmṣvari calē kahārā. 6.

Besides the above items, the great king (“mahipāla”) sent various items that stood for good omens, such as different types of scents and perfumes that are usually used during all auspicious events<sup>1</sup>. (5)

Other such items that stood for good omen which were sent by the king as gifts for the marriage party included curd and dried rice grains. All these gifts were carried by porters in palanquins and other vehicles. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Some of these items were sandalwood, musk, camphor, saffron, incense, aromatic plants and their roots and extracts etc.]

अगवान्ह जब दीखि बराता । उर आनंदु पुलक भर गाता ॥ ७ ॥
देखि बनाव सहित अगवाना । मुदित बरातिन्ह हने निसाना ॥ ८ ॥ agavānanha jaba dīkhi barātā. ura ānandu pulaka bhara gātā. 7.

dēkhi banāva sahita agavānā. mudita barātinha hanē nisānā. 8.

When the members of the advance party deputed by king Janak to formally receive and welcome the arriving bridegroom's party saw the guests, all of them were filled with thrill and their hearts were overjoyed with delight. (7)

Similarly, when the bridegroom's party saw the deputation of hosts, who had arrived to meet and welcome them on behalf of the king of Janakpur, decked up in their best of finery and ceremonial regalia befitting the occasion, all of them were exhilarated and delighted beyond measure even as they started playing their kettle-drums enthusiastically in a loud cacophony of sound to signify their joy and happiness. (8)

[Note—The members of two great kingdoms have met each other for the first time, and there was a lot of bonhomie and celebration.

Another point to note is that the marriage procession of the bridegroom was already very huge, consisting of a large and varied numbers of animals and servants. To this huge number was added the gifts that Janak has sent now, and would be further increased manifold later on at the time of its departure back to Ayodhya when Janak would send more gifts in the form of servants, animals and costly gifts. Refer respectively to the following verses of Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 298—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 300; (ii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 305; and (iii) from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 333—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 334.

To wit, the length and breadth and the strength of the members of the marriage party increased manifold when it returned to its home city of Ayodhya. If it had stretched for miles at the time of departure from Ayodhya for Janakpur, it probably stretched from horizon to horizon on its return!]

दो०. हरषि परसपर मिलन हित कछुक चले बगमेल ।

जनु आनंद समुद्र दुइ मिलत बिहाइ सुबेल ॥ ३०५ ॥

dōhā.

haraṣi parasapara milana hita kachuka calē bagamēla.

janu ānanda samudra du'i milata bihā'i subēla. 305.

There was so much warmth and affection between of the two sides (i.e. the arriving party from Ayodhya representing the bridegroom's side, and the deputation sent by king Janak to receive and welcome the guests, representing the bride's side) that as soon as they were within sight of each other, some of the members from each side dashed forward enthusiastically to go and embrace their counterparts from the opposite side. The scene reminded one of two huge oceans meeting each other at a single place. (Doha no. 305)

[Note—There would be a thunderous roar when waters of two great oceans clash with each other, sending huge waves leaping up to touch the sky, and splurging and spraying of water for miles around. In other words, a thunderous roar of mutual congratulations and honour, of loud cheers of joy and happiness, a burst of ecstasy and exhilaration erupted when the two sides rushed to meet each other enthusiastically. It was a moment of celebration, but it could be compared to the uproarious cacophony created when two armies clashed with each other in battle, though this 'clash' was not to kill each other but to shower love, affection and thanksgiving as well as to congratulate and honour each other.

The two sides were so eager to meet each other that they forgot all formalities and decorum of royalty, but rushed to hug and embrace each other as if two fast friends have met each other after a long time.]

चौ०. बरषि सुमन सुर सुंदरि गावहिं । मुदित देव दुंदुभीं बजावहिं ॥ १ ॥

बस्तु सकल राखीं नृप आगें । बिनय कीन्हि तिन्ह अति अनुरागें ॥ २ ॥
 प्रेम समेत रायें सबु लीन्ह । भै बकसीस जाचकन्हि दीन्ह ॥ ३ ॥

caupāī.

baraṣi sumana sura sundari gāvahiṁ. mudita dēva dundubhīṁ bajāvahiṁ. 1.
 bastu sakala rākhīṁ nṛpa āgēm. binaya kīnhi tinha ati anurāgēm. 2.
 prēma samēta rāyam̐ sabu līnhā. bhai bakasīsa jācakanhi dīnhā. 3.

The celestial beauties and damsels (i.e. different goddesses and consorts of gods as well as the heavenly nymphs; “sura sundari”) showered flowers (from the heaven) and sang melodious songs to celebrate the occasion, while the gods themselves enthusiastically played the kettle-drums<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Members of the advance reception party (deputed by king Janak to welcome king Dasrath and others in the marriage party) very politely placed all the gifts they had brought with them before the king (Dasrath), and prayed to him warmly to accept them gladly. (2)

The king in turn received the members of the deputation affectionately with great warmth, and accepted all the gifts cheerfully. The king then distributed these gifts to all alms-seekers and others as a gesture of generosity and magnanimity<sup>2</sup>. (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 309 below.

The sequence of narration clearly indicates that the gods beat their drums to synchronise their beats with the rhythm and melody of songs sung by the goddesses and numpths.

Another interesting observation can be made here: when the marriage party had began its journey from Ayodhya, both the gods as well as the goddesses had joined hands to sing auspicious songs and play the clarionet (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 302), but here in this present verse it is said that only the goddesses have sung songs while the gods have sounded the kettle-drums. It clearly means that on the earlier occasion, i.e. at Ayodhya at the time of departure of the party, the gods were in the heaven to join their counterparts, the goddesses, but then they joined the marriage party in person and accompanied it to Janakpur. So now at present they are on earth along with the rest of the members of the marriage party. Hence, the goddesses shower flowers from the heaven and sing songs in the sky while the gods vigorously beat the musical drums below on earth.

<sup>2</sup>It was a standard practice for great kings and noble men to give liberally to others whenever the occasion arose. Such liberal attitude was deeply engrained in the society in general also so much so that even a man of humble resources gave back to others things that he possessed whenever the occasion arrived. This gesture of giving liberally and sharing everything with others was more striking during happy occasions and ceremonial events. It will be clear when we see how the citizens had shared all gifts they received when we read about the celebrations in Ayodhya at the time of Lord Ram’s birth (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 194), then once again when there were wide-spread celebrations at

Janakput when Lord Ram had broken the bow (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 262; and Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 265) which are specific instances of this magnanimous attitude.]

करि पूजा मान्यता बड़ाई । जनवासे कहूँ चले लवाई ॥ ४ ॥
 बसन बिचित्र पाँवड़े परहीं । देखि धनदु धन मदु परिहरहीं ॥ ५ ॥ अति सुंदर दीन्हेउ जनवासा । जहँ सब कहूँ सब भाँति सुपासा ॥ ६ ॥ kari pūjā mān'yatā barā'ī. janavāsē kahum' calē lavā'ī. 4.

 basana bicitra pām'varē parahīm. dēkhi dhanadu dhana madu pariharahīm. 5.
 ati sundara dīnhē'u janavāsā. jaham'saba kahum'saba bhām'ti supāsā. 6.

After showing their reverence and paying due respect, obeisance and homage to the king (Dasrath)<sup>1</sup>, the members of the deputation then escorted the marriage party to the 'Janwasa', a place that was especially earmarked for lodging and boarding the members of the bridegroom's party. (4)

Warm reception awaited the party at the lodging place where ceremonial mats made of marvelous materials were laid out for them. Even the god of wealth, known as Kuber who is regarded as the custodian of the wealth of heaven, felt shy and humbled when he saw the opulence, the pomp and the grandeur of the welcome that was extended to the marriage party of the groom<sup>2</sup>. (5)

The members of the deputation gave the members of the bridegroom's party lodging places that were well equipped, pleasant, beautiful and glamorous in all possible ways, where all means of physical comfort and pleasure and joy were provided in abundance. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The bridegroom's close relatives are always shown great respect by members of the bride's family in traditional Indian households. So, king Dasrath and other members of the marriage party were literally worshipped ('Pooja') by members of the advance reception party deputed to welcome them.

<sup>2</sup>Kuber is proud of the fact that he presides over the wealth of heaven, the richest treasury of creation. But when he saw the opulence of Janak he felt shy of his wealth. He had also felt shy when he observed the wealth of Ayodhya, the kingdom of king Dasrath and Lord Ram—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 324. ]

जानी सियँ बरात पुर आई । कछु निज महिमा प्रगटि जनाई ॥ ७ ॥
 हृदयँ सुमिरि सब सिद्धि बोलाई । भूप पहुनई करन पठाई ॥ ८ ॥ jānī siyam' barāta pura ā'ī. kachu nija mahimā pragaṭi janā'ī. 7.

 hrdayam'sumiri saba sid'dhi bōlā'īm. bhūpa pahuna'ī karana paṭhā'īm. 8.

When Sita heard the news that the marriage party has arrived in Janakpur, she wished to exhibit some of her mystical powers<sup>1</sup>. (7)

In order to do so, she remembered all the Siddhis (personified forms of mystical powers that can produce miracles which defy explanation and worldly logic) in her heart and invited (invoked; summoned) all of them. Then she asked them to go and serve the king (Dasrath). (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Ordinary people had not known that Sita was a divine Shakti (dynamic energy of creation that is an inseparable part of the cosmic Creator) in a personified form as a lady. Lord Ram's stupendous powers and his out-of-the-world abilities had come to be well-known by many of the recent developments such as liberation of Ahilya, killing of demons Subahu and his army while the Lord protected sage Vishwamitra's fire sacrifice, and the breaking of Lord Shiva's bow which had steadfastly defied the combined strength of all the human kings and emperors of the world. To break this bow was a super-human feat in its own right.

But till now there was not a single event in the public domain that would establish the mystical powers of Sita, that she was not an ordinary human princess but a divine Shakti that was about to be united with the cosmic Lord of creation in the form of Sri Ram. So, Sita wished to utilise this occasion to show-case her mystical powers.

She also wished to indicate to Lord Ram by this subtle hint that she indeed is the right choice for him.

It ought to be noted here that in ancient times even great sages had this power to invoke the Siddhis whenever they needed them. This is evident when sage Bharadwaj had invoked the same Siddhis to serve Bharat and the huge army that accompanied him when he was going to the forest to try and bring Lord Ram back to Ayodhya from his forest exile—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 213—to Doha no. 215.]

दो०. सिद्धि सब सिय आयसु अकनि गई जहाँ जनवास ।

लिऐँ संपदा सकल सुख सुरपुर भोग बिलास ॥ ३०६ ॥

dōhā.

sidhi saba siya āyasu akani ga'īm jahām' janavāsa.
li'ēm' sampadā sakala sukha surapura bhōga bilāsa. 306.

All the different Siddhis, who came at the call of Sita, accepted her orders (to serve the marriage party of Lord Ram) and went to the place where the bridegroom's party had been lodged. They carried with them all imaginable types of ingredients needed for providing the party with physical as well as material comforts and pleasures that compared favourably with those available to the gods in heaven. (Doha no. 306)

[Note—We have read above in Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes this Doha no. 306 that the place where the marriage party of the groom was lodged was well-provided with all the amenities one can expect in this world to meet one's physical comforts and needs. But provision of these comforts was limited to the extent of human capabilities.

When Sita asked the various Siddhis to take care of the party, the amenities these Siddhis provided were of a heavenly dimension, i.e. they far exceeded what humans could arrange for because the Siddhis refer to super-natural mystical powers possessed by the gods.

Thus we see the difference between the facilities that were available to the members of the marriage party upon arrival at their respective places of lodging, and the sudden upgrading of these facilities to a much higher scale upon intervention of Sita.

The type of comforts and pleasures that were provided by these Siddhis has been described in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-8 that precedes Doha no. 215.]

चौ०. निज निज बास बिलोकि बराती । सुर सुख सकल सुलभ सब भाँती ॥ १ ॥
 बिभव भेद कछु कोउ न जाना । सकल जनक कर करहिं बखाना ॥ २ ॥
 सिय महिमा रघुनायक जानी । हरषे हृदयँ हेतु पहिचानी ॥ ३ ॥

caupāī.

nija nija bāsa bilōki barātī. sura sukha sakala sulabha saba bhāmṭī. 1.
 bibhava bhēda kachu kō'u na jānā. sakala janaka kara karahim bakhānā. 2.
 siya mahimā raghunāyaka jānī. haraṣe hṛdayam̐ hētu pahicānī. 3.

Each member of the marriage party found in his own apartment all the amenities and accoutrements of immense comfort and pleasure that one would find in heaven. All the paraphernalia of heavenly comfort that are available to the gods were made available to all the members of the bridegroom's party. (1)

No one, however, could guess the source of such out-of-the-world facilities; no one had an inkling of the mystery surrounding the availability of such heavenly enjoyments. [No one could know who was behind this arrangement.] So, everyone praised king Janak for his gracious nature and richness of the royal treasury. (2)

However, it was only Raghunayak (Lord Ram, the chief of the Raghu dynasty) who could understand that this miracle was Sita's creation, and this realization about Sita's influences and mystical abilities made the Lord very happy in his heart. (3)

[Note—Every person in the groom's party thought that the heavenly facilities provided to them were arranged by king Janak, the bride's father. No one could even imagine that the real force that worked up this miracle was Sita.

When Lord Ram heard of the exceptionally wonderful arrangements made for the comfort of his marriage party, he immediately recognized that it was the miraculous affect of Sita's mystical powers. Sita was a personified form of 'Shakti', the dynamic power of creation that is so astonishingly powerful that it can do anything it wishes. The Lord felt glad because it showed to him that the princess whom he was about to marry was indeed goddess Laxmi, Lord Vishnu's cosmic consort, in a personified form. It must be noted here in this context that Lord Ram himself was Lord Vishnu in the form of a human being.

The remarkable point to note here is this: Lord Ram has not yet visited the place where the party was lodged, because the Lord was staying at the place where sage Vishwamitra was staying, but still he could know about the sort of heavenly comforts that were provided for the marriage party. In other words, like Sita, Lord Ram too possessed mystical powers that transcended human abilities; the Lord could know about things and developments that were not immediately visible or apparent. Since Lord Ram was a manifestation of the Supreme Being, he had mystical powers that made him all-knowing and omnipresent; nothing was hidden or secret from him.

Lord Ram felt 'happy in his heart when he came to realize Sita's mystical powers' because they would come in handy for the Lord to fulfill his mission on earth—which was to eliminate the evil and cruel demon race. According to the master plan drawn by the Lord to eliminate the demons, Sita was to be abducted by Ravana, the demon king of Lanka, and held captive. Sita would need exceptional powers to survive the ordeal and overcome the threats posed by the demons. An ordinary woman would not have been in a position to stand against these ferocious demons. So when Lord Ram observed the mystical powers of Sita he felt reassured that he would be able to successfully complete his mission on earth and safely return to the heaven with Sita in her primary form as goddess Laxmi.]

पितु आगमनु सुनत दोउ भाई । हृदयँ न अति आनंदु अमाई ॥ ४ ॥

सकुचन्ह कहि न सकत गुरु पाहीं । पितु दरसन लालचु मन माहीं ॥ ५ ॥ pitu āgamanu sunata dō'u bhā'ī. hṛdayam' na ati ānandu amā'ī. 4.

sakucanha kahi na sakata guru pāhīm. pitu darasana lālacu mana māhīm. 5.

When the two brothers (Lord Ram and Laxman) heard about the arrival of their father (king Dasrath of Ayodhya), joy and delight overflowed in their hearts. (4)

They had a great desire to meet their father, but were hesitant to broach the subject with their Guru (sage Vishwamitra, with whom they were staying at the moment). (5)

[Note—It was the requirement of discipline and good manners that one does not disturb the Guru with petty desires. While in the company of a Guru, the disciple is expected to observe modesty in behaviour, self-restraint and discipline, not allowing oneself to be restless about worldly attractions and interactions. The arrival of king Dasrath was news that would surely be known to sage Vishwamitra in a short while, and then as surely enough the sage would go to meet him. The two brothers would naturally get an opportunity to meet their father then, so what was the hurry?

The two brothers had been away from their father for quite some time now. Dasrath was a doting father who loved his sons more dearly than his own life (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-5 and 10 that precede Doha no. 208). So it was natural that a great bond of affection, love and affinity existed between the two brothers and their father.

There are other instances as well where Lord Ram and Laxman had refrained from making bold requests to the sage to show respect to him and honour his dignity. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 218 where Lord Ram had been extremely hesitant to request sage Vishwamitra to give him permission so that he and Laxman can go and visit the city of Janakpur for sight-seeing; and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 225 which say that the two brothers felt afraid that the sage would get annoyed because they were late in returning to him after visiting Janakpur. These instances showed that the two brothers had the greatest respect for sage Vishwamitra and maintained the highest standards of discipline and modesty when dealing with the revered sage. They never behaved like spoilt princes of a mighty kingdom who become haughty and arrogant and do not give a dime to show respect to others.]

बिस्वामित्र बिनय बड़ि देखी । उपजा उर संतोषु बिसेषी ॥ ६ ॥
हरषि बंधु दोउ हृदयँ लगाए । पुलक अंग अंबक जल छाए ॥ ७ ॥
चले जहाँ दसरथु जनवासे । मनहुँ सरोबर तकेउ पिआसे ॥ ८ ॥ bisvāmitra binaya baḍi dēkhī. upajā ura santōṣu bisēṣī. 6.

haraṣi bandhu dō'u hr̥dayam̐ lagā'ē. pulaka aṅga ambaka jala chā'ē. 7 calē jahām̐ dasarathu janavāsē. manahum̐ sarōbara takē'u pi'āsē. 8.

The wise sage Vishwamitra was exceptionally happy and satisfied when he noted the exemplary level of modesty and politeness that the brothers exhibited<sup>1</sup>. (6)

The sage was so glad that he embraced the brothers most affectionately in a bear-hug, his body thrilled and tears welled-up in his eyes<sup>2</sup>. (7)

Thereafter, the sage, accompanied by the two brothers, set off towards the place where king Dasrath had been lodged to meet him with the eagerness of a thirsty man who rushes towards a pond to drink water to quench his thirst<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The sage expected such behaviour from them. Being in the company of a great sage of the stature of Vishwamitra who was renowned for his self-discipline and modesty would be deemed fruitful if the person acquires some of the sage's virtues in the same way as something that is in touch with sandalwood would acquire some of the fragrance of the latter. If a disciple does not learn from his learned teacher, the Guru, then he is not eligible to be called a true disciple. So the sage felt happy that the two brothers were acting in a matured way, have learnt discipline, modesty and self-control, as well as the principles of good behaviour and politeness.

<sup>2</sup>At the time when Dasrath had sent Lord Ram and Laxman with Vishwamitra he had told the sage that from then onwards the latter would be deemed to be their father—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 10 that precede Doha no. 208. Later on we read that the learned sage had taught the two brothers the science and art of use of mystical weapons and warfare. So in this sense the sage became their Guru—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 209 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 7-8.

Therefore, for all practical purposes sage Vishwamitra was their father as well as their Guru; he combined the two roles in his self.

As far as fatherly affection was concerned, the sage had never let them feel that they were away from their natural father, king Dasrath. In fact, sage Vishwamitra's love and affection at least equalled if not surpassed that shown by their natural father. Tulsidas has liberally praised the sage's love for the two brothers in his another classic story of Lord Ram known as "Geetawali"—refer: Geetawali, Baal

Kand (i) verse no. 52, stanza no. 5; verse no. 55, stanza no. 7; and verse no. 56, stanza no. 6.

<sup>3</sup>The analogy of the thirsty man rushing towards the pond to drink water is used here to indicate that the sage and the two brothers walked very briskly and eagerly towards the place where king Dasrath had been put up. The sage was eager to meet Dasrath and thank him for lending his two dearest sons, Lord Ram and Laxman, who had helped the sage overcome the fear of demons as well as give liberation to Ahilya, the cursed wife of sage Gautam who had now become obliged to Vishwamitra for enabling this to happen. The sage wished to convey to the king his immense sense of gratitude and thankfulness that the latter had allowed his two dear sons to accompany the sage and fulfil his wishes, to subtly tell the king that he had taken great care of his two beloved sons, and that it is time now that he wanted to hand over the two brothers back to him, with a lot of thanks and gratitude.

The two brothers obviously were eager to meet their father after such a long time. Their journey with sage Vishwamitra to the forest was the first occasion in their lives when the two brothers had been away from the fond care of their beloved and doting father for such long, and nostalgia and filial emotions therefore overtook them.]

दो०. भूप बिलोके जबहिं मुनि आवत सुतन्ह समेत । उठे हरषि सुखसिंधु महँ चले थाह सी लेत ॥ ३०७ ॥

dōhā.

bhūpa bilōkē jabahim muni āvata sutanha samēta.
uṭhē haraṣi sukhasindhu mahum'calē thāha sī lēta. 307.

As soon as the king (Dasrath) saw the sage (Vishwamitra) coming to him along with the king's two sons (Lord Ram and Laxman), he immediately got up to welcome them, and walked towards them so eagerly that his steps seemed to fall unsteadily on the ground like a man who tries to walk into an ocean of bliss and happiness. (Doha no. 307)

[Note—When a man walks right into an ocean, he totters and stumbles each step of the way forward, barely able to keep his balance and hold his foot firmly on the water-soaked soft ground below. Likewise, when king Dasrath saw the sage and his two beloved sons coming to meet him, he rushed forward to receive them. So excited and overwhelmed with emotions was he that he stumbled and virtually fell over more than once in his hurry to meet them personally.

The sight of the sage and the two princes coming to meet him was like the cool, refreshing and invigorating wave arising from an ocean of love and affection that rapidly moved towards the king and swept him off his feet. This wave reached the king much before the sage and the two brothers could, so as the king rushed forward to take a plunge in the blissfully soothing water of this ocean, he lost his mental and physical balance in his eagerness, and tottered and stumbled many a times.]

चौ०. मुनिहि दंडवत कीन्ह महीसा । बार बार पद रज धरि सीसा ॥ १ ॥

कौसिक राउ लिए उर लाई । कहि असीस पूछी कुसलाई ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

munihi daṇḍavata kīnha mahīsā. bāra bāra pada raja dhari sīsā. 1.
kausika rā'u li'ē ura lāī. kahi asīsa pūchī kusalāī. 2.

The king prostrated before the sage, repeatedly placing his head on the dust of the blessed sage's feet (as a sign of showing great respect and reverence). (1)

Kausik (sage Vishwamitra) immediately lifted the king and embraced him most affectionately. He blessed the king and asked about his welfare. (2)

[Note—The meeting of sage Vishwamitra with king Dasrath here is in sharp contrast with their first meeting in Ayodhya when the sage had gone to ask him to lend Lord Ram and Laxman to him so that his fire sacrifice could be protected against the demons' wrath. Here the two have met enthusiastically and with exemplary warmth, whereas on the earlier occasion both these emotions were absent. The gestures of respect shown by Dasrath and blessings by Vishwamitra during their first meeting at Ayodhya were more in the nature of formalities rather than spontaneous show of affection and warmth for each other.

What is the reason for this? Well, when the two met for the first time, king Dasrath became apprehensive of the sage's intentions because the sage was not a frequent visitor to his kingdom and court. So the king became suspicious about the reason of his visit. The king had observed that the sage's face was grim, he had a serious air about him, and his countenance as well as demeanours were grave, indicating that things were not rosy and cosy. The sage, on the other hand, was apprehensive whether the king would meet his demands and send Lord Ram and Laxman with him to the forest.

Therefore, the general atmosphere at the time of their first meeting was very somber and formal. But the situation had undergone a drastic change by now. Lord Ram and Laxman had attained matchless fame under the patronage of the sage: they had vanquished the unconquerable demons while protecting the fire sacrifice of the sage, Lord Ram had then liberated Ahilya, and later on broken the formidable bow which had put to shame all the mightiest kings of that time. Besides this, the two brothers had acquired expertise in the art and science of weaponry and warfare as a blessing of the sage. None of these achievements would have been made possible if the sage hadn't taken them with him to the forest.

In other words, both the king and the sage felt greatly obliged and very thankful towards each other. This created an environment conducive for bubbly warmth, cordiality and bonhomie between the two.]

पुनि दंडवत करत दोउ भाई । देखि नृपति उर सुखु न समाई ॥ ३ ॥

सुत हियँ लाइ दुसह दुख मेटे । मृतक सरीर प्राण जनु भेंटें ॥ ४ ॥ puni daṇḍavata karata dō'u bhāī. dēkhi nrpati ura sukhu na samāī. 3.

suta hiyaṁ lā'i dusaha dukha mēṭē. mṛtaka sarīra prāna janu bhēṭē. 4.

Then (i.e. after Dasrath and Vishwamitra had met each other and exchanged pleasantries) when the king saw that the two brothers (Lord Ram and Laxman) had prostrated before him, he felt overwhelmed with delight and happiness so much so that his joy could not be contained in his heart, it virtually spilled over. (3)

He immediately lifted his sons and embraced them to get rid of all the worries and grief from which he had been suffering all the while due to their absence. The king felt invigorated and energized as if a dead body had met life ('Pran') once again.

[To wit, just as a dead body becomes active and energized if new life is injected in it, the king felt rejuvenated and exceptionally cheerful upon meeting his two dear sons, Lord Ram and Laxman after a long gap of many days while they were away with sage Vishwamitra.] (4)

[Note—The king had always treated Lord Ram and Laxman as part of his 'Pran', a word meaning 'vital winds representing forces of life that keep the body of a creature alive'. This is clear when he said it expressly while handing them over to sage Vishwamitra in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 10 that precedes Doha no. 208.

Hence, for all practical purposes, Dasrath had sent his 'Pran' with sage Vishwamitra, and had since then lived virtually like a man who has no energy and dynamism left in him, who is just managing to survive on external life-support system in the hope that one day his lost energy and dynamism would come back to him.

Thus, when the king met Lord Ram and Laxman once again it seemed that a dead body has been revived. The king's face beamed and glowed with joy; he breathed freely and his entire being seemed to be bubbling with new-found energy of life.]

पुनि बसिष्ठ पद सिर तिन्ह नाए । प्रेम मुदित मुनिबर उर लाए ॥ ५ ॥
बिप्र बृंद बंदे दुहुँ भाई । मनभावती असीसें पाई ॥ ६ ॥

puni basiṣṭha pada sira tinha nā'ē. prēma mudita munibara ura lā'ē. 5.
bipra bṛnda bandē duhum' bhā'īm. manabhāvatī asīsēm pā'īm. 6.

[After meeting their father—] The two brothers bowed at the holy feet of sage Vasistha (the royal priest and the Guru of the family). The sage was overwhelmed with love and affection for them, and he lifted them and clasped them to his bosom. (5)

Then the two brothers paid their respects to all the others Brahmins and seniors present there, and in return they received liberal blessings from them that were in accordance to their wishes and liking.

[To wit, each individual Brahmin blessed the two brothers independently, and all of them blessed that whatever the two brothers desired in their hearts would be fulfilled.] (6)

[Note—The blessings of the elderly Brahmins were open-ended in the sense that that they blessed Lord Ram and Laxman that whatever they wished would be made available to them.

Earlier, such open-ended blessing was given to them by sage Vishwamitra in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 237 at the time when the brothers had come back after visiting the royal garden and meeting Sita there.]

भरत सहानुज कीन्ह प्रनामा । लिए उठाइ लाइ उर रामा ॥ ७ ॥
हरषे लखन देखि दोउ भ्राता । मिले प्रेम परिपूरित गाता ॥ ८ ॥ bharata sahānuja kīnha pranāmā. li'ē uṭhā'i lā'i ura rāmā. 7.

haraṣē lakhana dēkhi dō'u bhrātā. milē prēma paripūrita gātā. 8.

Then Bharat, along with his younger brother (Shatrughan) bowed before Lord Ram who picked them up affectionately and clasped them to his heart. (7)

Laxman too felt exhilarated when he saw his two brothers (Bharat and Shatrughan), and they met each other enthusiastically. (8)

[Note—It ought to be noted here that when Bharat and Shatrughan were meeting Lord Ram, Laxman was watching, and he felt very happy. He was ready to meet Bharat and Shatrughan, so as soon as the two turned towards Laxman to pay their respects to him by bowing before him, Laxman immediately responded by holding them mid-way, and pulled them towards himself to hug them tightly.]

दो०. पुरजन परिजन जातिजन जाचक मंत्री मीत ।
मिले जथाबिधि सबहि प्रभु परम कृपाल बिनीत ॥ ३०८ ॥
dōhā.

purajana parijana jātijana jācaka mantrī mīta.
milē jathābidhi sabahi prabhu parama kṛpāla binīta. 308.

After that, the most gracious and merciful Lord (Sri Ram) affectionately met everyone else present on the occasion, such as the the citizens of Ayodhya, the attendants and other members of the royal entourage, kinsmen, family relations, alms-seekers, ministers and friends in a way that suited the stature and position of each individual. (Doha no. 308)

[Note—The Lord met everyone affectionately, but while doing so he maintained his dignity and traditional decorum of the society. For example, when he met Brahmins, his Guru and his father, he touched their feet or bowed before them to pay respect; when he met his brothers he embraced them; when he met his friends and companions he exchanged pleasant notes with them and asked what they had been doing these past days; when he met his family members he asked how they were and what the news was back at home; when he met his ministers he wished them good and exchanged some information about the affairs of the kingdom; when he met his attendants and other junior members of the royal household he asked them how they were all and if everything was fine with them; and so on and so forth.

Virtually the same thing has happened much later on in the story when Lord Ram returned to Ayodhya after his 14-year forest exile. At that time also the Lord had met everyone according to his stature in the society. Refer— Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 5—to Doha no. 6.]

चौ०. रामहि देखि बरात जुड़ानी । प्रीति कि रीति न जाति बखानी ॥ १ ॥

नृप समीप सोहहिं सुत चारी । जनु धन धरमादिक तनुधारी ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

rāmahi dēkhi barāta juṛānī. prīti ki rīti na jāti bakhānī. 1.

nr̥pa samīpa sōhahīṁ suta cārī. janu dhana dharamādika tanudhārī. 2.

All the members of bridegroom's party felt contented and delighted when they saw Lord Ram (once again after so many days). The ways of love and affection are so unique that it is not possible to define them or assign any criterion to them<sup>1</sup>. (1)

The four brothers (Lord Ram and his three younger brothers Laxman, Bharat and Shatrughan) looked so marvelous near (or in the company of) the king (Dasrath) that they resembled personified forms of the four fruits (rewards) that one gets by leading a life of of righteousness, auspiciousness, probity and propriety. These four legendary fruits are 'Artha' (material and financial well-being), 'Dharma' (acclaim that comes with being able to lead an auspicious and righteous life), 'Kaam' (fulfillment of all desires), and 'Moksha' (liberation and deliverance from all sufferings associated with this world and one's body)<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Every citizen of Ayodhya had a personal equation with the Lord—some treated him as their friend, some as their prince, some as their son, some as their brother, some as a personified form of the Supreme Being, and so on. The Lord has magical powers in the sense that he can assume as many forms as he wishes, and therefore he appeared differently to different persons to please each single individual according to his liking or in the way he or she bonded with the Lord. In other words, those who treated the Lord as their friend saw him as a dear friend; those who regarded him as their prince saw him as such; those who had loved him as their son found their beloved son standing in front; those who regarded Lord Ram as their brother saw him as their sibling whom they were meeting after so many days of separation, and still others who visualised Lord Ram as an incarnation of the Supreme Being could see their revered deity revealed in the image of the Lord, and so on and so forth.

Irrespective of the way the individual citizens perceived the image of the Lord, irrespective of their age and social standing, and irrespective of their personal interaction with the Lord during his days at Ayodhya, love, affection and devotion was the common denominator in their relationship with him. So, the Lord fulfilled the wishes of all the citizens by appearing to them in the form they had known him and loved him. We see the same thing happening later on in the story when the Lord had come back to Ayodhya after the conquest of Lanka, when he had met all the eager citizens individually by assuming countless forms that were in accordance with the way each individual perceived and loved his or her Lord. Refer—Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede Doha no. 6.

All of them had longed to see their beloved Lord after so many days ever since he had gone away with sage Vishwamitra to protect his fire sacrifice. They were all worried and anxious about his well-being and safety because a forest is not a hospitable place for a prince to live in comfort in the first place, and then there was the special problem arising out of the presence of cruel demons.

Again, the notion that each individual had his or her personal view or perception of who Lord Ram was is endorsed in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 241—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 242.

The citizens were ‘delighted’ because they were seeing their beloved Lord after so many long days, and they were ‘contented’ because he was hale and hearty, unharmed, and as fine as they had last seen him at the time of his departure with sage Vishwamitra.

When the news of Lord Ram marrying Sita had reached Ayodhya through the messengers sent by king Janak, the entire city had erupted in joy and each citizen had been delighted to hear this good news—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 296.

All the people were highly excited, and as the marriage party assembled outside Ayodhya for departure for Jankapur, all the citizens wondered how soon would they see their beloved Lord once again—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 300. So naturally when the final moment arrived when their dream of seeing and meeting their Lord became a reality, their happiness and joy knew no bounds.]

Another reason for the citizens becoming so exceptionally happy to see Lord Ram after so many days is that while the Lord was in Ayodhya they would see him and interact with him almost on a daily basis, and over time they had developed a personal bond of affection and love for the Lord because of his friendly, welcoming, amiable and affable nature. So when they could not see, meet and interact with the Lord over so many days after he had gone to the forest with sage Vishwamitra, they began to miss him very intensely. Therefore, when the opportunity came to see him personally once again and exchange greetings and pleasantries and notes, the bonhomie is expected to be spontaneous and marked.

<sup>2</sup>Here, the reference is to king Dasrath who has been rewarded with these four fruits for all the meritorious deeds he had done in his lifetime. The king was very blessed to have the four brothers as his son.

Remember: Lord Ram was not an ordinary ‘human son’ of a king; he was a personified form of Lord Vishnu, the supreme Lord of creation. Dasrath had done severe Tapa (penance) and had requested the Lord to become his son because he wished to express his love, affection and devotion for the Lord more closely than anyone else could, and it is only possible if the Lord could live in close proximity with the king and be at his beck and call like a son. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Doha no. 148—to Doha no. 149.

Now, let us see what the four brothers stood for—(i) Shatrughan stood for ‘Artha’; (ii) Bharat stood for ‘Dharma’; (iii) Laxman stood for ‘Kaam’; and (iv) Lord Ram himself for ‘Moksha’.

Shatrughan managed the affairs of the kingdom of Ayodhya so well and with great finasse during the period of absence of Lord Ram when he had gone to live for 14 years in the forest to honour the word of his father king Dasrath, and Bharat, who was supposed to take over the reigns of the kingdom during the Lord’s absence, was so remorseful and full of guilt that he bluntly refused to accept the crown and spent the entire period of 14 long years as a reclusive hermit on the outskirts of the city of Ayodhya, that there was no dint in the prosperity and wealth of the kingdom during this period. Rather, when Lord Ram came back to Ayodhya at the end of the exile period he found that everything was absolutely fine and well-looked after, and that the legendary power and majesty of the kingdom was maintained in perfect order by Shatrughan during the Lord's absence. This simply means that Shatrughan was an expert administrator and excellent in handling the finances of the kingdom. Therefore he stood for the virtue of 'Artha'—financial well-being and meaningful management of the affairs of one's daily life.

Then we come to Bharat. He epitomised the virtues of 'Dharma' for the simple, obvious and straightforward reason that he refused to accept the crown of Ayodhya and its attendant attractions and benefits because it would have been an unrighteous, improper and unjust thing to do as the crown should have passed to his elder brother, Lord Ram, upon the death of their father, king Dasrath. Instead of this, unfortunately, Lord Ram had been sent to forest exile due to selfishness, ulterior motives and evil mechanisms of his own mother, Kaikeyi. In spite of all the efforts of the ministers of the kingdom, even his Guru sage Vaishista and mother of Lord Ram, Kaushalya, who had tried their best to persuade him to accept the crown of the kingdom, Bharat flatly refused, citing it to be a highly improper thing to do—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 171—to Doha no. 183.

Not only did he rescind the crown, but Bharat had also gone a step further by spending the next 14 years in self-imposed exile by living like a hermit on the outskirts of Ayodhya, and renouncing all comforts of the kingdom—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 323—to Sortha/Doha no. 326.

Laxman stood for 'Kaam' (meaning wish fulfilment) because he had always stood by Lord Ram and helped him, shoulder-to-shoulder and arm-in-arm, to help the Lord fulfill all his objectives in this world. To cite a few examples: (i) During the protection of the fire sacrifice of sage Vishwamitra, while Lord Ram had dealt with the chief of the demon army, i.e. Subahu and Marich, it was Laxman who had killed the rest of the demon forces—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-5 that precede Doha no. 210. (ii) Another instance is during the war at Lanka it was Laxman who had slayed Meghanad, the invincible son of the demon king Ravana—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 75—to Doha no. 76.

It ought to be noted here that Laxman's contribution in Lord Ram's divine mission on earth has been acknowledged by the Lord himself when Laxman lay wounded in the battle-field of Lanka and the Lord had grieved for him—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-18 that precede Doha no. 61.

And finally we come to Lord Ram himself. There is no doubting the assertion that the Lord stood for the fruit of 'Moksha' or spiritual liberation of the creature. The holy name of the Lord, i.e. the word 'RAM', is deemed to be a "Tarak Mantra", a divine mystical formula that helps the soul to cross over this mundane world consisting of an endless cycle of birth and death. This fact is endorsed by the holiest of Hindu scriptures, i.e. the 'Upanishads' themselves. Refer: Ram Uttar Tapini Upanishad, Canto 2, verse no. 1; Canto 4, verse no. 7; and Canto 6, verse nos. 1-29.

The access to the 'four fruits or rewards' by king Dasrath as well as his queens who were blessed enough to have the supreme Lord of the world as their son known as Lord Ram has been referred to elsewhere also in the context of Lord Ram's marriage in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha nos. 325 and 345.]

सुतन्ह समेत दसरथहि देखी । मुदित नगर नर नारि बिसेषी ॥ ३ ॥
सुमन बरिसि सुर हनहिं निसाना । नाकनटीं नाचहिं करि गाना ॥ ४ ॥ sutanha samēta dasarathahi dēkhī. mudita nagara nara nāri bisēṣī. 3.

sumana barisi sura hanahim nisānā. nākanaṭīm nācahim kari gānā. 4.

When the citizens of the city<sup>1</sup>, both the males as well as the females, saw the king standing alongside his four sons, all of them were exceptionally delighted and felt very happy. (3)

When the gods saw this wonderful sight, they liberally showered flowers (from the sky, the heaven) and merrily played their kettle-drums enthusiastically even as the celestial dancers (i.e. the Apsaras; heavenly nymphs) danced in gay abundance to the accompaniment of melodious songs. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Now, it is not clear which city and its inhabitants are being referred to here in this verse—is it Ayodhya or is it Janakpur?

Well, the answer is: 'both of them'. The citizens of Ayodhya were in the marriage party itself, while the citizens of Janakpur consisted of those who were sent by king Janak to welcome the party on the outskirts of the city, as well as those who were waiting eagerly to receive the party in the city itself.

The citizens of Janakpur were specially very happy and delighted because till this moment they had known only the two brothers, Lord Ram and Laxman, but now they saw that they were four brothers. Incidentally, Janak himself had two daughters, and his younger brother also had two daughters, bringing the number of eligible brides to four. The fascinated citizens visualized and hoped that all these four daughters would be married to the four brothers. Obviously it is a rare occasion when such a coincidence would occur. So this made them exceptionally delighted and happy.

The same thing can be applied to the citizens of Ayodhya. When they learnt that there were four princesses of marriageable age at Janakpur they wondered how nice would it be if all the four brothers could marry these four princesses? How wonderful and marvelous would it be to see the four couples getting married together under the same canopy, on the same dais, sitting in a row observing the rituals of the marriage ceremony together! The very idea made the citizens of the two cities ecstatic with joy.]

सतानंद अरु बिप्र सचिव गन । मागध सूत बिदुष बंदीजन ॥ ५ ॥
सहित बरात राउ सनमाना । आयसु मागि फिरे अगवाना ॥ ६ ॥ satānanda aru bipra saciva gana. māgadha sūta biduṣa bandījana. 5.

sahita barāta rā'u sanamānā. āyasu māgi phirē agavānā. 6.

Satanand (the royal priest of Janakpur), along with the Brahmins, the ministers, the minstrels, the bards and other wise men of the royal court of Janakpur who had been deputed by king Janak to receive the marriage party and extend a warm welcome to it, offered their greatest respect and heartiest welcome to king Dasrath and all other esteemed members of the party.

After paying their formal obeisance and extending a warm reception to the bridegroom's party, the members of Janak's delegation sought a polite permission from the honourable guests and returned back to the city. (5-6)

[Note—It is a tradition that the father of the bride would not go personally to meet the father of the groom upon the latter's arrival at the bride's place, but instead sends his emissary to receive and welcome the guests. Usually the priest of the bride's family is sent to represent the father of the bride at the head of the delegation that goes to meet the father of the groom and his companions.

Hence, Janak had sent Satanand as the head of the welcoming party that was sent to receive king Dasrath on the outskirts of Janakpur.

As we have already read earlier, they carried a lot of gifts with them as offerings to king Dasrath and other members of the entourage, and king Dasrath had graciously accepted everything as a token of his endorsement of this alliance between the two powerful kingdoms of Ayodhya and Janakpur. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Doha no. 304—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 306.]

प्रथम बरात लगन तें आई । तातें पुर प्रमोदु अधिकाई ॥ ७ ॥

ब्रह्मानंदु लोग सब लहहीं । बढहुँ दिवस निसि बिधि सन कहहीं ॥ ८ ॥ prathama barāta lagana tēm āī. tātēm pura pramōdu adhikāī. 7.

brahmānandu lōga saba lahahīm. bar̥hahum̐ divasa nisi bidhi sana kahahīm.
8.

Since the bridegroom's party had arrived well ahead of the day fixed for the marriage (of Lord Ram with Sita), there was great joy and rejoicing in the city (of Janakpur)<sup>1</sup>. (7)

The very thought (that there would be an extended stay of the marriage party and a lot of days to look forward for festivities and ceremonies), all the people were exceedingly exhilarated as if they have attained Brahm (i.e. as if they have obtained the highest degree of joy, bliss and happiness that is experienced by an ascetic when he has attained self-realisation).

They prayed to Vidhi (the Creator) that the days may be long and stretch to infinity (so that they may enjoy the wonderful time all the more)<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This is because the citizens would have more time in their hands to celebrate, rejoice, and enjoy the festivities that were organised on this auspicious occasion. There was no rush for time; things could be taken in a relaxed manner. The citizens would have ample time to strike a person rapport with the guests and forge relationships that would come in handy for future contacts, be it for trade and commerce, sport, defense, education, social exchanges such as tourism and mutual friendship, or for establishing matrimonial alliances that would unite families and clans together.

The word 'Lagan' refers to a combination of astrological factors, such as arrangement of stars and planets in the horoscope-charts of all concerned, that are used to decide on auspicious hours during which any important thing could, and should, be done to ensure that the chances of success of the enterprise being undertaken are greater. On such occasions as marriages, many days of a particular month are counted as auspicious Lagan days to hold the ceremony, taking into account the horoscopes of both the groom's side and the bride's side. Hence, if the marriage party of the groom from a distant land arrives well in time, there is more time for holding elaborate ceremonies and festivities at the bride's place; if the party arrives late and little time is left before the auspicious time-slot for the marriage rituals ends, then the ceremonies and festivities have to be shortened accordingly.

In the case of Lord Ram's marriage, his father king Dasrath arrived with Lord Ram's three brothers, a large retinue of courtiers, ministers, attendants and detachment of army troops so well in advance that there was ample time to engage in extended celebrations and gaiety and hold mega events on a large scale in Janakpur.

The citizens looked forward to such occasions as a pleasant and welcome break from humdrums of otherwise routine life, and royal events such as a marriage or a birth in the king's household gave them a rare chance to shun worries of life, and enjoy life's pleasures and be merry. To wit, the earlier the celebrations started the longer they would last, and it was so much the better for the citizens as they would have chance to enjoy themselves for more numbers of days.

<sup>2</sup>The same idea is expressed in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 195—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 196 where it is said that at the time of birth of Lord Ram and his three brothers, the days of rejoicing and merriment seemed to stretch to eternity, and there was no sight of night.]

दो०. रामु सीय सोभा अवधि सुकृत अवधि दोउ राज ।

जहँ तहँ पुरजन कहहिं अस मिलि नर नारि समाज ॥ ३०९ ॥

dōhā.

rāmu śīya sōbhā avadhi sukr̥ta avadhi dō'u rāja.

jaham̐ taham̐ purajana kahahim̐ asa mili nara nāri samāja. 309.

The citizens (of Janakpur and Ayodhya) collect here and there in (separate) groups of men and women, discussing the events among themselves and asserting that there is no comparison in the world for the beautiful image consisting of the pair of Lord Ram and Sita on the one hand, and of the majesty and grandeur of the two great kings (Dasrath of Ayodhya, and Janak of Janakpur) on the other hand<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 309)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The reason for this assertion is given below in Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 310.

Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 104, stanza no. 3 also.]

चौ०. जनक सुकृत मूरति बैदेही । दसरथ सुकृत रामु धरें देही ॥ १ ॥
 इन्ह सम काहुँ न सिव अवराधे । काहुँ न इन्ह समान फल लाधे ॥ २ ॥ इन्ह सम कोउ न भयउ जग माहीं । है नहिं कतहुँ होनेउ नाहीं ॥ ३ ॥

caupāī.

janaka sukr̥ta mūrati baidēhī. dasaratha sukr̥ta rāmu dharēm dēhī. 1.
 inha sama kāhum̐ na siva avarādhē. kāhum̐ na inha samāna phala lādhē. 2.
 inha sama kō'u na bhaya'u jaga māhīm. hai nahīm katahūm̐ hōnē'u nāhīm. 3.

All the good, auspicious, righteous and meritorious deeds done by king Janak in his lifetime have taken a personified form as Sita (his daughter), and likewise Lord Ram is an image of all the good, auspicious, meritorious and righteous deeds done by king Dasrath<sup>1</sup>. (1)

No one has worshipped and pleased Lord Shiva more than have these two kings, nor has anyone else been rewarded more than them<sup>2</sup>. (2)

Verily it is true and irrefutably certain that there has never been anyone anywhere in the world in the past who can be said to be as fortunate and privileged as these two kings, nor is there anyone in the present time, or would be in the future<sup>3</sup>. (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, Doha no. 325; and (b) Ayodhya Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 172; and (ii) Doha no. 173 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 5-7.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 309 that says that the four sons of king Dasrath appeared like a personified form of the four rewards of Artha, Dharma, Kaam and Moksha that Dasrath has been rewarded with.

As regards Sita, it has been expressly stated in Adhyatma Ramayan of Veda Vyas that Sita is the personified form of 'Yogmaya', the cosmic Shakti or dynamic powers of the Supreme Lord of creation, who has taken birth in the household of Janak. Refer: (i) Baal Kand, Canto 2, verse no. 28; (ii) Canto 4, verse no. 18; and (iii) Canto 6, verse nos. 58-70.

<sup>3</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 294.]

हम सब सकल सुकृत कै रासी । भए जग जनमि जनकपुर बासी ॥ ४ ॥
 जिन्ह जानकी राम छबि देखी । को सुकृती हम सरिस बिसेषी ॥ ५ ॥
 पुनि देखब रघुबीर बिआहू । लेब भली बिधि लोचन लाहू ॥ ६ ॥ hama saba sakala sukr̥ta kai rāsī. bha'ē jaga janami janakapura bāsī. 4.

 jinha jānakī rāma chabi dēkhī. kō sukr̥tī hama sarisa bisēṣī. 5.
 puni dēkhaba raghubīra bi'āhū. lēba bhalī bidhi lōcana lāhū. 6.

The citizens of Janakpur consider themselves very fortunate and privileged themselves (like their king Janak, as well as king Dasrath of Ayodhya). They thanked their good luck and affirmed—‘We, the citizens of Janakpur, are like a treasury of accumulated good and meritorious deeds because we have been fortunate to take birth as citizens of Janakpur. [It is due to this good fortune that we have been able to enjoy these happy moments in our lives.] (4)

Say, who else is more fortunate and privileged in this world than us who have seen with our eyes the magnificent and divine image of Janki (Sita) and Lord Ram. (5)

We will get the full benefit of having our eye-sights when we would be personally witnessing and enjoying the happy and auspicious event of the marriage of the divine couple, Lord Ram and Sita.’ (6)

[Note—The citizens were thoroughly enjoying themselves, considered themselves very fortunate, and enthusiastically looked forward for the marriage ceremony of Lord Ram and Sita. They were of a unanimous view that no one is as lucky as them in this world that day.

They thanked their good luck and felt highly elated, saying—‘There are countless kingdoms and millions of citizens living in them, but none of them have this reward today, none have this privilege today of participating in the rarest of rare event when the personified form of the Supreme Lord of this world is getting united with his divine Shakti in the form of Sita. So we regard ourselves especially blessed and fortunate in every respect. Our eyes have enabled us to see the divine image of Lord Ram and Sita, and also would enable us to watch their marriage soon. What more or greater reward can one expect by way of having eyesight?

At present we have been able to have only fleeting instances when we were able to see the divine image of Lord Ram and Sita. We have seen them separately—we have seen Lord Ram when he came to visit the city along with his brother Laxman upon their arrival at Janakpur, and we have seen Sita only a few times when she stepped out of the palace. Then we had seen them at the venue of the bow-breaking ceremony, but it was a somber occasion when there was a lot of uncertainty and tension in the air.

The only time we saw Lord Ram and Sita together was when she had gone to put the victory garland on Lord Ram after he had broken the bow and sealed his marriage with her. But this magnificent sight was short-lived because an angry sage Parashuram had arrived and created a ruckus. Our enjoyments were cut short. We also could not thoroughly enjoy ourselves because we had to watch the couple from our viewers’ gallery in the arena, and we could not come close and interact with them.

The situation would be different during the marriage ceremony when there would be an informal atmosphere marked by merry-making, festivities, celebrations and bonhomie when there would be no barriers of formalities and artificial distances created by social hierarchy. There would be close interactions and an informal atmosphere that would enable us to get up close to Lord Ram and Sita on one pretext or the other, such as to bless them ourselves on this auspicious occasion, and seek their blessings in return.’]

कहहिं परसपर कोकिलबयनीं । एहि बिआहँ बड़ लाभु सुनयनीं ॥ ७ ॥

बड़ें भाग बिधि बात बनाई । नयन अतिथि होइहहिं दोउ भाई ॥ ८ ॥

kahahim̐ parasapara kōkilabayanīm̐. ēhi bi'āham̐ bara lābhu sunayanīm̐. 7.
barēm̐ bhāga bidhi bāta banā'ī. nayana atithi hō'ihahim̐ dō'u bhā'ī. 8.

Ladies with beautiful eyes (sunayanīm̐) and voices as sweet as that of the cuckoo (kōkilabayanīm̐) collected together in groups and said to each other: 'Oh Friend! This marriage (of Lord Ram and Sita) is a harbinger of good fortunes that would bring great rewards to us<sup>1</sup>.*

[*This verse can be read as follows too: "Ladies who had voices as sweet as the cuckoo (kōkilabayanīm̐) spoke to each other—'Oh beautiful-eyed friends (sunayanīm̐)! There is great benefit and a huge reward for us in this marriage of Lord Ram with Sita.'" (7)

The Creator has been very gracious and magnanimous upon us that he has turned the events in such a way that we have been able to have the two brothers as guests of our eyes.

[To wit, we will be able to invite them and serve them in the best way we can in a symbolic way by watching them closely and intensely, and to the full satisfaction of our hearts and minds. The two brothers are the honoured guests of our kingdom, and while our king Janak is doing his own very best to serve them externally in physical terms, we can do our bit by serving them subtly in a symbolic manner in our hearts.] (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>What is the reward or benefit that the ladies are speaking of here? Well, the answer is found in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 220—to Doha no. 223 wherein the ladies of Janakpur have expressed their heart-felt desire to see Lord Ram as a groom of Sita so that they will have repeated opportunity to see their Lord again and again in their lives for the simple reason that then he would be paying visits to the city as it would be his in-law's place in future.

On the other hand, if Sita is married to someone else then the two brothers would go away to their kingdom at the end of the bow-breaking ceremony like the rest of the invited guests, and the ladies would never have a chance to see and interact with the Lord anytime again in their lives.]

दो०. बारहिं बार सनेह बस जनक बोलाउब सीय ।

लेन आइहहिं बंधु दोउ कोटि काम कमनीय ॥ ३१० ॥

dōhā.

bārahim̐ bāra sanēha basa janaka bōlā'uba sīya.

lēna ā'ihahim̐ bandhu dō'u kōṭi kāma kamanīya. 310.

The ladies were submerged in a pleasant reverie, dreaming that king Janak would repeatedly call Sita back (because he would be overwhelmed by affection and grief of separation from her at the time of the departure of the marriage party for Ayodhya, accompanied by the newly wed couple, Lord Ram and Sita), and each time the two brothers (Lord Ram and Laxman) would come back to request him to let Sita go with them. (Doha no. 310)

[Note—The charmed ladies were imagining that they would be able to see Lord Ram and Laxman again and again at the time of their departure for Ayodhya at the end of the marriage celebrations because Janak would be so overwhelmed with love and affection that he would be repeatedly calling Sita back to meet her one last time, and would like to spend as much last minutes with her as he possibly could do, forcing Lord Ram and Laxman to come back and asking the king to let Sita go as it was getting late for departure, and they have a long journey to cover on their way back to their kingdom of Ayodhya.

In the process, the ladies who were overwhelmed with affection for the Lord, closed their eyes and dreamt that they would have one extra and additional opportunity to see their beloved Lord for one last time more.]

चौ०. बिबिध भाँति होइहि पहुनाई । प्रिय न काहि अस सासुर माई ॥ १ ॥

तब तब राम लखनहि निहारी । होइहहि सब पुर लोग सुखारी ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

bibidha bhāmṭi hō'ihī pahunāī. priya na kāhi asa sāsura māī. 1.

taba taba rāma lakhanahi nihārī. hō'ihahim saba pura lōga sukhārī. 2.

[The ladies of the city of Janakpur, overwhelmed with affection for Lord Ram and Laxman, were elated at the possibility of having an extended opportunity to interact with the two brothers when they would willingly like to stay longer at Janakpur than is customary for a groom's party so as to enjoy the elaborate, extensive and cordial hospitality that would be shown to them by the bride's side. They discussed this possibility and its rewards amongst themselves as follows—]

‘The groom and his marriage party would be shown elaborate hospitality of every imaginable kind by the hosts, the bride's side. Say, who would not like this pampering; who would not like to have such a caring, doting and affectionate father-in-law and mother-in-law?’<sup>1</sup> (1)

On all such occasions (when Lord Ram would seek Janak's permission to go back to Ayodhya, and would be lovingly requested by Janak to postpone the departure for some more days), all the citizens of Janakpur would feel very happy and delighted to see Lord Ram and Laxman<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>In other words, king Janak and his queen Sunayana would shower their love and affection upon their son-in-law Lord Ram so much that the latter would feel pampered and spoilt by their attention and care. The Lord would feel that they love him more than his own father, king Dasrath so much so that he (Lord Ram) would prefer to stay as long as it is practically possible at Janakpur so as to enjoy this privileged treatment and honour as much as he can. The result would be that he would be in no hurry to return to Ayodhya, thereby giving the citizens of Janakpur more time to spend in his august company.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Ram and Laxman and the rest of the marriage party would have prepared themselves to start on their journey back to Ayodhya. They would have assembled at a public place before their departure, and the two brothers would go to Janak to say good-bye to him and seek his blessings. As this news would spread in the city, all the people would hurry out and come to have a last glimpse of the Lord, before his departure. They would be craning their necks and jostling with each other to have a close-up view of the two brothers, and if possible have a brief chat with him to bid him farewell.

But then they imagined that the king (Janak) would not give Lord Ram permission to leave, but would rather politely and most pleadingly ask him to stay for some more time so that the desire of his heart to extend more of his love for the Lord can be realized. The merciful and compassionate Lord Ram would have no choice but to accept the king's request, and would return to his place of lodging, postponing his departure for some more days.

This cycle would be repeated again and again: the Lord seeking permission from Janak to leave, and Janak asking him to stay for some more days. Lord Ram would personally be very happy to find an excuse to stay as long as possible at Janakpur because of the warmth of hospitality and the intensity of affability and cordiality shown by Janak and the rest of the citizens to him. Janak's request would be the perfect excuse for Ram to keep on postponing his departure from Janakpur.

This is what the ladies, and for that matter everyone else in Janakpur were hoping for as is evident in these verses.]

सखि जस राम लखन कर जोटा । तैसेइ भूप संग दुइ ढोटा ॥ ३ ॥
स्याम गौर सब अंग सुहाए । ते सब कहहि देखि जे आए ॥ ४ ॥

sakhi jasa rāma lakhana kara jōṭā. taisē'i bhūpa saṅga du'i ḍhōṭā. 3.
syāma gaura saba aṅga suhā'ē. tē saba kahahim dēkhi jē ā'ē. 4.

Oh friend! King Dasrath is accompanied by two other sons (Bharat and Shatrughan) who are exactly like Lord Ram and Laxman. (3)

Those who have gone to see them (a reference to the delegation sent by Janak to welcome the marriage party when it arrived on the outskirts of the city, as well as the huge crowd of citizens who had rushed to have a first-hand glimpse of the party as it entered the city with full royal regalia and proceeded towards the place designated for their stay at Janakpur) have come back and reported that these two sons are of dark and fair complexion respectively, and have a physique and personality that are charming and attractive in all possible manner<sup>1</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The same observation was made by these citizens for Lord Ram and Laxman earlier—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 220, and Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 221.]

कहा एक मैं आजु निहारे । जनु बिरंचि निज हाथ सँवारे ॥ ५ ॥
भरतु रामही की अनुहारी । सहसा लखि न सकहि नर नारी ॥ ६ ॥

लखनु सत्रुसूदनु एकरूपा । नख सिख ते सब अंग अनूपा ॥ ७ ॥
मन भावहिं मुख बरनि न जाहीं । उपमा कहूँ त्रिभुवन कोउ नाहीं ॥ ८ ॥ kahā ēka mairi āju nihārē. janu biranīci nija hātha samvārē. 5.

bharatu rāmahī kī anuhārī. sahasā lakhi na sakahim nara nārī. 6.
lakhanu satrusūdanu ēkarūpā. nakha sikha tē saba aṅga anūpā. 7.
mana bhāvahiṁ mukha barani na jāhīm. upamā kahum̐ tribhuvana kō'u nāhīm. 8.

While the enthused ladies were having this lively discussion, one of them said—‘I have seen them personally today. Surely it appears that the Creator known as ‘Vidhi’ has moulded them personally with his own hands.

[That is, the Creator took special interest and care to mould their bodies and inject exceptional charm and beauty in them. He did not create them in a run-of-mill routine sort of way, but took pains to use all his craftsmanship to give shape to their handsome personality and charming physique because the Creator wished to use them as a sample case to exhibit his expertise and skills as the supreme Craftsman.] (5)

Bharat is an exact replica of Lord Ram so much so that no man or woman would easily be able to distinguish between the two. (6)

Similarly, Laxman and Shatrughan (also known as Shatrusudan) are exactly like each other to look at.

All the four have perfectly charming physique, right from the tip of their toes up to the top of their heads<sup>1</sup>. (7)

The four brothers are so exceptionally attractive and charming to behold that though one’s Mana (the heart and the mind) is enthralled and captivated by their view, it is not possible for one to describe them in words (because the words have their own limitations and they cannot do justice to the magnificence of the sight that one beholds before him).

Verily it can be said with surety that there is no one in the entire world known as ‘Tribhuvan’ (i.e. the world consisting of three levels or dimensions of existence)<sup>2</sup> with whom any comparison, even a remotest one, can be made or even imagined with these four brothers. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>How pleasant is the personalities of all the four brothers who form two pairs resembling each other in every fine manner is described in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 219 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 3-8.

<sup>2</sup>The ‘Tribhuvan’ refers to the entire stretch of the living hospitable world. It consists of the heaven where the exalted gods live, the earth where ordinary creatures live, and the nether world where lower levels of life exist. It also refers to the past, the present and the future.]

छं०. उपमा न कोउ कह दास तुलसी कतहुँ कबि कोबिद कहैं । १ ।
बल बिनय बिद्या सील सोभा सिंधु इन्ह से एइ अहैं ॥ २ ॥

पुर नारि सकल पसारि अंचल बिधिहि बचन सुनावहीं । ३ ।
ब्याहिअहुँ चारिउ भाइ एहिं पुर हम सुमंगल गावहीं ॥ ४ ॥

chanda.

upamā na kō'u kaha dāsa tulasī katahum' kabi kōbida kahaim. 1.
bala binaya bidyā sīla sōbhā sindhu inha sē ē'i ahaim. 2.
pura nāri sakala pasāri aṇcala bidhihi bacana sunāvahim. 3.
byāhi'ahum' cāri'u bhā'i ēhim pura hama sumaṅgala gāvahim. 4.

Poet Tulsidas (the narrator of this epic Ram Charit Manas), who is a humble servant of Lord Ram, asserts that even expert poets and wise men declare that there is no one with whom the four brothers can be ever compared.

All the virtues and qualities that they possess, such as strength and valour, politeness and etiquette, knowledge, skills and wisdom, courteousness and good manners, as well as beauty and charm, are unique and exclusive to them. They cannot be compared with anyone else with respect to this glorious virtues and qualities. (Chanda line nos. 1-2)

All the women-folk of Janakpur spread out their garments before the Creator (just like a beggar would extend his hands and begging bowl to seek alms from a magnanimous donor) and pray to him most earnestly with these words—‘Oh dear Creator (Vidhi)! Let the four brothers be married here in Janakpur so that we can have a rare opportunity to sing auspicious songs to celebrate the event.’<sup>1</sup> (Chanda nos. 3-4)

[Note--1 Till this point of time when the party had arrived from Ayodhya, the women-folk of Janakpur had seen only Lord Ram and Laxman. So they had prayed to the Creator that Lord Ram should marry Sita and become a royal groom of Janakpur. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 222—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 223.

But now that they have seen all the four noble princes, they long to see all of them married at Janakpur to the four princesses of the kingdom.

It will be pertinent to note here that their love for the Lord was so real and honest that the Creator could not defy their prayers and longings because finally it so happened that this wish of the citizens was granted—i.e. all the four brothers were indeed married to four princesses of Janakpur, viz. Sita and her sister who were daughters of king Janak, and her two cousins who were daughters of her uncle, the younger brother of Janak. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 325.

Refer also to Tulsidas' book “Janki Mangal”, Chanda no. 19.]

सो०. कहहिं परस्पर नारि बारि बिलोचन पुलक तन । सखि सबु करब पुरारि पुन्य पयोनिधि भूप दोउ ॥ ३११ ॥
sōraṭhā.

kahahim paraspara nāri bāri bilōcana pulaka tana.
sakhi sabu karaba purāri pun'ya payōnidhi bhūpa dō'u. 311.

Tears of affection welled-up in the eyes of all the ladies, and their bodies were thrilled. They reassured each other, saying—‘Oh friend, have courage and faith. Purari (Lord Shiva) will fulfill our wishes<sup>1</sup>, because both the kings (Dasrath and Janak, the fathers of Lord Ram and Sita respectively) are like deep oceans of meritorious deeds (and their natural blessings, or the good fortunes that accompany such deeds)<sup>2</sup>.’ (Sortha/Doha no. 311)

[Note—Refer also to Tulsidas’ book “Janki Mangal”, Chanda no. 19.

<sup>1</sup>Lord Shiva was the patron deity of both the kingdoms, Ayodhya as well as Janakpur. Lord Ram has clearly stated the importance and paramount nature of Lord Shiva while consecrating the Shiva Lingam (an image of Shiva) before he launched his campaign to liberate Sita from the clutches of the demon king of Lanka, Ravana. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, from Chaupai no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 2—to Chaupai no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 3.

Further, after returning from his forest exile and assuming the crown of Ayodhya, Lord Ram had established millions (i.e. countless) of Shiva Lingams throughout the kingdom. This fact is specifically mentioned in ‘Adhyatma Ramayan’ of sage Veda Vyas, Uttar Kand, Canto 4, verse no. 27, line no. 1.

As for king Janak, the very fact that Lord Shiva had chosen his ancestors for the safekeeping of his bow which was duly worshipped by the royal family of Janakpur ever since then, and then allowing it to be got broken and not getting angry or feeling insulted by this otherwise despicable act so that Janak’s daughter Sita could be married to Lord Ram are sufficient evidences of the Lord’s grace upon the kingdom of Janakpur and its blessed king Janak. Refer: (a) Adhyatma Ramayan, Baal Kand, Canto 6, verse no. 16, 69-79; and (b) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 249—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 250; as well as Chaupai line nos. 6-8 and the following Chanda that precede Doha no. 261.

Now therefore, Lord Shiva would not want to do anything which would go against the wishes of these two noble kings, even if such fulfillment may not look too convenient for other devotees of Lord Shiva and they may take it as an affront to their worshipped deity, Lord Shiva, as is evident when sage Parashuram, an ardent devotee of the Lord, became extremely angry and wanted to punish Lord Ram for breaking the bow of his revered Lord, Shiva. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 269—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 285; and Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 293.

<sup>2</sup>Since both the kings have led a life of righteousness and auspiciousness, it is certain that Lord Shiva would fulfill their wishes. Obviously for Dasrath it would be to see all his four sons married as soon as possible as any father would naturally want, and what better chance would he get than to see them married with the princesses of Janakpur because this kingdom is as renowned, well-established and prosperous as his own kingdom of Ayodhya. Besides this fact, the princesses of this kingdom are of extreme beauty and of the right marriageable age to suit his four sons.

The two kings being ‘like an ocean of good deeds and its attendant blessings’ is a metaphoric way of stressing that like the ocean being a fathomless reservoir of water, the good and meritorious deeds of these two kings were also countless and so were the good affects of these deeds.]

चौ०. एहि बिधि सकल मनोरथ करहीं । आनँद उमगि उमगि उर भरहीं ॥ १ ॥
 जे नृप सीय स्वयंवर आए । देखि बंधु सब तिन्ह सुख पाए ॥ २ ॥ कहत राम जसु बिसद बिसाला । निज निज भवन गए महिपाला ॥ ३ ॥

caupāī.

ēhi bidhi sakala manōratha karahīm. ānam̐da umagi umagi ura bharahīm. 1.
 jē nṛpa sīya svayambara ā'ē. dēkhi bandhu saba tinha sukha pā'ē. 2.
 kahata rāma jasu bisada bisālā. nija nija bhavana ga'ē mahipālā. 3.

In this way, all the women-folk prayed to the Lord for fulfillment of their hearts' inner-most desires. This thought and the hope of its certain realization overwhelmed them and inundated their heart and inner-being<sup>1</sup>. (1)

All those kings who had come to attend Sita's 'Swayambar' (i.e. the competition of breaking of the bow that was organized to decide who would marry her) felt joyful and happy<sup>2</sup> to see the brothers. [Here the term 'brothers' means all the four of them—viz. Lord Ram and his three younger siblings, Laxman, Bharat and Shatrughan.] (2)

Talking about the stupendous glory and achievement of Lord Ram (with reference to the formidable feat of the breaking of Shiva's bow and overcoming the wrath of sage Parashuram), and singing his praises all the while, all the kings went back to their respective kingdoms. (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 222—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 223; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 249; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 255.

These above cited instances are clear indications of how intense were the desire of all the citizens of Janakpur, not only the women but the men as well, that Lord Ram should marry Sita at any cost, and for this all of them prayed to Lord Shiva and his divine consort Parvati.

<sup>2</sup>These kings were the good ones, those who had refrained from participating in the competition of breaking the bow. They had realized that Lord Ram was of the right age for the would-be bride, and that they themselves were much older than her and therefore unsuitable to marry her. Besides this, they had observed that a divine halo exuded from the Lord, and that he had the blessings and patronage of a renowned sage Vishwamitra with whom the two brothers had come to Janakpur. Then they had also observed how special treatment was given to them by their host, king Janak. So in short they had wisely and prudently decided to stay away from trying to break the bow, and had instead attempted to dissuade other kings to follow their example. In the event as it happened, the greedy and haughty kings didn't listen to their advice and got humiliated in the process because none of them was able to as much as move the bow even an inch.

These failed kings then tried to create a ruckus and revolted, even preparing to stage a bloody showdown (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 266). But when angry sage Parashuram intervened to seek retribution for the purported insult of Lord Shiva by breaking of the bow but was finally pacified by Lord Ram, these coward kings quietly slid away from the venue and left Janakpur to save their face, prestige and dignity (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 285).

Therefore, those amongst the invited kings who had refrained from attempting to break the bow had no fear of suffering loss of prestige and honour, so they stayed back as guests of king Janak. Since they had no personal friendship with the kingdom of Ayodhya and its king Dasrath, once the latter arrived they felt it prudent now to leave and go back to their own kingdoms.

Another reason for their decision to return home was that now all the attention of king Janak was diverted to attend and look after the marriage party, and these kings did not wish to give an impression of being a burden on Janak by overstaying beyond a reasonable time. That would be impolite and un-royal behaviour. Overstaying guests are not regarded with great respect, and beyond a certain time they become unwelcome and irritating even in modern days. So these wise and noble kings did not want to embarrass Janak, and left on their own accord.]

गए बीति कछु दिन एहि भाँती । प्रमुदित पुरजन सकल बराती ॥ ४ ॥
मंगल मूल लगन दिनु आवा । हिम रितु अगहनु मासु सुहावा ॥ ५ ॥

ga'ē bīti kachu dina ēhi bhāmṭī. pramudita purajana sakala barāṭī. 4.
maṅgala mūla lagana dinu āvā. hima ritu agahanu māsu suhāvā. 5.

Some pleasant days passed in this way when both the members of the bridegroom's party as well as the citizens of Janakpur thoroughly enjoyed themselves and felt merry<sup>1</sup>. (4)

Finally, the auspicious day arrived when the wedding was to be solemnized. It was in the pleasant month of 'Agahan' (which is the ninth month according to the Hindu calendar, and is also known as 'Maarga-shirsha', corresponding to the English month of December), the month that marks the beginning of the cold (winter) season. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The marriage party had arrived a number of days in advance of the day fixed for the marriage ceremony (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 309 and its accompanying note). So there was ample time for merriment and enjoyment. When one is happy and enjoying one's self, time seems to fly away and one does not seem to be bothered about the nitty-gritty of humdrum life.

A similar situation had prevailed at the time of the birth of Lord Ram and his brothers (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 197.)

Again, it is stated in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 280 that the citizens of Ayodhya who had accompanied Bharat to Chitrakoot in an attempt to bring Lord Ram back from the forest had so thoroughly enjoyed their stay there that time flew away for them so fast that even a long time equivalent to seven Yugs (celestial eras of time) seemed to be as small as a minute.

Another instance is found in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 15 wherein it is described how the monkeys who had come to Ayodhya with Lord Ram when he returned to his capital after victory at Lanka were so thoroughly enjoying their time there that six months passed by and they did not realize that the days were passing away. For them, this long period of time seemed as if it was merely a single day.]

ग्रह तिथि नखतु जोगु बर बारू । लगन सोधि बिधि कीन्ह बिचारू ॥ ६ ॥
 पठै दीन्हि नारद सन सोई । गनी जनक के गनकन्ह जोई ॥ ७ ॥
 सुनी सकल लोगन्ह यह बाता । कहहिं जोतिषी आहिं बिधाता ॥ ८ ॥ graha tithi nakhatu jōgu bara bārū. lagana sōdhi bidhi kīnha bicārū. 6.

 paṭhai dīnhi nārada sana sōī. ganī janaka kē ganakanha jōī. 7.
 sunī sakala lōganha yaha bātā. kahahim jōtiṣī āhim bidhātā. 8.

The Creator researched carefully and determined the most auspicious time and date when all the planets, asterisms, signs of the zodiac, and the constellation of stars and their individual members would be best placed and occupied the most beneficial place in the horoscope. (6)

Then the Creator sent sage Narad (his son and a famed celestial sage who had free access to heaven and earth) as his messenger who carried this message to Janak, who in his turn got it read and deciphered by his court astrologers and other wise men of the kingdom<sup>1</sup>. (7)

When the people heard of this news (that the time and date of the marriage ceremony was decided by none else but the Creator himself, they marveled at it and exclaimed in astonishment—‘Say, the Creator has assumed the role of an astrologer!’<sup>2</sup>) (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The horoscope is in a coded form, and professional experts are needed to decode it and read the hidden message in it. Hence, the month of ‘Agahan’ and the actual time and day of the ceremonies and rituals were decided by the royal astrologers and horoscope readers of Janakpur.

<sup>2</sup>The people rejoiced at the prospect that not only their wishes to see Lord Ram happily marrying Sita would be fulfilled now but that the couple will lead a happy married life because the time and date has been determined by the Creator himself. Since the Creator determines the destiny of all living beings, if he has selected a particular time and date for the union of Lord Ram and Sita, then no power of earth can ever disrupt it or cause any harm to this bond.

The next Doha no. 312 tells us about the exact time selected by the Creator for the performance of wedding rituals.]

दो०. धेनुधूरि बेला बिमल सकल सुमंगल मूल ।
 बिप्रन्ह कहेउ बिदेह सन जानि सगुन अनुकूल ॥ ३१२ ॥
 dōhā.

dhēnudhūri bēlā bimala sakala sumaṅgala mūla.
 bipranha kahē'u bidēha sana jāni saguna anukūla. 312.

When the designated most auspicious hour arrived, the time of the evening that is just before sunset when cows return after grazing in the field and a lot of dust is raised from their hooves, the learned Brahmins realized that the moment has come, and so they said to Janak (as narrated below in the following verses). (Doha no. 312)

[Note—All preparations were ready; they were just waiting for the correct arrangement of stars and planets. The time was deciphered after reading the chart sent by the Creator through sage Narad (pronounced Naarad) as narrated above in Chaupai line nos. 6-7.]

चौ०. उपरोहितहि कहेउ नरनाहा । अब बिलंब कर कारनु काहा ॥ १ ॥
सतानंद तब सचिव बोलाए । मंगल सकल साजि सब ल्याए ॥ २ ॥
caupāī.

uparōhitahi kahē'u naranāhā. aba bilamba kara kāranu kāhā. 1.
satānanda taba saciva bōlā'ē. maṅgala sakala sāji saba lyā'ē. 2.

The king (Janak) asked his royal priest (Satanand), 'Say, what is the cause of delay now? [That is, why are you wasting time and not going ahead with the wedding rituals though the auspicious time determined for the ceremony has arrived? So, please start the process immediately.]' (1)

Hearing these instructions of the king, Satanand immediately summoned the senior ministers of the royal court who arrived with all the auspicious paraphernalia needed for the wedding rituals and their accompanying ceremonies<sup>1</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>What were these paraphernalia and how were they brought to the platform where the marriage ritual was to be performed? The answer is given in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 346 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 4-8 which we shall be reading below soon.]

संख निसान पनव बहु बाजे । मंगल कलस सगुन सुभ साजे ॥ ३ ॥
सुभग सुआसिनि गावहिं गीता । करहिं बेद धुनि बिप्र पुनीता ॥ ४ ॥ saṅkha nisāna panava bahu bājē. maṅgala kalasa saguna subha sājē. 3.

subhaga su'āsini gāvahiṁ gītā. karahiṁ bēda dhuni bipra punītā. 4.

As soon as it was known that the process of the wedding has been initiated, there was a spontaneous sounding of conches, drums and tabors<sup>1</sup>. Accompanying them were displayed auspicious things such as pitchers (that are usually filled with curd or water from some holy river, and the mouth is covered with leaves of the mango tree on which is placed a coconut) and other articles that symbolise good omen<sup>2</sup>. (3)

(Accompanying the playing of the musical instruments were the) Graceful women (whose husbands were alive; those who were not widows) sang melodious songs, while the learned Vipras (Brahmins) chanted the holy sacred hymns from the Vedas (the ancient scriptures)<sup>3</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Whenever there was some good news, musical instruments were played and the conch was blown. In olden days when there were no radio and television, the loud sound of these musical instruments sort of alerted the citizens of the city that some good tidings has arrived, and it is time to celebrate and rejoice. Hearing these sounds, the people used to rush out of their homes and work-places to enquire about the reason why the musical instruments were played, and then the celebrations began. Similarly, when the city was attacked by an intruder or an enemy's army, the bugle was sounded to alert the people.

This sounding of the bugle and playing of musical instruments was spontaneous and done on the spur of the moment as the good news arrived. This is clearly mentioned in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 193 when king Dasrath has ordered that musical instruments be played as soon as he learnt that he has been blessed by four sons.

Again we see the same thing happening on other occasions as well. For instance, (i) When the news arrived in Ayodhya that Lord Ram was to be married with Sita—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 296; (ii) When Lord Ram had broken the bow—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 262; (iii) When Sita had put the victory garland around Lord Ram's neck—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 264.

<sup>2</sup>Earlier in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 303—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 304 that lists the auspicious and good omens which appeared when Lord Ram's marriage party departed from Ayodhya for Janakpur.

<sup>3</sup>Refer similar events of singing and chanting of the hymns of the Vedas that occurred earlier in (i) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-4, 6 that precede Doha no. 194, and Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 195 when Lord Ram was born in Ayodhya; (ii) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 263, and Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 265 when Lord Ram had broken the bow and Sita had put the victory garland on him; and (iii) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 297, Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 301, as well as Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 297 when the good tidings of Lord Ram's marriage with Sita arrived at Ayodhya.]

लेन चले सादर एहि भाँती । गए जहाँ जनवास बराती ॥ ५ ॥
कोसलपति कर देखि समाजू । अति लघु लाग तिन्हहि सुरराजू ॥ ६ ॥ lēna calē sādara ēhi bhāmṭī. ga'e jahām' janavāsa barātī. 5.

kōsalapati kara dēkhi samājū. ati laghu lāga tinhahi surarājū. 6.

In this way (i.e. accompanied by auspicious things such as the pitcher filled with curd or water besides other items of good omen, singing ladies, playing musical instruments, and Brahmins chanting sacred hymns from the Vedas), he (Satanand) along with other senior ministers of the royal court proceeded towards the place where the groom's party had been lodged. (5)

When he and others saw the majesty, the pomp, the grandeur and the magnificence of the king of Kaushal (i.e. king Dasrath) and his entourage, they felt that the royal court of the king of gods (Indra) would pale into insignificance when compared to the splendour of the court of Dasrath<sup>1</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A similar comparison is made elsewhere also in Ram Charit Manas. For instance: (i) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 289 which describes the majesty of Janakpur; (ii) Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 319 which describes the majesty of king Dasrath as compared to the majesty of Indra and other custodians of the world; and (iii) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 324 which describes the majesty of the kingdom of Ayodhya as compared to the kingdom of heaven.]

भयउ समउ अब धारिअ पाऊ । यह सुनि परा निसानहिं घाऊ ॥ ७ ॥

गुरहि पूछि करि कुल बिधि राजा । चले संग मुनि साधु समाजा ॥ ८ ॥ bhaya'u sama'u aba dhāri'a pā'ū. yaha suni parā nisānahirṁ ghā'ū. 7.

gurahi pūchi kari kula bidhi rājā. calē saṅga muni sādhu samājā. 8.

All the members of the delegation led by Satanand, who were sent by king Janak to request king Dasrath to come to the venue of the marriage ceremony so that the rituals can started, submitted before the king, 'Oh respected King! The auspicious time has arrived, so please be kind to come forward and step into the venue where the marriage rituals are to be performed.'

As soon as this request was heard by the groom's party, musical instruments such as the kettle-drum etc. were sounded thunderously, with a lot of enthusiasm. (7)

The king (Dasrath) consulted and sought permission from his Guru (sage Vasistha), and after completing the traditional family rites ordained for such occasions, he cheerfully proceeded towards the venue of the marriage ceremony together with his royal entourage as well as his Guru and a host of other holy men and sages<sup>1</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The king's royal entourage consisted of his ministers, commanders of his army, senior citizens of Ayodhya as well as his attendants, while his Guru who accompanied him was surrounded by other sages and holy men.

Whenever a great king moved out in public, this was the usual pattern of his royal procession. We observe it when king Janak had gone to meet sage Vishwamitra upon his arrival at Janakpur along with Lord Ram and Laxman: refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 214 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8.

Refer also to Janki Mangal, verse nos. 127-128; and Chanda no. 16 that follow these two verses.]

दो०. भाग्य बिभव अवधेस कर देखि देव ब्रह्मादि ।

लगे सराहन सहस मुख जानि जनम निज बादि ॥ ३१३ ॥

dōhā.

bhāgya bibhava avadhēsa kara dēkhi dēva brahmādi.
lagē sarāhana sahasa mukha jāni janama nija bādi. 313.

When the gods led by the creator Brahma and others observed the great luck, the good fortune, the glory and the magnificence of the king of Ayodhya, they began to praise him and extol his virtues with a thousand mouths. They considered themselves unlucky and their birth as fruitless (because they had merely enjoyed the comforts of heaven but had not been blessed enough to have such a close interaction with the Supreme Being as king Dasrath has had when the Lord took birth in his household as his son known as 'Ram' with whom the king played like a father would with his son and had spent a lot of time showering his undivided love and affection upon the Lord, a privilege that was denied to even the greatest of gods). (Doha no. 313)

चौ०. सुरन्ह सुमंगल अवसरु जाना । बरषहिं सुमन बजाइ निसाना ॥ १ ॥
सिव ब्रह्मादिक बिबुध बरूथा । चढ़े बिमानन्हि नाना जूथा ॥ २ ॥
प्रेम पुलक तन हृदयँ उछाहू । चले बिलोकन राम बिआहू ॥ ३ ॥

caupāī.

suranha sumaṅgala avasaru jānā. baraṣahim sumana bajā'i nisānā. 1.
siva brahmādika bibudha barūthā. carḥē bimānanhi nānā jūthā. 2.
prēma pulaka tana hṛdayam̐ uchāhū. calē bilōkana rāma bi'āhū. 3.

The gods realised that it was a very auspicious occasion, and hence they celebrated it by raining flowers from the heaven and beating their musical drums<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Lord Shiva, the creator Brahma, as well as a host of other exalted gods mounted their aerial vehicles and proceeded with great enthusiasm and delight, euphoric and thrilled in their bodies thrilled with excitement and exhilaration, to witness the marriage ceremony of Lord Ram<sup>2</sup>. (2-3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We note that this happens quite frequently whenever there is a happy occasion to celebrate and rejoice. Refer for instance the following verses of Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand which tell us the occasions when the gods had showered flowers from the sky and played their musical instruments:—

(i) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 191; (ii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 194; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 262; (iv) Doha no. 264; (v) Doha no. 285; (vi) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 302; (vii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 306; (viii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 314; (ix) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 319; (x) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 323; (xi) Doha no. 324 and its preceding Chaupai line no. 7; (xii) Chanda no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 327.

<sup>2</sup>These great gods were aware who Lord Ram actually was. They knew very well that he was not an ordinary human prince, but an incarnation of Lord Vishnu as they themselves had prayed to the Lord to assume a human form to get rid of the demons who had been tyrannically tormenting the earth and its inhabitants, and destroying Dharma. The Lord had then obliged them and had told them that he will take birth as Lord Ram in the household of king Dasrath. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 184—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 187. So, when they got an opportunity to participate in the Lord's wedding, they felt ecstatic and privileged.

We note here that Lord Shiva and Brahma are mentioned, but Lord Vishnu is conspicuous by his name not being mentioned. The answer is obvious—Lord Vishnu is in the form of Lord Ram whose marriage these gods are going to attend.

Their bodies were thrilled and exhilarated because it was a rare occasion and auspicious as well when one is able to witness the union of two cosmic forces of creation—i.e. the Supreme Being known as 'Brahm' in the form of Lord Ram, and the 'Shakti' or dynamic cosmic powers of Brahm in the form of Sita. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Sortha no. 361.]

देखि जनकपुरु सुर अनुरागे । निज निज लोक सबहिं लघु लागे ॥ ४ ॥
चितवहिं चकित बिचित्र बिताना । रचना सकल अलौकिक नाना ॥ ५ ॥

dēkhi janakapuru sura anurāgē. nija nija lōka sabahim laghu lāgē. 4.
citavahim cakita bicitra bitānā. racanā sakala alaukika nānā. 5.

When the gods saw the majesty, magnificence and opulence of the city of Janakpur, all of them felt that their own cities in the kingdom of heaven literally paled into insignificance<sup>1</sup>. (4)

Their looked in awe and were stunned at the strange and out-of-the-world beauty of the marriage pavilion. All the arrangements and paraphernalia they saw were exceptionally wonderful and fabulous<sup>2</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Janakpur was not an ordinary city; it was the place where the cosmic Shakti of the Supreme Being lived in a personified form as Sita. Besides this fact, king Janak was a highly enlightened and righteous king of his time, and if a king is noble then all the good fortunes and prosperity are ever eager to bless his kingdom and its subjects.

It ought to be noted here that when Lord Ram's marriage party had arrived from Ayodhya, Sita had instructed the 'Siddhis' (mystical powers that she possessed) to go and serve the guests in the best possible way. These Siddhis can provide anything one wishes, and when they got a chance to serve Lord Ram and Sita, they felt honoured. Hence they went out of their way to decorate and deck-up the city to make it more glamorous than the city of Indra, the king of gods. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 306—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 307.

Earlier we have already read that when Lord Ram had seen the natural beauty and magnificence of Janakpur when he arrived there with sage Vishwamitra, he too felt very happy and delighted at its sight. If anything can please the Lord then obviously it has to be of an excellent quality. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 212—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 214.

<sup>2</sup>We shall read below that when Lord Shiva found that the gods were dazed at the stunning magnificence of Janakpur, he told them that they must understand that they have come to attend the union of the Supreme Lord whose name is so holy and powerful that by merely saying it a person can have access to anything he or she desires. So there is no miracle or wonder in the sight they are observing on earth in the form of the city of Janakpur. Refer: Doha no. 314 and Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that follow it.

Once again we have read earlier that when Lord Ram had gone to visit the city of Janakpur for the purpose of sight-seeing, he was astonished at the beauty and layout of the arena where the bow-breaking ceremony was to be held. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 225. Well, if its magnificence surprised the Lord who is the Master of the entire creation, the Lord of Nature, the beauty and diversity of which are beyond description and measure, then there is no wonder that it awed the gods who have a limited reach as compared to the Supreme Being.

Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 320 specifically mention the glamour and magnificence of the pavilion where the wedding rituals were to be held.]

नगर नारि नर रूप निधाना । सुघर सुधरम सुसील सुजाना ॥ ६ ॥
तिन्हहि देखि सब सुर सुरनारीं । भए नखत जनु बिधु उजिआरीं ॥ ७ ॥
बिधिहि भयउ आचरजु बिसेषी । निज करनी कछु कतहुँ न देखी ॥ ८ ॥ nagara nāri nara rūpa nidhānā. sughara sudharama susīla sujānā. 6.

tinahahi dēkhi saba sura suranārīm. bha'ē nakhata janu bidhu ujī'ārīm. 7.
bidhihi bhaya'u ācaraju bisēṣī. nija karanī kachu katahum'na dēkhī. 8.

The citizens of the city of Janakpur, both the males as well as the females, were very handsome and attractive to look at as if they were like treasures of physical beauty and glamour. They lived in auspicious homes, followed the right path of Dharma (righteousness, probity, propriety and noble conduct), were courteous, cultured, amiable and wise<sup>1</sup>. (6)

When the gods and their consorts saw them and sub-consciously compared them with themselves, all of them felt subdued just like the stars are in the presence of the light of the sun<sup>2</sup>. (7)

The Creator known as Vidhi was astonished to see such a wonderful and outlandish city of exceptional magnificence and beauty that he was dumbstruck. He did not see anything that could ever imagine he has created; he was astounded at the sight because what he beheld was beyond his imagination and creative capabilities<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>As has been noted earlier in the comment appended to verse nos. 4-5 herein above, when their king, Janak, was of a high stature and so blessed that Laxmi, the goddess of wealth and prosperity and the divine consort of Lord Vishnu, had taken the form of Sita to become his daughter, nothing short of the best and the most excellent can be expected from either the city where Janak lived, or its residents.

We shall be shortly reading below that countless gods and goddesses had assumed human forms and joined the citizens of Janakpur to rejoice and take part in the celebrations. When these gods and goddesses assumed human forms then naturally their forms must have been most attractive and divine to behold. They had mingled with the rest of the inhabitants of the city so much so that it was impossible to distinguish between who were actually humans on the one hand, and who were gods and goddesses in human forms on the other hand. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-8 and Chanda line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 318.

Not only Janakpur, even the city of Ayodhya was more divine than the city of gods in heaven so much so that the goddess of speech, goddess Saraswati, and the thousand hooded serpent known as Seshnath could not describe its beauty and magnificence. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 195.

<sup>2</sup>The stars pale into insignificance as soon as the light of the sun floods the sky. All their pride of being glittering gems in the night sky vanish in the presence of the sun's light. Likewise, these gods and their consorts had been pride that they possessed divine bodies that did not grow old, showed signs of aging or disease, were handsome and attractive to look at, wore magnificent clothes and ornaments as depicted in Hindu iconography, etc. But when they saw the citizens of Janakpur, their pride and vanity were crushed as they observed that these humans were more likable and glamorous than they.

<sup>3</sup>This verse shows that the city of Janakpur was so perfect to look at that the Creator was astounded because everything he had created had some or the other flaw; nothing that he created was either perfect or so stunningly beautiful.]

दो०. सिवँ समुझाए देव सब जनि आचरज भुलाहु । हृदयँ बिचारहु धीर धरि सिय रघुबीर बिआहु ॥ ३१४ ॥

dōhā.

sivam̐ samujhā'ē dēva saba jani ācaraja bhulāhu.
hr̥dayam̐ bicārahu dhīra dhari siya raghubīra bi'āhu. 314.

When Lord Shiva (who was the wisest amongst them all, and who knew the supreme Truth of Lord Ram as a personified form of Brahm, the Supreme Being) observed that the gods were in a state of dazed stupor, he advised them not to be astonished and get lost in wonderment. He told them to think deeply in their hearts, to contemplate and realize whose marriage they have come to attend. It was the divine union of Lord Ram (the personified form of the Supreme Being who is the Lord of creation) and Sita (the personified form of the Shakti of the Lord). So they must become calm and not lose a grip on their senses. (Doha no. 314)

[Note—Lord Shiva reminded the gods of the earlier events when they had approached him to advise where to find Lord Vishnu so that they can plead with the Lord to protect them against the cruelty and tyranny unleashed by the demons. Shiva had told them to pray to Lord Vishnu at the place they were standing, and there was no need to go search the Lord anywhere as he manifests himself anywhere the devotee earnestly prays to him. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 185 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8.

The gods had prayed fervently to Lord Vishnu who revealed himself before them and promised that he will manifest himself as Lord Ram on this earth to fulfill their wishes. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 186—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 187.

Hence, Lord Shiva wisely reminded the gods of this event and alerted them to be careful and not get lost in a mirage created by the Lord's Maya Shakti, the magical powers of the Lord to create illusions. Instead, they should understand the truth and rejoice that they are privileged to take part in this celebration.

The gods were deluded by the physical world they saw because their knowledge is very limited. But Lord Shiva is a wise god who is regarded as the most enlightened and realized one in the entire pantheon of gods. Shiva always remained submerged in doing meditation, and he is the Lord with 'three eyes'—the third eye symbolising knowledge of the subtlest truth and reality of creation, a knowledge that escapes others. Lord Shiva is the one who has realized the true nature of the 'Self', the Truth of creation. He knows that the true essence of Lord Ram is not his gross body as the prince of Ayodhya, but as the Holy Spirit who had assumed a divine body to give joy to the creatures of this mortal world by living amongst them as one of them. See the verses that follow herein below.

What to talk of the gods, even Shiva's own consort, Parvati, got so deluded when she saw Lord Ram that inspite of Shiva's warning not to doubt him she decided to test the divine nature of Lord Ram, and had to pay an immense price for her delusions. This incident is narrated in detail in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 48—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 60.]

चौ०. जिन्ह कर नामु लेत जग माहीं । सकल अमंगल मूल नसाहीं ॥ १ ॥

करतल होहिं पदारथ चारी । तेइ सिय रामु कहेउ कामारी ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

jinha kara nāmu lēta jaga māhīm. sakala amaṅgala mūla nasāhīm. 1.

karatala hōhīm padāratha cārī. tē'i siya rāmu kahē'u kāmārī. 2.

Lord Shiva told the stunned gods—'Listen, oh gods! He whose name is so powerful, holy and divine that its mere utterance is enough to eliminate all evil, misfortunes and inauspiciousness from their very roots in this world [1], and one is able to have within one's easy grasp the four traditional rewards or fruits that one is entitled to for all good conduct and leading an auspicious and righteous life<sup>1</sup>--verily, it is that supreme Lord whom you are all seeing in the form of Sri Ram, and Sita is the personified form of the divine Shakti (cosmic powers and authority) of that Lord [2].

[Hence, don't be surprised at or perplexed with what you behold and witness. This is not an ordinary prince or princess whose marriage you all have come to attend, rather it is a rarest of rare opportunity for all of us to be a part of this auspicious gathering and be witnessing the union of the Holy Lord with his cosmic Shakti. It's a phenomenon which we will not get another opportunity to witness again. So stop wondering and enjoy the moment, because your knowledge and understanding of this endless creation is limited, and you cannot measure what is essentially measureless and beyond comprehension.] (1-2)

[Note—See a detailed note appended to Doha no. 314 herein above.

<sup>1</sup>The four legendary rewards for meritorious life are the following—‘Artha’ or financial well-being, ‘Dharma’ or meritorious life, ‘Kaam’ or fulfilment of desires, and ‘Moksha’ or spiritual liberation and deliverance from this world consisting of an endless cycle of pain and miseries associated with birth and death.]

एहि बिधि संभु सुरन्ह समुझावा । पुनि आगें बर बसह चलावा ॥ ३ ॥
देवन्ह देखे दसरथु जाता । महामोद मन पुलकित गाता ॥ ४ ॥

ēhi bidhi sambhu suranha samujhāvā. puni āgēm bara basaha calāvā. 3. dēvanha dēkhē dasarathu jātā. mahāmōda mana pulakita gātā. 4.

Lord Shiva advised the gods in the aforesaid manner and told them to abandon being sceptical or amazed, but rather make the best of this rare privilege that has come their way (by enjoying themselves and rejoicing).

Having done this, he moved his bull (i.e. his mount, named ‘Nandi’) ahead (so that he can move along with the bridegroom’s party that was slowly heading towards the venue of the wedding ceremonies). (3)

The gods saw king Dasrath going towards the palace of king Janak where the marriage was to be solemnised. His heart and mind were filled with euphoria, and his body was thrilled with ecstasy. (4)

साधु समाज संग महिदेवा । जनु तनु धरें करहिं सुख सेवा ॥ ५ ॥
सोहत साथ सुभग सुत चारी । जनु अपबरग सकल तनुधारी ॥ ६ ॥ sādhu samāja saṅga mahidēvā. janu tanu dharēm karahim sukha sēvā. 5.

sōhata sātha subhaga suta cārī. janu apabaraga sakala tanudhārī. 6.

He (Dasrath) was surrounded by sages and other holy men such as Brahmins etc. It appeared that all the joys and happiness that one expects in this world have personified themselves in their forms to serve (i.e. surround) the king. [In other words, since Brahmins and holy men represent all auspicious virtues in this world, their presence around Dasrath gave the impression that all the goodness that exists in this world have assembled to serve him because he was blessed enough to have the supreme Lord of creation as his dear son. This was a privilege and honour that no one else got in this creation.]<sup>1</sup> (5)

All the four sons were with Dasrath. They represented personified forms of spiritual bliss, beatitude and felicity that a soul yearns for.<sup>2</sup> (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We have already read how all the good omens and signs of good fortunes had collected together at the time of departure of Lord Ram's marriage party from Ayodhya. Refer: Ram Charit Mana, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 303—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 304.

Refer also to Ram Charit Mana, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 302 which says that Dasrath alongside sage Vasistha, his royal priest, looked as majestic and grand as Indra, the king of gods, looked in the company of the guru of the gods known as Brihaspati (Jupiter).

<sup>2</sup>The four type of spiritual liberation that a creature's soul wishes to have are the following—Salokya, Samipya, Sarupya and Sayujya.

Salokya Mukti means to obtain the abode of the chosen deity which the worshipper worships.

Samipya Mukti means to reside close to the deity worshipped in its abode.

Sarupya Mukti means to attain a divine form which is similar to the deity worshipped.

Sayujya Mukti means to become one with the deity worshipped. In other words it means to merge oneself with the Lord God.

Any of these four types of Muktis give the creature's soul its much desired peace and bliss.]

मरकत कनक बरन बर जोरी । देखि सुरन्ह भै प्रीति न थोरी ॥ ७ ॥

पुनि रामहि बिलोकि हियँ हरषे । नृपहि सराहि सुमन तिन्ह बरषे ॥ ८ ॥ marakata kanaka barana bara jōrī. dēkhi suranha bhai prīti na thōrī. 7.

puni rāmahi bilōki hiyaṁ haraṣē. nrpahi sarāhi sumana tinha baraṣē. 8.

The affection that sprouted in (the heart of) the gods when they saw the two pairs of princes—one of the hue of emerald (i.e. dark-hued Lord Ram and his younger brother Bharat) and the other with the glow of gold (fair-complexioned Laxman and his younger brother Shatrughan)—was not of a small measure.

[In other words, the gods felt a huge wave of love and affection for the four forms of the Supreme Being that they beheld right in their front. The surge of love and affection was of an intense dimension, so deep and fathomless that it could not be measured; it was of 'no small measure'.] (7)

After watching all the four brothers, they looked at Lord Ram once again. And the Lord's divine sight filled them with delight and euphoria. They (the gods) praised the king (Dasrath) in glowing terms, and showered flowers (upon him).

[The gods looked at all the four brothers and were extremely pleased at this sight. But then they focused their attention on Lord Ram who was a personified form of Lord Vishnu, the supreme Lord of creation. Lord Ram was the 'hero' of the occasion, and the cynosure of all eyes that were fixed on him. The Lord was so charming to behold that his form captivated the mind and the heart of the beholder.] (8)

दो०. राम रूपु नख सिख सुभग बारहिं बार निहारि ।

पुलक गात लोचन सजल उमा समेत पुरारि ॥ ३१५ ॥

dōhā.

rāma rūpu nakha sikha subhaga bārahiṃ bāra nihāri.
pulaka gāta lōcana sajala umā samēta purāri. 315.

When Lord Purari (Shiva) and his divine consort Uma watched the most enchanting and beauteous form of Lord Ram from head to foot, they were so charmed and enthralled with this image that they looked at it repeatedly with a thrilled body that was overcome with exhilaration and eyes that were filled with tears (of love, affection, devotion and attraction for the Lord).

[This is because they were not contented by looking at the Lord's most endearing form. So, even after seeing it so many times, they continued to look at it again and again repeatedly.] (Doha no. 315)

[Note—When king Manu and his wife Satrupa had done severe penance to get a divine vision of Lord Vishnu, and the Lord had finally revealed himself before them, the couple was awe-struck by the Lord's divine beauty and charm so much so that no matter how intently they looked at him, they did not find it enough and wished to continue to see the Lord for an infinite period of time. It is with this purpose in mind—that they can watch the Lord from up close, and as much as their heart and eyes wanted—that they requested him to become their son. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 148—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 150.

Another instance is in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 260 where Bharat tells Lord Ram that he has never been contented by looking at the divine form of the Lord.]

चौ०. केकि कंठ दुति स्यामल अंगा । तड़ित बिनिंदक बसन सुरंगा ॥ १ ॥

ब्याह बिभूषन बिबिध बनाए । मंगल सब सब भाँति सुहाए ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

kēki kaṇṭha duti syāmala aṅgā. taḍita binindaka basana suraṅgā. 1.
byāha bibhūṣana bibidha banā'ē. maṅgala saba saba bhāmṭi suhā'ē. 2.

[These four verses describe the stunning beauty of the image or form of Lord Ram as he headed towards the venue of the wedding ceremony to be solemnised in the palace of king Janak. This description should be compared with the one that describes the Lord's beautiful form at the time he came to the venue of the bow-breaking ceremony as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chuapai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 243—to Chuapai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 244.]

Lord Ram's glowing complexion was of a radiant dark hue that resembled the glow of a peacock's neck<sup>1</sup>, while the clothes that he wore were of different colours and dazzled like the brilliance of lightening<sup>2</sup>. (1)

His entire body had been gracefully decorated with fabulous ornaments especially crafted in numerous designs and patterns especially for the occasion of the Lord's marriage, and all of them bore auspicious signs, were most pleasant and wonderful to look at. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The peacock is enamoured of the rain-bearing clouds because as soon as this bird hears the distant rumbling of the approaching clouds, or sees them overhead in the sky, it becomes ecstatic and begins to dance. The complexion of Lord Ram's body is universally depicted in all the versions of the Ramayan as being 'blue or azure' like the colour of the sky. The basic philosophy behind this choice of colour is that Lord Ram is a personified form of 'Brahm', the all-pervading, all-encompassing, cosmic, invisible and attribute-less form of the Supreme Being. This form of Brahm that surrounds everything and permeates everywhere in this creation is best manifested in the form of the 'sky element' which is the subtlest of the five basic elements of creation. The other elements are air, fire, water and earth.

A true lover gets so submerged in the thoughts of his or her beloved that he or she becomes one with the latter—i.e. there remains no distinction between the lover and the beloved. This emotional state of affairs is metaphorically depicted by way of saying that they become alike in colour.

Here, the narrator of Lord Ram's divine story is none else but Lord Shiva himself—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 11 that precedes Doha no. 35. And it well established that Lord Shiva has a blue or purple tinged throat. This is why he is also known as 'Neel-Kantha', the Lord with a blue throat. Lord Shiva is a great admirer and devotee of Lord Ram, and therefore he, being the one who is narrating this divine story, has used the metaphor of the peacock's neck to indicate that when he (i.e. Lord Shiva) was watching Lord Ram at that moment, he (Shiva) was so lost in the huge waves of love and affection that heaved in his heart for his beloved Lord (Ram) that he could see no other colour but the one of his 'own self' being reflected in the complexion of Lord Ram.

<sup>2</sup>Usually Lord Ram is depicted as wearing a 'Pitambar' which is a long, yellow body-wrapping one-piece silk cloth that is worn by Lord Vishnu whose incarnation he was. But the last word used in this verse is 'Suranga', which means multiple colours that are auspicious and charming, but not necessarily yellow. This is justified because this is the occasion of the Lord's marriage, and a groom is decked up in all finery for this once-in-his-life-time occasion. The best of cloth and the best of combination of colours were used to make the garments and robes of Lord Ram for this most happy moment of his life. This will be clearly hinted in the next verse no. 2 that deals with the Lord's ornaments.]

सरद बिमल बिधु बदन सुहावन । नयन नवल राजीव लजावन ॥ ३ ॥

सकल अलौकिक सुंदरताई । कहि न जाइ मनहीं मन भाई ॥ ४ ॥

sarada bimala bidhu badanu suhāvana. nayana navala rājīva lajāvana. 3.
sakala alaukika sundaratā'ī. kahi na jā'i manahīm mana bhā'ī. 4.

His (Lord Ram's) countenance and appearance were as charming, enthralling and captivating in their charm, enthrallment and bewitching beauty as the full moon is in a cloudless night of autumn.

His eyes were of a pink hue that reminded one of a pair of fully blooming lotus flowers of this colour<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Taken all-in-all, the Lord's glamorous form was so exceptionally magnificent and fabulous that it was simply incomparable and beyond description as if it was out of this world and had an heavenly dimension to it. It enchanted the Mana (mind and heart) of the beholder, but since the Mana lacked eyes to see and a mouth to speak about it, it felt unable to describe the astounding beauty and charm of the countenance and image of Lord Ram<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When the sky is cloudless in autumn, the full disc of the moon appears the most beautiful as compared to other nights throughout the year. Hence, this analogy is used to stress that since this day was a very special day in the life of Lord Ram, as he was going to be married that day, his face glowed with a radiance that had a special splendour to it. It does not mean at all that the glory of the Lord's face dimmed on other occasions or days, but it is a poet's way of giving importance to a particular event in the Lord's life—which is the day of his marriage.

Meanwhile, the Lord's eyes are compared to a pink lotus which is regarded as the most healthy and attractive form of this flower.

<sup>2</sup>The eyes that beheld the Lord's beauty had no power to speak, and the mouth that could describe had no eyes, so none of them were fully equipped and competent to narrate what they saw or spoke about. Emotions of affection and love have their seat in the heart, while the mind controls all the sense organs and their conscious functions. Unfortunately, neither the heart nor the mind themselves have their own powers to see and speak, and the body of a living being has to depend upon the eye to see and the mouth to speak. The eye and the mouth are separate and independent units of the body like the heart and the mind. Hence, the 'Mana' (mind-heart complex) could not describe what it saw in terms of the fabulously magnificent view of the image of Lord Ram decked up in all finery as a groom heading to the venue of his wedding ceremony.]

बंधु मनोहर सोहहिं संग। जात नचावत चपल तुरंगा ॥ ५ ॥

राजकुअँर बर बाजि देखावहिं । बंस प्रसंसक बिरिद सुनावहिं ॥ ६ ॥ bandhu manōhara sōhahim saṅgā. jāta nacāvata capala turāṅgā. 5.

rājaku'amṛa bara bāji dēkhāvahim. bansa prasansaka birida sunāvahim. 6.

[The next four verses, i.e. nos. 5-8, describe the horses upon which the four brothers rode.]

The (four) brothers looked elegant as they moved ahead together on their agile steeds whom they made to dance lively and prance with sprightly steps. (5)

The other princes who were accompanying them (i.e. the many friends of Lord Ram who had come from Ayodhya and other kingdoms to participate in the Lord's marriage function) also showed their respective well-groomed horses and their skills, while the royal bards who accompanied these princes recited verses in their honour, praising their respective families and their glories and achievements<sup>1</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 249.]

जेहि तुरंग पर रामु बिराजे । गति बिलोकि खगनायकु लाजे ॥ ७ ॥
कहि न जाइ सब भाँति सुहावा । बाजि बेषु जनु काम बनावा ॥ ८ ॥ jēhi turaṅga para rāmu birājē. gati bilōki khaganāyaku lājē. 7.

kahi na jā'i saba bhāmṭi suhāvā. bāji bēṣu janu kāma banāvā. 8.

Even the king of birds, i.e. 'Garud', the Eagle who is regarded as a vehicle of Lord Vishnu, felt ashamed when he saw the speed and agility and nimbleness of the horse on which Lord Ram rode<sup>1</sup>. (7)

The horse on which Lord Ram rode was so astonishingly wonderful and charming to behold that it is not possible to describe its beauty and magnificence. It looked as if Kamdeo, the god of beauty and charm, has himself assumed the form of a horse to serve the Lord personally<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Traditionally Garud is regarded as the fastest creature in creation. Whenever Lord Vishnu wishes to go anywhere he summons Garud, and the latter takes the Lord to his desired destination in a fraction of a second. But when Garud watched the way the horse of Lord Ram moved with quick, sprightly and nimble steps that had a spring-action in them, his pride of being the fastest mover in this creation was crushed. Garud realized for once that it is the Lord who empowers him (Garud) to move with lightening speed, and this quality of moving with such phenomenally quick speed is not something over which Garud had any personal right as is proved now when the horse upon which Lord Ram was sitting was also able to move with equally quick steps like the ones for which Garud was so falsely proud of.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Ram is a personified form of the Supreme Being, and thus he represents the best of everything, the best of qualities and virtues in this creation. This fact is clearly hinted in Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precedes Doha no. 19.

'Beauty' is a word that symbolises the best things in this world, for its opposite word is 'ugly' that would stand for everything that is unworthy, unholy and bad. This being the case, it is naturally expected that the horse the Lord rode should also be a match for the beauty of the Lord; it should be the best of all the horses in creation. Since 'beauty' is used as a measurement for the good virtues of life, and since the god who personifies this quality in its physical form is Kamdeo, so the latter decided not to delegate this duty of beautifying the Lord's mount to anybody else but to do it himself. And hence he became a horse to serve Lord Ram.

Refer also to the Chanda that follows herein below.]

छं०. जनु बाजि बेषु बनाइ मनसिजु राम हित अति सोहई । १ ।
 आपनें बय बल रूप गुन गति सकल भुवन बिमोहई ॥ २ ॥
 जगमगत जीनु जराव जोति सुमोति मनि मानिक लगे । ३ । किंकिनि ललाम लगामु ललित बिलोकि सुर नर मुनि ठगे ॥ ४ ॥

chanda.

janu bāji bēṣu banā'i manasiju rāma hita ati sōha'ī. 1.
 āpanēm baya bala rūpa guna gati sakala bhuvana bimōha'ī. 2.
 jagamagata jīnu jarāva jōti sumōti mani mānika lagē. 3.
 kiṅkini lālāma lagāmu lalita bilōki sura nara muni ṭhagē. 4.

It appears that the god of beauty and charm (known as 'Kamdeo') has himself assumed the form of a steed in order to serve Lord Ram, and in the process acquire acclaim and honour for himself. (1)

In this physical form, he (Kamdeo as the horse) appears to enthrall and fascinate the entire world with his youthfulness, his strength and vigour, his astounding beauty and charm, and his excellent qualities and virtues as well as personality. (2)

The horse's saddle is bejeweled and glittering with the illumination emanating from the pearls, the precious gems and the rubies that are embedded on all its sides. (3)

The magnificent bridle is adorned with small tinkling bells, and it looks so fabulous that the exalted gods, the ordinary men and the great sages who saw it were dazed and awe-struck by its beauty and the soft sound made by its tiny bells (as the horse danced, swayed and moved forward). (4) [Chanda line nos. 1-4]

[Note—Kamdeo is eternally beautiful and is the only god whose physically attractive and captivating form that has an exceptional charm is cited by way of an example whenever the concepts of beauty, magnificence, attractiveness, passion and charm are to be depicted.

So, though he is inherently beautiful and charming, being closely associated with the Supreme Lord of this creation in the form of Lord Ram and making the Lord sit on his back on a very special event when all the gods, the humans and the sages are in attendance, closely observing the beauty of the Lord to fill their eyes with this magnificent sight, gave Kamdeo a special occasion, a special chance to show-case his own beauty and draw attention of the world towards himself.

Kamdeo was very clever for he had very wisely realized that if he joined the ranks of the other gods and watched the Lord's marriage function along with them, then he will be lost in the sea of so many handsome, good-looking gods and beautiful, bewitching goddesses, all of them dressed in their finest and presenting themselves in the best manner possible. No one will pay any attention to him. But now when he became a horse and Lord Ram sat on his back, Kamdeo became the cynosure of all eyes; he became the center of attention as well as attraction. And to this was added the rare honour of being able to serve the Lord during a happy event during his sojourn on earth.

Remember: All the other gods would get an opportunity to serve the Lord in their forms as monkeys and bears as directed by the old patriarch Brahma, the creator, who had advised them to assume these forms and serve Lord Vishnu when he manifests himself on earth as Lord Ram—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 187 and Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that follow it.

But unfortunately for Kamdeo, he was apparently not assigned any duty. Not to be outdone, he decided to serve Lord Ram in the happiest moment of his life—that of his marriage.

Now, come to think of it—Kamdeo had overtaken the other gods hands down to serve the Lord in a very special way, and in this he was very privileged and blessed. Well, this is because while the other gods would serve Lord Ram in the forest during a sad and unpleasant phase in the Lord's life, when he was grieving at having lost his dear wife Sita who was abducted by the demon king Ravana, by helping him to collect a huge army of monkeys and bears, crossing the mighty ocean and conquering Lanka by defeating Ravana, Kamdeo, on the other hand, had served the Lord when he was enjoying every moment of the time that passed because it was a happy occasion of his marriage.]

दो०. प्रभु मनसहिं लयलीन मनु चलत बाजि छबि पाव ।

भूषित उड़गन तड़ित घनु जनु बर बरहि नचाव ॥ ३१६ ॥

dōhā.

prabhu manasahim layalīna manu calata bāji chabi pāva.

bhūṣita uḍagana taḍita ghanu janu bara barahi nacāva. 316.

The beauty of the horse was magnified manifold by the fact that its 'Mana' (mind and heart) was completely in sync with that of Lord Ram so much so that the former could understand what the Lord wanted, and it danced and moved in accordance to the Lord's wishes even without the Lord giving any overt instructions to it.

This complete compatibility, coordination and synchronization between the moves of the horse and the wish of the Lord reminded one of the way the rain-bearing dark cloud that is illuminated by the dazzle of lightening in the sky that is studded with twinkling stars is able to make a charmed peacock dance voluntarily and merrily on its own in step with the rumble and thunder of the cloud. (Doha no. 316)

[Note—Here, Lord Ram is compared to the dark rain-bearing cloud because of his dark complexion. The horse is likened to the peacock that looks very beautiful when it opens its feathers and dances as soon as it sights this cloud. The sound emanating from the tiny tinkling bells attached to the bridle is like the gentle rumble of the cloud; the gems, rubies and pearls attached to the saddle are like the countless stars in the sky; and the way they dazzle and shine reminds one of the frequent streaks of lightening that pass through the cloud.

The remarkable thing to note in this imagery is this: When dark clouds appear in the sky, the stars vanish from sight; only lightening and rumble of the cloud remain. It will be noted here that the gems and pearls are embedded in the saddle upon which Lord Ram sits, and obviously when the horse moves and dances these gems would be hidden from sight as the body of the Lord shifts on the saddle and the ceremonial robes that he wears covers the sides of the saddle completely.

On the other hand, the bridle and its reins are not hidden from view, and the Lord holds the rein in his hands. The bells are attached to it, and it is also bejeweled. So this long rein and decorated bridle would represent the streak of lightening, and the soft sound of the tiny bells attached to them would be like the rumble of the cloud.]

चौ०. जेहिं बर बाजि रामु असवारा । तेहि सारदउ न बरनै पारा ॥ १ ॥

संकरु राम रूप अनुरागे । नयन पंचदस अति प्रिय लागे ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

jēhiṁ bara bāji rāmu asavārā. tēhi sārada'u na baranai pārā. 1.
saṅkaru rāma rūpa anurāgē. nayana pañcadasa ati priya lāgē. 2.

[Summarizing the beauty and the good luck of the horse on which Lord Ram was sitting, the horse who actually was the god named Kamdeo in its physical form, Tulsidas says—] Even Sarda, the goddess of speech and knowledge, would not be able to describe the horse on which Lord Ram rode (as the Lord proceeded towards the pavilion where his marriage was to be solemnised)<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Lord Shiva was completely enthralled by the beauteous image of Lord Ram, and he loved to have fifteen eyes (which enabled him to see the divine image of the Lord more clearly and intensely)<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The discussion about the horse of Lord Ram commenced in Chaupai line no. 7 that preceded Doha no. 316, and the present verse concludes this description.

Another important point to note here is that the horse on which Lord Ram rode has been singled out to be the one whose beauty and good luck cannot be described by Sarda. This is important because otherwise it would be construed that all the horses—such as the ones on which Lord Ram's other brothers rode as well as those on which their friends and other princes who had come to attend the marriage ceremony rode—were of equal beauty and magnificence. This was not the case simply because the god of beauty and magnificence, i.e. Kamdeo, had himself assumed the form of a horse to serve Lord Ram, whereas all the other horses were ordinary animals, though they were all thoroughbreds and chosen with great perfection. A distinction had to be made.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Shiva has three eyes—two conventional eyes and one additional eye in the center of the forehead above the root of the nose. This third eye is known as the eye of wisdom, and it symbolizes Shiva's most exalted spiritual stature as the god who has realized the supreme truth of his own 'self'. The three-eyed Shiva is known as 'Trayambak'.

The Brihajjabal Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition, in its Brahman 4, verse no. 29 says that the Lord has three eyes, and hence called 'Trinetrum'. This third eye represents the 'fire element'. Refer: The Yogtattva Upanishad of Krishna Yajur Veda tradition, verse nos. 92-94 which say that Lord Shiva, in his form as Rudra, is the patron deity and personification of the fire element.

The Tripura Tapini Upanishad, Canto 4, verse no. 11 says that Shiva represents the third state of consciousness known as the Sushupta state, and this is symbolized by the third eye which burns all delusions.

Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 92 which reiterates that Shiva has ‘three eyes’.

Shiva is also said to have five heads, thereby giving him the name ‘Panch Mukhi’. This fact is mentioned in Yogtattva Upanishad, verse no. 100 which says that “as the deity of the sky element, Lord Shiva has a moon tucked in his lock of hairs, besides having five mouths, ten arms and three eyes.

Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 220 which reiterates that Shiva has ‘five heads’.

This being the case, the total number of eyes are 5 heads x 3 eyes in each head = 15 eyes.

There are instances in Ram Charit Manas where we find Lord Shiva being completely captivated and enchanted by the beauteous image of Lord Ram whom he adores and worships as his revered deity. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 50 when Lord Shiva saw Lord Ram while he was returning home after paying a visit to the hermitage of sage Agastya; (ii) Chanda line no. 10 that precedes Doha no. 511 where Ahilya has acknowledged this fact of Shiva loving the sight of Lord Ram’s beautiful image when she was offering her prayers to the latter; (iii) Doha no. 315 above which also says the same thing.]

हरि हित सहित रामु जब जोहे । रमा समेत रमापति मोहे ॥ ३ ॥

निरखि राम छबि बिधि हरषाने । आठइ नयन जानि पछिताने ॥ ४ ॥

hari hita sahita rāmu jaba jōhē. ramā samēta ramāpati mōhē. 3.
nirakhi rāma chabi bidhi haraṣānē. āṭha'i nayana jāni pachitānē. 4.

When both Ramapati (“ramāpati”; i.e. Lord Vishnu) and his divine consort Rama (“ramā”; i.e. goddess Laxmi) watched Lord Ram along with his wonderful horse (“Hari”), they were so enthralled at this fascinating and beautiful sight that both of them gazed at it intently, feeling amazed and dazed<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Watching intently the beauteous image of Lord Ram, the creator Bidhi (Brahma) was exhilarated, but he regretted that he has only eight eyes (as compared to Shiva who could enjoy this beautiful image of Lord Ram with his fifteen eyes)<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word “Hari” has many connotations—such as a horse, the sun, a monkey, and of course Lord Vishnu. Now, this is very interesting: Lord Vishnu has himself manifested in the form of Lord Ram on the request of the gods and mother earth so that the cruel demons can be eliminated—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-7 that precede Doha no. 187.

Therefore, the meaning of this verse has a profound metaphysical import—it succinctly brings into focus the great metaphysical and spiritual philosophy as propounded by the Upanishads. Lord Vishnu represents the ‘super Consciousness’ that is also known as the ‘Parmatma’, the supreme Atma or the supreme Soul or the supreme Holy Spirit of creation, while Lord Ram is an image of this very Parmatma that is seen in a gross world that is unable to perceive anything that is subtle and sublime but can easily see that which is gross. The Atma or the soul that resides in the physical gross body of someone that the ignorant world likes to recognize as ‘Ram’, the prince of Ayodhya, is the same cosmic Atma or the supreme Consciousness that is a universal and all-pervading entity which has a subtle and sublime dimension. Vishnu is the cosmic form of the super Consciousness, while Lord Ram is the gross form of the same Consciousness that reveals it's self in a physical gross body of a prince. Lord Ram embodies the universal Holy Spirit that is revealed in his form.

In simple terms this verse means that Vishnu, who is the primary Parmatma, was watching his own image in the form of Lord Ram, and the former was stunned at the beauty of his own image which made him wonder how beautiful he actually was. Let us take an example to understand this phenomenon. We cannot see our own selves without the help of a reflecting surface such as a mirror upon which an image can be formed. So, Vishnu did not know hitherto how beautiful was his cosmic form, known as the Viraat Purush in the Upanishads, until he saw it being reflected in the image of Lord Ram!

It is such a wonderful idea depicted in such a wonderful way that one is left dumbfounded and with all praises for the intellectual maturity of the poet Tulsidas who has written this holy book Ram Charit Manas.

Now, the next question is: why was Rama (Laxmi) captivated by the beautiful image of Lord Ram? Well, the answer is obvious and simple: it was for the first time she was seeing her own divine consort Lord Vishnu in a physical form that can be viewed with eyes, because hitherto she could not see how beautiful Vishnu was as he lived in his primary cosmic form as the Viraat Purush that is invisible. In other words, since Lord Ram was the 'visible' form of the primarily 'invisible' Vishnu, Laxmi was stunned at her Lord's beauty.

<sup>2</sup>Brahma, the creator, has four heads, and therefore eight eyes. 4 heads x 2 eyes in each head = 8 eyes.

In iconography, Brahma is depicted as an old sage with four heads or mouths that represent the four Vedas (Rik, Sam, Yajur and Atharva), the four Yugs (eras or epochs—Sata, Treta, Dwapar and Kali), the four main directions (north, east, south and west), the four Varanas (classes of the society—Brahmin, Kshatriya, Vaishya and Shudra), and the four Ashrams (phases of life—Brahmacharya, Grishastya, Vaanprastha and Sanyas).

He regretted that he is unable to enjoy the divine sight of Lord Ram as much as Shiva who has fifteen eyes, Lord Kartikeya who has twelve eyes, and even Indra, the king of gods, who is said to have thousands of eyes on his body that are represented by the holes created on it by a curse of sage Gautam.]

सुर सेनप उर बहुत उछाहू । बिधि ते डेवढ़ लोचन लाहू ॥ ५ ॥

रामहि चितव सुरेस सुजाना । गौतम श्रापु परम हित माना ॥ ६ ॥

sura sēnapa ura bahuta uchāhū. bidhi tē dēvar̥ha lōcana lāhū. 5.
rāmahi citava surēsa sujānā. gautama śrāpu parama hita mānā. 6.

The commander of the army of gods (i.e. Lord Kartikeya<sup>1</sup> who is also known as 'Shadanan', the one with six heads) felt very happy that he has one-and-a-half times more eyes than Bidhi (Brahma), and so is able to take in the visual delight of viewing the magnificent image of Lord Ram by that enhanced number. (5)

When the king of gods (i.e. Indra) gazed at Lord Ram, he was so glad (to be able to view the stunning beauty of the Lord) that for once he felt blessed for the curse of sage Gautam<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Kartikeya is the son of Lord Shiva and Parvati, and he has six heads. This gives him another name of 'Shadaanan'—the Lord with six heads. Each head has two eyes, and hence the total numbers of eyes are: 6 heads x 2 eyes each = 12 eyes.

According to legends, he was reared by six divine celestial mothers who personified the constellation called Krittikaa (or Pleiades), hence the name 'Kartikeya'. He assumed six faces to suckle milk from all these six mothers, hence called 'Shadaanan'—one with six heads or mouths.

<sup>2</sup>The story goes that once sage Gautam found Indra, who was very lascivious and sexually pervert by nature inspite of being the king of gods, in an uncompromising state with his wife Ahilya. The sage was so infuriated that he cursed Ahilya to become a stone, and Indra to have his body perforated with thousands of holes that would enable him to look at women with them.

Now, though this curse made Indra look ugly and unable to hide his evil deed because wherever he went everyone could see those holes and remember how pervert and sinful he had been, this curse proved to be a blessing in disguise for him now as he was able to watch Lord Ram with all these thousands of eyes.]

देव सकल सुरपतिहि सिहाहीं । आजु पुरंदर सम कोउ नाहीं ॥ ७ ॥
मुदित देवगन रामहि देखी । नृपसमाज दुहुँ हरषु बिसेषी ॥ ८ ॥

dēva sakala surapatihi sihāhīm. āju purandara sama kō'u nāhīm. 7.
mudita dēvagana rāmahi dēkhī. nr̥pasamāja duhum̐ haraṣu bisēṣī. 8.

All the gods were in full praise for their king (Indra), saying—'Today, no one is as lucky and fortunate as 'Purandar' (i.e. the one who demolishes the city of his enemies; their king Indra who defeats the enemies of gods).<sup>1</sup>' (7)

Verily, all the gods (Brahma, Shiva, Vishnu, Kartikeya, Indra and the rest of them) were euphoric and rejoiced at the sight of Lord Ram (who looked fabulous and magnificent in his fully bejeweled and decorated form as a groom astride a magnificent horse).

Likewise, all the members of the royal courts of the two kingdoms (of Ayodhya and Janakpur) were also exhilarated beyond measure. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The gods were virtually jealous of Indra because none of them had 'thousands' of eyes as he so that they could enjoy the divine view of Lord Ram as much as he could. Brahma had eight eyes, Shiva had fifteen eyes, Kartikeya had twelve eyes, and the rest of the gods had two eyes each. So in this context, Indra was the luckiest one.]

छं०. अति हरषु राजसमाज दुहु दिसि दुंदुभीं बाजहिं घनी । १ ।

बरषहिं सुमन सुर हरषि कहि जय जयति जय रघुकुलमनी ॥ २ ॥
 एहि भाँति जानि बरात आवत बाजने बहु बाजहीं । ३ । रानी सुआसिनि बोलि परिछनि हेतु मंगल साजहीं ॥ ४ ॥

chanda.

ati haraṣu rājasamāja duhu disi dundubhīm bājahim ghanī. 1.
 baraṣahim sumana sura haraṣi kahi jaya jayati jaya raghukulamanī. 2.
 ēhi bhāmṭi jāni barāta āvata bājanē bahu bājahim. 3.
 rānī su'āsini bōli parichani hētu maṅgala sājahim. 4.

There was exceptionally great amount of euphoria and happiness among the members of the two royal courts as well as the subjects of the two kingdoms (of Ayodhya and Janakpur). Kettle drums were played loudly and enthusiastically on both the sides. (1)

The exhilarated gods showered flowers (from the sky) to celebrate the occasion, exclaiming in ecstasy, 'Hail, Hail; Glory to the Lord who is like a jewel (the best, the most exalted and an excellent member) of king Raghu's family (or dynasty).' (2)

In this way, amid rejoicings and merriment, when it became known within the city (of Janakpur) that the marriage procession has arrived and is approaching the venue of the wedding ceremony, many sorts of musical instruments started playing. (3)

Meanwhile, as soon as queen Sunayana (the mother of Sita) heard of this good news, she summoned well-decked up ladies whose husbands were alive, and began arranging auspicious items to prepare to welcome the groom when he arrives<sup>1</sup>. (4) [Chanda line nos. 1-4.]

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The auspicious items were arranged on large plates and kept ready. Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 3 describes what these were supposed to be—fresh curd, blades of dark grass known as Durva (pronounced “Durvaa”), a paste made from cow's dung, urine and bile, fresh leaves of the Basil plant, lighted earthen lamps, rice and other cereals, and so on.]

दो०. सजि आरती अनेक बिधि मंगल सकल सँवारि । चलीं मुदित परिछनि करन गजगामिनि बर नारि ॥ ३१७ ॥

dōhā.

saji āratī anēka bidhi maṅgala sakala samvāri.
 calīm mudita parichani karana gajagāmini bara nāri. 317.

Having arranged, in a variety of ways, all the auspicious items needed to perform the ritual of the Aarti<sup>1</sup> (showing of lighted lamps to the honoured guest who in this case was Lord Ram, the groom), these beautiful and charming ladies, who walked with an elegance and majesty of a healthy adult elephant, moved forward cheerfully to welcome the groom, perform his Aarti, and make their offerings to him. (Doha no. 317)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>There were many ladies in the group headed by queen Sunayana that went out to receive Lord Ram and his party. Each of these ladies held a plate decorated with auspicious paraphernalia needed to do the Aarti. They arranged the items needed for this ritual in different ways according to their liking. This shows that there was a lot of freedom and an informal environment of rejoicing when everyone had the freedom to enjoy the occasion in the best way he or she wished.]

चौ०. बिधुबदनीं सब सब मृगलोचनि । सब निज तन छबि रति मदु मोचनि । १ ।
 पहिरें बरन बरन बर चीरा । सकल बिभूषन सजें सरीरा ॥ २ ॥
 सकल सुमंगल अंग बनाएँ । करहिं गान कलकंठि लजाएँ । ३ । कंकन किंकिनि नूपुर बाजहिं । चालि बिलोकि काम गज लाजहिं ॥ ४ ॥

caupāī.

bidhubadanīṁ saba saba mṛgalōcani. saba nija tana chabi rati madu mōcani.

1.

pahirēm barana barana bara cīrā. sakala bibhūṣana sajēm sarīrā. 2.

sakala sumaṅgala aṅga banā'ēm. karahiṁ gāna kalakaṇṭhi lajā'ēm. 3.

kaṅkana kiṅkini nūpura bājahiṁ. cālī bilōki kāma gaja lājahiṁ. 4.

[Verse nos. 1-4 describe the ladies who had gone to extend a ceremonial welcome to Lord Ram by doing his Aarti and offering auspicious gifts to him. These verses are a natural flow from Doha no. 317 and its preceding verses.]

All the ladies who had gone with decorated plates full of auspicious items to ceremonially welcome the groom, Lord Ram, were pretty to look at, had young and handsome bodies with doe eyes. They were so good-looking and elegant in their demeanours and bearings that they trounced the pride of Rati, the consort of the god of beauty (known as Kamdeo), as being the most beautiful, elegant, attractive and handsome lady in creation. (1)

These charming ladies wore magnificent clothes of varying colours, designs and textures. Their entire bodies were decorated with ornaments of different varieties. [Ladies wore an assortment of ornaments such as earrings, nose-rings, bracelets, armlets, neck-bands, necklaces, waist-bands, anklets, toe-rings and so on.] (2)

Their limbs were further beautified by marks of auspicious signs and special ornamentations (showing that they are of noble birth, belong to the higher strata of society, are married with husbands who were still alive, and other such signs that women sport during auspicious moments)#. They sang melodious songs in a pleasant and sweet voice that would put to shame the sweet voice of the cuckoo*.

[#Some of the common marks are application of vermilion powder on the head, a 'dot' painted in the middle of the forehead, the 'Mangal Sutra' worn around the neck signifying that the ladies are married with a living husband, palms of hands and soles of legs painted with a dye, and so on.

*The girls who had accompanied Sita at the time of her appearing at the venue of the bow-breaking ceremony had also sung sweet songs. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 248.] (3)

As they moved, a pleasant sound emanated from the bristling of bracelets they wore, as well as from the chiming of tiny bells attached to their waist-bands and anklets.

They moved with such a majestic gait that the elephant of Kamdeo* (the god who prides himself as being the most elegant, handsome and dignified in this creation) felt that it has been humiliated for being falsely proud of its majestic gait and bearing.

[*Kamdeo rides an elephant, and the manner in which a healthy young elephant walks is usually cited by poets and bards when they need to describe the majestic way a person of high stature and position moves—a series of swaying, robust, confident steps, overstepping obstacles easily.] (4)

[Note—When the word was sent out from the royal palace that ladies were to be selected to represent the kingdom of Janakpur at the time of the formal welcoming ceremony where an Aarti of the groom, Lord Ram, was to be done, a number of candidates must have appeared for the so-called selection process, and out of them those who were the most charming with a pleasant personality were selected to accompany queen Sunayana.

We can assume that a similar situation must have prevailed when young girls were to be selected to accompany Sita to the venue of the bow-breaking ceremony. The girls who would accompany Sita were expected to be not only of having astounding beauty but also possessing intelligence and wit. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, line no. 2 of Doha no. 246.

Great diligence was exerted in this selection process because these ladies would represent the women-folk of the entire kingdom of Janakpur in the eyes of the guests coming from Ayodhya which was another great kingdom known for its handsome citizens. In other words, the best ladies had accompanied queen Sunayana when she went to welcome Lord Ram and other guests of the marriage party.]

बाजहिं बाजने बिबिध प्रकारा । नभ अरु नगर सुमंगलचारा ॥ ५ ॥
 सची सारदा रमा भवानी । जे सुरतिय सुचि सहज सयानी ॥ ६ ॥
 कपट नारि बर बेष बनाई । मिलीं सकल रनिवासहिं जाई ॥ ७ ॥ करहिं गान कल मंगल बानी । हरष बिबस सब काहुँ न जानीं ॥ ८ ॥ bājahim bājanē bibidha prakārā. nabha aru nagara sumaṅgalacārā. 5.

 sacī sārādā ramā bhavānī. jē suratiya suci sahaja sayānī. 6.
 kapaṭa nāri bara bēṣa banā'ī. milim sakala ranivāsahim jā'ī. 7.
 karahim gāna kala maṅgala bānīm. haraṣa bibasa saba kāhum' na jānīm. 8.

Musical instruments of varying kinds were played, and auspicious hymns were chanted both on the ground as well as in the sky (heaven)<sup>1</sup>. (5)

[Verse nos. 6-8 narrate how the different goddesses had assumed human forms to join in the celebrations. They mingled with other ladies so much so that it was impossible to distinguish between them.]

Sachi (the consort of Indra, the king of gods), Sarda (also known as Saraswati, the consort of Brahma the creator), Rama (also known as Laxmi, the divine consort of Lord Vishnu), and Bhavani (also known as Uma or Parvati, the divine consort of Lord Shiva), along with other consorts of exalted gods who were chaste, wise and intelligent [6], assumed the illusionary form of a human female, and all of them mingled indistinguishably with other members of the royal household (of king Janak) [7]. (6-7)

They (i.e. the goddesses in human forms) too joined in the singing of auspicious melodious songs in a sweet voice. Everyone (i.e. all the members of the royal family as well as other ladies of the kingdom) was so overwhelmed with joy and euphoria at that time that none of them could realize who these ladies were<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>On the ground, hymns and laudatory verses were recited by the Brahmins and bards, while in the sky it was done by the gods and celestial singers such as Kinnars.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 319.

<sup>2</sup>The atmosphere of celebration and rejoicing was so overpowering that no human lady could realize that great goddesses were personally present amongst them and participating in the ceremonies like ordinary women-folk, as their close friends and compatriots. It was a wonder of astounding proportions, and the presence of these divine goddesses lent a special air of divinity, holiness, splendour and unqualified magnificence to the existing atmosphere of celebrations, euphoria and rejoicing.]

छं०. को जान केहि आनंद बस सब ब्रह्म बर परिछन चली । १ ।
कल गान मधुर निसान बरषहिं सुमन सुर सोभा भली ॥ २ ॥
आनंदकंदु बिलोकि दूलहु सकल हियँ हरषित भई । ३ । अंभोज अंबक अंबु उमगि सुअंग पुलकावलि छई ॥ ४ ॥

chanda.

kō jāna kēhi ānanda basa saba brahmu bara parichana calī. 1.
kala gāna madhura nisāna baraṣahim sumana sura sōbhā bhalī. 2.
ānandakandu bilōki dūlahu sakala hiyaṁ haraṣita bha'ī. 3.
ambhōja ambaka ambu umagi su'aṅga pulakāvali cha'ī. 4.

Who would bother to scrutinize or worry about others and their identities as everyone was overwhelmed with ecstasy and submerged in euphoria marking the happy occasion? All the ladies moved forward to offer their greetings and obeisance to Brahm, the Supreme Being in the form of the groom Lord Ram. (Chanda line no. 1)

Sweet and melodious songs were being sung, kettle-drums were being played with a soft sound, and the gods were showering flowers from the sky to make the event very charming and auspicious. (Chanda line no. 2)

All the ladies were overwhelmed with a sense of immense happiness and contentedness in their hearts when they saw the groom (Lord Ram) who was like a treasury of bliss and happiness in a personified form. (Chanda line no. 3)

Their lotus-like eyes welled-up with tears of love and affection for the Lord (of their heart and dream), and their bodies were thrilled beyond measure. (Chanda line no. 4)

[Note—Refer: Tulsidas' book "Janki Mangal", verse nos. 131—136 which also describe these events.]

दो०. जो सुखु भा सिय मातु मन देखि राम बर बेषु । सो न सकहिं कहि कलप सत सहस सारदा सेषु ॥ ३१८ ॥

dōhā.

jō sukhu bhā siya mātu mana dēkhi rāma bara bēṣu.
sō na sakahiṁ kahi kalapa sata sahasa sārādā sēṣu. 318.

The extent and dimension of happiness and joy that sprouted in the heart of the mother of Sita when she saw Lord Ram dressed as a groom was so profound and intense<sup>1</sup> that this feeling defied description by either Sarda (goddess Saraswati, the patron goddess of speech) or the thousand-tongued Seshnath even if they had tried for a thousand years to attempt to narrate it<sup>2</sup>. (Doha no. 318)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The mother of Sita, Sunayana, was always longing to have Lord Ram as the groom for her daughter Sita. This is clearly pointed out in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Doha no. 255—to Chaupai line nos. 3 that precedes Doha no. 257 which describe her anxiety before Lord Ram had broken the bow, and in Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 263 which describes her sense of relief and great happiness after the Lord had broken the bow to ensure his marriage with Sita.

<sup>2</sup>It is a usual practice with poets that when they want to stress that something is very great and profound so much so that they cannot find words to adequately describe it, they employ this method of citing the inability of Saraswati and Seshnath to do it, because it means that if these two deities cannot narrate certain thing or event then it is impossible for humans to do so.

To cite an example of this symbolic way of showing that a scene is exceptionally beautiful so much so that words cannot do justice for it, we can refer to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 317 which deals with the horse on which Lord Ram is riding.

We shall read below that when Lord Ram and his three brothers returned to Ayodhya with their brides, the sight of the four couples were so fabulous that Sarda had tried to find a comparison but had failed inspite of her best efforts. So she decided to abandon her scholarship and instead enjoy the divine sight—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 349.]

चौ०. नयन नीरु हटि मंगल जानी । परिछनि करहिं मुदित मन रानी ॥ १ ॥

बेद बिहित अरु कुल आचारू । कीन्ह भली बिधि सब व्यवहारू ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

nayana nīru haṭi maṅgala jānī. parichani karahim mudita mana rānī. 1.
bēda bihita aru kula ācārū. kīnha bhalī bidhi saba byavahārū. 2.

Realising that it was a most auspicious time, the queen restrained the tears (of affection and love) swelling-up in her eyes<sup>1</sup> and performed the ritual of offering Aarti (waving of lights in ceremonial earthen lamps) and other rites that are suitable for such occasions with an euphoric heart and mind ('Mana'). (1)

She did everything with due diligence and completed all the rituals as prescribed by the Vedas<sup>2</sup> for such occasions and traditionally observed in her family (i.e. the kingdom of Janakpur)<sup>3</sup>, properly and enthusiastically. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It has already been said above in Chanda line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 318 that tears of love and affection welled-up in the lotus-like eyes of the queen. So this line completes the idea by saying that though ordinarily tears would have rolled down the queen's eyes, she managed to restrain them, because their rolling down could be misconstrued as her weeping in sorrow whereas the fact is that she was exceedingly happy and euphoric and not at all regretful. It was a joyous occasion and a broad smile was gracing her lips. She was singing auspicious songs befitting such occasions along with the other ladies who were accompanying her.

The queen's heart and mind were overwhelmed with surging love and affection, and it was that one moment in her life for which she was so eagerly waiting for all along. And naturally when her wishes were fulfilled, when her desires bore fruit she was swept off her feet with emotions.

Allowing tears to fall on an auspicious occasion is not a good thing to do. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 7. Here the occasion was the return of Lord Ram, Laxman and Sita from their 14-year forest exile when all the mothers were meeting them at Ayodhya. Though tears would have gushed out from their eyes under ordinary situation but they managed to hold them back as it was not the proper time to shed tears even if they were tears of joy.

<sup>2</sup>Performing of Aarti along with showering of flowers, rice grains, coloured powder and other auspicious items are a part of the ritual of formally welcoming a guest. And Lord Ram was not an ordinary guest; he was the beloved groom of Sita, and so all the rites were done carefully and diligently.

Though the overall rituals are the same as sanctioned in the Vedas, every society nevertheless has its own unique set of rites that sets it apart from the others. There were some specific rituals observed in Janakpur which may not have been prevalent in Ayodhya, and this is observed even in modern times today.

<sup>3</sup>All the rites were done in accordance with the sanction of the Vedas and as established in the society by tradition. There are other instances where the same idea is conveyed—that due diligence was practiced in doing the rituals properly in accordance with the prescription of the scriptures and established norms of the society: refer specifically to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 352 which repeats this assertion at the time when religious ceremonies were being done to formally welcome the four brothers when they had returned to Ayodhya with their brides.]

पंच सबद धुनि मंगल गाना । पट पाँवड़े परहिं बिधि नाना ॥ ३ ॥

करि आरती अरघु तिन्ह दीन्हा । राम गमनु मंडप तब कीन्हा ॥ ४ ॥ pañca sabada dhuni maṅgala gānā. paṭa pāmṣṛē parahiṁ bidhi nānā. 3.

kari āratī araghu tinha dīnhā. rāma gamanu maṇḍapa taba kīnhā. 4.

Meanwhile, there were five types of auspicious sounds that were heard on that occasion<sup>1</sup> besides the sound of melodious singing of auspicious songs that accompanied the rituals, while carpets of different kinds were being spread (as the groom and his companions moved forward towards the marriage pavilion)<sup>2</sup>. (3)

After performing the Aarti (waving of lighted earthen lamps) of Lord Ram, the queen offered oblations to him and offered water so that the Lord could wash his hands and feet before proceeding ahead. Then, Lord Ram moved ahead and proceeded towards the pavilion where the wedding ceremony was to be solemnized<sup>3</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>‘Five sounds’ refer to the following:--

(i) The sound of music produced by five types of musical instruments such as the Indian lute (Veena), the clapping of hands and the clashing and cymbals, the beating of kettle-drums, playing of the clarinet, and the blowing of the trumpet or any other wind instrument such as the conch.

(ii) The chanting of the hymns of the five branches of the Vedas by the Brahmins. These five branches are the following—Rig Veda, Sam Veda, Shukla Yajur Veda, Krishna Yajur Veda, and the Atharva Veda. This is known as ‘Veda-vani’, the words of the Vedas.

(iii) Besides this loud chanting of the Vedas, there was the singing of laudatory verses, known as ‘Bridaawali’, by family bards and minstrels who were known as royal Bandijans’, loud cheers of joy and applause, known as ‘Jaya-vani’, by the citizens and others present on the occasion, the sound of conch shells, known as ‘Shankha-dhwani’, which are blown during auspicious occasions, as well as the sound created by the vigorous beating of drums, which is known as ‘Dundubhi-vani’.

All these sounds erupted simultaneously, creating a tumultuous and a heady cacophony of music, applause, singing and cheers.

Remember: Brahmins always played an important role in all auspicious functions, and therefore it is impossible to say that they weren’t present to chant the sacred hymns from the scriptures on this occasion. While songs were being sung by the ladies, the sacred hymns were being recited by the Brahmins. Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 313 which is specific for this purpose.

<sup>2</sup>The spreading of carpets and the groom moving towards the marriage pavilion on them shows that Lord Ram had by now alighted from his horse and had walked on foot to the designated place where the wedding was to take place.

<sup>3</sup>The Aarti, the offering of oblations and flowers, and the washing of hands and feet were done after he had got-off the horse.

Another interpretation can be that the Aarti was performed while Lord Ram was still astride the horse, and as soon as he got down from it, flowers were showered on him, and water was offered to him to wash his hands and feet. Then the Lord moved slowly on the carpets that were rolled out before him as he walked forward.

These carpets were not spread before hand, but rolled out before him one after another as he moved forward.]

दसरथु सहित समाज बिराजे । बिभव बिलोकि लोकपति लाजे ॥ ५ ॥

समयँ समयँ सुर बरषहिं फूला । सांति पढ़हिं महिसुर अनुकूला ॥ ६ ॥ dasarathu sahita samāja birājē. bibhava bilōki lōkapati lājē. 5.

samayam̐ samayam̐ sura baraṣahim̐ phūlā. sānti paṛhahim̐ mahisura anukūlā.
6.

King Dasrath looked majestic and glorious along with his royal entourage so much so that his majesty and glory put to shame all the other custodians of the world<sup>1</sup> (the ‘Lokpatis’)<sup>1</sup>. (5)

The gods showered flowers from the sky (heaven) from time to time<sup>2</sup>, while on the ground the Brahmins (who are known as “the gods’ representative on earth”) recited the sacred hymns from the Vedas and other scriptures (known as “Shanti Paath”)<sup>3</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The choice of word ‘Lokpati’ by Tulsidas is remarkable. ‘Lok’ means ‘world’, and ‘Pati’ means its ‘lord’ or ‘master’. Therefore, this single word ‘Lokpati’ would cover all the kings of this terrestrial world, as well as Indra, the king of gods, who rules over heaven.

Now it must be noted here that all the kings and princes who had come to attend the bow-breaking ceremony had already gone back home—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 312. Hence, comparison with them is out of place. Only the gods were present on the occasion.

Therefore, the word ‘Lokpati’ clearly hints at Indra, the king of gods. This fact has been reiterated elsewhere also—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 313 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 6.]

<sup>2</sup>It must be noted here that the gods had showered flowers on every occasion that was to be celebrated. For instance, when Lord Ram and his brothers were born (Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 194), when Lord Ram had broken the bow (Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 262), when Sita had put the victory garland on Lord Ram (Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 264), when the marriage party left Ayodhya for Janakpur (Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 302), when king Dasrath was invited to come with Lord Ram so that the marriage rituals could commence (Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 314), and again when the gods saw Lord Ram on the horse (Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 315), and so on.

<sup>3</sup>The symbolism of the Brahmins reciting the hymns of the Vedas alongside the gods showering flowers from the sky is clear when the former are called ‘Mahisurs’, literally meaning the ‘gods of earth’. It signifies that while the gods showed their joy by showering flowers from the heaven, their counterparts or representatives on earth, the Brahmins, showed their happiness by chanting the hymns of the Vedas as a symbolic gesture of blessing and joy.

It will be noted in Chanda line no. 3 herein below that ‘Brahma, the creator, and other gods had assumed the physical forms of Brahmins to enjoy the ceremonies’. Well, this clearly establishes why the Brahmins are honoured as being ‘Mahisurs’, the gods on earth. We have already read that the gods and goddesses had assumed human forms and mingled with the citizens of Janakpur to enjoy the marriage ceremony of Lord Ram, and they blended perfectly with other humans. So it was not possible to distinguish between actual human beings and gods in the form of humans. Therefore, all Brahmins were collectively called ‘Mahisurs’.]

नभ अरु नगर कोलाहल होई । आपनि पर कछु सुनइ न कोई ॥ ७ ॥
एहि बिधि रामु मंडपहिं आए । अरघु देइ आसन बैठाए ॥ ८ ॥

nabha aru nagara kōlāhala hō'ī. āpani para kachu suna'i na kō'ī. 7.
ēhi bidhi rāmu maṇḍapahīn ā'ē. araghu dē'i āsana baiṭhā'ē. 8.

As a result of this thunderous sound of joy and happiness emanating from the sky as well as the ground (i.e. by the applause of the gods and playing of their musical instruments as well as singing of celestial singers in the heaven, and singing of auspicious songs, playing of musical instruments and recitation of the hymns of the scriptures by the Brahmins on earth), there was a loud cacophony of sounds in the city (of Janakpur) so much so that no one could hear even their own words as well as what the others said<sup>1</sup>. (7)

On this wise Lord Ram arrived at the wedding pavilion. He was made to sit down on his seat after water was sprinkled on him and his feet were washed ceremoniously<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 318.

<sup>2</sup>Washed by whom? Well, the answer is ‘by the bride’s mother, queen Sunayana’. The ladies of the household escort the groom to the pavilion and perform initial rites before the elaborate rituals that are performed by Brahmins get under way. The gentlemen enter the pavilion after the ladies retire.

King Janak was still at the door with his counterpart, king Dasrath, and the rest of the party who had not entered the pavilion till this point of time. This will be absolutely clear in the verses that follow Doha no. 319 herein below.

Refer specially “Janaki Mangal”, verse no. 137-138 which specifically state that the friends of Sita brought Lord Ram to the pavilion while offering oblations and sprinkling water at his feet.]

छं०. बैठारि आसन आरती करि निरखि बरु सुखु पावहीं । १ ।
 मनि बसन भूषन भूरि वारहिं नारि मंगल गावहीं ॥ २ ॥
 ब्रह्मादि सुरबर बिप्र बेष बनाइ कौतुक देखहीं । ३ । अवलोकि रघुकुल कमल रबि छबि सुफल जीवन लेखहीं ॥ ४ ॥

chanda.

baithāri āsana āratī kari nirakhi baru sukhu pāvahīm. 1.
 mani basana bhūṣana bhūri vārahīm nāri maṅgala gāvahīm. 2.
 brahmādi surabara bipra bēṣa banā'i kautuka dēkhahīm. 3.
 avalōki raghukula kamala rabi chabi suphala jīvana lēkhahīm. 4.

The bridegroom (Lord Ram) was made to sit on a seat after his Aarti was done. As they watched the Lord closely, they (the ladies along with the queen) felt very happy and blissful. (Chanda line no. 1)

The ladies first offered to the Lord numerous gems, clothes and ornaments, and then scattered them around him in abundant quantities (as a established gesture to show their immense pleasure at having him as their honoured guest of special importance as he was the groom of Sita, the princess of the kingdom), all the while singing auspicious songs in a melodious voice. (Chanda line no. 2)

Brahma, the creator, along with other exalted gods had assumed the form of Brahmins<sup>1</sup> as they cheerfully watched in amazement<sup>2</sup> the happy events unfolding before their eyes. (Chanda line no. 3)

All of them (i.e. all the gods) consider themselves most lucky as they affectionately gazed at the beauteous form of Lord Ram who brings delight to the race of king Raghu just as the sun makes the lotus cheerful so much so that the latter blooms at its sight<sup>2</sup>. (Chanda line no. 4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This is why the Brahmins were called 'Mahi-surs', the 'gods on earth', in Chaupai line no. 6 herein above. It was not possible to distinguish between human Brahmins and gods who were present on the occasion as Brahmins.

<sup>2</sup>The gods were amazed and dumbfounded because they could not imagine that Lord Vishnu whom they had known as the Viraat Purush without any form could actually be so beautiful and wonderful to look at. Prior to this they had thought that Vishnu was one like them, but now they realized that the Lord's beauty far surpassed their imagination.]

दो०. नाऊ बारी भाट नट राम निछावरि पाइ ।
 मुदित असीसहिं नाइ सिर हरषु न हृदयँ समाइ ॥ ३१९ ॥

dōhā.

nā'ū bārī bhāṭa naṭa rāma nichāvari pā'i.
mudita asīsaḥim nā'i sira haraṣu na hr̥dayam̐ samā'i. 319.

As the barbers, the heralds and the torch-bearers, the royal family bards and the dancers, et al, cheerfully and joyously collected the precious offerings that lay scattered around Lord Ram (as described in Chanda line no. 2 herein above), their hearts were overwhelmed with delight even as they profusely blessed the Lord and reverentially bowed before him. (Doha no. 319)

[Note—Refer also to “Geetawali Ramayan”, Baal Kand, verse no. 6, stanza no. 23-24. These verses essentially say that everyone felt privileged and honoured to accept anything as gift that was related to Lord Ram even if they had to become a beggar to beg for it. In other words, no one felt ashamed at picking up the offerings that lay scattered around the Lord; rather they vied with each other for the honour of possessing even one item of the scatterings as a cherished memorabilia of the happy occasion that they would pass down their descendants from one generation to another.]

चौ०. मिले जनकु दसरथु अति प्रीतीं । करि बैदिक लौकिक सब रीतीं ॥ १ ॥
मिलत महा दोउ राज बिराजे । उपमा खोजि खोजि कबि लाजे ॥ २ ॥ लही न कतहुँ हारि हियँ मानी । इन्ह सम एइ उपमा उर आनी ॥ ३ ॥
caupāī.

milē janaku dasarathu ati prīṭīm. kari baidika laukika saba rīṭīm. 1.
milata mahā dō'u rāja birājē. upamā khōji khōji kabi lājē. 2.
lahī na katahum̐ hāri hiyam̐ mānī. inha sama ē'i upamā ura ānī. 3.

[In the following verses we shall about the most cordial way king Janak met king Dasrath.]

King Janak met and embraced king Dasrath most cordially and with the greatest of affection. Janak observed all the formalities and customs required to be observed according to the edicts of the Vedas and established by convention when the bride's father met for the groom's father for the first time prior to the wedding ceremony<sup>1</sup>. (1)

When two great monarchs met each other affectionately, they presented a spectacle so magnificent that even acclaimed poets and bards who are very adept at describing such rare spectacles and citing suitable analogies to suit such occasions failed to do so even after they tried their best to find a suitable analogy or metaphor. And having thus failed, they felt ashamed at their incompetence<sup>2</sup> (and the false honour that they had of being experts in their respective fields, an assumed expertise by virtue of which they had been appointed as court poets and bards by the two monarchs). (2)

Finally, when they were unable to find a suitable analogy or metaphor (that would even closely relate to the grandeur and magnificence of the glorious occasion), they felt baffled, accepting defeat in their Mana (heart and mind) and gave up, unanimously proclaiming that the meeting between these two great monarchs was of such astounding magnificence attended by scintillating joy and bubbly euphoria that it was better not to compare this meeting with anything else, but to let it be a unique event. So they declared that this meeting could be best described by saying that the pair (of king Janak and king Dasrath) is unique and likened to themselves alone<sup>3</sup>. (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>(i) We have read in Doha no. 319 and its preceding verses how Lord Ram was welcomed by the ladies of the royal household and escorted to the pavilion where the marriage rituals were to be performed. Now here we read how king Dasrath was welcomed by his counterpart, king Janak. Genuine cordiality, immense warmth, high degree of affection, sincere bonhomie and a spontaneous bond of friendship that was forged at that time were literally infective and were the overriding emotions at that time.

Two renowned and great kingdoms had come together by a stroke of unexpected good luck to forge an alliance that would make them not only a powerful military force to reckon with but compliment each other when it came to splendour, glory and majesty in the community of great kingdoms and empires of the time. Both the kings were highly reputed and their respective kingdoms were equally prosperous and powerful, and therefore none of them felt any sort of complex vis-à-vis the other. King Janak was all the more happy because he did not see any trace of unhappiness in the behaviour of king Dasrath that would indicate that the latter had felt insulted at not being invited to attend the bow-breaking ceremony, something that may have been nagging at Janak's conscience till now. On his part, king Dasrath felt exhilarated to realize that his son Lord Ram has married into an established family ruling over a great kingdom of Janakpur that is no less powerful and prosperous than his own kingdom of Ayodhya.

(ii) Both the royal families were upholders of religious traditions and duly observed all the rules and customs as prescribed by the Vedas and other scriptures. Even small details point out to this practice—for instance, Dasrath always gave prominence to his guru, sage Vasistha, as did Janak who showed respects to his guru, sage Satanand. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 197 at the time of the naming ceremony of Lord Ram and his other brothers; (ii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 208 at the time when sage Vishwamitra had gone to bring Lord Ram to the forest to protect his fire sacrifice; (iii) Doha no. 214 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8 that narrates king Janak going with his guru and other Brahmins to meet sage Vishwamitra when the latter arrived at Janakpur; (iv) Doha no. 293 when the letter announcing the good news of Lord Ram's marriage was taken by Dasrath himself to his guru Vasistha to seek his blessings even before the rest of the royal household was informed; (v) Doha no. 310, and Chaupai line no. 3 that follows this Doha when Vasistha was given precedence at the time when the marriage party departed from Ayodhya for Janakpur and the king sought his blessings prior to departure.

Again we read at various places in Ram Charit Manas that the edicts of the Vedas and customs of the society were duly observed by both the kings from time to time. For instance we read in Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 302 that “king Dasrath had followed all the rituals as ordained by the Vedas and required to be done by tradition and family custom at the time of departure of the marriage party for Janakpur from Ayodhya”.

Another instance is in Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 319 where exactly the same idea in the same words is expressed when it is narrated how queen Sunayana has duly welcomed the groom, Lord Ram, at the time of performing his Aarti and making oblations and offering gifts upon his arrival at the venue astride a horse.

A little later on we shall read how all the customs and traditions were diligently observed at the time of the actual performance of marriage rituals in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chanda line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 323; and (ii) Chanda line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 327.

In “Janki Mangal” of Tulsidas, we read about the same observance of Veda traditions and customs of the society in verse no. 139.

<sup>2</sup>There are other instances also where we read that expert poets and bards had failed to cite an appropriate example or analogy to describe certain events, and having thus failed they felt ashamed at themselves and their false pretension of expertise. For instance, in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 288—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 289 that relate to describing the immensity of the glory of Bharat, Lord Ram’s younger brother.

<sup>3</sup>Refer to “Janki Mangal”, verse no. 129 that says that there is no comparison of the pair consisting of king Janak and king Dasrath anywhere in the three world, i.e. in the heaven, the earth and the subterranean world.

Refer also to line nos. 3-4 of Chanda no. 16 of “Janaki Mangal” that says—‘When the two kings Dasrath and Janak who were now related to each other due to the marriage of their son and daughter respectively, and who were alike in glories and virtues, met each other, both felt extremely delighted. Watching them, the humans, the gods and the sages alike applauded them and raised their voice to praise them in a unanimous way.’]

सामध देखि देव अनुरागे । सुमन बरषि जसु गावन लागे ॥ ४ ॥
जगु बिरंचि उपजावा जब तें । देखे सुने व्याह बहु तब तें ॥ ५ ॥ सकल भाँति सम साजु समाजू । सम समधी देखे हम आजू ॥ ६ ॥ sāmadha dēkhi dēva anurāgē. sumana baraṣi jasu gāvana lāgē. 4.

jagu biran̄ci upajāvā jaba tēm. dēkhē sunē byāha bahu taba tēm. 5.
sakala bhām̄ti sama sāju samājū. sama samadhī dēkhē hama ājū. 6.

When the gods saw the two fathers-in-law developing fondness for each other, they too felt delighted. To celebrate the occasion, they (the gods) showered flowers from the sky and applauded them by singing their glories. (4)

The gods proclaimed, ‘We have seen many marriages and alliances between great families ever since the creator created this creation [5], but it is for the first time today that we have witnessed two great families of equal glory, greatness and grandeur getting united in a marriage alliance. [6]’ (5-6)

[Note—Indeed the two families were equal in their glory—because in one, i.e. the kingdom of Ayodhya represented by the family of king Dasrath, Lord Vishnu had taken birth as Lord Ram, and in another, i.e. the kingdom of Janakpur represented by the family of king Janak, Vishnu’s divine consort Laxmi had taken birth as Sita.]

देव गिरा सुनि सुंदर साँची । प्रीति अलौकिक दुहु दिसि माची ॥ ७ ॥
देत पाँवडे अरघु सुहाए । सादर जनकु मंडपहिं ल्याए ॥ ८ ॥

dēva girā suni sundara sām̐cī. prīti alaukika duhu disi mācī. 7.
dēta pām̐vaṛē araghu suhā'ē. sādara janaku maṇḍapahiṁ lyā'ē. 8.

*When everyone heard the words of the gods which were very true and most pleasant to hear, there was a flood of affection and rejoicing everywhere.

[*This verse can also be read as follows—When the word spread that the gods have endorsed this alliance, and the fact that what the gods say is always true and pleasant, there was a surge of affectionate feeling amongst the subjects of the two great kingdoms who rejoiced at this declaration by the gods.]<sup>1</sup> (7)

King Janak offered oblations and water to king Dasrath for washing his hands and feet, and then escorted the latter to the pavilion where the wedding was to be solemnized even as carpets were spread before Dasrath, one after another, as he moved forward towards the pavilion<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Gods never tell a lie, and when the subjects of both the kingdoms heard that the gods have unequivocally supported and endorsed this alliance, all of them felt exceptionally happy. It was obviously a time to celebrate and rejoice.

<sup>2</sup>The same procedure was followed while Lord Ram was escorted to the pavilion—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-4, 8 that precede Doha no. 319.

We shall read a little later on that when a grand feast was organized for the grooms and their father king Dasrath along with all other members of the marriage party, carpets were spread all along the ground from their residences to the venue of the banquet—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 328.]

छं०. मंडपु बिलोकि बिचित्र रचनाँ रुचिरताँ मुनि मन हरे । १ ।
निज पानि जनक सुजान सब कहूँ आनि सिंघासन धरे ॥ २ ॥
कुल इष्ट सरिस बसिष्ट पूजे बिनय करि आसिष लही । ३ । कौसिकहि पूजत परम प्रीति कि रीति तौ न परै कही ॥ ४ ॥

chanda.

maṇḍapu bilōki bicitra racanām̐ ruciratām̐ muni mana harē. 1.
nija pāni janaka sujāna saba kahum̐ āni siṅghāsana dharē. 2.
kula iṣṭa sarisa basiṣṭa pūjē binaya kari āsiṣa lahī. 3.
kausikahi pūjata parama prīti ki rīti tau na parai kahī. 4.

The pavilion was astoundingly wonderful to behold and tastefully decorated. It was so magnificent and artfully decked up that its beauty stole (i.e. enchanted and captivated) even the minds of sages (who are supposed to be immune to such worldly attractions). (Chanda line no. 1)

The wise and prudent king Janak had decorated thrones (seats or chairs that were specially designed and decorated for this occasion, had exquisite upholstery, and were very comfortable) brought in, and he placed them before the honoured guests himself<sup>1</sup>. (Chanda line no. 2)

Janak then worshipped and offered his obeisance to sage Vasistha the same way as he would have worshipped his family deity, seeking the sage's blessings which he got in unequivocal terms. (Chanda line no. 3)

After that, when he worshipped and offered his obeisance to sage Kaushik (Vishwamitra), the intensity of his sense of gratitude and thankfulness for the sage was so intense that it cannot be described<sup>2</sup>. (Chanda line no. 4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The king is called 'wise and prudent' because he knew royal protocol well as he laid out the chairs in proper order so that the guests were seated in accordance with their importance and place in the hierarchy of the royal family as well as the society. For instance, king Dasrath and his royal priest sage Vasistha, along with sage Vishwamitra and Vamdeo (pronounced "Vaamdeo") etc. were seated in the front row at the center, followed by the brothers of Lord Ram, senior members of the royal court including ministers, courtiers, Brahmins, other noble-men of Ayodhya and its principle citizens, and so on and so forth.

Another reason of calling Janak 'wise and prudent' is that he knows that one should personally serve sages and seers besides guests of honour such as king Dasrath and his close associates instead of delegating such service to servants and other attendants. This is the reason why Janak stood himself and supervised the laying out of chairs, and then personally escorting the guests to their respective seats according to standard practice of royal protocol of the kingdom of Janakpur.

Now, from the practical point of view it seems highly unlikely that no seat or chair was placed at the venue before the guests started arriving. It would be absurd and highly incredulous to imagine it. Then what is the meaning of Chanda line no. 2 that says that Janak himself brought the thrones and made the guests sit on them? Well, it simply means that he may have shifted the chairs a bit forward or sideways to make it easy to escort the guests to their respective seats and as a gesture that he was personally clearing the way for them. May be also that he had removed some seats to make more space between adjacent chairs so that the more important amongst the guests could sit more comfortably with more leg-space between them.

<sup>2</sup>Janak was overwhelmed with gratitude for Vishwamitra because it was he who had come to his rescue by ordering Lord Ram to break the bow so as to remove the dark cloud of gloom and desperation that had overpowered Janak when none of the kings could break the bow and a dark future for his beloved daughter Sita stared right on his face. Had it not been for sage Vishwamitra's proactive stand and decision to order Lord Ram to break the bow, the present environment of joy and happiness would have been non-existent. Instead, there would have been grief and lamentations all around.

It was sage Vishwamitra who had been instrumental in bringing Lord Ram, the personified form of Lord Vishnu, to the doorstep of Janak, something for which great ascetics, hermits, sages and saints did severe Tapa (austerity and penance) but still would find difficult to achieve.]

दो०. बामदेव आदिक रिषय पूजे मुदित महीस । दिए दिव्य आसन सबहि सब सन लही असीस ॥ ३२० ॥

dōhā.

bāmadēva ādika riṣaya pūjē mudita mahīsa.
dī'ē dibya āsana sabahi saba sana lahī asīsa. 320.

Then the king (Janak), who was euphoric with joy, duly worshipped and offered his obeisance to sage Vamdeo and other sages and seers who were present on the occasion. He gave them all magnificent seats befitting their stature, and got blessings from all of them in return. (Doha no. 320)

[Note—The king was very happy, or ‘euphoric with joy’, because great sages had collected to bless the occasion. Amongst them were great names such as Vasistha, Vishwamitra and Vamdeo. This was a rare privilege.

This Doha also indicates that Janak had first worshipped the two great sages Vasistha and Vishwamitra independently because they had a special relationship with Lord Ram, and then he worshipped the rest of the guest sages and seers led by Vamdeo together. After that, he ushered them to their respective seats.]

चौ०. बहुरि कीन्हि कोसलपति पूजा । जानि ईस सम भाउ न दूजा ॥ १ ॥
कीन्हि जोरि कर बिनय बड़ाई । कहि निज भाग्य बिभव बहुताई ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

bahuri kīnhi kōsalapati pūjā. jāni īsa sama bhā'u na dūjā. 1.
kīnhi jōri kara binaya barā'ī. kahi nija bhāgya bibhava bahutā'ī. 2.

After offering his obeisance to the sages, Janak paid his respects to king Dasrath by duly worshipping him in a formal way and offering oblations to him with the same sincerity and reverence as he (Janak) would have offered to his family deity<sup>1</sup> (which in Janak's case was Lord Shiva—“īsa”). Janak had no other thoughts in his mind while offering his respects to Dasrath<sup>2</sup>. (1)

Janak humbly joined his palms in prayer and as a mark of respect for Dasrath, praising the latter's high stature and extolling his glories, and acknowledging that his own honour, stature, rank and fortunes have been enhanced manifold by his association with the latter (Dasrath)<sup>3</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word used in the text is “Ish” which has two main meanings—Lord Shiva, as well as a revered God that a man worships. Hence, the verse means that Janak offered his respects to Dasrath with the same reverence with which he would have worshipped his family deity, or Lord Shiva who was also worshipped in the family of Janak.

In ancient societies, Lord Shiva was worshipped as a universal deity, and that is why Shiva has been honoured with the epithet 'Maha-Deva', the Great God, the God who supercedes all the others.

<sup>2</sup>Janak did not regard Dasrath to be an ordinary king or emperor, but as being equivalent to Lord Shiva himself. Why? It is because Shiva is the only deity, the only godhead who takes the creature away from entanglements of the mortal world and provides his soul with liberation and deliverance. Dasrath was the worldly father of Lord Ram, the incarnate Supreme Being, and hence he deserves being praised as the one who became instrumental in bringing the invisible Lord on this earth so that he becomes visible in the form of Lord Ram so that ordinary creatures who do not have access to high spiritual knowledge and wisdom, those who lack the wherewithal for liberation and salvation of their souls can at least now find deliverance from their worldly spiritual sufferings in a easy way by worshipping and having devotion for Lord Ram with whom they can easily identify themselves as opposed to the abstract and invisible form of the Supreme Being that goes beyond their comprehension.

Since Dasrath was the worldly father of Lord Ram who was an incarnation of the Supreme Being, the former's permission to the Lord to accept the alliance with Janak so that the latter could be in close proximity with a human form of the Lord was like fulfilling the desire of the soul of Janak to enjoy the bliss and happiness that comes with being near to the Lord, with being closely related and associated with the Lord. What more would Janak want than to have Lord Ram as his son-in-law, and for this he surely must treat Dasrath as being equivalent to Shiva who also takes the soul of the creature near to the Lord.

Remember: Lord Shiva provides the 'Tarak Mantra' to the dying man so that his soul finds liberation and deliverance from this body as well as the chance of rebirth in this world. And this 'Tarak Mantra' is the holy name of the Lord, which is the word "RAM" (pronounced as "Raam"). Dasrath has made this possible for Janak in physical and practical terms, and so he deserves no less respect and honour than that reserved for Lord Shiva.

<sup>3</sup>Janak has praised Dasrath by saying that his own reputation and stature has been enhanced by his association with the latter. This acknowledgement by Janak also goes to prove the point that Dasrath was a bigger and more powerful king than Janak. In other words, whereas Dasrath was a 'Chakravarti King' who was like an Emperor because his realm and reign spread in all the directions of the earth, covering a large circular area ("Chakra" = a circle) that constituted his kingdom (or empire), Janak's kingdom had a limited spread.

When a smaller or less important king manages to establish an alliance with a great emperor, naturally it is a matter of great pride and honour for the former. In this case the honour was all the more marked because it was a matrimonial alliance, and the emperor had come to the doorstep of the king instead of the other way round. So, Janak had felt humbled and grateful towards Dasrath.

Dasrath could have refused his permission to his son Lord Ram to marry into a junior family of king Janak because while Dasrath was a Chakravarti king, Janak wasn't. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 295 which explicitly honours Dasrath as being a 'Chakravarti King'. That he didn't and instead had himself come to attend the marriage at Janakpur made Janak overwhelmed with gratitude and exceptionally obliged and honoured.

In this context, please refer to the notes appended to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 286 as well as Chaupai line no. 1 that follows it.]

पूजे भूपति सकल बराती । समधी सम सादर सब भाँती ॥ ३ ॥
 आसन उचित दिए सब काहू । कहौं काह मुख एक उछाहू ॥ ४ ॥
 सकल बरात जनक सनमानी । दान मान बिनती बर बानी ॥ ५ ॥ pūjē bhūpati sakala barātī. samadhī sama sādara saba bhāmṭī. 3.

 āsana ucita di'ē saba kāhū. kahaurṁ kāha mukha ēka uchāhū. 4.
 sakala barāta janaka sanamānī. dāna māna binatī bara bānī. 5.

After this, the king (Janak) duly offered his respects and worshipped all the rest of the members of the marriage party in all possible ways, with the same sincerity and diligence as he had offered to his son-in-law's father (i.e. king Dasrath). [In other words, every member of the bridegroom's party felt equally honoured as they were given equal treatment by Janak who did not allow even one of them to feel that he has been neglected or discriminated on account of rank or status in society.] (3)

He offered each one of them an appropriate seat<sup>1</sup>. [Tulsidas says—] How can I describe the happiness and joy of those moments with a single mouth<sup>2</sup>? (4)

Janak honoured the whole of the marriage party with ample gifts, showing of respect, offering of prayers to them, and exchanging pleasantries and sweet words with all its members, attending to each of them individually<sup>3</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We see here that though Janak had shown equal respect to every member of the marriage party as clearly said in verse no. 2, he chose to give them 'appropriate seats', i.e. seats that were in accordance to their stature and position in the royal hierarchy and society. This was necessary because showing equal respect to them was to honour all of them as welcome guests, but it was impractical to seat the king and his close family members with the ministers and courtiers and other members of his staff. That would be incredulous even to imagine, and tantamount to insulting and undermining the high stature of the king as well as blatant violation of royal protocol. That is why Janak has been called a 'wise and prudent' king in Baal Kand, Chanda line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 320 herein above.

We shall read below that when the marriage party was invited by Janak to the grand wedding feast, there also he had first shown great respect to them by laying out a red-carpet welcome for them and washing their feet, and after that escorting them to their seats which were arranged in accordance to strict norms of social protocol—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 328.

<sup>2</sup>Earlier, Tulsidas has used the instance of the happiness and joy that surged in the heart of Sunayana, the mother of Sita, when she saw Lord Ram dressed up as a groom to say that she was so delighted and euphoric that even Seshnath, the legendary serpent with a thousand hoods, and therefore a thousand mouths and tongues, and goddess Sarda, the patron goddess of speech, would be unable to describe it even in thousands of years. Refer: Baal Kand, Doha no. 318.

This is a standard practice adopted by Tulsidas—that when he wants to emphasise the immensity of some event or situation he says that one mouth or one tongue is insufficient to describe it. In simple words it means that words cannot narrate the truth and reality of a certain happening, they cannot fully transcribe the depth and dimension of the event because words have their own lingual limitations.

<sup>3</sup>Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 326.]

बिधि हरि हरु दिसिपति दिनराऊ । जे जानहिं रघुबीर प्रभाऊ ॥ ६ ॥
कपट बिप्र बर बेष बनाएँ । कौतुक देखहिं अति सचु पाएँ ॥ ७ ॥
पूजे जनक देव सम जानें । दिए सुआसन बिनु पहिचानें ॥ ८ ॥ bidhi hari haru disipati dinarā'ū. jē jānahim raghubīra prabhā'ū. 6.

kapaṭa bipra bara bēṣa banā'ēm. kautuka dēkhahim ati sacu pā'ēm. 7.
pūjē janaka dēva sama jānēm. di'ē su'āsana binu pahicānēm. 8.

The Creator Vidhi (or Bidhi; i.e. Brahma), Hari (Vishnu), Har (Shiva), the Dikpals (custodians of all the ten directions of the world<sup>1</sup>), and the Sun God—these gods and the rest of the gods who knew about the divine glories of Lord Ram (and the fact that he was an incarnate supreme Lord of creation) [6]—all of them assumed illusionary human forms as Brahmins to witness the divine spectacle and derive immense delight from it [7]. (6-7)

King Janak duly worshipped and honoured all these Brahmins, treating them to be equivalent to gods (though he did not realize that they were not ordinary Brahmins but actual gods in their forms). Janak worshipped them equally (because he was unaware of their true identity), and then he gave all of them comfortable seats#@<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The 'Dikpals' are the following—Indra who is the king of Gods and who has a thousand eyes on his body, and is therefore called 'Sahastraaksha', Agni or the Fire God, Yam or the God of Dharma (i.e. the God responsible to ensure that the great tenets of righteousness and proper conduct are observed by the creatures, and to punish those who violate these laws), Niritya (also known as Nairitya), Varun or the Water God, Anil or the Wind God, Indu or the Moon God, Ishan or Lord Shiva, Brahma the creator, and Anant or Lord Seshnath, the legendary serpent who holds the earth on its hoods and upon whom the supreme Lord Vishnu reclines in the celestial ocean (the word also refers to Vishnu himself in his infinite form as the Viraat Purush). Refer: Ram Purva Tapini Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition, Canto 4, verse nos. 38-39.

<sup>2</sup>All the gods had assumed illusionary forms of Brahmins, and all of them looked exactly alike. So, Janak could not know about their true identity, but nonetheless he worshipped all of them equally with due diligence. Then he seated them on seats that were all alike. In other words, Janak treated all the Brahmins equally, treating them as personified forms of gods, and therefore he neither discriminated in showing his respects to them, nor in the way he seated them.

Janak had not realized that the Brahmins he was worshipping and praying were not human beings, but were actually all the great gods in their forms. This was indeed a rare privilege for Janak because when one does any religious activity, he invokes the gods to come and accept his worship and offerings, but it is rare that the gods would actually come personally in physical form to accept the offerings and worship. If the worshipper's devotion, sincerity and spiritual level are high, the gods do come, but they do so in an invisible and subtle form, not actual physical form. But in the case of Janak this came to happen—the gods came down from the heaven personally to witness the events and participate in them, and to give Janak the honour of physically worshipping them personally.

We will read shortly that the goddesses who had assumed female forms and had also entered the household of Janak to be with Sita and accompany her to the marriage pavilion and throughout the marriage ceremony were also not recognized by anyone present there—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 322 below.

We have already read above that Janak had not distinguished between anyone while offering his respects to each member of the groom's party. When one worships, he usually keeps his sight low and concentrates his attention on the process of worshipping instead of looking up and staring at the face of the person or the deity honoured, because if he does so it would be wrong and equivalent to showing disrespect to the person or the deity worshipped. So, Janak could not realize, and neither did he had the time to scrutinize each member's identity to decide as to who was a human and who was a god amongst the large group of members of the marriage party whom he had to show individual attention and offer formal respects before the marriage rituals could get underway. Time was passing away fast, so he wanted to be done with this formal process of welcoming as quickly as possible so that the main function could start.

#An interesting principle emerges in this narration. When one shows his respects to the elders, the learned ones and honourable people in the society, one should not distinguish between them on the basis of caste, religion or creed. One must respect their excellent qualities, characters, knowledge, skills and good virtues rather than in which class they are born, or the colour of their skin, or their financial status, and so on.

The same thing applies to guests: all of them are equal and should be equally treated. No guest should be regarded as being inconsequential and less important than the others because one can never know which of these guests will be so pleased by his hospitality and feel obliged to him that later on in life when the host falls on bad times and needs some kind of help, the same humblest-amongst-the-guests would come forward to repay his moral debt to his former host by extending him support and giving him aid to the best of his ability and means at a time when the former host needs it most.

@Another interesting observation is this: Janak had not distinguished between the sages and seers when he worshipped them and seated them as narrated in Doha no. 320 along with its preceding Chanda line nos. 3-4. Once again he has worshipped and seated all the Brahmins equally as narrated in the present Chaupai line nos. 7-8 herein above. But though Janak had shown equal respect to all the members of the royal family of king Dasrath and the rest of the entourage consisting of the members of the marriage party, but when it came to allotting them seats he was very careful, and all the members were allotted seats that were individually appropriate for them. This is clear in Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 321.

Now, what does this mean? It simply means that Janak was a very wise and intelligent king (refer: Chanda line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 320) who knew very well the royal protocol, as well as the established customs and traditions of the society. He knew that all the members of a group of sages and seers as well as Brahmins should be treated equally, and that when each group is seated a similar seat is to be given to all the members of that group. But this does not apply to others. For members of the royal marriage party care was to be taken to respect royal hierarchy and position of the concerned person in the kingdom. For instance, it would be nonsense to seat a junior minister of the royal court alongside the king while his chief minister is given a seat far away! Likewise, a servant of the royal household cannot be expected to be seated alongside the master whom he serves.]

छं०. पहिचान को केहि जान सबहि अपान सुधि भोरी भई । १ ।
 आनंद कंदु बिलोकि दूलहु उभय दिसि आनंद मई ॥ २ ॥
 सुर लखे राम सुजान पूजे मानसिक आसन दए । ३ ।
 अवलोकि सीलु सुभाउ प्रभु को बिबुध मन प्रमुदित भए ॥ ४ ॥

chanda.

pahicāna kō kēhi jāna sabahi apāna sudhi bhōrī bha'ī. 1. ānanda kandu bilōki dūlahu ubhaya disī ānamṛda ma'ī. 2.
 sura lakhē rāma sujāna pūjē mānasika āsana da'ē. 3.
 avalōki sīlu subhā'u prabhu kō bibudha mana pramudita bha'ē. 4.

Who had the inclination or the time to find out about others and recognize who they were when everyone was so ecstatic and lost in surging joy that they had lost awareness of their own selves? (1)

[This is because—] Both the sides (i.e. the bridegroom's side and the bride's side) were very jubilant and euphoric as they watched the groom (Lord Ram) who was a personified form of bliss and happiness. (2)

When the wise Lord Ram saw and recognized the gods (who were disguised as Brahmins and seated with other members of the marriage party), he mentally worshipped them all, and then offered them symbolic seats to show respect to them<sup>#1</sup>. (3)

When the gods observed how Lord Ram had mentally worshipped and showed his respects to them, all of them felt delighted and praised the gentle manners, the courteous nature and the congenial temperament of the Lord<sup>2</sup>. (4) [Chanda line nos. 1-4.]

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Ram could recognize the gods because he was the Supreme God to whom all the rest of the gods paid their obeisance. It was on their request that he had decided to become a human being to free the earth of its burden of cruel demons. Lord Ram had divine penetrating sight that was able to transcend human boundaries and limitations of vision. So the Lord could see who the Brahmins actually were, that they were gods in their forms, whereas Janak could not recognize them.

We have already read that goddesses had also assumed the form of women-folk and quietly slipped in to mingle with the female members of Janak's household to closely enjoy and participate in the marriage rituals of Sita and Lord Ram. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 318.

When one worships one's deity, he prays to the latter, and then offers the deity a seat so that it can be seated respectfully. Lord Ram mentally worshipped all the gods who were present on the occasion in the form of Brahmins, and then he offered them symbolic seats to show his respects to them. The occasion was formal, and the Lord could not get up from his seat to overtly welcome the gods. So he welcomed them in a symbolic way at the mental level.

#A very interesting thing is to be noted here. Lord Ram has offered his mental respects to the gods who had come to attend his marriage ceremony in the form of Brahmins as narrated in the present Chanda no. 3, but the Lord did not do so with the other sages and seers such as Vasistha, Vishwamitra and Vamdeo etc. This would be clear if we read relevant verses once again, viz. Doha no. 320 along with Chanda line nos. 3-4 that precede it. The question is—why did Lord Ram not pay his respects to these sages and seers as he had done with the gods? The answer is to be found earlier in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 308. Lord Ram pays his due respect to sage Vasistha and all the other sages, seers and Brahmins who had come with the marriage party along with his father Dasrath at the time the Lord had met them when he had gone to meet his father. The gods had not accompanied Dasrath from Ayodhya, but they came directly to the marriage pavilion. Hence, there was actually no necessity for showing respect to these sages and seers again because they had already been duly respected. Repeating the same process would be too superfluous. On the other hand, since the gods had come for the first time, the Lord felt it necessary to show them his respects, which he does in the present verse.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Ram was the lord of the world, and as such there was no real necessity for him to offer his worship to these gods who were much junior to him in the hierarchy of the heaven and of creation at large. But the Lord did it because of his polite nature, to show to the world that anyone in the form of a Brahmin must be shown respect, and also because he thought that he must thank the gods for coming to his marriage function.]

दो०. रामचंद्र मुख चंद्र छबि लोचन चारु चकोर ।

करत पान सादर सकल प्रेमु प्रमोदु न थोर ॥ ३२१ ॥

dōhā.

rāmacandra mukha candra chabi lōcana cāru cakōra.

karata pāna sādara sakala prēmu pramōdu na thōra. 321.

Everyone present on the occasion gazed unblinkingly at the beautiful and graceful moon-like face of Sri Ram-Chandra<sup>1</sup>, drinking cheerfully and with the greatest of affection drank the nectar of beauty that dripped from it and deriving immense pleasure from it just as the Chakor bird watches enraptured at the moon and derives intense happiness from it. (Doha no. 321)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The selection of the name ‘Ram-Chandra’ for Lord Ram fits in excellently with the metaphor of the moon and the bird Chakor used in this Doha. The word “Chandra” prepares the reader to visualize the Lord’s face as being equivalent to the moon. Just as this bird Chakor gazes with great affection at the full moon, all those present at the venue watched Lord Ram most lovingly. Again, just as the Chakor not willing to look at anything else as long as the moon shines in the sky, and following the course of the moon as it traverses across the sky from the eastern to the western horizon, all those who were present at the venue kept their eyes fixed on Lord Ram, following each of his movements so transfixed were they as they watched the beautiful and charming form of the Lord that enthralled the mind and captivated the heart of the beholder.]

चौ०. समउ बिलोकि बसिष्ठ बोलाए । सादर सतानंदु सुनि आए ॥ १ ॥
बेगि कुअँरि अब आनहु जाई । चले मुदित मुनि आयसु पाई ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

sama'u bilōki basiṣṭha bōlā'ē. sādara satānandu suni ā'ē. 1.
bēgi ku'am̐ri aba ānahu jā'ī. calē mudita muni āyasu pā'ī. 2.

When Vasistha (the royal priest of king Dasrath and the one who presided over the marriage rituals, representing the groom’s side) saw that the auspicious time for the wedding rituals has arrived, he respectfully called in Satanand (the royal priest of king Janak, who would assist Vasistha and represent the bride’s family during the rituals). When Satanand heard the call (that he is being summoned by Vasistha), he came there, showing due respect too (to Vasistha). (1)

Vasistha requested him—‘Bring the bride soon (as the time for the performance of the rites has arrived)’.

When Satanand heard this instruction of the sage, he immediately went from there with a gladdened heart (to go and usher in the bride, Sita). (2)

[Note—After everyone was duly seated and the auspicious moment arrived, sage Vasistha summoned his counterpart, sage Satanand, and requested him to bring the bride to the pavilion at the earliest so the rituals of the marriage can be commenced. Satanand was waiting for this instruction, so he felt very happy.]

रानी सुनि उपरोहित बानी । प्रमुदित सखिन्ह समेत सयानी ॥ ३ ॥
बिप्र बधू कुलबृद्ध बोलाई । करि कुल रीति सुमंगल गाई ॥ ४ ॥ rānī suni uparōhita bānī. pramudita sakhinha samēta sayānī. 3.

bipra badhū kulabṛd'dha bōlā'īm̐. kari kula rīti sumāṅgala gā'īm̐. 4.

When the wise and intelligent queen<sup>1</sup> heard the words of the royal priest (Satanand), she, along with her companions, was exuberant with joy. (3)

She summoned wives of Brahmins (of the kingdom) and elder female members of the family. All joined together in properly completing the different customs and traditional rites of the family and the society even as they sang auspicious songs befitting the joyful occasion. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>As with the case of king Janak, queen Sunayan is also ‘wise and intelligent’. She knows the way such occasions are to be properly handled. She maintains her calm and poise; she summons not only the Brahmin wives but also the elders of the family, neglecting none. All of them joined hands in completing the formalities and rituals so that nothing was missed out. If one lady forgot something, others stepped in to complete the process.

There is another reason for calling the queen ‘wise and intelligent’. We shall read in the next couple of verses (Chaupai line nos. 5-7 herein below) how the different consorts of gods, known as the ‘Shaktis’, had assumed the form of human females and entered the royal household imperceptibly to join in the celebrations and participate in the performance of rituals that are exclusively done by the female members of the bride’s family. At that time the queen had recognized these divine consorts of various gods, and had honoured them with the same respect as she would have extended to the senior goddesses such Uma, Rama and Sarda, though others present on the occasion could not recognize them. This clearly indicates that the queen was intelligent and wise enough to quickly recognize some divine traits in some of the ladies in her group and determine that they were not human beings but some divine Being in human form. So, inspite of not knowing the identity of each single goddess, she nevertheless decided to honour all of them equally and with the same reverence as she would show to senior goddesses.]

नारि बेष जे सुर बर बामा । सकल सुभायँ सुंदरी स्यामा ॥ ५ ॥
तिन्हहि देखि सुखु पावहिं नारीं । बिनु पहिचानि प्रानहु ते प्यारीं ॥ ६ ॥
बार बार सनमानहिं रानी । उमा रमा सारद सम जानी ॥ ७ ॥
सीय सँवारि समाजु बनाई । मुदित मंडपहिं चलीं लवाई ॥ ८ ॥ nāri bēṣa jē sura bara bāmā. sakala subhāyam̐ sundarī syāmā. 5.

tinahahi dēkhi sukhu pāvahiṁ nārīm̐. binu pahicāni prānahu tē pyārīm̐. 6.
bāra bāra sanamānahiṁ rānī. umā ramā sārada sama jānī. 7.
sīya sam̐vāri samāju banāī. mudita maṇḍapahiṁ calīm̐ lavāī. 8.

All the different Shaktis (i.e. the goddesses; the consorts) of gods who had assumed the form of human females (like the gods themselves who had also assumed the form of Brahmins) to join in the celebrations, looked naturally lovely and youthful to behold<sup>1</sup>. (5)

The women-folk of the royal household, including the elders, as well as the wives of Brahmins (who had been invited by the queen to participate in the marriage ceremony) felt delighted to see them (i.e. the Shaktis in human forms) in their midst.

Though they could not recognize these Shaktis<sup>2</sup>, they nevertheless developed a natural bond of love and affection for them so much so that began to hold them dearer than their own lives. (6)

The queen repeatedly showed her respects to them and regarded them as being equivalent to personified forms of Uma (the divine consort of Lord Shiva), Rama (goddess Laxmi, the divine consort of Lord Vishnu) and Sarada (pronounced 'Saardaa'; i.e. goddess Saraswati), the divine consort of Brahma, the creator)<sup>3</sup>. (7)

These female friends decorated Sita beautifully in fine bridal gear, adorning her in all the best of finery, and in all possible ways. Then they formed a group around her and cheerfully escorted her to the marriage pavilion<sup>4</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When the gods descended upon earth in the form of humans, disguised as Brahmins, to join in the celebrations accompanying Lord Ram's marriage, their counterparts, the 'Shaktis' or the different goddesses, too decided to join them. So these Shaktis assumed the form of females and entered the household of Janak.

Remember: The senior goddesses such as Uma, Rama and Sarda had already come to join the royal family as clearly said in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 318. These senior goddesses had accompanied the queen when she escorted Lord Ram to the pavilion—refer: Chaupai line nos. 4 and 8 that precede Doha no. 319.

So this means that these goddesses were present in the marriage pavilion to attend to the groom because it is a tradition that once the groom enters the pavilion and gets seated, he is not left alone but is attended by some of the female members of the bride's side. Therefore, when Satanand asked the queen to get Sita ready and send her to the pavilion, the rites that were to be performed prior to Sita going to the pavilion were immediately, and the junior goddesses helped the queen complete them. These goddesses would then not only escort Sita to the pavilion but accompany her throughout the ceremony because they decided to assume the role of the bride's friends.

<sup>2</sup>Besides these Shaktis in human forms, there was a large number of ladies present on the occasion, such as wives of Brahmins, both young and elderly female members of the royal household, and other ladies who had been invited as guests. None of them could recognize these goddesses; none could know that some of the members of the crowd are not humans but divine Beings.

<sup>3</sup>The fact that the queen could realize that some members of the ladies' group are consorts of various gods, something others could not, is the reason why she has been honoured as being 'wise and intelligent' in Chuapai line no. 3 herein above. Once she recognized these special members of the group, she honoured them and treated them with the same respect as she would have done with Uma, Laxmi and Saraswati who are the three senior-most goddesses in the heavenly hierarchy of goddesses because they are the divine consorts of senior gods Shiva, Vishnu and Brahma respectively.

<sup>4</sup>Who were these friends of Sita who adorned her and accompanied her to the marriage pavilion? Well, the answer is obvious—'the Shaktis of the various gods who had assumed human female forms' as narrated in Chaupai line nos. 5-7 above.

Elderly ladies are not expected to accompany a bride to her marriage pavilion, and so are the wives of Brahmins who too are not expected to do so. Brahmin women are respected but they cannot act as ‘friends’ of the bride because this role is like an attendant who has to take care of everything related to bride, such as holding her hands, picking up her garments if they drag on the ground or get stuck somewhere, helping her with the manual tasks associated with the elaborate rituals, and so on.

Hence, the group of ladies that escorted Sita to the pavilion consisted of the goddesses who had come to attend the ceremony disguised as human beings.]

छं०. चलि ल्याइ सीतहि सखीं सादर सजि सुमंगल भामिनीं । १ ।

नवसप्त साजें सुंदरीं सब मत्त कुंजर गामिनीं ॥ २ ॥

कल गान सुनि मुनि ध्यान त्यागहिं काम कोकिल लाजहीं । ३ ।

मंजीर नूपुर कलित कंकन ताल गति बर बाजहीं ॥ ४ ॥

chanda.

cali lyā'i sītahi sakhīm sādara saji sumaṅgala bhāminīm. 1.

navasapta sājērṁ sundarīm saba matta kuṅjara gāminīm. 2.

kala gāna suni muni dhyāna tyāgahim kāma kōkila lājahim. 3.

mañjira nūpura kalita kaṅkana tāla gati bara bājahim. 4.

Sita's friends and other ladies collected auspicious materials needed for the occasion and respectfully escorted Sita to the pavilion. (Chanda line no. 1)

All of them, the friends as well as the ladies who had accompanied Sita, were fully decorated in all the sixteen types of adornments traditionally regarded as complete decoration of a female body<sup>1</sup>. All of them were lovely to look at and walked with a graceful gait that resembled the confident majestic swagger with which an adult healthy elephant walks. (Chanda line no. 2)

They sang with such a sweet voice and melodious tone that when sages and hermits heard them their meditation was disturbed (i.e. they could not remain aloof to such charming songs and attractive voices, and failed to maintain their concentration during meditation)<sup>2</sup>.

Likewise, the cuckoo<sup>3</sup> that represented Kamdeo or cupid (the god who excelled in casting his spell of charm and passion on others by a variety of means, and singing sweet songs was one of the methods he used) felt shamed and humbled by the sweetness and the mellifluous nature of the songs that these ladies sang. (Chanda line no. 3)

As these ladies walked, the pleasant sound of tinkling and clinking that emanated from their anklets, their waist-bands, and the bangles that they wore worn around their wrists, resonated perfectly with the tune of their songs<sup>4</sup>. (Chanda line no. 4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 297 in this context.

<sup>2</sup>We can read this part of the verse as follows—“When the sages and hermits heard these ladies singing in a sweet and mellifluous tone, they found it hard to maintain their concentration and remain indifferent to the inherent charm of the songs. As a result they felt obliged to forego their meditation and listen to the songs instead.”

Well, this is just a way to highlight the sweetness and the beauty of the way the marriage songs were being sung, and not to actually refer to any sage or hermit whose meditation was disturbed at that time by hearing of these songs. Remember that it was the marriage pavilion, and not a hermitage in the forest where any sage or hermit could be imagined to be meditating! It’s simply a figure of speech to describe the pleasant environment of the occasion where the sound of soft music and sweet songs wafted soothingly through the atmosphere much like the case of sweet fragrance of flowers in full bloom that completely permeates the surroundings in a garden to welcome a guest warmly.

<sup>3</sup>The cuckoo is reputed to be a bird with a sweet voice. The companions of Sita sang so melodiously that even the cuckoo felt humbled and abashed because it was no match for the way these ladies sang. All its pride and reputation as the bird with the sweetest voice was crushed and set aside.

<sup>4</sup>It appeared that these ornaments took up the role of musical instruments as no such instrument is mentioned here. Music and song go hand-in-hand, and if one is absent the other loses its charm. They are complimentary to each other. When the ladies walked, these ornaments shook and rubbed against each other, producing a rustling sound. Tiny bells that were attached to the anklets, the waist bands and the bangles also chimed sweetly. The net affect was that together they produced a sound that filled in the vacuum created by the absence of formal musical instruments.

Hence, the soft sound coming out of the ornaments worn by the ladies complimented the songs they sang, and for all practical purposes they provided the music component of the songs.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 230 where the ornaments of Sita are described when she came to the garden where Lord Ram and Laxman had first seen her.

Similarly, when the ladies of Janakpur had gone to welcome Lord Ram as he arrived on his horse for the wedding ceremonies, the same type of ornaments are mentioned in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 318.

Refer also to “Geetawali Ramayan”, Uttar Kand, verse no. 18, stanza no. 5, line no. 2.]

दो०. सोहति बनिता बृंद महुँ सहज सुहावनि सीय । छबि ललना गन मध्य जनु सुषमा तिय कमनीय ॥ ३२२ ॥

dōhā.

sōhati banitā bṛnda mahum̐ sahaja suhāvani sīya.
chabi lalanā gana madhya janu suṣamā tiya kamanīya. 322.

Sita, who was inherently endowed with natural beauty of exceptional finesse, looked most magnificent and fabulous in the midst of lovely ladies who were themselves most charming and attractive as if the virtues of beauty, finesse, refinement, grace and magnificence have personified themselves in the form of Sita to take a pride of place amongst a horde of such glorious qualities which too had taken human forms as the companions of Sita. (Doha no. 322)

[Note—What an excellent analogy indeed. All virtues are excellent in themselves, but each individual person possesses them in varying degrees, and no two individuals in this mortal gross world can be expected to have exactly the same degree of excellence and divine virtues in them. So this Doha means that all the companions of Sita were beautiful—remember, they were personified forms of goddesses and other divine Beings as clearly indicated in Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede this Doha no. 322, and therefore there is no doubt that they were beautiful—but their beauty and magnificence was a notch inferior to that of Sita. Remember that Sita was a personified form of the Shakti of Brahm, the Supreme Being and the Lord of all gods and creation. She therefore personified the best of all virtues in their finest forms.

Let us understand this verse with an example. It is like the case of a collection of golden ornaments—one piece has 24 carate gold of the finest variety, the finest refinement with no impurities, while the other samples also have gold but of slightly low fineness besides having traces of impurities. Now, externally one would not be able to distinguish between these samples, but an expert would know the difference. When the ornament of the purest gold is kept in a collection of golden ornaments of varying qualities and purities of the metal, how would an expert describe this collection? He would use the same method employed by Tulsidas here to point out the piece of ornament that has the best quality of gold in it.

In simple terms it means that all the ladies were very charming and attractive to look at, but Sita stood out amongst them as being special. This is expected from a practical point of view also—after all, she was the bride, and a bride is especially decorated for such occasions; special attention is obviously paid to her and she is at the center of all activities. The bride looks special in the group of ladies that accompanies her because of her unique bridal adornment and the way she is given special attention and ceremoniously conducted by others.

Thus, Sita looked special in the group of magnificent ladies who escorted her to the marriage pavilion; she became the cynosure of all eyes.]

चौ०. सिय सुंदरता बरनि न जाई । लघु मति बहुत मनोहरताई ॥ १ ॥
 आवत दीखि बरातिन्ह सीता । रूप रासि सब भाँति पुनीता ॥ २ ॥
 सबहि मनहिं मन किए प्रनामा । देखि राम भए पूरनकामा ॥ ३ ॥ हरषे दसरथ सुतन्ह समेता । कहि न जाइ उर आनँदु जेता ॥ ४ ॥

caupāī.

siya sundaratā barani na jā'ī. laghu mati bahuta manōharatā'ī. 1.
 āvata dīkhi barātinha sītā. rūpa rāsi saba bhām'ti punītā. 2.
 sabahi manahim mana ki'ē pranāmā. dēkhi rāma bha'ē pūranakāmā. 3.
 haraṣē dasaratha sutanha samētā. kahi na jā'i ura ānam'du jētā. 4.

[Verse nos. 1-8 describe the moments when Sita was escorted to the wedding pavilion by her companions.]

The beauty, majesty, elegance, charm and glamour of Sita were so astounding and profound in nature that they defy description. My wit and abilities are very limited and insufficient while her beauty and elegance were so great that it is beyond me to as much as even hint at them in words, let alone describe them and do justice to them<sup>1</sup>. (1)

The members of the groom's party watched her mesmerised as she arrived at the venue, in all her royal regalia and finesse. She was an epitome of purity and a treasury of the virtues of beauty, charm, elegance, majesty and glamour of the highest quality. (2)

All of them bowed to her mentally and paid their obeisance to her. Meanwhile, Lord Ram felt fulfilled and happy in his heart when he saw her<sup>2</sup>. (3)

King Dasrath, along with his other sons (i.e. Bharat and Shatrughan), felt very happy, and the extent of joy in his heart was so immense that it is not possible to describe it in words<sup>3</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to: (i) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 230 which say that when Lord Ram had first seen Sita in the royal garden he was stunned by her beauty and charm. (ii) Again, everyone was dumbfounded by her beauty when she came to the venue of the bow-breaking ceremony as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 247 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8.

Later on in the story of the Ram Charit Manas we will read that Lord Ram had himself acknowledged that Sita was a treasury of Gunas (excellent qualities and virtues) as well as of Sundartaa (beauty)—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 30. This verse refers to the time when Sita was abducted by Ravana and Lord Ram grieved for her.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Ram felt contented and happy in his heart because he had fulfilled the desire in the heart of Sita to marry him. The Lord, left to his own self, is neutral and dispassionate and very conscientious about his behaviour (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (a) Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede Doha no. 231, and (b) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 237; (c) Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 48; as well as (d) Ayodhya Kand, line no. 1 of Doha no. 31). But he feels that it is his duty to oblige those who love him and have surrendered themselves to him—and he prefers to go the extra mile for his devotee and those who love him.

Sita had decided that if she has to marry then she will marry Lord Ram and no one else. She had mentally surrendered herself to the Lord and had fervently prayed to goddess Parvati to let this happen—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(a) from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 235—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 236; (b) from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 257—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precede Doha no. 259 which are very explicit on this subject.

Refer also to “Janki Mangal”, verse nos. 103—104.

Lord Ram had to honour her determination because the Lord had himself declared that if one surrenders to him completely then he is bound to accept him or her irrespective of all other considerations—refer: Ram Charit Manas—(i) Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 48 in the context of Vibhishan when he had come to surrendered to the Lord and seek his protection, and (ii) Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 46 where Lord Ram preaches his subjects about the importance of Bhakti or devotion.

<sup>3</sup>The king and Lord Ram's other two brothers, i.e. Bharat and Shatrughan, were seeing Sita for the first time. Laxman had already seen her closely every time Lord Ram had the opportunity to see her. Dasrath was happy to see that his daughter-in-law is so holy, pure and beautiful to look at as any father would be, and Bharat and Shatrughan were pleased to have such a nice sister-in-law.

Dasrath's sons were the most beautiful and handsome princes of the time, and so naturally he expected that his daughter-in-law would also be equally beautiful and charming so that she looks a fitting companion for his beloved son Ram.]

सुर प्रनामु करि बरिसहिं फूला । मुनि असीस धुनि मंगल मूला ॥ ५ ॥
गान निसान कोलाहलु भारी । प्रेम प्रमोद मगन नर नारी ॥ ६ ॥ sura pranāmu kari barisahim phūlā. muni asīsa dhuni maṅgala mūlā. 5.

gāna nisāna kōlāhalu bhārī. prēma pramōda magana nara nārī. 6.

Meanwhile, the gods bowed their heads in reverence and showered flowers upon her. There was a loud chorus of auspicious words of benediction and expression of satisfaction as the learned sages and seers too blessed her simultaneously<sup>1</sup>. (5)

There was a loud symphony of music from melodious songs being sung and kettle-drums being played simultaneously. All the citizens, both the males and the females<sup>2</sup>, were overwhelmed with joy and rejoiced at those happy moments. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When the gods feel delighted, they express their happiness by showering flowers and playing their musical instruments in the heaven, while the elderly sages and seers do so by blessing those with whom they are pleased.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 319 that describe the scenario at the time when Lord Ram was escorted to the pavilion and made to sit down on the designated seat. Here also the gods have showered flowers and the sages and seers have chanted auspicious blessings.

<sup>2</sup>The words used in the text are 'males and females'—'Nar' and 'Naari'. The males included the residents of Janakpur as well as those guests who had come from Ayodhya with the marriage party. The females were only those who lived in Janakpur—because females do not accompany marriage parties that go from the groom's place to the bride's place.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 319 that describe the scenario at the time when Lord Ram was escorted to the pavilion and made to sit down on the designated seat. We observe that both the moments have been described by Tulsidas using similar language to emphasise that the celebrations and rejoicings had continued uninterrupted from the moment Lord Ram stepped into the pavilion till this moment when Sita came, and they continued henceforth also.

There was dancing and singing in the city. Everyone rejoiced, and the happiness seemed to be infective and all-pervading. The sound was so deafening that one could not hear what others were saying.]

एहि बिधि सीय मंडपहिं आई । प्रमुदित सांति पढ़हिं मुनिराई ॥ ७ ॥
तेहि अवसर कर बिधि व्यवहारू । दुहुँ कुलगुर सब कीन्ह अचारू ॥ ८ ॥ ēhi bidhi sīya maṇḍapahim āī. pramudita sānti paṛhahim munirāī. 7.

tēhi avasara kara bidhi byavahārū. duhum<sup>2</sup> kulagura saba kīnha acārū. 8.

In this way, Sita arrived at the marriage pavilion even as the sages and seers read (chanted; read aloud in chorus) the hymns of the Vedas, known as ‘Shanti Paath’<sup>1</sup>. (7)

During those moments, the two Gurus (preceptors) of the two royal families (i.e. sages Vasistha and Satanand who were the royal priests of the kingdoms of Ayodhya and Janakpur respectively, and who were presiding over the rituals on behalf of the two families) performed all the necessary rituals and ceremonies as required to be done in accordance to tradition and custom of the society as well as ordained by the scriptures<sup>2</sup>. (8).

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 319 that describe exactly the same thing when Lord Ram had arrived at the pavilion.

This verse concludes the narration that started in Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 322.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 302. The entire formal process is detailed in Valmiki’s version of the Ramayana, in its Baal Kand, Canto 73, verse nos. 19—24.

Let us read what these verses say—“The great sage and ascetic Vasistha prepared a sacrificial altar at the center of the pavilion in accordance to the prescription of the scriptures regarding its construction, location and preparation. This altar was duly decorated on all the four sides with flowers and plastered with a paste of sandalwood. After this, fresh sprouts were placed in golden plates, jars of varying colours, and earthen pots and placed around this altar. Other things that were placed around the sacred altar were the following—vessels containing incense and other fragrances, conch-shells that would be sounded at strategic moments as well to be used to place sprouts, wooden spatulas and ladles that would be used to offer libations of clarified butter etc. to the sacred fire during the rituals, other vessels some of which were filled with water to offer as oblations to the different deities who would be worshipped, while others that contained parched paddy flakes, grains of rice and dried grass upon which the fire would be placed once it is lit.”

Since the rituals are headed by the priest of the groom’s side, sage Vasistha led the ceremonies, and sage Satanand helped him along.]

छं०. आचारु करि गुर गौरि गनपति मुदित बिप्र पुजावहीं । १ ।

सुर प्रगटि पूजा लेहिं देहिं असीस अति सुखु पावहीं ॥ २ ॥

chanda.

ācāru kari gura gauri ganapati mudita bipra pujāvahīm. 1.
sura pragaṭi pūjā lēhīm dēhīm asīsa ati sukhu pāvahīm. 2.

*The Gurus (Vasistha and Satanand) performed all the rituals according to established custom. The Brahmins (who were helping him in the process as his assistants) cheerfully helped him conduct the worship of Gauri (goddess Parvati, the divine consort of Lord Shiva) and Ganesh (the son of Lord Shiva and the god who is offered first worship during any religious ceremony).

[*This line can be read in a different way as follows—“After the two Gurus completed the initial formalities that are done at the beginning of such ceremonies as marriage, they made the couple, Lord Ram and Sita, worship goddess Gauri, god Ganesh, and other Brahmins who were present there.”

The Brahmins are regarded as being equivalent to gods-on-earth, as the ‘Mahi-surs’ = earth + god, so they are universally worshipped with the same reverence as shown to gods of the heaven. Worshipping Brahmins is treated as offering obeisance to personified gods.<sup>1</sup>] (Chanda line no. 1)

The gods who were invoked for the purpose of worship actually manifested themselves to personally accept the offerings. While doing so, they profusely blessed and showered their benediction (on the couple, Lord Ram and Sita)<sup>2</sup>. (Chanda line no. 2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 295 where we have read how the queen-mothers had offered their respects to the Brahmins at Ayodhya when they learnt about Lord Ram’s marriage with Sita; and (i) Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 321 where king Janak has offered his worship to the gods who were disguised as Brahmins.

These Brahmins are referred to as being personified forms of Gods on earth, the “Mahi-surs”—refer: Refer Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 319. This is based on the fact that when the gods and goddesses wished to assume human forms to come down to earth to participate in the marriage of Lord Ram and Sita, they chose to become Brahmins—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 318; and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 321.

We shall read below in Doha no. 323 that even the Vedas had assumed the form of Brahmins to take active part in the ceremonies.

<sup>2</sup>We have already read that the three chief gods, i.e. Brahma, Vishnu and Shiva, along with the patron gods of all the directions as well as the Sun God had disguised themselves as Brahmins who were worshipped by Janak. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 321.

The gods were willing to accept the worship and the offering as they felt very honoured and lucky to be a part of the celebrations that marked the union of the cosmic Lord in the human form of Lord Ram with his Shakti in the form of Sita. It was a rare conjunction and a rare phenomenon. Everyone wanted to be part of this history-in-the-making.]

मधुपर्क मंगल द्रव्य जो जेहि समय मुनि मन महँ चाहैं । ३ ।

भरे कनक कोपर कलस सो तब लिएहि परिचारक रहैं ॥ ४ ॥

madhuparka maṅgala drabya jō jēhi samaya muni mana mahum̐ cahaim̐. 3.
bharē kanaka kōpara kalasa sō taba li'ēhim̐ paricāraka rahaim̐. 4.

Whatever sweets (known as “Madhu-purk”<sup>1</sup>) and auspicious items that were needed for the rituals<sup>2</sup> by the sages (Vasistha and Satanand who were performing the marriage rites) were instantly made available to them whenever they asked for them by the attendants who stood ready with golden pots and pitchers filled with such requirements. (Chanda line nos. 3-4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>“Madhu-purk” = This is a sweet concoction made from curd, honey, clarified butter, water and sugar, a total of 5 ingredients. This mixture is offered to deities during worship, and to honourable guests when they arrive at the host’s doorstep.

<sup>2</sup>Many things are needed during the course of the rituals—such as water from different pilgrim places and holy rivers, various other assorted offerings that are to be made to the fire sacrifice, such as sandalwood, fragrances and incense, Kush grass, clarified butter, honey, herbs of different kinds, firewood and so on. All these things were kept ready and dedicated attendants stood at attention to provide them to the two priests as and when they were required.]

कुल रीति प्रीति समेत रबि कहि देत सबु सादर कियो । ५ । kula rīti prīti samēta rabi kahi dēta sabu sādara kiyō. 5.

एहि भाँति देव पुजाइ सीतहि सुभग सिंघासनु दियो ॥ ६ ॥

ēhi bhām̐ti dēva pujāi'ī sītahi subhaga siṅghāsanu diyō. 6.

The Sun God (who was the patron deity of the Solar Race to which Lord Ram belonged) himself directed the rituals by giving advice and pointing out which rite was to be performed when, and how it was to be done. The priests obeyed his instructions and performed the rituals as directed by the Sun God. (Chanda line no. 5)

In this way, after the sages (Vasistha and Satanand who were presiding the ceremony) made Sita offer worship to the gods, she was made to sit down on the designated magnificent throne (seat) that was reserved for her. (Chanda line no. 6)

[Note—Verse no. 6 implies that till this point, the rituals that were done were the initial ones that are performed when the bride enters the pavilion, and they were all done while she was standing. Once this was completed, Sita was escorted to the seat reserved for her.]

सिय राम अवलोकनि परसपर प्रेमु काहु न लखि परै । ७ ।

मन बुद्धि बर बानी अगोचर प्रगट कबि कैसें करै ॥ ८ ॥

siya rāma avalōkani parasapara prēmu kāhu na lakhi parai. 7.
mana bud'dhi bara bānī agōcara pragaṭa kabi kaisēm karai. 8.

The subtle love that flowed between Lord Ram and Sita as they affectionately glanced at each other was so sublime in dimension that it was imperceptible to others (i.e. those present on the occasion could not realise that they were looking at each other secretly, by the corners of their eyes, and these glances filled both of them with love and affection of the purest kind for each other). (Chanda line no. 7)

It was beyond the grasp and understanding of the best of mind, intellect and speech. Say then, how can a humble poet ever describe it or even as much as come near to its depth, intensity, purity and dimension. (Chanda line no. 8)

[Note—In other words, even the wisest men present on that occasion could not fathom the dimension, the depth and the intensity of the sublime quality of love and affection that existed between Lord Ram and Sita at that time. This being the case, Tulsidas says that he is unable to narrate it because he is merely an ordinary poet of no great expertise with words or intelligent enough to fathom it. This observation of Tulsidas points to his sense of humility and modesty.

Besides this aspect of his character, he also refrains from describing the love and affection between Lord Ram and Sita because he treats the Lord as his revered deity and god, and so would not like to say anything that may be indecent, look immodest, and violative of norms of the society which require that love and affection between married couples are their private and personal affair, and should not be the subject of public scrutiny or comment as it would be indecent and uncivilised by nature to do so, and intrusive as well.]

दो०. होम समय तनु धरि अनलु अति सुख आहुति लेहिं ।
बिप्र बेष धरि बेद सब कहि बिबाह बिधि देहिं ॥ ३२३ ॥
dōhā.

hōma samaya tanu dhari analu ati sukha āhuti lēhim.
bipra bēṣa dhari bēda saba kahi bibāha bidhi dēhim. 323.

At the time of offering libations to the sacred fire, the Fire God revealed himself personally to accept the offerings very cheerfully.

Meanwhile, the Vedas assumed the form of Brahmins to give detailed instructions and help conduct all the rituals personally. (Doha no. 323)

[Note—So we see here that besides the gods, even the Vedas and other scriptures had personified themselves as Brahmins to help with the rituals.

While the other gods who had assumed human forms had done so participate in the divine ceremony and rejoice the events, the Vedas assumed the role of priests that actually do the rituals. This ensured that every step was done to perfection.]

चौ०. जनक पाटमहिषी जग जानी । सीय मातु किमि जाइ बखानी ॥ १ ॥
 सुजसु सुकृत सुख सुंदरताई । सब समेटि बिधि रची बनाई ॥ २ ॥
 caupāī.

janaka pāṭamahīṣī jaga jānī. sīya mātu kimi jā'i bakhānī. 1.
 sujasu sukṛta sukha sundaratāī. saba samēṭi bidhi racī banāī. 2.

The queen<sup>1</sup> of king Janak (named Sunayana) is well-known in the world (for her virtuousness and excellent qualities). Say, who can describe her glories, especially when she has the rare honour to be the mother of Sita<sup>2</sup>. (1)

It appears that Vidhi (the Creator) had collected all the glories, all the meritorious deeds, all the happiness and bliss, as well as beauty and majesty that he had created in this world and moulded them in her form. [In other words, the queen was a personified form of all these qualities.]<sup>3</sup> (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word used in the text for Sita's mother is “pāṭamahīṣī”, which means the queen who sits with the king on the throne, and who is the 2nd in line of command after the king himself. The word technically means a ‘chief queen’, but no account is available that Janak had more than one wife as compared to his counterpart, king Dasrath, the father of Lord Ram and son-in-law of Janak, who had three senior queens—Kaushalya, Sumitra and Kaikeyi. In the case of Dasrath, the position of the “Paat-Mahisi” belonged to Kaushalya, the mother of Lord Ram.

<sup>2</sup>Sita is a personified form of ‘Shakti’, the dynamic cosmic powers of the supreme Lord. To be known as the ‘mother of this Shakti’ is indeed a rare honour. Refer Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 16 which praises Kaushalya in similar terms for getting the honour to become the ‘mother of Lord Ram’, the Lord of creation. Even Janak, the worldly father of Sita, has this unique privilege, and is duly acknowledged in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 310.

<sup>3</sup>Similar praise has been given to the parents of Lord Ram in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 16 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 6-8.]

समउ जानि मुनिबरन्ह बोलाई । सुनत सुआसिनि सादर ल्याई ॥ ३ ॥ जनक बाम दिसि सोह सुनयना । हिमगिरि संग बनी जनु मयना ॥ ४ ॥ sama'u jāni munibaranha bōlāīrṁ. sunata su'āsini sādara lyāīrṁ. 3.

 janaka bāma disi sōha sunayanā. himagiri saṅga banī janu mayanā. 4.

When the appropriate time arrived (i.e. when the mother of the bride's presence was felt necessary in the conduction of the rituals), the sages (Vasistha and Satanand who were conducting these rituals as presiding priests) called for her. When the virtuous companions and friends of the queen got this summon, they cheerfully escorted her to the pavilion. (3)

Sunayana sat by the left side of Janak, and the couple looked as glorious and majestic as when Mayana had sat by the side of Himgiri (during the wedding of Lord Shiva with Parvati, the divine Mother of creation)<sup>1</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This entire episode of Lord Shiva's marriage with Parvati) is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 65—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 103.

More specific verses that describe exclusively the divine marriage of Shiva with Parvati appear in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Doha no. 99—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 101.

Mayana was Parvati's mother, and Himgiri, the king of the snow-covered Mountains, was her father. During the process of the wedding rites, both the parents of the bride must sit together at the time of the crucial phase known as “Kanyaa-Daan”, which literally means ‘donating or giving away the girl’. A detailed note on this ritual is appended to Baal Kand, Chanda line no. 12 that precedes Doha no. 324 herein below.]

कनक कलस मनि कोपर रूरे । सुचि सुगंध मंगल जल पूरे ॥ ५ ॥
निज कर मुदित रायँ अरु रानी । धरे राम के आगें आनी ॥ ६ ॥

kanaka kalasa mani kōpara rūrē. suci sugandha maṅgala jala pūrē. 5.
nija kara mudita rāyam'aru rānī. dharē rāma kē āgēm ānī. 6.

Golden pitchers that were filled with auspicious water that was scented and had been brought from pilgrim places, and were covered on the mouths with plates full to the top with priceless gems<sup>1</sup> [5], were brought by the king and queen with their own hands and placed before Lord Ram (as part of the rituals) [6]. (5-6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The plates full of gems were used as lids for the pitchers filled with holy water brought from pilgrim places and scented by addition of fragrances.

There is another way of interpreting and reading verse no. 5. The plates were studded with gems and made of gold. These were to be used to wash the feet of the groom as part of the rituals. The scented water in the golden pitchers was to be used for this washing. The plates were used as lids to cover the mouths of the pitchers, but when the washing was to start they would be placed below the feet of the groom and the water from the nozzle or the spout of the pitcher would be poured on the feet. The water that flowed would be collected in the plates with high rims. In this interpretation, this verse no. 5 would read as follows—“Golden pitchers were filled with auspicious water that was scented and had been brought from pilgrim places, and they were covered on their mouths with golden plates that were studded with gems [5]”.]

पढ़हिं बेद मुनि मंगल बानी । गगन सुमन झरि अवसरु जानी ॥ ७ ॥
बरु बिलोकि दंपति अनुरागे । पाय पुनीत पखारन लागे ॥ ८ ॥

parḥahim bēda muni maṅgala bānī. gagana sumana jhari avasaru jānī. 7.
baru bilōki dampati anurāgē. pāya punīta pakhārana lāgē. 8.

The sages read (chanted; incanted) auspicious hymns from the Vedas, and the gods showered flowers from the sky (heaven) when they found that the time was right for this<sup>1</sup>. (7)

The royal couple (king Janak and queen Sunayana) watched the groom (Lord Ram) very affectionately and lovingly, deriving immense delight from it. Then they began washing his clean (i.e. holy, divine, venerable, pure and august) feet<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The gods had showered flowers on each and every occasion that demanded it—this is clearly said in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 319. There are countless such occasions mentioned in the context of Lord Ram's marriage. Some of these are the following—(i) Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 262; (ii) Doha no. 264; (iii) Doha no. 285; (iv) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 306; (v) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 314; (vi) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 323; (vii) Doha no. 324 and its preceding Chaupai line no. 7; (viii) Chanda line no. 54 that precedes Doha no. 327.

This is the gods' way of showing honour and delight.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Ram and Sita were personified forms of the supreme Lord and his divine Shakti, or of Brahm and Mother Nature, respectively. Their sight was sufficient to make even those ascetics and hermits who remained submerged in meditation and the thoughts of Brahm, the super Consciousness, which gave them intense bliss and contentedness that comes with self-realisation, forego this, and instead enjoy the nectar-like bliss that comes by seeing the divine form of Lord Ram and Sita. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 216.]

छं०. लागे पखारन पाय पंकज प्रेम तन पुलकावली । १ ।

नभ नगर गान निसान जय धुनि उमगि जनु चहुँ दिसि चली ॥ २ ॥

chanda.

lāgē pakhārana pāya paṅkaja prēma tana pulakāvalī. 1.
nabha naqara qāna nisāna jaya dhuni umaqi janu cahum̃ disi calī. 2.

[This Chanda, consisting of 16 lines, describes the ritual of “Kanyaa-Daan” whereby the parents of the bride formally tie her knot with the groom, handing her to the groom in marriage amidst a lot of fanfare and celebrations.]

The royal couple (the queen and the king) began washing the holy lotus-like feet of the Lord (Sri Ram) with so much love and affection that their bodies were thrilled and goose-bumps appeared on them<sup>1</sup>. (Chand line no. 1)

The sky and the city were filled with the symphonic sound of melodious songs being sung merrily, kettle-drums being played enthusiastically, and a wave after wave of loud chorus of applause and thanksgiving that ranted the air and overflowed in every direction<sup>2</sup>. (Chand line no. 2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>How lucky was Janak indeed! He had this once-in-a-lifetime rarest-of-rare opportunity to wash the holy and revered feet of the supreme Lord of creation which the greatest of sages, seers, ascetics and hermits would die to do but never get the chance. Come to think of it, even Dasrath who was so profoundly blessed as to have the Lord as his son did not do this in his lifetime. Well, what is the reason; what can be the cause?

The answer is this—in terms of spiritual enlightenment, wisdom regarding the ultimate Truth that leads to self-realisation, in-depth knowledge of the principles of metaphysics and spirituality, Janak was very highly elevated and had reached the pinnacle of realization, and Dasrath was no match for him. This will be very clear if we analyse the events narrated in the story of the Ramayana.

When Janak had first met Lord Ram while welcoming sage Vishwamitra, he had expressed his astonishment at his mental and emotional condition when he saw the Lord. He was surprised how his mind that was supposed to be neutral to all worldly attractions and remain eternally dispassionate and detached had suddenly developed a strong bond of love and affection for Lord Ram at first sight. He had then unable to suppress his amazement and had openly asked Vishwamitra why was it that his Mana (mind and heart) that was immersed in the bliss of Brahm-realisation had become so attracted by the charm of Lord Ram, something that was not in his nature, and therefore it was surely something that had more in it than what met the eye. Though sage Vishwamitra did not give a direct reply but his agreeing with the king was enough of a hint that Janak was right to deduce that Lord Ram was not an ordinary prince but a personified form of Brahm, the Supreme Being. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 215—to Doha no. 216. This approval of the sage made Janak very satisfied.

This is one of the reasons why he did not felt angry or offended when Laxman had embarked on an angry tirade against him in open court when Janak had declared that since no competitor had been able to break the bow he considers that the earth is devoid of brave and strong warriors, inspite of the fact that Lord Ram had not even been invited to go and try his hand at the bow, and the mighty sage Vishwamitra was present at the venue. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 251—to Doha no. 253. Why? Because Janak knew that Laxman was not a human prince, but a personified form of Seshnath, the legendary serpent on whose coiled body Lord Vishnu reclines on the surface of the celestial ocean of milk known as 'Kshir Sagar', and who holds the earth on his thousand hoods. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 197.

The irony of the matter is that Dasrath was so overwhelmed by the dark shadow of Maya of the Lord, i.e. the Lord's delusion creating powers, that prevented Dasrath from realizing the truth about the Lord and remaining mired in worldly ignorance, thinking the Lord to be his 'son' like an ordinary human father would. Dasrath had forgotten that Lord Ram was an incarnation of Lord Vishnu who had descended upon earth with a clear divine mission of clearing the menace of demons from the world. Dasrath thought that Ram was his son, his heir who should ascend the throne of Ayodhya, rule over the kingdom, produce sons to carry over the family line, spread the fame of the family and so on and so forth like an ordinary father would expect. This would be crystal clear at two points of time—

(i) When sage Vishwamitra had gone to request him to send Lord Ram to the forest to eliminate the demons so that the fire sacrifices of sages could be completed unhindered, Dasrath had bluntly refused. Like an ordinary man, he would not allow his sons to go to the forest to face the cruel demons and suffer harm. He did not realize that Lord Ram's chief mission in this world was to eliminate the demons, and this was the first step. It was then that sage Vasistha had to intervene and make him change his mind. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 207—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 208.

(ii) The second time when we find Dasrath showing his ignorance of who Lord Ram actually was is when he was on his death-bed and wailing for 'his son' who had gone to the forest. Dasrath wailed and grieved, repeatedly calling out the name of Ram, his 'son', and declaring that he cannot live without seeing him like an ordinary father. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 155. If the king had realized that he whom he calls his 'son' is not a human prince but the Lord of the world who has many more important things to do than to be at his beck-and-call at Ayodhya so that the old king can see him daily by his side, Dasrath would not have lamented the way he did, but would have rather waited patiently for the Lord to finish off his assignment for which he had descended from heaven upon the earth.

<sup>2</sup>If we understand the importance and significance of this occasion as explained above, we will also understand the reason for the exuberant celebrations, in the heaven as well as on the earth. Everyone praised Janak and Sunayana and applauded their good fortune that they were able to wash the holy lotus-like feet of Lord Vishnu in the form of Lord Ram. This will be evident immediately below in the following verse nos. 3-8 below.]

जे पद सरोज मनोज अरि उर सर सदैव बिराजहीं । ३ ।

जे सकृत् सुमिरत बिमलता मन सकल कलि मल भाजहीं ॥ ४ ॥

जे परसि मुनिबनिता लही गति रही जो पातकमई । ५ ।

jē pada sarōja manōja ari ura sara sadaiva birājahīm. 3.

jē sakṛta sumirata bimalatā mana sakala kali mala bhājahīm. 4.

jē parasi munibanitā lahī gati rahī jō pātakama'i. 5.

[The following verse nos. 3-8 build up on the first verse that says that king Janak and queen Sunayana had begun washing the feet of Lord Ram. Were these ordinary feet they were washing? Well, to answer this question, these verses outline the glories, divinity and importance of the holy feet of the Lord, and in a way praise the immense good fortune and rare luck that Janak and Sunayana had that they had been able to hold in their hands and wash the holy feet of the supreme Lord of creation for which every living being would sacrifice everything if they had been given this rare chance, a chance which eludes even the greatest of sages, saints, hermits and ascetics.]

The holy and divine feet (of Lord Ram) which eternally bloom like a beautiful lotus flower in the lake-like heart of Lord Shiva who has conquered 'Manoj', the god of passions (and therefore is deemed to practice exemplary self-control over his sense organs as well as his emotions and thoughts having their center in the heart and the mind respectively)<sup>1</sup>, ----(Chanda line no. 3)

The Mana (mind and heart) becomes purified and cleaned of all worldly taints and delusions associated by the current age of Kali-yug by remembering these holy feet (of Lord Ram) even once----- (Chand line no. 4)

By touching this holy and divine feet (of Lord Ram), even the sinful wife of the sage (i.e. Ahilya, the wife of sage Gautam) attained liberation for her self.<sup>2</sup>----- (Chanda line no. 5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 328.

Lord Shiva has many names, and ‘the Lord who had conquered, the Lord who had overcome the wild inciting gestures of the god of passion, known as Kamdeo (cupid; “manōja ari”)', is one of them. This entire episode of why and how this happened is narrated while describing the story of Lord Shiva’s marriage with Parvati in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 82—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 88.

The heart of Shiva—or, for that matter, of all living beings—is envisioned as a lake in which numerous desires and yearnings live like aquatic animals living in water. These animals continuously keep churning the water, never letting it rest so that the dirt floating in it cannot have any chance to settle down at the bottom and make the surface of the water clean. The very presence of these aquatic animals makes the water of the lake polluted and dirty. The same thing applies to the creature—as long as he is not able to control his natural desires, yearnings, tendencies, emotions and inclinations, his heart can never find peace and rest.

The greatest turbulence in the water of this lake-like heart is created by Kamdeo, the personified form of a creature’s natural impulses, inclinations and passions, the desire for self-gratification and satisfying the urges and the needs of the sense organs. The only possible way is to consciously subdue Kamdeo, overcome his enticements and allurements, and rebuff him and his gestures by practicing self-control and keeping a tight leash on one’s own self. One who has conquered Kamdeo is the greatest conqueror in this world because Kamdeo is the most formidable enemy for the creature’s peace of mind and happiness.

The metaphor of the lotus is universally used in the ancient scriptures to describe something that is very pure and clean inspite of living in an unclean environment. This is because the dirty water of the pond or the lake does not cling to the petals of the lotus flower inspite of the latter living in this surrounding; the lotus always remains clean and pure irrespective of the pollution of the water of its habitat, the lake or the pond.

Living of Lord Ram in the form of a lotus flower in the lake-like heart of Lord Shiva who is a conqueror of Kamdeo means that both Lord Ram and Lord Shiva are free from the corruptions associated with this world. Lord Ram is eternally divine and holy as symbolized by the purity and cleanliness of the lotus flower, and Lord Shiva too is holy and clean because he has been able to conquer Kamdeo, the chief polluter of the Mana (heart and mind).

Lord Shiva is the greatest devotee of Lord Ram. This fact has been acknowledged by Lord Ram himself and the Lord has reciprocated Shiva’s dedication and devotion by declaring that if anyone wants to have Bhakti (devotional access) for Lord Ram then he must first have Bhakti for Lord Shiva, because without the blessings of Shiva it is not possible to have Bhakti for Lord Ram. This is clearly mentioned in Ram Charit Manas, (i) Lanka Kand, from Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 2—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 3; and (ii) Uttar Kand, Doha no. 45.

This divine story known as Ram Charit Manas which describes the worldly deeds of Lord Ram who was a personified form of the Supreme Being was in fact conceived or revealed first in the heart of Lord Shiva. He had then divulged it to his divine consort Parvati as well as to Kaag-Bhusund (the saint-crow) from whom it passed down to sage Yagyawalkya, Bharadwaj and other sages living on earth. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 30.

Lord Shiva constantly repeats the holy name “RAM” (pronounced ‘Raam’) in his heart as the only Mantra, a spiritual formula, which can provide eternal bliss, peace and happiness, a formula that provides liberation, deliverance, emancipation and salvation, a formula that gives beatitude and felicity to the soul of the creature. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3, 8 that precede Doha no. 19.

<sup>2</sup>This story is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 11 that precedes Doha no. 210—to Doha no. 211. Please refer to the relevant verses and the notes accompanying them.]

मकरंदु जिन्ह को संभु सिर सुचिता अवधि सुर बरनई ॥ ६ ॥

करि मधुप मन मुनि जोगिजन जे सेइ अभिमत गति लहैं । ७ ।

ते पद पखारत भाग्यभाजनु जनकु जय जय सब कहैं ॥ ८ ॥ makarandu jinha kō sambhu sira sucitā avadhi sura barana'ī. 6.

kari madhupa mana muni jōgijana jē sē'i abhimata gati lahaiṁ. 7.

tē pada pakhārata bhāgyabhājanu janaku jaya jaya saba kahaiṁ. 8.

The gods have praised and adored the holiness and the purity of the nectar (i.e. the water of the holy river Ganges) flowing out of these lotus-like feet (of Lord Ram) that was shown so much reverence by Lord Shiva that he decided to keep it on his head (as a mark of showing the greatest of respect to it).<sup>1</sup>------(Chanda line no. 6)

Sages and hermits transform their Mana (mind and heart) into a black-bee so as to be able to drink (soak-in; remain submerged and engrossed in the thoughts of) the nectar of these holy feet (of Lord Ram), while ascetics attain anything they want or achieve their desired spiritual goals and objectives by serving them (i.e. having devotion for and meditating upon them).<sup>2</sup>------(Chanda line no. 7)

It is the same holy and divine feet (of Lord Ram) that Janak was holding today and affectionately washing them with his own hands with the greatest of reverence. How fortunate and lucky was he! Everyone<sup>1</sup> (the gods as well as the humans) acknowledged this in a unanimous voice, repeatedly hailing him and his good luck (as well as the accumulated effects of his meritorious deeds that had made this happen)<sup>3</sup>. (Chanda line no. 8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The ‘nectar’ flowing out of the lotus representing Lord Ram’s holy feet refers to the river Ganges which is also called the ‘river of gods’. The gods revere it so much that when Ganges descended upon the earth from heaven, Lord Shiva decided to keep it on his head as a mark of showing respect to it and prevent it from getting dirty or polluted by coming in touch with earth which is gross and dirty.

Sage Vishwamitra had told the story of river Ganges to Lord Ram and Laxman when they were on their way to Janakpur. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 212, along with their accompanying notes.

<sup>2</sup>The sages concentrate their minds and focus their thoughts on the holy feet of Lord Ram to derive immense spiritual bliss, felicity and beatitude from it just like the bee that first hovers over the lotus flower and then slowly settles on it to enjoy drinking its sweet nectar. Once the bee is attracted to the lotus flower and tastes the nectar, it does not like being disturbed; it becomes oblivious to the world outside. Similar condition prevails with the sages and the hermits: once they hitch their mind on the holy feet of Lord Ram even by conscious effort, the rest becomes very easy for them. The intensity and depth of the bliss and ecstasy that they get is so magnetic and profound that they don't have to prod their mind and heart any further to love Lord Ram and remain focused on his holy feet. It becomes natural and a latent habit with them.

The same principle applies to the ascetics. They follow the path of Yoga and Dhyan which entails intense meditation and concentration respectively. These paths are rigorous and need a lot of effort. But if they focus their attention on the holy feet of Lord Ram as a means of doing Yoga and Dhyan, the path becomes very easy for them, because whereas pure Yoga and Dhyan are tough exercises requiring a lot of practice and being alert against their many pitfalls and dangers, having devotion for the holy feet of Lord Ram serves the same purpose but without its attendant hassles.

<sup>3</sup>Refer Chanda line nos. 1-2 herein above in this context, and the meaning becomes clear. When Janak had started washing the feet of Lord Ram, there was a symphony of songs, music and loud applause in 'the city and the sky or heaven'. It means both the 'humans' and the 'gods' had joined in praising him in the 'city' and the 'heaven' respectively.]

बर कुअँरि करतल जोरि साखोचारु दोउ कुलगुर करै । ९ ।

भयो पानिगहनु बिलोकि बिधि सुर मनुज मुनि आनंद भरै ॥ १० ॥

bara ku'am̐ri karatala jōri sākhōcāru dō'u kulagura karaim̐. 9.

bhayō pānigahanu bilōki bidhi sura manuja muni ānam̐da bharaim̐. 10.

As part of the wedding ritual, the two family Gurus (i.e. sages Vasistha and Sadanand acting on behalf of kings Dasrath and Janak respectively) made the groom and the bride join the palms of their hands with each other while they (the Gurus) read the family genealogy of the two sides<sup>1</sup>. (Chanda line no. 9)

When the groom and the bride had touched each other's palms (as a token or gesture of 'union, closeness, obliteration of distance between the two, and equal partnership in thick and thin of future life')<sup>2</sup>, everyone who saw this glorious event—the creator Vidhi, the gods, and the humans who were present on the auspicious occasion—was filled with great happiness and euphoria. (Chanda line no. 10)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This process is called “Saakho-chaar”—a ritual that involves reciting the names of prominent members of the two families of the groom and the bride while they hold hands or touch each other’s palms in a symbolic gesture of union or closeness. This gesture symbolically establishes a union between the two families by virtue of this marriage. This unification is done with all the guests as witnesses, and they are deemed to have ratified this union.

<sup>2</sup>The ritual when the groom accepts the hands of the bride is called “Paani-grahan”—‘accepting’ her ‘hands’. It is a symbolic gesture that implies that the boy has accepted the girl as his life-time partner and both of them will share the joys and sorrows of life equally.

In the context of Lord Ram and Sita, it was a union of Brahm with his Shakti represented by Lord Ram and Sita respectively. The touching of their hands also meant that now-onwards they will jointly strive to fulfill the promise Lord Vishnu had made to the gods and mother earth that he will free them from the horrors of the demons. Therefore, it was now their joint responsibility, and not only that of Lord Ram.

This is why the Creator and the gods rejoiced, and the sages and other humans joined them in rejoicing as they represented the earth.]

सुखमूल दूलहु देखि दंपति पुलक तन हुलस्यो हियो । ११ ।
करि लोक बेद बिधानु कन्यादानु नृपभूषन कियो ॥ १२ ॥ sukhamūla dūlahu dēkhi dampati pulaka tana hulasyō hiyō. 11.

kari lōka bēda bidhānu kan'yādānu nrpabhūṣana kiyō. 12.

When the royal couple (i.e. king Janak and queen Sunayana) saw the groom who was like a root from which all happiness and bliss originated (and then sprouted into a huge tree to benefit the whole world), they were very thrilled in their bodies and their hearts were overwhelmed (with love, affection, bliss and euphoria)<sup>1</sup>. (Chanda line no. 11)

Then the king (Janak) who was like a gem in the community of kings (i.e. who had excellent qualities and was most virtuous amongst all the kings), observed all the social customs and norms dictated by the Vedas to formally hand over the bride to the groom in a ritual called ‘Kanyaa-Daan’<sup>2</sup>. (Chanda line no. 12)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Another way of reading this verse is: “When the royal couple watched the groom who was a fountain of happiness and bliss, their bodies were thrilled and their hearts heaved with the emotions of love, affection and ecstasy.”

King Janak had conceded that Lord Ram was so charming to look at that it seems he empowers the virtue of ‘Anand’ (bliss, joy and happiness) itself to enable it to give bliss and happiness to others. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 217. In other words, Lord Ram is a ‘root’ from which the tree of bliss and happiness grows.

<sup>2</sup>“kan'yādāna”—During the process of the wedding rites known as “Kanyaa-Daan”, which literally means ‘donating or giving away the girl’, both the parents of the bride must sit together at the time of the crucial phase. It's called a "Daan" because once when someone 'donates' something, or gives a "Daan", he relinquishes all his rights over the item donated or given away to other in charity. The bride's parents have no right over their daughter after marriage. She even has to forgo her ancestral family name and instead assume the title of her husband, creating an absolutely new identity for herself. This is the greatest sacrifice one can make—to part with the daughter forever is like cutting-off one fraction of their own being as far as the parents of the bride is concerned. The girl has the genes of her parents running in her bloodstream, and so she symbolically is a 'part of her parent's existence in this world'. But suddenly she—as well as her parents—has to snap this tie. Imagine how painful would it be for you if any part of your being is suddenly cut-off? The great king Dadhichi had 'donated' his bones to the gods for making their weapons, especially the Vajra of Indra, with which they defeated the demons. Giving away of the beloved daughter whom the parents have reared from day one of her birth with all care and love a parent can only give, is not a mean sacrifice to do, and this is why this step of the wedding is known as "Kanyaa Daan".

The presence of both the partners, the mother and the father of the girl, is obligatory to ensure that both their consent is given for this ritual.

The ritual of Kanyaa-daan and Paani-grahan are undertaken simultaneously and compliment each other. While 'Paani-grahan' means the bride's hand and responsibility for her well-being has been willingly accepted by the groom, 'Kanyaa-daan' means that her father has willingly given her to the groom forever, and he will never claim any right over her or any material wealth that she would inherit from the side of the groom's family in future.

Refer also to another of Tulsidas' book "Janki Mangal" that is exclusively dedicated to this theme of Lord Ram's marriage with Sita. Kanyaa Daan is narrated in brief in its verse no. 144.]

हिमवंत जिमि गिरिजा महेसहि हरिहि श्री सागर दई । १३ ।

तिमि जनक रामहि सिय समरपी बिस्व कल कीरति नई ॥ १४ ॥

himavanta jimi girijā mahēsahi harihi śrī sāgara da'ī. 13.

timi janaka rāmahi siya samarapī bisva kala kīrati na'ī. 14.

In the manner Himwant (the king of the Mountains) had given his daughter Girija (Parvati) in marriage to Lord Mahesh (Shiva)<sup>1</sup>, and Sagar (the celestial ocean) had given Sri (Laxmi) to Hari (Lord Vishnu)<sup>2</sup> (Chanda line no. 13), ---

--- Janak submitted (or gave) his daughter Sita to Lord Ram in marriage<sup>3</sup>, an event which bestowed upon him unprecedented glory and fame that spread world-wide<sup>4</sup> (Chanda line no.14).

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This is described in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precedes Doha no. 101. During the marriage of Lord Shiva with Parvati, who was also known as "Girija" because she was the daughter of Giri, the king of Mountains, the same process as narrated while Lord Ram was married to Sita was followed then. Since there is a similarity between the two marriages, Lord Shiva's marriage is recalled here.

<sup>2</sup>This incident refers to the time when the celestial ocean was churned by the gods and the demons in search of Amrit, the nectar of eternal life. Amongst other items that were produced by this churning was Laxmi. She was the daughter of Sagar, the ocean, because she emerged from it. Later on, Laxmi was married to Lord Vishnu. This incident is referred to in Adhyatma Ramayan of Veda Vyas, in its Baal Kand, Canto 6, verse nos. 54—54½ .

<sup>3</sup>Refer Tulsidas' book "Janki Mangal", line nos. 1-2 of Chanda no. 18 where exactly the same idea is conveyed.

<sup>4</sup>Just as Himwan got world-wide fame that has lasted from time immemorial by being the father-in-law of Lord Shiva, and Sagar due to being Lord Vishnu's father-in-law, king Janak acquired world-wide eternal fame of an unprecedented nature by becoming the father-in-law of Lord Ram.

Lord Ram's glory and fame was well-established by now. He had broken the formidable bow of Lord Shiva in an assembly that was attended by thousands of kings and princes where none of them was able to as much as move the bow even an inch inspite of their best of efforts, what to imagine of breaking it. Immediately after that, sage Parashuram had come angrily to wreak revenge for this breaking of the bow, but not only could he not harm Lord Ram but in the end had to submit before the Lord, surrender his own bow to him, and ask for forgiveness. All these incidents have already been narrated earlier in this Kand. (Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Doha no. 250—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 262; and from Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 268—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 285 respectively.)

The fame and glory of Lord Ram was no less than that of Lord Shiva and Lord Vishnu. While on the one hand Lord Ram resides in the heart of Lord Shiva as the latter's revered deity, on the other hand he is a manifested form of Lord Vishnu himself. Therefore, marrying his daughter to such a famous and glorious prince as Lord Ram naturally helped to spread king Janak's own fame along with that of the Lord's because of the ties created by this marriage.

The parents of Sita (i.e. king Janak and queen Sunayana) knew very well about the glories and divine mission of Lord Ram on this earth as proclaimed by the famous sage Yagyawalkya who was a frequent visitor to the court of king Janak and also happened to be the latter's Guru, and was repeated by the queen herself by citing the sage. These two facts are clearly available in (i) Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 285; and (ii) Brihad Aranyak Upanishad of Shukla Yajur Veda, Canto 4, Brahman 1-2.

Further, Janak has declared the fact that he knows everything about who Lord Ram was and why did he marry Sita in Adhyatma Ramayan at the time of departure of the marriage party from Janakpur for Ayodhya after the marriage ceremonies were over. Refer: Veda Vyas' "Adhyatma Ramayan", Baal Kand, Canto 6, verse nos. 63-66.]

क्यों करै बिनय बिदेहु कियो बिदेहु मूरति सावँरीं । १५ ।

करि होमु बिधिवत गाँठि जोरी होन लागीं भावँरीं ॥ १६ ॥

kyōm karai binaya bidēhu kiyō bidēhu mūrati sāvamṛīm. 15.
kari hōmu bidhivata gāmṭhi jōrī hōna lāgīm bhāvamṛīm. 16.

Janak was so enchanted and overwhelmed by the beguiling beauty of the dark-complexioned form of the Lord (Sri Ram) that he was dazed so much that he lost awareness of his surroundings and forgot that it was the time to offer formal prayers or respects to the groom.

[The king continued gazing at the bewitching beauty of the face of Lord Ram and was so enamoured by it that he virtually forgot that time was passing away and he was expected to perform the next step in the wedding rituals, which was to offer prayers or respects to the groom. However, he recovered himself after some time and continued with the ceremonies as follows—] (Chanda line no. 15)

Oblations and libations were duly offered to the sacred fire (a process known as “Homa”) in the proper traditional way as sanctioned in the Vedas and other scriptures.

When these were completed, the ends of the marriage robes of the bride and the groom were tied together, and the couple went around the sacred fire several times (i.e. did circumambulation of the sacred fire in a rite known as “Bhaanwari”). (Chanda line no. 16)

[Note—Bhhanwari is also narrated by Tulsidas in his other books describing the story of the divine marriage of Lord Ram with Sita—viz. (i) “Geetawali” of Tulsidas describes this rite of ‘Bhaanwari’ in its Baal Kand, verse no. 105, stanza no. 3; and (ii) “Janki Mangal”, a book exclusively dedicated to this theme of Lord Ram’s marriage, in its Chanda no. 18, line no. 3.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1 and 7 that precede Doha no. 325 that appear herein below.

Circumambulation of the sacred fire is done so as to make it a witness to this union of the boy and the girl as well as the marriage vows both of them take. ‘Fire’ is the most potent and the purest of all the deities, and it is able to burn all that is dirty and impure while leaving untouched the pure and the truthful. In this material world it is evident when a goldsmith puts a sample of gold in the fire—the fire burns all the impurities that may be present in the sample, but it does not touch the raw metal or affect its purity.

The process of Bhaanwari is a warning to the couple that both of them are obliged to adhere to the vows they have taken in the presence and witness of the sacred fire, and be warned that this powerful fire element is very dangerous and unforgiving as it does not tolerate nuisance of any kind. Let them be warned that they would be scorched to death should they take this warning lightly in their lives and play fools with this sacred witness of the Fire God!

From the perspective of metaphysics, this process when applied to Lord Ram and Sita assumes a profound meaning. Lord Ram was a personified form of ‘Brahm’, the Supreme Being who is also known as the ‘Viraat Purush’, the all-encompassing, all-pervading and immanent macrocosmic invisible form of the Super Consciousness—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 72 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 2-8.

Now, according to the Upanishads, Brahm does not do anything himself, but he employs his ‘Maya Shakti’, which is Brahm’s dynamic, almighty, cosmic power that is also responsible for creation of delusions, to do whatever he wishes. It is this Maya Shakti of Brahm that keeps the wheel of creation rotating endlessly. It is also said that Maya is a maidservant of Brahm and follows the instructions of the Lord—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 71. The servant cannot be superior to the Master, and a loyal and faithful servant is one who always ‘follows’ his Lord.

Another important point to remember is that Brahm and Maya are inseparable because if Brahm wishes to ‘do anything’ he will have to take recourse of seeking help from Maya who obediently obeys him—an euphuism for ‘following Brahm’.

Then again, the ‘tying of the ends of the wedding robe of Lord Ram and Sita’ prior to the Bhaanwari procession as mentioned in Chanda line no. 16 here also symbolizes this relationship between Brahm and Maya—‘they are tied and invariably associated with each other; Brahm cannot do his worldly duties without an explicit support of Maya, and neither would Maya have any existence and value without being associated with Brahm’.

As we progress with the story of Ramyana we discover the importance of this association and the role it plays in the fulfillment of the divine mission of Lord Ram. It was Sita’s abduction by Ravana that led to the final elimination of the cruel demons by Lord Ram. Without Sita the story would have been completely different.

Besides the elimination of the demons, Sita played a stellar role in establishing the glory and fame of Lord Ram. It was during the bow-breaking ceremony related to her marriage that the world came to know who Ram was. It was in her marriage ceremony that the Lord had broken the formidable bow of Lord Shiva which not even the mightiest and strongest of other kings or princes who had come from all corners of the world could do, thereby establishing the Lord’s glory and dynamic abilities in this world in an irrefutable way. The world then began to recognize that Lord Ram was the most able and strongest warrior with no one to match him in this world. His glory was further enhanced when he had as easily and comfortably vanquished the haughtiness of sage Parashuram who was renowned as the killer of the warrior race.

So we see that Sita had been instrumental in establishing Lord Ram’s fame and glory in this gross world even as Maya had helped Brahm at the cosmic level to unfold his potentials and miraculous abilities by creating magic-like delusions and the world of infinite variations.

This Maya is very powerful, and once it was let loose by Brahm it became a virtual Frankenstein Monster because it got hold of Brahm himself. This development is metaphorically depicted in the process of ‘Bhaanwari’. So we discover that a reversal of roles takes place once this Brahm decides to assume a gross form like any other living being of this world by employing his own Maya to hide the truth of his form. That is, only a few enlightened and self-realised persons knew who Ram actually was, for the majority of the population he was the son of Dasrath, the prince of Ayodhya and the groom and the husband of Sita.

The fine distinction between Brahm in his subtle and sublime cosmic form, and in his gross worldly form as Lord Ram becomes evident once we closely examine this single process of ‘Bhaanwari’. Whereas Maya is the one who follows Brahm in the Lord’s cosmic form, the process is reversed when the same Brahm assumes a gross body and steps into this gross world of delusions to become a human being in the form of Sri Ram, the prince of Ayodhya, who got married to the princess of Janakpur, known as Sita. As a human he is the one who follows Maya—symbolised by the bride that leads this circumambulation process with the groom following her from behind during the first four rounds around the sacred fire while doing Bhaanwari.

But after the first four rounds, the groom takes the lead with the bride following him from behind during the last three rounds. There are a total of seven rounds around the sacred fire.

That is, first it was Sita who was followed by Lord Ram during the first four rounds, and then the places were reversed and Lord Ram led the circumambulation. This implies that after Brahm realized that his Maya has started to get the better of him, he ordered Maya to go behind him. That is, Brahm stepped in and brought Maya under his control before the things got out of control.

From practical point of view this process of Bhaanwari tells us that even if we are deluded in the early phases of our existence in this world because we are overcome by the influence of Maya as soon as we get involved in the affairs of this gross world symbolized by marriage which robs the man and the woman of their independence, the sooner we wake up to the truth and reality and overcome the effects of Maya the better it is for us. Though Maya has forced us to follow it in the beginning of our worldly existence, we can always put it behind us and force it to follow us should we decide to become wise and enlightened by shunning delusions and worldly attachments.]

दो०. जय धुनि बंदी बेद धुनि मंगल गान निसान ।

सुनि हरषहिं बरषहिं बिबुध सुरतरु सुमन सुजान ॥ ३२४ ॥

dōhā.

jaya dhuni bandī bēda dhuni maṅgala gāna nisāna.

sunī haraṣahim̐ baraṣahim̐ bibudha surataru sumana sujāna. 324.

At that time there was a loud cacophony of sounds consisting of praises and hailings from royal minstrels and bards, the chanting of the verses from the Vedas (by the Brahmins), the singing of auspicious songs befitting the occasion (by professional singers as well as women-folk of the kingdom), and the playing of musical instruments such as the kettle-drums.

When the immortal gods (who were watching the proceedings from the heaven) heard this symphony of sounds from their position in the sky (heaven)<sup>1</sup>, they felt exhilarated, and showered the best of flowers<sup>2</sup> plucked from the evergreen tree that grows in heaven (which is known as the “Sur-Taru<sup>2</sup>”; the tree of paradise; Sur = god; Taru = tree). (Doha no. 324)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We have read that the gods had assembled in the sky in their aerial vehicles to watch the divine spectacle of the union of Lord Ram with Sita in a formal ritual that is known as ‘marriage’ in this world. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 314.

<sup>2</sup>At that time also they had showered flowers—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 314.

Refer also to “Janki Mangal”, verse no. 142.]

चौ०. कुअँरु कुअँरि कल भावँरि देहीं । नयन लाभु सब सादर लेहीं ॥ १ ॥

जाइ न बरनि मनोहर जोरी । जो उपमा कछु कहौं सो थोरी ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

ku'amŗu ku'amŗi kala bhāvamŗi dēhīm. nayana lābhu saba sādara lēhīm. 1.
jā'i na barani manōhara jōrī. jō upamā kachu kahaurm sō thōrī. 2.

As the distinguished groom (“Kunwar; ku'amŗu”) and the bride (“Kunwari; ku'amŗi”) performed the ritual of ‘Bhaanwari’ (“bhāvamŗi”) with graceful steps (as described above in note of Chanda line no. 16 that precedes Doha no. 324 herein above), all those present on the occasion enjoyed the wonderful sight with great affection, and felt honoured to be able to witness it<sup>1</sup>. (1)

[Tulsidas says—] ‘The divine couple (i.e. Lord Ram and Sita) was so beguilingly beautiful to behold and enchanting to look at that it mesmerized the onlooker and held him in thrall. Whatever comparisons I may try to make will fall short of expectations and cannot do justice to the reality.’<sup>2</sup> (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It was a divine spectacle of extraordinary beauty when the supreme Lord of creation in the form of Sri Ram was followed by his Shakti in the form of Sita as they went around the sacred fire in a rite of marriage known as “Bhaanwari”.

It was not always that one could witness such a rare and wonderful spectacle. Therefore, all those who watched it regarded themselves as very fortunate. And to see anything one has to have ‘eyes’, so this is the reason why the ‘eye’ has been singled out in this verse for thanksgiving. Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-7 that precede Doha no. 317 which describe how the different gods had felt lucky themselves and had envied each other’s ability to watch the beauty of Lord Ram more clearly and with extra eyes as the Lord was going to the marriage pavilion astride his horse.

<sup>2</sup>Refer also to: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse nos. 105—106.

Tulsidas breaks from the narrative to add a comment from his own side. A poet or author would use a metaphor or simile to try to give an idea about the thing, person or event he or she is describing by comparing it with some other entity or thing or event that is well known and universal so that the reader can get a rough picture about what is being said of the subject under discussion. For instance, we say ‘white as milk’, ‘brave as a lion’, ‘bright as daylight’, ‘chirpy as a bird’, ‘tall as a mountain’, or ‘beautiful as a garden of fresh, blooming flowers’, ‘beautiful as the sky seen during the sunset or sunrise’, ‘beautiful as a rose flower’, ‘cold as ice’, ‘fresh as the morning dew’, and so on.

What Tulsidas means here is that the sight of Lord Ram and Sita standing together in all their fine wedding robes, displaying finesse and grace of the highest degree, was astoundingly fabulous and marvelous to look so much so that it enamoured the mind and the heart of all those who watched them, keeping everyone dazed and amazed. The view was so beautiful that it defied description, and it is impossible therefore to compare it with anything known to this world because there is nothing in this gross mortal world that can be used to compare the sublime and subtle beauty of the couple. In terms of beauty, grandeur, glamour, charm and magnificence, Lord Ram and Sita were matchless, unique and one of their own kind. The best of metaphors and similes would fall short of the expected mark and would give a wrong impression of the intensity and depth of the heavenly beauty of Lord Ram and Sita as it appeared at that time.

However, Tulsidas attempts to try to give an idea of the beauty of the couple in the following verse nos. 3-4 herein below, but immediately follows it by pointing out its flaws or shortcomings in next verse no. 5.]

राम सीय सुंदर प्रतिछाहीं । जगमगात मनि खंभन माहीं ॥ ३ ॥
मनहुँ मदन रति धरि बहु रूपा । देखत राम बिआहु अनूपा ॥ ४ ॥ दरस लालसा सकुच न थोरी । प्रगटत दुरत बहोरि बहोरी ॥ ५ ॥

rāma sīya sundara pratichāhīm. jagamagāta mani khambhana māhīm. 3.
manahum̐ madana rati dhari bahu rūpā. dēkhata rāma bi'āhu anūpā. 4.
darasa lālasā sakuca na thōrī. pragaṭata durata bahōri bahōrī. 5.

Exceptionally beautiful images of Lord Ram and Sita were reflected from the glittering bejeweled pillars of the pavilion.

[The moment that is being described is that of 'Bhaanwari' when Lord Ram and Sita were moving around the sacred fire. The pillars were well-polished and shining. Thus, the image of the couple was reflected from different angles on the many pillars of the pavilion. In other words, the images were many, as many as the pillars, and they kept on changing as the couple moved.] (3)

These images reminded one of Kamdeo (cupid) and his wife Rati who appeared to have personally come down to witness the divine marriage ceremony of Lord Ram and Sita, a glamorous occasion that was rare and most magnificent to watch<sup>1</sup>. (4)

They, Kamdeo and Rati, have a strong desire to come up front and watch the divine spectacle from up close, but they are very hesitant and bashful to do so. Hence, they keep on appearing and disappearing from view repeatedly<sup>2</sup>, as if playing a game of hide-and-seek. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We have read in verse no. 2 above that Tulsidas says that the view of Lord Ram and Sita is so magnificent that he fails to find an apt comparison. Then he gave a second thought: perhaps his readers would like him to at least hint at the beauty of the sight, even if this hint would not give any idea of the reality of the situation. So, Tulsidas thought, 'What's the harm; let me tell them. Then I'll show its drawback.'

Many gods and goddesses were present on the occasion of the marriage of Lord Ram and Sita, but Tulsidas chose Kamdeo and Rati because as far as gods and goddesses are concerned, this couple is the most beautiful of the entire pantheon. Kamdeo (cupid) is the patron god of passion, love and beauty. The word 'Kaam' is used as a synonym for these emotions, and the word 'Deo' of course means 'god'. Hence, the best choice to compare Lord Ram with was 'Kamdeo', and 'Rati', Kamdeo's consort, was the best choice for comparison with Sita.

All other gods and goddesses had assumed human forms to mingle with others as clearly mentioned in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 321, and (ii) Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 318 respectively. But Kamdeo and Rati decided not to do so. What may have been the reason for this? This couple was proud of its fabulous beauty and matchless glamour, and thought that if they became humans like their other counterpart gods and goddesses, they will not be noticed in the huge crowd that milled around the pavilion.

So they decided to come in their original form as invisible ‘god and goddess’, instead of as a human.

They found that in their original invisible form no one would recognize them, and they would be marked as being absent in the marriage of Lord Ram and Sita in the annals of history. So what should they do now? Well, they thought that they will reveal themselves in the form of images that appear on the glittering pillars made of gems and priceless stones. It is now that the clever poet Tulsidas picks up the cue and says that ‘the images of Kamdeo and Rati that appeared on the pillars were actually those of Lord Ram and Sita respectively’.

Tulsidas has in one stroke served two purposes—one, he has acknowledged the attendance of Kamdeo and Rati on this auspicious occasion, and two, he has debunked Kamdeo and Rati for their false pride of being the most glamorous couple in creation by saying that what was seen on the pillars and thought to be Kamdeo and Rati were actually images of Lord Ram and Sita! If the ‘reflected image’ is so stupendously beautiful, one can imagine how beautiful the ‘principal object’ must be. Thus, the adroit poet Tulsidas is able to satisfy his eager readers who want to have some kind of comparison nevertheless by citing this instance of images being reflected on the pillar to give the readers an idea of the glamour and beauty of the form of Lord Ram and Sita as they appeared during their marriage ceremony, while at the same time upholding his observation that they were so fabulously magnificent to look at that no comparison can be made as asserted by him in Chaupai line no. 2 herein above.

<sup>2</sup>The next question is ‘what was the flaw in this image of Kamdeo and Rati that was seen in the pillars that it could not be an ideal comparison with Lord Ram and Sita’?

Well, for one it was an ‘image that was a mere reflection’. A reflected image cannot replace the original; after all it is merely a copy of the original. The second reason is that ‘this image seen on the pillars seemed to change every now and then, appearing now and vanishing the next moment, or looking attractive now and distorted the next moment, as Lord Ram and Sita moved from one point to another’. This constant change in the images on the pillars was due to many reasons—such as the angle from which they were viewed, the position and angle of Lord Ram and Sita vis-à-vis the individual pillar, the surface polish, deformities and curvature of the pillars themselves, and the light and other extraneous factors that intervened to give a final effect to the images.

Now, whereas there was no consistency in shape and uniformity in the beauty of the images reflected from the pillars, the sight of the original form of Lord Ram and Sita inside the pavilion was consistently brilliant and uniformly beautiful to behold.

Therefore, there can be no comparison between the image of Lord Ram and Sita seen in the pillars to symbolize the presence of Kamdeo and Rati, and their original form as seen directly in the pavilion.

Another question is: ‘Why were Kamdeo and Rati shy of appearing in person like other gods and goddesses?’ The answer is simple: It is because Lord Shiva was present there. Lord Shiva is a renowned enemy of Kamdeo (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 324), and had even burnt the latter’s physical form when he once got angry at him (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-6 that precede Doha no. 87). At that time, when Rati had begged Shiva to show mercy, the Lord had blessed her by saying that henceforth her husband, Kamdeo, would live in an invisible form, without a visible body—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 87.

Therefore, Kamdeo and Rati were terrified at the prospect of assuming a visible form as humans on the one hand, and played ‘hide-and-seek’ by repeatedly appearing and disappearing on the pillars on the other hand, to avoid being noticed by Lord Shiva and inviting his wrath.]

भए मगन सब देखनिहारे । जनक समान अपान बिसारे ॥ ६ ॥

प्रमुदित मुनिन्ह भाँवरीं फेरीं । नेगसहित सब रीति निबेरीं ॥ ७ ॥ bha'e magana saba dēkhanihārē. janaka samāna apāna bisārē. 6.

pramudita muninha bhāmvarīrī phērīrī. nēgasahita saba rīti nibērīrī. 7.

These two sights (of Lord Ram and Sita in person, and their images that simmered on the pillars to remind one of Kamdeo and Rati) were so fascinating that everyone was amazed and dazed. All those who watched them were as enchanted and enraptured as king Janak had been (as described in Chanda line no. 15 that precedes Doha no. 324 herein above)<sup>1</sup>. (6)

The sages (Vasistha and Satanand as the presiding priests) helped the couple to go around (circumambulate) the sacred fire to complete the ritual of ‘Bhaanwari’, and then they completed all the other rites according to established tradition and customs of the society and their respective families<sup>2</sup>. (7)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word ‘everyone’ includes the gods and the goddesses who were present to witness the marriage of Lord Ram and Sita, both in their forms of human beings which they had assumed to participate in this auspicious occasion, as well as in their primary invisible form in the sky. Remember: Both these forms were there—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 318 which deals with the goddesses assuming human forms; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 321 which deals with the gods assuming human forms; and (iii) numerous instances which show that the gods have showered flowers from the sky—viz. Doha no. 324, and Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 319.

<sup>2</sup>The process of ‘Bhaanwari’ that had commenced in Chanda no. 16 that precedes Doha no. 324 is completed here. While the newly married couple moves around the sacred fire, the presiding priests recite auspicious hymns from the scriptures and undertake all other rites and rituals associated with it.

A very interesting thing is to be noted here. The process of ‘Bhaanwari’ involves going seven times around the sacred fire. We will note here that exactly ‘seven lines’ have been written here about Bhaanwari (from Chaupai line no. 1 to 7) by the clever poet Tulsidas to indicate these ‘seven rounds’.

Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 105, stanza no. 4 also.]

राम सीय सिर सेंदुर देहीं । सोभा कहि न जाति बिधि केहीं ॥ ८ ॥

अरुन पराग जलजु भरि नीकें । ससिहि भूष अहि लोभ अमी कें ॥ ९ ॥

बहुरि बसिष्ठ दीन्हि अनुसासन । बरु दुलहिनि बैठे एक आसन ॥ १० ॥ rāma sīya sira sēndura dēhīm. sōbhā kahi na jāti bidhi kēhīm. 8.

aruna parāga jalaju bhari nīkēm. sasihi bhūṣa ahi lōbha amī kēm. 9.
bahuri basiṣṭha dīnhi anusāsana. baru dulahini baiṭhē ēka āsana. 10.

Lord Ram applied ‘Sindoor’<sup>1</sup> (vermillion powder) on the forehead of Sita along the hairline and on the hair on the top of the head. This sight was so wonderful, so beautiful and graceful to look at that even the creator Vidhi (i.e. Brahma) did not understand how to describe it*.

[*This verse can be interpreted to mean that ‘The sight of Lord Ram applying Sindoor on the head of Sita was so wonderful, so beautiful and graceful to watch that it is not possible to describe it by any means; it defied all description’.] (8)

This scene is reminiscent of a serpent, which is thirsty for nectar, picking up a young lotus flower of reddish hue and full of pollen, to appease the moon by offering this flower to it (so that the moon feels obliged to let the thirsty serpent quench its thirst by allowing it to drink or suck at the nectar that is stored in the moon which is regarded as the heavenly pitcher in which the gods have stored their Amrit, the elixir of blissful life)<sup>3</sup>. (9)

After this rite was completed, sage Vasistha instructed the groom and the bride to sit together on the same seat<sup>3</sup>. (10)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to Tulsidas’ book titled “Janki Mangal”, Chanda no. 18, line no. 3.

<sup>2</sup>In this remarkable metaphor, the arms of Lord Ram is likened to the serpent, the red-coloured cup made from gems that contained the red vermillion powder to the red lotus full of pollen, and the face of Sita to the moon. This comparison of the face of Sita to the moon has been done earlier also in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 230 when Lord Ram first meets Sita in the royal garden.

Another instance where Lord Ram and Sita stand face-to-face and the moon has been invoked as a comparison is when Sita puts the victory garland around the neck of the Lord—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 264. The similarity between these two instances is remarkable indeed and it is like a symphony in verses.

<sup>3</sup>The boy and the girl become a husband and wife once this rite of applying of the vermillion powder is finished. Prior to this they sit on separate seats, but now they are made to sit together. It implies that now onwards, they would share the ups and downs of life together on equal terms.]

छं०. बैठे बरासन रामु जानकि मुदित मन दसरथु भए । १ ।

तनु पुलक पुनि पुनि देखि अपनै सुकृत सुरतरु फल नए ॥ २ ॥

chanda.

baiṭhē barāsana rāmu jānaki mudita mana dasarathu bha'ē. 1.
tanu pulaka puni puni dēkhi apanēm sukrṭa surataru phala na'ē. 2.

When king Dasrath saw Lord Ram and Sita sitting together on the same seat (as husband and wife), his Mana (heart and mind) was euphoric with joy<sup>1</sup>. (Chanda line no. 1)

His (Dasrath's) body was thrilled with joy and happiness as he watched his good deeds take shape and fructify in the form of fruits of the evergreen tree of gods represented by Lord Ram (his meritorious and gracious son) and Sita (his beautiful and virtuous daughter-in-law)*<sup>2</sup>.

[*This line can read as follows also—"When Dasrath watched the couple sitting together on the same seat (as husband and wife), his body was thrilled with the joy that came with the thought that all his good deeds, which he compared to the evergreen tree of gods, have produced new fruits (in the sense that his son has been married to a beautiful, meritorious and virtuous princesses from another great kingdom of immense repute). What more would a father want."'] (Chanda line no. 2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Janak was fascinated by Lord Ram because he had recognized who "Ram" actually was, something that eluded Dasrath. Janak had also been thrilled, but not because he was watching or honouring a handsome prince who he has been fortunate enough to have as a groom for his daughter, but as a personified form of Brahm.

Janak's level of spiritual enlightenment had immediately warned him at first sight of the Lord that he was not an ordinary prince but some divine Being. This is clear in the reading of Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 215—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 216.

But Dasrath was so overcome with delusions created by the Lord's Maya (delusion creating powers) that he had merely treated Ram as his 'son', and had died wailing for him and calling out his name with a mental image of a son—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ahodhya Kand, Doha no. 155.

Even at the time when sage Vishwamitra had asked him to send Lord Ram with him to help eliminate the terror of demons, Dasrath had not realized that it was a part of the divine mission for which Lord Ram had come down to earth from heaven, but refused to oblige the sage fearing for the safety of his son—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 207—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 208.

So, in all the earlier verses which deal with Janak (Chanda line nos. 1-16 that precede Doha no. 324) it has been said that he was enthralled by the beautiful form of Lord Ram, and not of 'the couple'. When a reference to the 'couple' (i.e. Lord Ram and Sita) is made in Chaupai line no. 2 herein above, Janak is cited merely as an example of the joy that others felt (refer: Chaupai line no. 6 herein above).

The picture of Lord Ram and Sita together is absolutely stunning as endorsed elsewhere also in Ram Charit Manas. For instance, refer to Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 265.

<sup>2</sup>On the other hand, when the turn of describing Dasrath came, Tulsidas chose the moment when Lord Ram and Sita sat together as husband and wife. And then he says that "Dasrath was happy that all his meritorious deeds have taken the form of the couple, Lord Ram his son, and Sita his daughter-in-law". Even a causal reading of the concerned verses will make this observation clear.

It is said here that he was happy because ‘new fruits have been produced by the tree of his good deeds’. What is ‘new’ about it? Earlier his son was unmarried, and now he is married, and the icing on the cake is that the bride he has got is the most beautiful girl in the whole world (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 251). Added to this good fortune is the fact that he acquired great fame and got himself recognized in the whole world by breaking the bow of Lord Shiva and overcoming the wrath of the vengeful sage Parashuram, two achievements that made Lord Ram stand apart from all the so-called brave and mighty princes and kings of the time. What more would a father want in this world—Dasrath is so happy that his son has acquired for himself matchless glory and acclaim that not only established him as a strong and powerful prince but also brought laurels to his family, the dynasty of king Raghu. Another fruit is that his son has married a beautiful princess of great grace, virtues and beauty, and who belongs to another great kingdom of Janakpur that is as renowned as his own kingdom of Ayodhya.

This is the ‘new fruit’ that has given so much happiness to Dasrath. With the arrival of a bride, Sita, in the household, a new member has come—and it is the same as having another wonderful fruit in addition to the fruits he already has in the form of his beloved son Lord Ram and his other three sons Bharat, Shatrughan and Laxman. So if previously he had ‘four divine fruits’, now he has ‘five’ such fruits with the addition of Sita in the family.

King Dasrath had no daughter, and he longed to have one. By the grace of God and the good effects of his meritorious religious deeds and righteous life he has got his wish fulfilled in the form of Sita. The ‘daughter-in-law’, by the virtue of her marrying and adopting her husband’s family as her new home, becomes a ‘daughter’ of her adopted family in the eyes of the ‘law’. So, this was akin to Dasrath getting new fruits from the tree of his good deeds.]

भरि भुवन रहा उछाहु राम बिबाहु भा सबहीं कहा । ३ ।

केहि भाँति बरनि सिरात रसना एक यहु मंगलु महा ॥ ४ ॥ bhari bhuvana rahā uchāhu rāma bibāhu bhā sabahīm kahā. 3.

kēhi bhāmṭi barani sirāta rasanā ēka yahu maṅgalu mahā. 4.

There was universal rejoicing in all the corners of the world (“Bhuvan”). Everyone said that Lord Ram has been married (and it is therefore time to celebrate)<sup>1</sup>. (Chanda line no. 3)

How can the lone tongue praise (or describe) this auspicious happening which is of a huge dimension and so grand that it defies description<sup>2</sup>. (Chanda line no. 4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The same idea is expressed when Lord Ram had broken the bow—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 262.

Another instance is when Sita put the victory garland on Lord Ram—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 265.

<sup>2</sup>Once again, the same idea of a single tongue being unable to describe the glory of a certain event or situation is expressed in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha nos. 289 and 318 earlier in the context of this episode of Lord Ram’s marriage with Sita.]

तब जनक पाइ बसिष्ठ आयसु ब्याह साज सँवारि कै । ५ ।
मांडवी श्रुतकीरति उरमिला कुअँरि लई हँकारि कै ॥ ६ ॥

taba janaka pā'i basiṣṭha āyasu byāha sāja samvāri kai. 5. māṇḍavī śrutakīrati uramilā ku'am̐ri la'īm hamkāri kai. 6.

[Chanda line nos. 5-12 narrate that Janak took permission from sage Vasistha and married all the other three remaining princesses of the family who were sisters and cousins of Sita to the three brothers of Lord Ram. It means that all the four brothers were married together in the same ceremony and in the same family.]

After the wedding ceremony of Lord Ram and Sita was over, Janak took permission from sage Vasistha<sup>1</sup> and ordered that the other three princesses (daughters) of the family, i.e. Maandavi, Srutkirti and Urmila<sup>2</sup>, should be properly decked up in full bridal attire and be brought to the marriage pavilion<sup>3</sup>. (5-6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Janak did not wish to miss this golden and once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to see all the princesses of the family married. Fortunately for him, by a stroke of good luck and the good effects of his own righteous deeds and meritorious life, and of course by the grace of God, he has not only come in contact with the most famous family of the time, the royal family of Ayodhya that had acquired so much acclaim and had established itself as a righteous and law-abiding dynasty that even the Purans and Itihasas (ancient histories of India) mentioned it, but has already established an unbreakable bond created by marrying of his daughter Sita with the eldest son of the family, i.e. Lord Ram.

Now, Janak was shy of asking Dasrath that it is his desire to marry all the other three sisters of Sita to the other three sons of Dasrath if he would permit. He did not want to create any unsavoury situation should Dasrath dither and express his reservations. After all, even if Janak had asked Dasrath directly, the latter would have sought the opinion and permission of his royal Guru, sage Vasistha, before giving an answer. So why not seek permission from Vasistha directly instead, thought Janak—because if Vasistha agreed then there was no fear of Dasrath refusing.

So, he wisely and correctly thought that it would be best for him to seek permission from sage Vasistha.

Now the question is 'why did Janak wish to get all the daughters married into the same family?' There were many probable reasons for this decision of Janak as discussed below.

Sita and her other sisters, i.e. her own sister Urmila, and her cousin sisters Maandavi and Srutkirti, were very close to each other. They loved each other extremely dearly, and the very notion that they would be separated forever after Sita's marriage had made the other three princesses plunge into deep depression. These three princesses had shared each moment of their lives and so Janak thought that it would be prudent if they stayed together for the rest of their lives also.

Besides this, the royal family of Dasrath was highly reputed, disciplined and righteous, and all the four daughters were ensured a comfortable life in the future. Janak thought that there was no certainty what kind of family and husband the other three daughters would get if they were married elsewhere. Therefore, it was wise not to take the risk and marry them into the royal family of Ayodhya.

This marriage had the blessing of two great sages of the time—sage Vishwamitra and sage Vasistha, each no less exalted and powerful than the other. In a way they stood guarantors of happiness and well-being for all the four daughters of Janak who were getting married with the four sons of king Dasrath, and the resultant relationship and bond of friendship and family ties that were being now established.

Janak had got news through his spies that every one of the subjects in his kingdom of Janakpur wanted that all the four princesses should be married to the four wonderful princes of Ayodhya—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 311 along with its preceding Chanda line no. 3-4. Hence he thought that his decision would also be endorsed by his subjects. Every noble king ensures that all his actions and decisions are endorsed and liked by his subjects; this ensures that everyone is happy and there is no chance of rumour mongering and scandalous gossip in the kingdom. Even if something went wrong, the king would have support and sympathy of his subjects.

<sup>2</sup>Urmila was the younger sibling of Sita and the second daughter of Janak, while Maandavi and Srutkriti were the two daughters of Janak's younger brother named Kusketu or Kushdhwaj. Maandavi was the elder of the two.

The sequence in which the three princesses are mentioned is significant. Janak was the king, and so it is expected that his own daughter Urmila's name should be placed first. But instead of that, Maandavi and Srutkriti are mentioned first, followed by Urmila at the end. This implies two things—

(i) In terms of age, Maandavi was senior to both Srutkriti and Urmila, so she was named first. Srutkriti was Maandavi's sibling because both were the daughters of Kushdhwaj, the younger brother of Janak. So, Srutkriti was named second. The third place was left for Urmila. Hence, they are named in this sequence.

(ii) Janak was a very conscientious king, and he did not want his younger brother Kushdhwaj to feel belittled or offended by giving the latter's two daughters Maandavi and Srutkriti less importance than his own daughter Urmila. So the wise king Janak decided that Maandavi and Srutkriti should be given precedence over Urmila when summon was sent for them.

<sup>3</sup>Janak had made his intentions clear that he wanted all of them to be married right then by ordering that they be decorated in bridal attire and then brought to the pavilion. This also shows that they hadn't accompanied Sita when she was brought for her wedding rites. Sita was accompanied by other girls and ladies, but not her three sisters. They had stayed in the palace. This was in accordance with the custom of the society and royal protocol of the time that required that unmarried daughters should not come out in the public during open ceremonies.

The marriage of all the four lovely princesses of Janakpur with the four noble princes of Ayodhya as described in the present verses of Ram Charit Manas, have also been described by Tulsidas in his book "Janki Mangal" in its verse nos. 153-154. This latter book is entirely dedicated to the subject of Lord Ram's marriage.]

कुसकेतु कन्या प्रथम जो गुन सील सुख सोभामई । ७ ।

सब रीति प्रीति समेत करि सो ब्याहि नृप भरतहि दई ॥ ८ ॥ kusakētu kan'yā prathama jō guna sīla sukha sōbhāma'ī. 7.

saba rīti prīti samēta kari sō byāhi nṛpa bharatahi da'ī. 8.

The first (elder) daughter of Kusketu (also known by the name of Kushdhwaj, the younger brother of Janak) who has been named first or was summoned to the pavilion first (as mentioned in verse no. 6 herein above), was very virtuous, very courteous, gave happiness to others by her presence and amiable nature, and was a personified form of beauty and elegance. (7)

The king<sup>1</sup> performed all the necessary rites and duly observed all the customs before affectionately marrying her to Bharat<sup>2</sup> (the younger brother of Lord Ram). (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The 'first or elder' daughter, or 'the one who was named first amongst the three daughters called for the purpose of marriage', was Maandavi.

Though it is not clear here who had done the rites, whether it was Janak, Maandavi's elder uncle, or Maandavi's father Kushhwaj, but in all probability it was Kushdhwaj who did it because he was the father. According to the established procedure, it is always the father who does the 'Kanyaa-daan' ritual, i.e. he is the one who formally hands over his daughter to the groom as the final step during the wedding rites. In case the bride's father is not alive or unable to undertake the duty himself then only the next-of-kin, say an uncle or someone else in order of kinship and blood-line of the bride would perform Kanyaa-daan.

This means one more thing also—both Janak and Kushdhwaj were seated side by side during the entire procedure. This conclusion is obvious because four girls were married simultaneously—two were the daughters of Janak (Sita and Urmila), and two of Kushdhwaj (Maandavi and Srutkirti). It also means that the four brothers, i.e. Lord Ram and his three brothers Bharat, Shatrughan and Laxman, were also seated on the same platform so that the rituals could be done together.

Lord Ram and Sita were finished with their part, but they continued to sit alongside the others to create a wonderful sight of immeasurable and indescribable beauty as narrated in Chanda line no. 13-16 that follow below.

<sup>2</sup>It is prohibited in the scriptures that two or more blood-sisters (i.e. two or more sisters having the same mother) cannot be married to blood-brothers (brothers having the same mother). This restriction is very cleverly observed in the marriage of the four princesses of Janakpur with the four princes of Ayodhya.

Let's see how: Sita was married to Lord Ram, and now we read that Maandavi was married to Bharat. Sita's mother was Sunayana, the queen of Janak, and Lord Ram's mother was the senior queen of Dasrath, queen mother Kaushalya. But Maandavi's mother was the queen of Kushdhwaj, while that of Bharat was Kaikeyi, the second queen of Dasrath. Hence, this scriptural sanction was duly observed.

Another wonderful thing to observe is that Lord Ram and Bharat looked alike—both were dark-complexioned. Likewise, the two princesses, Sita and Maandavi, looked very much like twins. Like their husbands, Lord Ram and Bharat, these two princesses too had great affinity for each other.

And by the criterion of age also, these two pairs were perfect match—because Lord Ram was the eldest of the four brothers, and Bharat was the second eldest, and likewise Sita was the eldest and Maandavi next in terms of age.]

जानकी लघु भगिनी सकल सुंदरि सिरोमनि जानि कै । ९ ।
सो तनय दीन्ही व्याहि लखनहि सकल बिधि सनमानि कै ॥ १० ॥

jānakī laghu bhaginī sakala sundari sirōmani jāni kai. 9.
sō tanaya dīnhī byāhi lakhanahi sakala bidhi sanamāni kai. 10.

[The third in line to be married were Laxman and Urmila.]

Janki's (Sita's) younger sister, whom the king (Janak) knew to be like a crown-jewel in terms of beauty and elegance, was married to Laxman with great affection and honour after all rites and customs were duly completed. (Chanda line nos. 9-10)

[Note—Urmila, the blood-sister of Sita, was married to Laxman whose mother was Sumitra, the third queen of Dasrath.

Laxman was of a fair complexion like that of Urmila, and so they made a perfect pair.

One very important factor that played a major role in Janak marrying Sita's own sister with Laxman was that he had carefully observed that both these two brothers stayed together very closely and had immense love for each other. They were more like dear friends than mere brothers, sharing each other's views and emotions openly and without reservations. This will be very clear when we recall the conversation between Lord Ram and Laxman in the garden where they met Sita, and later on when they had gone to do their evening prayers—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) from Doha no. 230—to Doha no. 231; (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 237; and (iii) from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 237—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 239.

The above verses will clearly show the level of openness and frankness with which the two brothers shared each other's views and the little joys of life. Later on in the story also we learn that when Lord Ram had gone to exile, Laxman followed him and served him very affectionately throughout.

Since Sita and Urmila were blood-sisters, and Lord Ram and Laxman shared such close relationship of affection and love, the wise king Janak thought that by virtue of this marriage of Urmila with Laxman she will have a better chance to stay in close proximity with her own sister Sita who was already married to Lord Ram. The two pairs would bond well with each other because of the natural affinity between its members.]

जेहि नामु श्रुतकीरति सुलोचनि सुमुखि सब गुन आगरी । ११ । सो दई रिपुसूदनहि भूपति रूप सील उजागरी ॥ १२ ॥

jēhi nāmu śrutakīrati sulōcani sumukhi saba guna āgarī. 11.
sō daī ripusūdanahi bhūpati rūpa sīla ujāgarī. 12.

She whose name was Srutkirti who had beautiful eyes (like that of a doe), an attractive face, was a mine of good virtues, and was well-known for her beauty and amiable nature, was given in marriage by the king to Ripusudan* (another name of Shatrughan, the younger brother of Lord Ram and a sibling of Laxman). (Chanda line nos. 11-12)

[Note—The younger blood-sister of Maandavi was Srutkirti. Maandavi was married to Bharat, and her own younger sister Srutkirti was married to Shatrughan, the younger blood-brother of Laxman.

Thus, we have the following pairs: (i) Lord Ram, the eldest of the four brothers, was married to Sita, the eldest of the four sisters. (ii) Bharat, the second oldest of the 4 brothers, was married to Maandavi, the second oldest of the 4 sisters. (iii) Laxman, the third in line in terms of age, was married to Urmila, the third in terms of age amongst the sisters. And (iv) Shatrughan, the youngest of the 4 brothers, was married to Srutkirti who was the youngest amongst the sisters.

Besides this, all care was taken to adhere to the edict of the scriptures as outlined in a note appended to verse no. 8 herein above and explained in subsequent verses in relation to each couple.

*Shatrughan is also called “Ripusudan” which means one who trounces, one who vanquishes the enemy—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 197.]

अनुरूप बर दुलहिनि परस्पर लखि सकुच हियँ हरषहीं । १३ ।
सब मुदित सुंदरता सराहहिं सुमन सुर गन बरषहीं ॥ १४ ॥ anurūpa bara dulahini paraspara lakhi sakuca hiyaṁ haraṣahīm. 13.

saba mudita sundaratā sarāhahim sumana sura gana baraṣahīm. 14.

When the four pairs of brides and their respective grooms looked shyly at each other and their partners, and observed that each pair was perfectly matched, they blushed exceedingly even as they felt delighted in their hearts<sup>1</sup>. (Chanda line no. 13)

Everyone present on the occasion was euphoric, and all of them unanimously praised the magnificent beauty of the four pairs even as the assembly of gods showered flowers on them<sup>2</sup>. (Chanda line no. 14)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The four brothers and the four sisters blushed and felt shy because everyone was closely watching them, and when their eyes met their siblings they smiled in acknowledgement as well as in embarrassment because they all felt self-conscious and awkward.

<sup>2</sup>We have seen on many previous occasions that the gods have showered flowers at every instant when it was an occasion to rejoice and celebrate. The celebrated moment now was that all the four brothers had been married.]

सुंदरीं सुंदर बरन्ह सह सब एक मंडप राजहीं । १५ ।
जनु जीव उर चारिउ अवस्था बिभुन सहित बिराजहीं ॥ १६ ॥

sundarīm sundara baranha saha saba ēka maṇḍapa rājahīm. 15.
janu jīva ura cāri'u avasthā bibhuna sahita birājahīm. 16.

All the lovely brides looked very adorable in the same marriage pavilion and under the same canopy alongside their respective handsome grooms just as the Jiva (the living being, the creature) and his soul (the Jiva's Atma, the consciousness that is his true 'self'), which is also known as 'Bibhu'<sup>1</sup>, exhibits four states of conscious existence in this world<sup>2</sup>. (Chanda line nos. 15-16)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word "Bibhu" or "Vibhu"—This term applies to the Supreme Being. It means one who is almighty, omnipresent, all-pervading, all-encompassing, magnanimous, eternal, infinite, all-powerful, immovable, constant and immutable. In the context of the Jiva, the living being, the Vibhu is his Atma or soul that is pure consciousness which lives in the subtle space of his heart inside his gross physical body.

The word "Jiva" means a living being. The soul of the living being is known as the Atma. According to metaphysical concept, the Atma is nothing but the pure consciousness that lives in the subtle space of the heart of the Jiva. This consciousness is the defacto Lord or the Master of the creature, because if there is no 'consciousness' the creature would be dead and useless. The gross body will be there, but the Jiva is deemed to be dead if he loses consciousness in this body. This consciousness is invisible and very subtle, but the hard fact is that it is the real 'life and soul' of the Jiva instead of his gross body. But the ignorant world that can't see beyond the gross things that are visible to it erroneously treats the gross inane body as the identity of the Jiva instead of the Atma or the soul which is the pure subtle consciousness that resides in the subtle space of the heart that lives inside the gross body of the Jiva.

<sup>2</sup>The pure conscious self of the Jiva is his Atma or soul which is said to have four states of existence: viz. Turiya, Sushupta, Swapna and Jagrat. The Jiva and the Atma are inseparable from one another, and in essence their truthful identity is nothing but pure consciousness that is uniform and unchanging. But in the context of the physical world in which the Jiva lives, the Atma displays four states of existence with varying degrees of awareness and attachment with the world. In the 'Jagrat' state the Jiva is fully involved physically in the affairs of the world and is affected by them. The same Jiva finds a bit of peace when he sleeps and dreams, as in this stage called 'Swapna' his physical body is at rest and only the mind and subconscious are busy and active. In the third stage known as 'Sushupta', even the mind becomes inactive and therefore the rest is complete. But this stage is short-lived as the Jiva reverts back to the Swapna and the Jagrat stages soon. In certain cases when the Jiva is enlightened and wise, he crosses the threshold and reaches the fourth stage of existence known as 'Turiya' when the bliss obtained in the Sushupta stage becomes more sustainable and permanent.

This great metaphysical concept of the Upanishads is cited here to emphasise that all the four brothers and their respective brides were like the same Jiva living in four states of consciousness. The brides and the grooms loved each other so much as if their were different bodies with the same heart. Or, it was like the same soul living in two bodies. Applied in a more holistic sense it may mean that though in physical terms there were four brothers and four brides but in essence they were the same Divine Lord who has manifested himself in their individual forms.

The four states of Consciousness and its relationship with the Jiva—According to the concepts of metaphysics, the ‘consciousness’ exists in four primary states within the body of the creature. These in descending order are the following—(i) the highest level known as ‘Turiya’ which is the transcendental state of existence, (ii) the next lower level known as ‘Sushupta’ which is equivalent to deep sleep state of consciousness, (iii) the third lower level and the second from the lowest as ‘Swapna’ which means dreaming state of consciousness, and (iv) the lowest level as ‘Jagrat’ which means the waking state of consciousness. Each state has its own unique virtues, characters and dynamism.

Therefore, from the perspective of metaphysics, Lord Ram and Sita represent the Turiya state, Bharat and Maandavi the Sushupta state, Shatrughan and Srutkirti the Swapna state, and Laxman and Urmila the Jagrat state.

The reason for this association is this: Lord Ram is the Supreme Being known as Brahm or Super Consciousness, and his dynamic Shakti or power of action is Sita. Brahm is recognized in the transcendental state of consciousness, and not in its gross level. An ascetic is said to live in this Turiya state of meditative trance where he may appear to be going about his normal duties of the world but actually he remains aloof from everything and sees everything with utmost detachment and neutrality like the case of Lord Ram. So, Lord Ram represents the ‘Turiya state’.

The Turiya state and Sushupta state are closely linked with only a hair-line distinction between the two. Bharat and Lord Ram resembled each other in all matters—physical looks as well as at the temperamental level. Bharat was as calm and wise as Lord Ram. Even in the story we will read that while Lord Ram lived like a hermit in the forest, Bharat copied him in Ayodhya by living like a hermit in exile. Therefore, Bharat represents the ‘Sushupta state’, the state having close links with the Turiya state and resembling the latter. In the Sushupta state, the mind is unaware of the external world and remains in a blissful state of calmness and tranquility like the case of Bharat.

Laxman had accompanied Lord Ram to the forest and not only helped the Lord do all his daily chores but also was his comrade-in-arm in the epic war of Lanka and the rest of the story from start to finish. In other words, like the creature doing his duties in this mundane gross world during his waking state of life when all his organs of perceptions and actions interact with the world, Laxman helped Lord Ram in his worldly duties. Therefore, he represents the ‘Jagrat state’ or the waking state.

And finally we have Shatrughan who represented the ‘Swapna state’ as he remained active in this world but only in a symbolic and perfunctory way like a man remaining active in a world of dreams. He carried out the daily grind of the administrative affairs of the huge kingdom of Ayodhya because Bharat had taken voluntary exile and Laxman had gone with Lord Ram to actively help the Lord in the forest—but it was in a sanitized environment of the city of Ayodhya that was already in a state of gloom and grief due to the exile of Lord Ram; there was no excitement. Aside of routine work and daily chores, there was no excitement for Shatrughan unlike Laxman who had to face the daily uncertainty of the cruel environment of the unknown and uncharted forest.

Whatever Shatrughan did during the long 14 years of Lord Ram’s exile remained unsung and unacknowledged by all—no where do we find any applause for Shatrughan and his skillful handling of the affairs of the kingdom during the Lord’s absence. On the other hand, Laxman has been praised by everyone as he served Lord Ram in the forest and helped in winning the war of Lanka, but the role of Shatrughan was no less important in taking care of the kingdom of Ayodhya with as much diligence and effort as Lord Ram would have himself done. But like the case where a man does so many great deeds in his dream but these deeds remain unacknowledged and unrecognized in the physical world, Shatrughan remained unacknowledged and unrecognized by this gross world. It must not be forgotten that often a man finds solutions for his greatest problems related to the physical world while he sleeps and dreams of them, but when he implements the ideas that he got in his dream to overcome the problems of the physical world, only his actions that are taken in practice are observed and recognized by the external world which remains oblivious of the back-ground channel of the 'dream' where the solution and the direction for action was actually found or discovered by the concerned person.

That is why while Laxman's deeds were openly acknowledged and praised by all, Shatrughan, who maintained a very low profile and worked behind the curtains as it were, remained obscure. Hence, coming to our discussion, he is said to represent the 'Swapna or dreaming state' which is a combination of activity at the subtle level, and non-activity at the gross level of existence.

The four states of existence of the consciousness have been described in detail in the following Upanishads—(a) Shukla Yajur Veda—Trishikhi Brahman Upanishad, Canto 2, verse nos. 149-150; Brihad Aranyak Upanishad 2/1/16-20, 4/3/9-38; Subalo-panishad, Canto 4 full as well as Canto 9, verse no. 1-7; Paingalo-panishad, 2/11-16; Mandal Brahmin Upanishad, 2/4-2/5; Turiyateet Upanishad. (b) Krishna Yajur Veda tradition—Varaaha Upanishad, Canto 2, verse no. 59-64, 72; Canto 4, verse no. 11-20; Brahmo-panishad, verse no. 1, 20-21; Kaivalya Upanishad, verse no. 12-14; Dhyan Bindu Upanishad, verse no. 93/12-93/15; Sarwasaar Upanishad, verse no. 4; Shaarirak Upanishad, verse no. 14; Brahm/Amrit Bindu Upanishad, verse no. 11. (c) Atharva Veda tradition—Mandukya Upanishad, verse nos. 3-7; Atharvashikha Upanishad; Nrisingh Tapini Upanishad, Canto 4, verse no. 4-7; Naradparivrajak Upanishad, Canto 5, verse nos. 1, 24-26; Canto 6, verse no. 3-4, Canto 8, verse nos. 9-16, 19-20; Ram Uttar Tapini Upanishad, Canto 3, verse nos. 1-4 (in relation with Sri Ram and others), and verse nos. 5-8 (in relation with the Atma); Param Hans Parivarjak Upanishad, paragraph no. 6; Annapurna Upanishad, Canto 1, verse nos. 25; Canto 2, verse nos. 12-16; Canto 3, verse nos. 10, 13, 16-18; Canto 5, verse nos. 16, 46, 84-85, 88-89, 109-111.

The Atma or the soul which is pure consciousness and true self of the creature has many states of existence according to metaphysics—e.g. the 1st state called the waking state or 'Jagrat', the 2nd state called the dreaming or 'Swapna', and the 3rd called the deep sleep state of consciousness or 'Sushupta'. There is a 4th state also, and it is called 'Turiya', which is obtained as a result of going beyond the 3rd stage of deep sleep, and it is a permanent state of bliss and felicity in which the conscious Atma usually lives in ordinary people who are said to be self-realised. Beyond this 4th state is the Turiyateet, literally the state which is beyond the Turiya state and in which the Atma (pure consciousness) is free from all the encumbrances and characters displayed by it during the other four states. Therefore, Turiyateet would be the 5th state of existence of the Atma, and the higher transcendental state when the spiritual aspirant experiences oneness with Brahm. The Turiyateet state is the state of existence of 'super-consciousness' on a perpetual basis. Whereas the Turiya state is the hallmark of those who are self-realised, the Turiyateet state is the benchmark for those who are Brahm-realised. The Turiya state is the preliminary ground which paves the way for attaining the Turiyateet state.

To start with the understanding of these different states of existences of the consciousness, we have to begin with the fundamental two states in which the creature lives in this world. These two are the following—(1) the waking and (2) the sleeping states. For the purposes of analyzing the behaviour and existential states of the creature during these two fundamental stages, they have been classified into three distinct states as follows—the waking state called ‘Jagrat’, the dream state called ‘Swapna’, and the deep sleep state called ‘Sushupta. Beyond these three, there are two transcendental states called Turiya and Turiyateet states of existence of the consciousness in which self-realisation and Brahm-realisation are possible, or which mark the state in which those who are self-realised and Brahm-realised exist. We will now endeavour to analyse all these five states of existence of the conscious Atma in simple terms in brief.

According to the Varaaha Upanishad of Krishna Yajur Veda, Canto 1, verse no. 11, there are three types of world that the Jiva lives in. They pertain to the three states of consciousness in this world. They are Vishwa (the world as the individual creature perceives it in its waking state of consciousness), Taijas (the world as the individual creature perceives it in its dreaming state of consciousness), and Pragya (the world as the individual creature perceives it in its deep sleep state of consciousness).

The Atharva Veda’s Par Brahm Upanishad, verse no. 5 says that the four states of existence of consciousness, viz. the Jagrat or waking state, the Swapna or the dreaming state, the Sushupta or the deep sleep state, and the Turiya or the post-Sushupta state, correspond to the four forms of divinity as represented by Brahma the creator, Vishnu the sustainer, Rudra the concluder and the patron god of ascetics, and the Atma which is pure consciousness representing the supreme transcendental Brahm.

This notion of four states of consciousness vis-à-vis Lord Ram and his three brothers has been elaborately dealt with in Atharva Veda’s Ram Uttar Tapini Upanishad, Canto 3, verse nos. 1-4.]

दो०. मुदित अवधपति सकल सुत बधुन्ह समेत निहारि ।

जनु पाए महिपाल मनि क्रियन्ह सहित फल चारि ॥ ३२५ ॥

dōhā.

mudita avadhapati sakala suta badhunha samēta nihāri.
janu pā'ē mahipāla mani kriyanha sahita phala cāri. 325.

The king of Ayodhya (Dasrath) was jubilant as he watched his four sons alongside their respective brides. They appeared to symbolize the four fruits that the king got as rewards for his righteous and noble deeds and leading an auspicious life marked by probity and propriety. (Doha no. 325)

[Note-Refer also to “Janki Mangal”, verse no. 158.

Earlier in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 309 we have read about the four great rewards for meritorious deeds that one does in his life. They are ‘Artha’ or financial well-being, ‘Dharma’ or fulfillment of all religious obligation, ‘Kaam’ or fulfillment of one’s desires, and ‘Moksha’ or spiritual liberation and emancipation. These four divine fruits are represented by the four glorious sons of king Dasrath.

Lord Ram stands for Moksha because he is a personified form of the Supreme Being who is the target for all spiritual aspirants who seek to find eternal liberation and freedom from the cycle of birth and death in this gross mundane world. Bharat stands for the ideals of Dharma because by his deeds and actions he had set a stellar example of a life of auspiciousness, righteousness, probity, propriety and noble conduct. Shatrughan stands for Artha because he had managed the finances and other affairs of the kingdom of Ayodhya extremely well during the long time of 14 years when his other three brothers were absent from the city because of Lord Ram's forest exile. And finally Laxman stood for Kaam as he is the one who had helped Lord Ram fulfill his desire of eliminating the cruel demons.

Their wives have been likened to their respective Shaktis or inherent strengths because all of them had contributed their might in helping their respective husbands fulfill their obligations and duties without creating any hindrance for them. Imagine the situation if Sita had not agreed with Lord Ram to let Ravana, the king of Lanka, abduct her so that the Lord can go and kill the entire lot of tyrannical demons, inspite of having to suffer a lot in the process.

Similarly, when Laxman decided to accompany Lord Ram to the forest, his wife Urmila did not come in the way and insist that he change his decision. Likewise, Bharat's wife suffered loneliness and forced separation from her husband all through the 14 years of exile because Bharat chose to live like a hermit on the outskirts of Ayodhya for the entire duration of the period; she did not complain. And Shatrughan's wife too helped her husband to carry on with his duties without instigating him to usurp the powers of the kingdom and misuse his authority for selfish gains and enjoyments.

The access to the 'four fruits or rewards' by king Dasrath as well as his queens who were blessed enough to have the supreme Lord of the world as their son known as Lord Ram has been referred to elsewhere also in the context of Lord Ram's marriage in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 309, and in Doha no. 345.]

चौ०. जसि रघुबीर ब्याह बिधि बरनी । सकल कुँअर ब्याहे तेहिं करनी ॥ १ ॥
 कहि न जाइ कछु दाइज भूरी । रहा कनक मनि मंडपु पूरी ॥ २ ॥
 कंबल बसन बिचित्र पटोरे । भाँति भाँति बहु मोल न थोरे ॥ ३ ॥
 गज रथ तुरग दास अरु दासी । धेनु अलंकृत कामदुहा सी ॥ ४ ॥ बस्तु अनेक करिअ किमि लेखा । कहि न जाइ जानहिं जिन्ह देखा ॥ ५ ॥

caupāī.

jasi raghubīra byāha bidhi baranī. sakala kumāra byāhē tēhiṁ karānī. 1.
 kahi na jā'i kachu dā'ija bhūrī. rahā kanaka mani maṇḍapu pūrī. 2.
 kambala basana bicitra paṭōrē. bhāmṭi bhāmṭi bahu mōla na thōrē. 3.
 gaja ratha turaga dāsa aru dāsī. dhēnu alaṅkṛta kāmāduhā sī. 4.
 bastu anēka kari'a kimi lēkhā. kahi na jā'i jānahiṁ jinha dēkhā. 5.

All the princes were married in the same way and following the same rites as had been observed for the marriage of Lord Ram ("Raghubir")<sup>1</sup>. (1)

[Verse nos. 2-5 describe the marriage gifts, known as ‘Dahej’ (dā'ija)<sup>2</sup>, that was given by king Janak to all the grooms at the end of the marriage ceremony.]

It is not possible to describe the sort, the quality and the quantity of ‘Dahej’ or the marriage gifts that were collected at the pavilion to be given to the grooms. *The entire pavilion was full of gold, gems and other precious things.

[*This 2nd part of the verse can be read as follows also: “The golden pavilion was full of gems (and other things mentioned in verse no. 3) that were collected for the purpose of giving as Dahej on the occasion of the marriage.”] (2)

Different varieties of woolen blankets, cotton garments and ceremonial silk robes that were valuable and especially made for the occasion were there in abundance.<sup>3</sup> (3)

Besides these things (that were collected in huge heaps under the canopy of the main pavilion), there were elephants, chariots, horses and servants, both male and female (that collected outside and around the main pavilion)*. Then there were fully decorated milch cows that were like the Kamdhenu cow of the gods which is famous for giving an endless supply of milk.<sup>4</sup> (4)

There were countless other things so innumerable in number and diverse in quality that it is not possible to account for them or list them. It is not possible to describe them either; only those who saw them knew how immense the gifts were, and even they failed to fully appreciate their quality, quantity and value. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>An exactly the same idea in the same words have been conveyed by Tulsidas in “Janki Mangal”, verse no. 155.

While narrating the marriage of the three brothers of Lord Ram, i.e. Bharat, Shatrughan and Laxman, no details have been given in Chanda line nos. 7-12 that precede Doha no. 325 herein above. So this verse is included by Tulsidas to remove all doubts regarding the way they were married—“they were all married in the same way as Lord Ram”.

It ought to be noted here that Lord Ram was so gracious that he had always shared all the pleasures of life, small or big, with his brothers. There are abundant examples of it. The marriage of all the four brothers simultaneously at the same venue and in the same family epitomizes this desire of the Lord. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1, 4 that precedes Doha no. 205; Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-7 that precede Doha no. 10.

<sup>2</sup>The “Dahej” (dā'ija) is an age-old tradition wherein the bride’s father gives gifts to the newly married couple. Basically the idea is that the bride’s father gives all those things that a newly-wed couple would need to start a home—things of daily need such as clothes, utensils etc. Then he gives some jewellery to the bride to ensure her financial security. Other costly items include gems and things made of gold and silver. These also serve the same long-term purpose of financial security. Since this marriage was in a royal family, so items befitting a king were included—such as elephants, horses, chariots and servants. The idea is the same—that the newly wed couple can start a new home independently as a king and queen.

Amongst the various reasons behind this custom is that the bride’s father wished to tell the groom’s family that he is well-off and prosperous, and that therefore they shouldn’t taunt his daughter or her family on pecuniary grounds. His daughter has lived in comfort in her father’s home, and so she should be allowed the comfortable life she is accustomed to, and not to treat her as a maid.

The girl's father wishes to convey the hint that he is giving his daughter in marriage to the groom not because he cannot sustain her financially or that she is any kind of burden on him, but because it is the custom of the society and sanctioned by the scriptures as this was the way the creator had devised the things in his plan to perpetuate life in this world.

<sup>3</sup>Pearls, gems and other precious metals such as gold and silver in the form of coins and ornaments etc. were collected in big bejeweled jars made of jade, sapphire and ruby and the like. Clothes, robes and blankets etc. of various denominations that were made of fine material with embroidery work done in golden and silver threads, and well decorated by an assortment of pearls and different types of gems and precious stones were arranged in huge bundles and stacked in the pavilion.

<sup>4</sup>The were assembled around the main platform where the marriage rituals were done, while the animals and the chariots were collected outside the pavilion.

Not only the cows, but all the other animals were also decorated. It was a usual practice for those who could afford it to adorn the gifted cow with gold on its horns and hooves, and embroidered clothes draped on its back. Since this was a marriage in a royal family it is natural to conclude that all the other animals such as the elephants and the horses were also likewise decorated. And obviously by extension, the chariots must also have been adequately adorned. The servants too were fully decked up in fine clothes and ornaments that would make them look dignified when they stood next to their respective masters.

*Amongst the servants, both males and females, who were sent by Janak with his four daughters, were those who had been serving the royal household for a long time and were personal attendants of the princesses. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 339. This was done to ensure that the daughters did not feel home-sick, were well-cared for and well-attended. These attendants knew about their preferences and habits, and would help the four princesses feel comfortable and at-home in a completely new environment at their in-law's place.

There is another hidden reason behind this tradition of sending servants to accompany the bride. They would owe allegiance to her more than anyone else, and would virtually act as spies on the behalf of the bride's father to keep a close watch on her safety and well-being. Should anything go wrong and the girl feels the need to confide with someone with whom she is comfortable, these maid-servants and other attendants who had been serving her in her father's home will come to her aide and act as a safety-valve for her. They can even send a secret message to her father if the need arises.]

लोकपाल अवलोकि सिहाने । लीन्ह अवधपति सबु सुखु माने ॥ ६ ॥
दीन्ह जाचकन्हि जो जेहि भावा । उबरा सो जनवासेहि आवा ॥ ७ ॥ तब कर जोरि जनकु मृदु बानी । बोले सब बरात सनमानी ॥ ८ ॥ lōkapāla avalōki sihānē. līnha avadhapati sabu sukhu mānē. 6.

dīnha jācakanhi jō jēhi bhāvā. ubarā sō janavāsēhiṁ āvā. 7.

taba kara jōri janaku mṛdu bānī. bōlē saba barāta sanamānī. 8.

All these marriage gifts (i.e. the Dahej) were appreciated and praised by all the Lokpals (custodians of the world—here meaning the many gods who were watching the marriage proceedings both in human forms who mingled with the crowd in the pavilion, as well as in their invisible form in the sky). King Dasrath of Ayodhya felt happy and accepted these gifts with grace<sup>1</sup>. (6)

Whatever was asked of king Dasrath by the (countless) alms-seekers, he gave them liberally, and without reservations<sup>2</sup>. After these formalities were over, he (Dasrath) came to the palace where the marriage party had been lodged. (7)

Then (i.e. after king Dasrath was duly honoured and marriage gifts were handed over to him on behalf of the grooms, and he left the venue for his residence as stated in Chaupai line nos. 2-7 herein above), king Janak joined his palms as a sign of showing great respect to all other members of the marriage party and spoke to them sweetly, exchanging greetings and pleasantries with them<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Dasrath wished to say “most welcome” to Janak, and this verse in effect means exactly this. When someone gives a gift it is good manners and courteous to accept it graciously with a smile and say thanks. It was not that Dasrath lacked anything; the kingdom of Ayodhya was very prosperous and well-to-do. His treasury was full to the brim. But he accepted whatever was given as Dahej in deference to Janak’s sentiments and as a sign of showing great respect to him.

The fact that Ayodhya was a very prosperous kingdom comes to the fore on countless occasions as we read the story. For instance, one can read the following verses to get an idea of its wealth and prosperity: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(a) at the time of Lord Ram’s birth in Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 194; Chaupai line nos. 2-8 that precede Doha no. 195; (b) at the time the auspicious news of marriage of Lord Ram with Sita arrived in Ayodhya from Janakpur in Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 296—to Doha no. 297; (c) at the time the marriage party arrived in Ayodhya with the four brides as described from Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 344—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 345.

Similarly, in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 324 it is said that Ayodhya was a kingdom whose majesty and glory was praised by even the king of gods, and its wealth and prosperity made the treasurer of gods ashamed of his own wealth.

The idea is that Dasrath did not accept these gifts because he was greedy for easy wealth, but as gesture of respect for Janak. Obviously it would be highly uncivilized, impolite, rude and uncourteous for Dasrath if he had refused to accept anything that Janak gave.

We will read in the next line no. 7 that soon after accepting the gifts, Dasrath liberally gave away whatever was asked by alms-seekers who flocked around him to accept gifts that the groom’s father gives as a token of his joy.

<sup>2</sup>Whenever there was a happy occasion, alms-seekers used to assemble around the chief patron to get gifts. Not that these alms-seekers were paupers or beggars, but they sought gifts as a token of rejoicing and celebration when one gives and accepts gifts, such as during festivals and other ceremonial events. These alms-seekers then themselves liberally donated and cheerfully gave away to others what they had got as gifts. This is very clear when we read Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 194.

Dasrath was a charitable person with a broad, magnanimous heart who enjoyed giving liberally whatever anyone wanted and whatever came his way as is clear elsewhere also—refer for instance: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 196 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 7-8; and Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 351.

Even his queens followed his example and gave away liberally and with open hands—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 295 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 7-8.

<sup>3</sup>The father-in-law of the bride, i.e. king Dasrath was the chief guest on the occasion of the marriage ceremony. He was shown full attention. When he left the venue and retired to his place of lodging, king Janak duly honoured the rest of the marriage party by meeting each individual member and exchanging sweet pleasantries with them.

The following Chanda verses continue with this exchange of pleasantries and the events that followed them.]

छं०. सनमानि सकल बरात आदर दान बिनय बड़ाइ कै । १ ।

प्रमुदित महा मुनि बृंद बंदे पूजि प्रेम लड़ाइ कै ॥ २ ॥

chanda.

sanamāni sakala barāta ādara dāna binaya barā'i kai. 1.

pramudita mahā muni br̥nda bandē pūji prēma larā'i kai. 2.

[The previous Chaupai verses have dealt primarily with the conduct of the marriage rites and the accompanying formality of giving of marriage gifts known in local parlance as Dahej-giving at the end of them. Now in these following Chanda verses we read that Janak has shown respect to all the members of the marriage party and made them all happy by his courteousness, good manners, simplicity and affection for all of them.]

He (king Janak) duly honoured the entire marriage party by showing great respect to all its members individually by way of polite prayers and giving abundant gifts to them.<sup>1</sup> (Chanda line no. 1)

The great sages present there felt very delighted at the way the marriage ceremony was conducted with great grace, honour and dignity by Janak, and by the most courteous and polite way he showed his respect to the entire marriage party as well as to these sages themselves.

Then the king worshipped and paid his obeisance to all the other Brahmins and elders of the groom's party with great expression of affection towards all of them.<sup>2</sup> (Chanda line no. 2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We have read in earlier Chaupai line no. 8 that Janak faced the members of the groom's party, speaking politely with them and exchanging pleasantries. These Chanda verses build upon that premise and describe how he pleased each member of the marriage party individually as well as in the form of their groups.]

<sup>2</sup>The marriage party consisted not only of noble men, courtiers, ministers and senior and prominent citizens of Ayodhya but also of great sages and Brahmins as well as elders of the society. So Janak had attended to each one of them individually in accordance with his standing and position in the hierarchy of the society and royalty. Since sages, Brahmins and elders should be shown special respect and their blessings sought by the host, Janak took care to address this aspect of hospitality by worshipping them and paying his obeisance to them in a special manner befitting their stature. This would obviously make them pleased.]

सिरु नाइ देव मनाइ सब सन कहत कर संपुट किएँ । ३ ।

सुर साधु चाहत भाउ सिंधु कि तोष जल अंजलि दिएँ ॥ ४ ॥

siru nā'i dēva manā'i saba sana kahata kara sampuṭa ki'ēm̃. 3.

sura sādhu cāhata bhā'u sindhuki tōṣa jala anjali di'ēm̃. 4.

After that, king Janak offered his obeisance to the gods by bowing his head reverentially before them. He joined his palms in prayer and submitted [3]—‘Gods and holy men seek nothing but love and submission (i.e. they are fully contented and want nothing else but respect and affection from others). Say, is it ever possible to actually fill the ocean by offering a palm-full cup of water as done when one offers performs his daily ritual of offering oblations to it? [4]<sup>1</sup>’ (Chanda line nos. 3-4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, though the mighty ocean, which is the largest reservoir of water on earth, does not need any more water to make it full, but still it expects that others at least show their respect to its greatness by offering oblations to it. A mere cup-full of water is like a speck of sand on the vast stretch of the desert or the shore line covered with tons and tons of sand, but it still satisfies the ocean because it is a token of respect that the worshipper offers to the ocean to acknowledge the fact that the water which is brought down to him in the form of rain that sustains life on earth and is likened to the elixir of life known as Amrit owes its origin to the ocean.

The ocean that gulps down endless flows of great rivers gushing down into it from the time the earth was created but still never overflows its bank, and neither does it say that it is full and so it does not need any more water from these rivers, the same ocean feels contented by a mere cup of water offered to it by a worshipper. In other words, the only thing the ocean expects is respect, and nothing else.

Similarly, the only thing the great gods and holy men expect is respect and honourable treatment. They are not hungry or thirsty for anything else.

Hence, when king Janak offered his obeisance to the sages, the Brahmins and other elders present on the occasion (as in Chanda line no. 2), as well as the gods and holy men (as in Chanda line no. 3), all of them felt extremely delighted and blessed the king. In this sense, Chanda line nos. 2-3 can be combined to give a greater effect to their broader meaning.]

कर जोरि जनकु बहोरि बंधु समेत कोसलराय सों । ५ ।

बोले मनोहर बयन सानि सनेह सील सुभाय सों ॥ ६ ॥

संबंध राजन रावरें हम बड़े अब सब बिधि भए । ७ ।

एहि राज साज समेत सेवक जानिबे बिनु गथ लए ॥ ८ ॥
 ए दारिका परिचारिका करि पालिबीं करुना नई । ९ । अपराधु छमिबो बोलि पठए बहुत हौं ढीट्यो कई ॥ १० ॥

kara jōri janaku bahōri bandhu samēta kōsalarāya sōm. 5.
 bōlē manōhara bayana sāni sanēha sīla subhāya sōm. 6.
 sambandha rājana rāvarēm hama barē aba saba bidhi bha'ē. 7.
 ēhi rāja sāja samēta sēvaka jānibē binu gatha la'ē. 8.
 ē dārikā paricārikā kari pālibīm karunā na'ī. 9.
 aparādhu chamibō bōli paṭha'ē bahuta hauṁ ḍhīṭyō ka'ī. 10.

[After having paid his obeisance to the sage, Brahmins, elders, gods and holy men present on the occasion, king Janak turned to king Dasrath, the father of his son-in-laws, and offered his due respects to him in Chanda line nos. 5-10.]

Then king Janak, along with his brother (i.e. younger brother Kushdhvaj), stood most gracefully and humbly before the king of Kaushal (which is another name for Ayodhya; i.e. king Dasrath) [5], and paid his tribute to him by submitting himself before him and speaking very sweetly, using polite words that were very courteous and full of affection as follows—[6]

‘Your great Majesty! We have been immensely honoured in all possible ways by the virtue of our connection, our association and our ties with your honourable self [7].

All of us, i.e. at our individual level as well as at the level of the kingdom at large, submit ourselves unconditionally before you. From now onwards you can treat all of us as your humble and obedient servants. [That is, we are ready to serve you in any way you please, without obligations!] [8]

Treat these innocent and inexperienced girls (our daughters) with the greatest of kindness and love [9], and forgive them for any mistakes of commission and omission that they may make. Besides this, please excuse me for giving you the trouble of calling you from such a great distance to this place* [10].’ (Chanda line nos. 5-10)

[Note—In these verses, king Janak has offered his respects to king Dasrath and has politely requested him to treat the four newly wed girls, who are now onwards his daughters-in-law, with the greatest of love and care as he would have shown to his own daughters. These four brides, i.e. Sita and her sister Urmila, as well as her cousins Maandavi and Srutkirti, are going to a new home of which they have no idea. They are unaware of its customs, routine and ways of life and expectations from them. The brides would be far away from home and surrounded by complete strangers in the initial days of their life in Ayodhya before they become fully acquainted with their new relations and become accustomed to their in-laws’ household and the way of life there.

So Dasrath was requested by Janak to be extra careful and be diligent in acting the part of a loving father-in-law who is expected to make his daughter-in-law feel fully comfortable and at ease in the new home as if it was her original parent’s home.

*Janak was extremely polite, and it is evident in this statement of his. What he means is this—

“Ordinarily, a junior king goes to pay his respects or tributes to the senior king, or the emperor. The process of marriage that was chosen for marrying my daughter Sita was a ‘Swayambar’, which literally means ‘self-chosen bride or groom’, in which the qualified candidate marries the girl in a very brief ceremony without the necessity of having to go through the elaborate process that is required under the traditional system of marriage which entails a lot of formalities such as elaborate rituals and their accompanying ceremonies, as well as the requirement of the presence of the groom’s parents amongst other things.

So, formally I could have avoided giving you the trouble of coming all the way from Ayodhya to Janakpur to attend the marriage of Sita with your son Ram. I could have solemnised the marriage and send the couple with my senior priest and other senior citizens to Ayodhya. Or better still, I could have accompanied the newly married couple myself and paid a visit to Ayodhya.

But sir, I had to give you the trouble to come to Janakpur as it was the express order of sage Vishwamitra (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 286—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 287).

Nevertheless, I am extremely glad that you came as it not only gave me the honour and privilege of serving you personally but also of strengthening the bond of affection and friendship between the two of us at the individual level as well as between our two great kingdoms by getting all my daughters, mine and my brother’s, married to your excellent sons. What more would I want; what more could I have prayed for? I feel that today, I am the most blessed king on the face of earth!”]

पुनि भानुकुलभूषन सकल सनमान निधि समधी किए। ११।

कहि जाति नहिं बिनती परस्पर प्रेम परिपूरन हिए॥ १२॥

puni bhānukulabhūṣana sakala sanamāna nidhi samadhī ki'ē. 11.

kahi jāti nahim binatī paraspara prēma paripūrana hi'ē. 12.

After king Janak had shown his respect and courtesy to king Dasrath who was a gem in the glorious solar race<sup>1</sup>, the latter reciprocated the warm gestures of king Janak by being immensely courteous and extremely polite towards him in all possible ways as he had been to Dasrath<sup>2</sup>. (Chanda line no. 11)

They were so affectionate and polite towards each other, and the reciprocal way they prayed and offered their respects to each other with their hearts brimming over with love and affection that it is not possible to describe any part of it<sup>3</sup>. (Chanda line no. 12)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>King Dasrath is compared to the ‘sun’ in the solar race. This is a metaphor to mean that out of so many kings in this race, Dasrath was the most fortunate and glorious king. He had the Supreme Being as his son in the form of Lord Ram, and this fact in itself lifts him to the highest stature of human existence. Like the sun that shines bright and clear in the sky and outshines the rest of the celestial bodies, including the moon that is the king of the night sky, Dasrath’s glory and fame outshone the rest of the kings of this race.

<sup>2</sup>Dasrath was well-versed with the ways of protocol as he was a great emperor who had been welcoming and showing respects to great kings, sages, Brahmins and gods all through his life. In the case of Janak he took special care to express his friendship and affection by being extremely courteous and polite because all his sons have now been married to all the daughters of Janak and his brother Kushdhwaj. This marriage had created a special inviolable relationship between these two great kings and their kingdoms. Being the senior of the two, Dasrath went out of his way to make Janak comfortable and happy. For all practical purposes, Dasrath was now the de-facto elder brother of Janak, and the two vowed to stand by each other in thick and thin.

Dasrath showed so much affection, honour and respect for Janak that the latter was virtually swept of his feet with these expressions; Janak was overwhelmed by Dasrath's politeness and affectionate gestures.

<sup>3</sup>This mutual show of respect and honour must have gone on for some time and become progressively intense so much so that each one of them seemed overwhelmed by the affection of the other.]

बृंदारका गन सुमन बरिसहिं राउ जनवासेहि चले । १३ ।
दुंदुभी जय धुनि बेद धुनि नभ नगर कौतूहल भले ॥ १४ ॥ br̥ndārakā gana sumana barisahim rā'u janavāsēhi calē. 13.

dundubhī jaya dhuni bēda dhuni nabha nagara kautūhala bhalē. 14.

The gods showered flowers from the sky (heaven) as the king (Dasrath) made his way to his lodging place. (Chanda line no. 13)

There was a cacophony of sounds created by the beating of the kettle-drums, exclamatory loud applause of cheer, and the chanting of the hymns of the Vedas. There was a tumult in the sky (the heaven from where the gods were watching the proceeding on the ground) as well as in the city (of Janakpur). (Chanda line no. 14)

[Note—After the formalities and exchange of greetings and pleasantries were over, Dasrath took his leave and proceeded towards the palace where he and other members of the marriage party were lodged.

At that time, there was all-round celebration—both in the heaven as well as in the city.]

तब सखीं मंगल गान करत मुनीस आयसु पाइ कै । १५ ।
दूलह दुलहिनिन्ह सहित सुंदरि चलीं कोहबर ल्याइ कै ॥ १६ ॥

taba sakhīm maṅgala gāna karata munīsa āyasu pā'i kai. 15.
dūlaha dulahininha sahita sundari calīm kōhabara lyā'i kai. 16.

Then, upon receiving orders from the chief sage (i.e. sage Vasistha), the pretty companions of the brides began singing auspicious songs befitting the occasion. They then escorted the brides and their respective grooms to the room where the family deities had been kept for offering of worship by the newly wed couples at the end of the marriage ceremony. [This ritual is known as “Kohabar”.] (Chanda line nos. 15-16)

[Note—When the marriage rituals are finished, the groom’s father and other family members as well as the rest of the marriage party go back to the place where they are lodged. But the groom and the bride are brought to the room in the bride’s home where the couple offer worship to the family deities. This is “Kohabar”.

Remember: All the four brothers have been married simultaneously here, so when the time for doing the ritual of Kohabar arrived, all of them were escorted by the lady-friends of the four princesses from the marriage pavilion to the palace of king Janak where the family deities would be worshipped by the four couples. Refer also to “Janki Mangal”, verse no. 146.

An interesting development occurs now. On the way from the platform where the main marriage rituals were done, to the room where the Kohabar is to be done, Tulsidas has taken a pause. He now takes a break from the narration of events associated with the wedding ceremony to describe the personal chemistry between Lord Ram and Sita in Doha no. 326 that follows herein below. The poet-devotee heart of Tulsidas got the better of him for some moments as this great saint forgot for a moment what he was describing a while ago, i.e. he forgot to go ahead with the narration of the Kohabar and other rituals that followed it, but paused and began describing the wonderful, out-of-the-world and fabulously beautiful image of Lord Ram who was the Lord he adored and worshipped in his heart and mind.

Therefore, we pause for a while now in our reading of the events and formal rituals associated with the marriage, and instead read about the eye-catching, bewitching beauty of Lord Ram ‘through the eyes of Sita’.

This is a fantastic moment—Tulsidas is describing the beauty of Lord Ram as a groom not in the manner he wishes to describe, but in the way Sita herself saw the Lord. The wise Tulsidas has made Sita a witness of his description of Lord Ram’s glamorous beauty as a groom. This is absolutely clear when we consider the fact that Doha no. 326, which says that Sita repeatedly glances at Lord Ram and is overwhelmed by the fabulous sight she saw, acts as a prelude of the actual description of the beauty of the form of Lord Ram as narrated in the verses, i.e. Chaupai line nos. 1-10, immediately following this Doha.

After he is finished with describing the beauty of the form of his Lord, Tulsidas virtually wakes up from his sentimental reverie and resumes his narration of the marriage rituals from Chanda line no. 1 that follows the last line no. 10 of the set of Chaupais of ten verses herein below that describe the Lord’s exquisite beauty.]

दो०. पुनि पुनि रामहि चितव सिय सकुचति मनु सकुचै न ।
हरत मनोहर मीन छबि प्रेम पिआसे नैन ॥ ३२६ ॥

dōhā.

puni puni rāmahī citava siya sakucati manu sakucai na.
harata manōhara mīna chabi prēma pi’āsē naina. 326.

Sita repeatedly glanced at Lord Ram in a shy and surreptitious manner, though her heart kept her inspiring to keep her gaze fixed on the Lord. [In other words, Sita wanted to keep her eyes fixed on her beloved, Lord Ram, but out of modesty she could not look at him with a fixed stare though her heart egged her to do so. So, she once looked at him, then looked away, and once again glanced back at him.]

Her persistent efforts to watch the Lord with intense love and affection in her eyes reminded one of the fish whose eyes are constantly open in the water (because the fish derives immense and unbound satisfaction by seeing the water all around it, as it loves the water intensely and does not seem to have enough of its sight, so much so that it continues to gaze at the water with unblinking eyes, although this effort might be causing physical discomfort to the enamoured fish).<sup>1</sup> (Doha no. 236)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The fish does not remain static in water; it is constantly moving from one point to another. Likewise, Sita is moving towards the place where the family deities are to be worshipped. All along the way, she sheepishly casts sideways glances at Lord Ram, but cannot fix her eyes steadily on the Lord because she has to keep walking under the constant vigil of her friends who are accompanying her and have surrounded her on all sides as they escort the couple towards the ritual of doing Kohabar. Even once she has reached there, she has to do so many worship rituals that she can't stand with peace and look straight at Lord Ram. Therefore, her situation is akin to the fish.

Even when the fish is in water it keeps its eyes wide open unlike us who would be forced to close ours when we are under water. Hence, Sita had kept her eyes open and focused on Lord Ram though she had to walk and keep her attention on the ground in order to avoid tripping and falling over. Even in the Kohabar room she engaged in doing physical rituals with her eyes focused on Lord Ram.

Another idea in using the metaphor of the fish is that Sita did not as much as blink her eyes in order not to miss even a second of looking at Lord Ram.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda line nos. 9-10 that precede Doha no. 327 herein below.]

चौ०. स्याम सरीरु सुभायँ सुहावन । सोभा कोटि मनोज लजावन ॥ १ ॥

जावक जुत पद कमल सुहाए । मुनि मन मधुप रहत जिन्ह छाए ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

syāma sarīru subhāyam' suhāvana. sōbhā kōṭi manōja lajāvana. 1.

jāvaka juta pada kamala suhā'ē. muni mana madhupa rahata jinha chā'ē. 2.

[The entire set of 10 lines in this Chaupai describes the beautiful form of Lord Ram as a bridegroom.]

He (Lord Ram) had a dark complexion<sup>1</sup> which was inherently most beautiful and so bewitchingly charming to behold that it put to shame the beauty and charm of countless Kamdeos (cupids) who prides himself for his physical glamour and attractiveness<sup>2</sup>. (1)

His lotus-like feet that were coloured red by application of a dye<sup>3</sup> looked as wonderful as a blooming and healthy lotus flower that is brimming-over with nectar over which the thirsty bees representing the Mana (mind and heart) of great sages and hermits are hovering to get a chance to drink it<sup>4</sup>. (2)

[Note—The out-of-the-world magnificent beauty of Lord Ram as a groom has also been elaborately described by Tulsidas in his book “Geetawali” in its Baal Kand, verse no. 1/108. Refer also to Geetawali, Baal Kand, verse no. 1/68, stanza no. 10.

Lord Ram’s extraordinary beauty and charm as a prince who is most suitable to marry Sita who herself was the most beautiful girl of her time (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 251) has been described elsewhere also in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 219 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 3-8 at the time the two brothers had gone to see the sights of the city of Janakpur when they had first arrived there, and once again as Sita saw them in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 233 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8.

<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 221; (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 316.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 220; (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 243.

It must be remembered that Lord Ram is an incarnation of Lord Vishnu, and the latter possesses this wonderful swarthy-complexioned form that would put countless Kamdeos to shame as endorsed in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 146.

In this context it ought to be noted that the divine form of Lord Vishnu that is described in Ram Charit Manas (Baal Kand, from Doha no. 146—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 148) fits in perfectly, point to point, with the glorious form of Lord Ram that is being described in these current verses as well as anywhere else in the entire spread of Ram Charit Manas.

<sup>3</sup>The feet of the groom as well as the bride are painted with a red dye made of melted lac.

<sup>4</sup>Refer similar views are expressed in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 221; (ii) line no. 2 of Doha no. 231.

It is said in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 17 that Bharat always kept his mind and heart devoted to Lord Ram’s feet just like the honey-bee that does not wish to move away from the nectar that is present in the lotus flower.]

पीत पुनीत मनोहर धोती । हरति बाल रबि दामिनि जोती ॥ ३ ॥

कल किंकिनि कटि सूत्र मनोहर । बाहु बिसाल बिभूषन सुंदर ॥ ४ ॥ pīta punīta manōhara dhōtī. harati bāla rabi dāmini jōtī. 3.

kala kiṅkini kaṭi sūtra manōhara. bāhu bisāla bibhūṣana sundara. 4.

The yellow-coloured clean ‘Dhoti’ (a single-piece body wrapping garment worn by males) made of silk that he wore was glistening with radiance so much that it virtually outshone the colour and beauty of the nascent sun as it rises in the eastern horizon as well as the splendour and the dazzle of lightening (as it streaks across the sky)<sup>1</sup>. (3)

The waist-band with small chiming bells that he wore around his hip, as well as his long muscular arms that were adorned with beautiful ornaments together looked absolutely charming<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Doha no. 147; (ii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 219; (iii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 244.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 147; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 219.]

पीत जनेउ महाछबि देई । कर मुद्रिका चोरि चितु लेई ॥ ५ ॥
सोहत ब्याह साज सब साजे । उर आयत उरभूषन राजे ॥ ६ ॥ pīta janē'u mahāchabi dē'ī. kara mudrikā cōri citu lē'ī. 5.

sōhata byāha sāja saba sājē. ura āyata urabhūṣana rājē. 6.

The sacred thread of a yellow colour (pīta janē'u) that he wore across his chest gave his divine form a sense of enhanced beauty and dignity (because not only this yellow colour of the thread matched with the yellow colour of the Dhoti that the Lord wore, but it also showed that he belonged to a noble race and had been duly initiated or baptised in accordance with the custom of the higher echelons of the society).<sup>1</sup>

The ring that he wore on his finger<sup>*2</sup> appeared to steal (i.e. enchant, captivate, enthrall) the mind of the beholder<sup>3</sup>. (5)

He (Lord Ram) looked most adorable and charming with all the wedding decorations and paraphernalia with which he was adorned<sup>4</sup>.

His chest was broad, and it was adorned with wonderful ornaments<sup>5</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 147; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 244.

<sup>2</sup>This is the marriage-ring that the groom is offered by the bride at the time of formalisation of their marriage. This is the reason why there has been no mention of a 'ring' earlier while the physical beauty and charm of Lord Ram has been described in Baal Kand of Ram Charit Manas.

*Some very interesting observations can be made in connection with this 'ring' at this juncture. As is the custom, the bride and the groom exchange rings during the marriage rituals as a token of exchanging vows to remain tied to each other permanently and bonded with each other in an unbreakable seamless bond like the ring whose two ends are so carefully forged and melded into each other that no one can say where the first end begins and the last end ends. Likewise, the relationship that has been created as a result of this marriage would also remove the distinction between the two individual identities of the boy and the girl, and therefore hence forward they should not only be treated by the world as being 'one', but they should also treat each other without any distinction whatsoever.

The ring that Lord Ram gave Sita bore the insignia of the royal kingdom of Ayodhya as well as the initials of the Lord, viz. the single letter 'Ra' with an ‘anuswar’ (dot) on the top. This is pronounced as ‘Raang’, and it is the Beej Mantra (seed Mantra or basic spiritual formula) that enables the spiritual aspirant to meditate upon the cosmic form of Lord Ram as Brahm, the supreme liberator as well as the ultimate destination of the soul of the creature the attainment of which stature leads to the final emancipation and salvation of the soul.

Similarly, the one which Sita exchanged with him bore the symbol of the kingdom of Janakpur and the initials of Sita, which is the letter ‘Sa’. This letter is the 2nd part of the eclectic Baaj Mantra “Hans” which ascetics use for meditation. This letter means ‘It’ or ‘That is’, and the letter ‘Han’ means ‘Me’. In totality this Mantra means ‘it is me’, i.e. the ultimate truth of existence is my soul known as the pure conscious Atma, and it is my true identity. Therefore, this letter ‘Sa’ representing Sita and etched on the ring that she gave to Lord Ram during the exchange of rings as a part of the wedding custom implied that she wishes to tell the Lord that now onwards her true identity is the Lord himself. And simultaneously reminding the Lord that she, Sita, is as close to him as his own soul—‘It is me’.

We read in the story that when Lord Ram was going to the forest and had crossed the river Ganges, he wanted to give some reward to the boatman (Kewat) who rowed him, Sita and Laxman across the river. But the problem was that he had left Ayodhya dressed as a hermit, and even Sita had discarded all her ornaments when she accompanied the Lord. They didn’t have anything of material value to give the boatman. So then Sita took-off her ring and gave it to Lord Ram so that he can in turn give it to the boatman. But the boatman refused to accept it out of his empathy for the Lord’s present condition that he was going to the forest as a hermit without possessions and had nothing to give, as well as a mark of his devotion and surrender for the Lord whom he recognised as the Supreme Lord in a human form. The boatman had wisely observed that Sita had taken her own ring out from her finger and the Lord was giving it to him. It would have been very greedy and inhuman for the boatman had he even shown a trace of willingness to take it. He would have been like a greedy vulture who feeds upon flesh of those who are lying wounded in the battle-field and already suffering intensely. Or like a greedy money-lender who would not hesitate to suck the last drop of blood from unfortunate people who are unable to pay him back, if this drop of blood could transform into money by sale in the market! Or like those greedy men roaming in the cremation ground who would extract a gold-plated tooth from a dead body or rob corpses of the little bit of jewellery that they can find on them.

Now, when the wise boatman refused to accept the ring, Sita did not take it back. Why? This is because once something has been given to someone as a token of service rendered by the latter, or even as a gift or charity, its ownership ends with the giver, and then it would be highly wrong for the giver to take it back right then and there. Therefore, this ring was kept by Lord Ram. There was no problem in this—because the ring did not belong to Lord Ram, but to Sita. Lord Ram was merely a medium that was used by Sita to give it to the boatman. And since it could not be thrown away or given to someone else because it was the marriage ring that was given to her at the time of wedding, so the Lord decided to keep it. This incident of Sita giving the ring to Lord Ram for giving it to Kewat, the boatman, and his refusal to accept it is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 102 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8.

Later on in the story we read that when the search party of monkeys and bears was sent in search of Sita, Lord Ram had given a ring to Hanuman to take it to Sita as a token of identification so that she would be able to recognise him as the Lord’s messenger. Refer: Ram Charit Manas—(i) Kishkindha Kand, Chaupai line nos. 9-11 that precede Doha no. 23; and (ii) Sundar Kand, Doha no. 13 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8.

The next question is—which ring was it? It was either of the two rings—the one that Lord Ram had kept with him when the boatman refused to accept it at the time of crossing of the river Ganges, and the other could have been the one that Lord Ram was given by Sita at the time of marriage and he had been wearing it ever since. The answer is that it was the marriage ring of Lord Ram bearing his signature that was sent to Sita—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precedes Doha no. 13.

Though Lord Ram had discarded all his royal ornaments while donning the robes of a hermit at the time of departure for the forest from Ayodhya, in all probabilities he had retained his marriage ring. It was obligatory for him to keep wearing the marriage ring, and it is also sanctioned by the scriptures because his wife was with him; they hadn't divorced in which eventuality he would have been expected to remove the marriage ring. Even Sita and Laxman had discarded all their royal ornaments and paraphernalia at the time of departure for the forest—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 29; and (ii) Doha no. 33.

In all probability, Lord Ram had given Hanuman the ring of Sita so that she could recognise it very easily. Besides this 'recognition' factor, the ring bore the initials of Lord Ram which would serve as a great morale booster and a source of moral support for the forlorn Sita during her lonely and pitiful days in captivity at Lanka.

Now, what was the message that Lord Ram wished to convey through this ring to Sita aside of it being a sort of identification for Hanuman to help her know he was an authentic messenger of the Lord?

It was a sort of reprimand for Sita and a subtle warning to her to overcome ego first if she desires redemption by Lord Ram. The ring would remind her of her stubborn nature when she had declined to take back it back when the boatman had refused to accept it, forcing Lord Ram to keep it with him: she had pretended to be too righteous to take back a thing which was assigned to or given to someone else as a gift. She had learnt a bitter lesson in the meanwhile, and therefore she has now accepted, with great affection, the same ring that she had refused earlier. This incident is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, from Doha no. 12—to Chaupai line no. 10 that precedes Doha no. 13.

At the time of taking the ring back when the boatman had declined to accept it from Lord Ram, Sita had not realized one mistake she was making: that since this ring was the 'marriage ring', by not accepting it she was virtually breaking her ties with the Lord. But that was not her intention at all, and the Lord was aware of it. Her idea was noble—not to take back anything that is given to someone once. So, he politely kept the ring with him for some later day opportunity to return it to Sita. And this opportunity came when he had to give something to Hanuman as a sign of his being a messenger from the Lord and not some cunning imposter sent by Ravana to deceive Sita. That is why Lord Ram chose to give this ring to Hanuman to return it to Sita.

The Lord also wished to convey a message to Sita that he would come to her rescue only if she accepts this 'marriage ring' as a reaffirmation of her loyalty and allegiance to the Lord. Sita got the hint, and that is why she accepted it with the greatest of affection and with tears of affection and remembrance in her eyes—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 13.

Now, how would Lord Ram know that Sita had reaffirmed her submission to the Lord and it was time he acted to free her from the captivity of the demons? The answer is found in Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 27.

The other connotation and spin to this episode related to the “ring” is this: Lord Ram is the supreme Brahm, the Lord of creation whose cosmic form is Lord Vishnu. Brahm does not do anything himself, but it is his dynamic powers known as Shakti that does it for him. This Shakti has revealed itself as Sita. Sita had come down to earth to help Lord Ram accomplish his divine mission of freeing the earth from the tyranny of the cruel demons. We read in Adhyatma Ramayan of Veda Vyas that when Lord Ram was reluctant to go to the forest in order to embark on his mission of eliminating the demons and their ruler Ravana of Lanka because he could not bear the sight of grieving and weeping citizens of Ayodhya being left behind him to suffer grief of separation from their beloved Lord, it was Sita who had climbed the chariot, that was brought by Sumanta, the chief charioteer of the kingdom, first, and then caught hold of Lord Ram’s hand and pulled him on board. Laxman followed behind Lord Ram. This is clearly narrated in Adhyatma Ramayan, Ayodhya Kand, Canto 5, verse nos. 43-44.

The idea is that Sita virtually told Lord Ram—“Look Lord, you have not come down to earth to get entangled in worldly attachments to become mired in emotions and trapped by sentiments. For you a greater mission is pending ahead. It has to be done. How can we finish our divine mission if you allow yourself to be overcome with worldly emotions and forget that you are expected to be neutral and detached from all grossness associated with this world? Tell me, if you become so emotional and sentimental, what would happen when the time comes for the elimination of demons at Lanka; you will start showing mercy on them and their wailing families. Say then, how will the demons be eliminated? So come on and desist from being emotional. Get on the chariot and let’s move ahead to the forest.”

Sita, being the ‘Shakti’ of the supreme Brahm, knew her task clearly and what was to be done. So, in the intervening period from the time of leaving Ayodhya and crossing of river Ganges, she observed that Lord Ram was sad and remorseful when he remembered how the citizens of Ayodhya were gravely grieving for him, how king Dasrath was wailing and lamenting, how Bharat would burst out in grief when he learns that his beloved brother Lord Ram has gone to the forest for enduring hardship for fourteen long years because of him, and so on. Though Lord Ram maintained an exterior of calmness and poise, internally a storm of grief had overcome him. Sita was closely observing all this. So she decided to step in: she, being Brahm’s Shakti and a part of Brahm, thought that may be Lord Ram would not allow her to be kidnapped by Ravana, the demon king, and hear her wailing. If this is not allowed by the Lord then the entire mission of slaying the cruel demons would fail even before it started—because it was imperative that Sita is taken hostage by Ravana so that an excuse is found by the Lord to go to Lanka in order to rescue her, and kill the ferocious and immoral demons in the process.

So what should be done now, thought Sita. She got an opportunity when something was to be given to the boatman. She decided to give her marriage ring and indicate to the Lord that all his worldly relationships with her—that she was his beloved wife—are snapped forthwith! Lord Ram should stop treating her as his ‘wife’ now onwards, but concentrate on the divine mission of the gods for which he and she have come down to earth. Since the formal relationship of a husband and wife is symbolized by the ‘marriage ring’ that they wear, with Sita discarding this ring she indicated to Lord Ram that she is no longer his worldly wife but the cosmic Shakti who is accompanying him to fulfill the divine mission of the gods.

Therefore, the Lord should remember that when the time comes for her abduction by Ravana, he should let it proceed in accordance to plan and not create an unnecessary hindrance because Sita was his wife and she can't be separated from him at any cost. Well, the 'separation' is done now when the marriage ring was returned to the Lord by Sita herself, so there was no question of regrets and reluctance in allowing her being kidnapped by Ravana.

The next question in this context is: Why then was the ring sent by Lord Ram to Sita during her captivity in Lanka? It was to tell her that if she did not accept it with affection, Lord Ram will take it that she does not wish to restore the old ties once again. It was alright to break the relationship at the time of commencement of the forest journey by returning the ring on the banks of the river Ganges because it helped the Lord to become wise and overcome his emotional attachments with Sita so that the job at hand can be done in a clinical, efficient manner without any sentimental tampering. But that intention of Sita is accomplished: she has reached inside the fortress of the demons. Now it is the time to reiterate the eternal, unbreakable and inviolable bond that exists between Brahm and Shakti. So, Lord Ram, the personified form of Brahm, reiterates this eternal relationship by sending the ring to Sita, the personified form of Shakti, and this is why she gladly accepts it.

We read that Sita not only accepts the ring but reaffirms her loyalty and allegiance to Lord Ram by sending her 'Chudaamani' (a hairpin that was studded with gems and given to her at the time of marriage when vermillion powder was applied on her head by Lord Ram during the marriage rituals in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 325) to him through Hanuman (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 27).

Sending of this hair-pin is a symbolic gesture by Sita to indicate to the Lord that she is bowing her head before him and surrendering herself to him. Lord Ram gladly accepts this hair-pin with the greatest of affection—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 32.

<sup>3</sup>This is a wonderful and fascinating metaphor that would make a discerning reader done his thinking-cap and ponder on its metaphysical and spiritual import. The 'ring' is round in shape just like a circular enclosure. This particular ring was worn by Lord Ram when he married Sita, it was a 'marriage ring', implying that he has voluntarily got himself permanently tied to the affairs of this world and responsibilities of a married life. From the perspective of the philosophy of the Upanishads that emphasise detachment from all things related to this gross world, this ring symbolically implies that the Lord has got himself trapped in a snare of worldly responsibilities and their attendant chain of miseries and grief, of joy and sorrows.

We find that this is what exactly happened with Lord Ram. After marriage he had to go to exile in the forest where his wife Sita was abducted by the demon king Ravana, which plunged the Lord as well as Sita in grief for a long time. This was followed by the difficult phase when Lord Ram had to trek all the way to Kishkindha where he met the monkey friends, and then from there he had to go to the southern ocean to cross it and launch a bloody assault on Lanka to free Sita which resulted in the epic war. In his final days on earth he had to abandon Sita once again, and finally depart from the world grieving for her.

In short, all his worries, troubles and entanglements with the world were symbolised by this 'ring'. In other words, those who watched the beautiful image of Lord Ram going through the steps of the ritual of marriage also got deluded to think that the Supreme Being ‘has married’, a proposition that is as ludicrous as it is false. The supreme Brahm is formless; he has no attributes as are being described in relation with Lord Ram. Brahm did not marry anyone; this ‘marriage’ was a ploy of the Lord so that his cosmic Shakti in the form of Sita could join hands with him to successfully accomplish the divine mandate for which the Lord had to come down to earth as a human prince whom the ignorant world recognised as ‘Sri Ram’.

The world, in its utter ignorance, thought that the Supreme Being has ‘married’, and that ‘his wife’ is Sita, and that she was ‘abducted by the demon king’, and that Lord Ram ‘grieved for her and had to wage a bloody war to free her from the clutches of the demons’. All this is a play of the Lord’s Maya or his power to create delusions.

This ‘ring’ stands for this ‘circle of delusions’ that the Lord voluntarily created around himself so that his truth and reality remains hidden. It was not hidden from the great sages, seers and even those who were blessed devotees of the Lord as is absolutely clear from many instances where they had shown clear knowledge of who Lord Ram was. Examples are sage Vasisthaa, sage Vishwamitrab, sage Sutikshanc, sage Agastyad, sage Bharadwaje, Ahilyaf who was freed from her cursed body of a stone and resumed her original form as wife of sage Gautam, Sabarig who had waited for long years to have a divine glimpse of Lord Ram and achieve salvation, and so on. {References: <sup>a</sup>Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 48—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 50.

<sup>b</sup>Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 5-8 that precede Doha no. 206; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 4 and 7 that precede Doha no. 209.

<sup>c</sup>Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 10—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 12.

<sup>d</sup>Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 9 that precedes Doha no. 12—to Chaupai line no. 13 that precedes Doha no. 13.

<sup>e</sup>Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 210.

<sup>f</sup>Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Doha no. 210—to Doha no. 211.

<sup>g</sup>Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 34—to Doha no. 36.}

A deluded person’s mind is a ‘captive mind’, a mind that can’t think freely and intelligently to correctly arrive at the truth after diligent analysis and thought. This phenomenon is metaphorically depicted in these lines by saying that “the mind of those who beheld Lord Ram’s ring was captivated by its charm and beauty”. Yes it is the ‘charm and beauty’ of the power of Lord’s Maya that it ensnares even the gods who were watching the proceedings. Say, did the gods not know who Lord Ram and Sita were, and if they knew then there should have been no cause for these gods to be enchanted by the physical beauty of Lord Ram. Did they not know that the virtue of ‘beauty and charm’ itself was powered by the Lord’s wish; did they not know that all the artificial things of this world, such as this gem-studded marriage ring, had no attraction for the Lord of creation, and that the Supreme Lord does not ‘marry and wear a marriage ring’? Therefore, there was no cause to be charmed by this ring. It was a snare that trapped the ignorant mind of the beholder.

<sup>4</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 316.

<sup>5</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Doha no. 243, line no. 1 that says that the Lord wore a garland made of Tulsi leaves, i.e. freshly plucked leaves of the holy Basil plant; (ii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 219 says that on his broad chest he wore a garland made of ‘Naagmani’ which is the solidified sap of the size and shape of a pearl that is found on the hood of a special family of serpents; and (iii) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 147 that says that he, in his cosmic form as Lord Vishnu, wore the sign of the footprints of sage Bhrigu as well as a magnificent garland of fragrant flowers of a special kind of tree that grows in the forest.]

पिअर उपरना काखासोती । दुहुँ आँचरन्हि लगे मनि मोती ॥ ७ ॥

नयन कमल कल कुंडल काना । बदन सकल सौंदर्ज निधाना ॥ ८ ॥

pi'ara uparanā kākḥāsōtī. duhum' ām̐caranhi lagē mani mōtī. 7.
nayana kamala kala kuṇḍala kānā. badanu sakala saundarja nidhānā. 8.

A length of yellow-coloured ceremonial cloth, which had strings of gems and pearls intricately embroidered on its fringes, adorned the upper part of his body. It was slung across his broad chest, with one end passing under his right armpit and the other end hung across his left shoulder<sup>1</sup>. (7)

His eyes were like lotus flowers<sup>2</sup>, and rings hung from his ears<sup>3</sup>.

Taken all in all, the body of Lord Ram was like a treasury of beauty, glamour, magnificence and charm<sup>4</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Yellow is regarded as an auspicious colour, especially during marriage ceremonies. Hence all the cloth-pieces that Lord Ram wore on this occasion were coloured yellow.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 147; (ii) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 219; (iii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 243; and (iv) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 316.

<sup>3</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 147; (ii) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 219; and (iii) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 243.

<sup>4</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 147; (ii) Doha no. 242, line no. 2; (iii) Doha no. 315; and (iv) Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 316.]

सुंदर भृकुटि मनोहर नासा । भाल तिलकु रुचिरता निवासा ॥ ९ ॥

सोहत मौरु मनोहर माथे । मंगलमय मुकुता मनि गाथे ॥ १० ॥

sundara bhr̥kuṭi manōhara nāsā. bhāla tilaku ruciratā nivāsā. 9.
sōhata mauru manōhara māthē. maṅgalamaya mukutā mani gāthē. 10.

The Lord's eyebrows<sup>1</sup> were charming, and so was his nose<sup>2</sup>. The Tilak mark<sup>3</sup> on his forehead appeared to be a treasury of loveliness. (9)

A tiara studded with precious gems and pearls adorned the ceremonial wedding crown on his (Lord Ram's) head<sup>4</sup>. (10)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 4 that precedes Doha no. 147; (ii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 219; and (iii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 243.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2 that precedes Doha no. 147.

<sup>3</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 4 that precedes Doha no. 147; (ii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 219; and (iii) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 243.

<sup>4</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 5 that precedes Doha no. 147; (ii) Doha no. 219; and (iii) Chanda line no. 1 that follows herein below.]

छं०. गाथे महामनि मौर मंजुल अंग सब चित चोरहीं । १ ।

पुर नारि सुर सुंदरीं बरहि बिलोकि सब तिन तोरहीं ॥ २ ॥

chanda.

gāthē mahāmani maura maṇjula aṅga saba cita cōrahīm. 1.
pura nāri sura sundarīm barahi bilōki saba tina tōrahīm. 2.

The enchanting tiara stuck in the ceremonial wedding crown placed on the Lord's head was studded with precious gems.

All the organs of the Lord were so attractive that they captivated the mind and held its undivided attention.<sup>1</sup> (Chanda line no. 1)

The women-folk of the city of Janakpur as well as the pretty celestial ladies of the gods watched the glamorous, lovely form of the groom (Lord Ram) and broke blades of grass as a magic formula (or a talisman) that would prevent evil eyes of any kind from harming the Lord. (Chanda line no. 2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This verse concludes the narration of the physical beauty of Lord Ram as a groom that was commenced in Chaupai line no. 1 that followed immediately after Doha no. 326 herein above.]

मनि बसन भूषन वारि आरति करहिं मंगल गावहीं । ३ ।

सुर सुमन बरिसहिं सूत मागध बंदि सुजसु सुनावहीं ॥ ४ ॥ mani basana bhūṣana vāri āraṭi karaḥiṁ maṅgala gāvahīṁ. 3.

sura sumana barisahīṁ sūta māgadha bandi sujasu sunāvahīṁ. 4.

These ladies scattered precious gems around the Lord, and offered ceremonial clothes and ornaments to him as a gesture to show their immense joy and pleasure to see the Lord as a groom, as well as a sign that they are blessing him and offering their respect to him.

After this, they did the ceremonial Aarti of the Lord to honour him and pay their obeisance to him.

[That is, the ladies first expressed their joy by scattering gems etc. before the Lord. This is a social custom that is observed during auspicious and happy events, such as marriages, as a token of expression of happiness and pleasure. Then they offered clothes and ornaments to the Lord as gifts on the occasion of his marriage. Finally, they did his Aarti, i.e. they waved lighted lamps, arranged on a decorated platter, in front of Lord Ram to honour him and pay their obeisance to him.] (Chanda line no. 3)

The gods showered flowers from the sky, while the bards, the minstrels and other professional singers sang laudatory songs praising the Lord's glories and those of his royal family. (Chanda line no. 4)

कोहबरहिं आने कुअँर कुअँरि सुआसिनिह सुख पाइ कै । ५ ।

अति प्रीति लौकिक रीति लागीं करन मंगल गाइ कै ॥ ६ ॥ kōhabarahiṁ ānē ku'amṛa ku'amṛi su'āsininha sukha pā'i kai. 5.

ati prīti laukika rīti lāgīṁ karana maṅgala gā'i kai. 6.

The honourable ladies<sup>1</sup> who had accompanied the prince (Lord Ram) and the princess (Sita), cheerfully brought them to the room where the family deities of the bride's family were placed to be worshipped by the newly-wed couple. [This ritual is known as "kōhabara".]<sup>2</sup> (Chanda line no. 5)

Once there, they affectionately sang auspicious songs befitting this occasion along side undertaking the various social rites that are associated with this part of the wedding ceremony (that is known as the "kōhabara")*. (Chanda line no. 6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word used in the text is "su'āsininha" which literally means those ladies whose husbands were still alive; the opposite of a widow. During auspicious events, only those women whose husbands were alive were allowed to participate.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: (a) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda line no. 16 that precedes Doha no. 326 above; and (b) Janki Mangal, verse no. 146.

An interesting observation can be made at this juncture. Please refer also to the note appended to Chanda line no. 16 that precedes Doha no. 326.

We have read that all the four brothers were married together in the same pavilion. So, when the lady-friends of the four brides escorted the four pairs of couples inside the palace to do the ritual of Kohabar, all of them were together. This fact is clear when we read Chanda line no. 16 that precedes Doha no. 326. But when they reached the spot, the actual worship of the family deities was done by the four couples separately.

*Tulsidas had paused his narration of the events associated with the marriage in Chanda line no. 16 that precedes Doha no. 326, and had started describing the physical beauty of the Lord's divine form through the fish-eye lens of Sita—refer: Doha no. 326 and Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that follow it.

Now, when there was a loud chorus of applause and cheering by the crowd of exuberant gods in the sky and the people on the ground, Tulsidas suddenly woke up from his day-dreaming in which he was lost while describing the Lord's beauty to pick up the threads of his narration and resume it once again from these verses, Chanda line no. 5 that describes the ritual of Kohabar that was kept in pause mode earlier.]

लहकौरि गौरि सिखाव रामहि सीय सन सारद कहैं । ७ ।

रनिवासु हास बिलास रस बस जन्म को फलु सब लहैं ॥ ८ ॥ lahakauri gauri sikhāva rāmaḥi sīya sana sārada kahairṁ. 7.

ranivāsu hāsa bilāsa rasa basa janma kō phalu saba lahairṁ. 8.

During the next ritual known as “Lahakouri”<sup>1</sup>, goddess Gauri (Parvati, the divine consort of Lord Shiva) herself taught Lord Ram what to do, and likewise Sita was advised by Sarada (the goddess of knowledge and divine consort of Brahma, the creator). (Chanda line no. 7)

The entire part of the palace where the female members of the royal household lived (known as “ranivāsa”; technically the ‘royal gynaeceum’) was brimming over with enthusiasm and merriment as all its members thoroughly enjoyed the celebrations that accompanied the marriage of Sita with Lord Ram. Everyone said that their birth and life have been fully rewarded and has been worthwhile as they had been able to witness this glorious moment first hand and enjoy it fully.<sup>2</sup> (Chanda line no. 8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>“Lahakouri” is a ritual when the bride and the groom feed sweets to each other by putting the morsels directly in each other's mouth. This rite is observed to break the wall of shyness and formality between the groom and the bride, and to enable them to overcome inhibitions of all kinds. The lady-friends of the bride poke jokes and tease the couple amid an informal environment of bonhomie and laughter. Refer also to: “Janki Mangal”, verse no. 149.

<sup>2</sup>We have read previously that the women-folk of Janakpur had very eagerly wanted that Lord Ram should marry Sita and thereby establish a permanent bond or relationship with this city and its inhabitants so that all of them would get more chances to see and interact with the Lord in future when he comes to pay an occasional visit to his in-law's place. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 222—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 223.]

निज पानि मनि महुँ देखिअति मूरति सुरूपनिधान की । ९ ।
चालति न भुजबल्ली बिलोकनि बिरह भय बस जानकी ॥ १० ॥

nija pāni mani mahum' dēkhi'ati mūrati surūpanidhāna kī. 9.
cālati na bhujaballī bilōkani biraha bhaya basa jānakī. 10.

Sita saw the enchanting image of her beloved Lord being reflected in the gems and other precious stones on the ornaments that she wore on her hands (finger-rings, bangles, bracelets, armlets etc.). (Chanda line no. 9)

She did not move her hands even slightly and it appeared that they were made of wood (i.e. she was completely immobilised) for fear of losing the chance of uninterruptedly seeing the beautiful images of the Lord that were reflected from the gems she wore on her hands if these images got disrupted when the hand was moved. (Chanda line no. 10)

[Note—Sita was shy to look at her beloved Lord Ram directly in the presence of so many of her friends. So she watched Lord Ram's images as they got reflected from the gems and precious stones studded on the ornaments she wore on her hands. Even a slight movement of the hand would change the angle of reflection and disrupt the image. She was so enthralled and captivated that she became rigid and her hands become immobile like logs of wood—"Bhuj-balli".

The same idea is expressed in Doha no. 326 herein above, as well as earlier when Sita had been so immobilised out of shyness that she could not raise her hands to put the victory garland around the neck of Lord Ram after the bow was broken—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-7 that precede Doha no. 264.

The situation has become piquant now: The ritual of "Lahakouri" is being done when the bride and the groom feed sweets to each other personally by directly using their hands and fingers, instead of a spoon, to put morsels of it into the mouth of their partner (refer: Chanda line no. 7 herein above). But Sita is so immobilised that she refuses to move her hand and put sweets into the mouth of Lord Ram. Sita was extremely shy to look up and see Lord Ram directly in the face which would be necessary if she was to feed him as required during the ritual of Lahakouri. But at the same time she wanted to see the beautiful and charming face of her beloved Lord without losing a moment's chance. Trapped in this dilemma, she decided to see Lord Ram's image as it was reflected from the many ornaments she was wearing on her hands—such as the finger rings, the bangles, the bracelets and the armlets. She kept her eyes riveted on them, giving the impression that her hands had become as rigid as a log of wood.]

कौतुक बिनोद प्रमोदु प्रेमु न जाइ कहि जानहिं अलीं । ११ ।
बर कुअँरि सुंदर सकल सखीं लवाइ जनवासेहि चलीं ॥ १२ ॥

kautuka binōda pramōdu prēmu na jā'i kahi jānahim alīm. 11.
bara ku'amṛi sundara sakala sakhim lavā'i janavāsēhi calīm. 12.

The atmosphere of joyous celebrations and gaiety, of mirth and rejoicing, of euphoria and exhilaration, of happiness and gladness exceedingly, that prevailed everywhere at that time is beyond narration (even as it is beyond imagination). Only the friends of the brides who were present on that occasion could know it (because they witnessed it and enjoyed it). (Chanda line no. 11)

After the rituals were over, the female friends cheerfully escorted the wonderful pairs of the grooms and their brides to the palace where the groom's marriage party headed by king Dasrath was lodged.<sup>1</sup> (Chanda line no. 12)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>King Dasrath had already left the venue of the marriage functions and gone to his residence as narrated herein above in Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 326.

The grooms and their brides were then led inside the palace of king Janak where the two rituals of Kohabar and Lahakouri were undertaken as described in Chanda line nos. 5 and 7 above.

Having finished with all the rituals, the ladies now escorted the four couples to the place where the guests from Ayodhya, i.e. the grooms' marriage party, were lodged.]

तेहि समय सुनिअ असीस जहँ तहँ नगर नभ आनँदु महा । १३ ।
चिरु जिअहुँ जोरीं चारु चार्यो मुदित मन सबहीं कहा ॥ १४ ॥

tēhi samaya suni'a asīsa jaham̐ taham̐ nagara nabha ānam̐du mahā. 13.
ciru ji'ahum̐ jōrīm cāru cāryō mudita mana sabahim̐ kahā. 14.

At that time, loud exclamations of profuse blessings (from elders, Brahmins, gods etc.) could be heard from all the directions even as there was great exultation and euphoria both in the city of Janakpur as well as in the sky (i.e. the heaven from where the gods were watching the proceedings). (Chanda line no. 13)

Everyone present on that auspicious occasion whole-heartedly blessed the four couples, saying affectionately: 'Let the four pairs live a long and happy life'. (Chanda line no. 14)

[Note—The four pairs of brides and grooms were heading for the place where king Dasrath and the rest of the marriage party was lodged. The royal procession with the four newly-wed couples passed through the streets of the city, wending its way slowly, majestically, with all the royal grandeur and fanfare, from the palace of king Janak to the palace where king Dasrath was staying. The exuberant rejoicings, the loud applause and profuse blessings pouring in from all the sides came from the citizens who had lined on both sides of the street to cheer at the four royal couples as they proceeded in a procession towards the place where the marriage party was lodged. The gods, however, cheered from the sky.]

जोगींद्र सिद्ध मुनीस देव बिलोकि प्रभु दुंदुभि हनी । १५ ।

चले हरषि बरषि प्रसून निज निज लोक जय जय जय भनी ॥ १६ ॥

jōgīndra sid'dha munīsa dēva bilōki prabhu dundubhi hanī. 15.

calē haraṣi baraṣi prasūna nija nija lōka jaya jaya jaya bhanī. 16.

When the great ascetics, the mystics, the sages and the gods saw Lord Ram dressed as a groom, they were ecstatic with joy and delight. The kettle-drums were played enthusiastically by them to celebrate this divine sight and the auspicious occasion. (Chanda line no. 15)

After that (i.e. when the marriage ceremonies were over and the four couples had reached the palace where king Dasrath waited for their arrival), all of them (i.e. the ascetics, the mystics, the sages and the gods) showered flowers (for the last time) and departed from there to go back to the respective places from where they had come to witness and participate in this wedding ceremony. Before finally departing for their respective destinations<sup>1</sup>, they erupted in a thunderous applause of praise and honour for all the four couples, cheering them and exclaiming delightedly, 'Hail, Hail; Glory to you all. You all be blessed!' (Chanda line no. 16)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The ascetics, mystics and sages had come from their far-flung hermitages spread in all the corners of the world to attend the marriage ceremony of Lord Ram. How did they come to know of this event? Well, the answer is this—when Lord Shiva's bow broke, there was a thunderous roar, the earth shook, and the sound of the breaking of the bow along with the shudder of the earth rumbled across its surface to reach its farthest corners. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 261—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 262.

The sages, hermits and ascetics realized that Shiva's bow had been broken, and they also realized that this indicated that Lord Vishnu had fulfilled his promise made to the gods and mother earth on some earlier occasion that he will come down to earth as Lord Ram to eliminate the demons. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 187.

So this was an ideal opportunity for them to have a divine glimpse of their Lord and get the reward of being born as a human being. They felt that this rare opportunity won't come again in their lives and so all of them came to attend the divine marriage of Lord Ram with Sita, alone and in groups.

Having witnessed the holy events and partaking of this divine nectar-like sight of watching the Supreme Lord up so close, they showered flowers upon him, blessed him and then retired back to their hermitages and forests to continue with their spiritual endeavours.]

दो०. सहित बधूटिन्ह कुअँर सब तब आए पितु पास ।

सोभा मंगल मोद भरि उमगेउ जनु जनवास ॥ ३२७ ॥

dōhā.

sahita badhūṭinha ku'amṛa saba taba ā'ē pitu pāsa.
sōbhā maṅgala mōda bhari umagē'u janu janavāsa. 327.

Then all the four princes, the grooms, came to their father along with their respective brides. It appeared at that time that the entire place of residence of the marriage party overflowed with waves of joy, delight, euphoria and happiness. (Doha no. 327)

[Note—This Doha concludes the narration of the marriage ceremony of Lord Ram with Sita with its customary rituals that commenced with the sending of an invitation to king Dasrath by Janak to come to the marriage venue with the groom, Lord Ram, and the subsequent events that followed, as narrated from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 313 onwards.]

चौ०. पुनि जेवनार भई बहु भाँती । पठए जनक बोलाइ बराती ॥ १ ॥ परत पाँवड़े बसन अनूपा । सुतन्ह समेत गवन कियो भूपा ॥ २ ॥
caupāī.

puni jēvanāra bhaī bahu bhāmṭī. paṭha'ē janaka bōlā'i barātī. 1.
parata pām̐vaṛē basana anūpā. sutanha samēta gavana kiyo bhūpā. 2.

Then an elaborate marriage banquet (the post-wedding feast) was organised in which a wide variety of delectable dishes of all imaginable types were served. King Janak invited all the members of the groom's party to come to this feast<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Carpets made of exquisite materials were spread all along the way as king Dasrath left his place of residence with his four sons (to participate in this banquet)<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The type of food served and the elaborate arrangements for this feast are described below from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 328—to Doha no. 329.

Refer also to “Janki Mangal”, verse no. 159.

<sup>2</sup>These carpets were spread as a warm and affectionate gesture to welcome the king and his sons as well as the rest of the marriage party to the grand feast.

Earlier also we read that such carpets were spread on two special occasions—
(i) one was when Lord Ram had come to the pavilion where the marriage rituals were to be done—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 319; and (ii) once again when Dasrath had come to attend the marriage ceremony such carpets were spread for him and his retinue—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 320.]

सादर सब के पाय पखारे । जथाजोगु पीढ़न्ह बैठारे ॥ ३ ॥
धोए जनक अवधपति चरना । सीलु सनेहु जाइ नहिं बरना ॥ ४ ॥

sā dara saba kē pāya pakhārē. jathājōgu pīṛhanha baiṭhārē. 3.
dhō'ē janaka avadhapati caranā. sīlu sanēhu jā'i nahim baranā. 4.

Janak courteously washed the feet of everyone as a gesture of showing warm welcome as well as respect for them<sup>1</sup>. He then escorted the guests to their respective seats that were arranged for them in accordance to their position and status in the royal and social hierarchy<sup>2</sup>. (3)

*Janak respectfully washed the feet of Dasrath, the king of Ayodhya. It is not possible to narrate how affectionately and courteously Janak did it.

[*We can read this verse as follows also—“When Janak washed the feet of the king of Ayodhya (i.e. Dasrath, who was now related to him by the virtue of the marriage of his four daughters with the latter’s four sons), he did it so affectionately and showed so much courtesy that it is not possible to either measure his happiness and joy, or to describe their intensity in words.”<sup>3</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It should be noted that this verse telling us that Janak washed the feet of the guests refers to the all the members of the marriage party except king Dasrath whose feet Janak washes in Chaupai line no. 4 herein below.

However, we must note here that broadly speaking, the same procedure of showing respect to the guests was followed when king Dasrath and the rest of the groom’s party had arrived at the wedding pavilion—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 321.

<sup>2</sup>The seating arrangement was strictly according to royal protocol and in line with the prevalent norms of the society. For instance, all the close relatives of the grooms were given central seats that were specially marked for the members of the royal family, then there were seats especially ear-marked for the guest sages and seers, then there were seats for the senior ministers, commanders of the army, the royal attendants in accordance to their position in the royal hierarchy, and so on and so forth.

<sup>3</sup>Janak had shown great and special affection and respect for Dasrath when he washed the latter’s feet. The way Janak washed Dasrath’s feet was different from the way the feet of others were washed by him. Whereas the feet of the other members of the marriage party were washed merely as a custom of the society and a polite expression of welcome, the situation was different when the turn of Dasrath came. Janak and Dasrath were now equal in terms of stature by the virtue of the marriage of all the four princesses of Janakpur with all the four princes of Ayodhya. The two kings now shared a bond of family relationship that has been forged as a result of this marriage. Now onwards, they were like brothers, and not merely friendly kings.

Janak regarded Dasrath as the more fortunate king of the two of them because the Lord of the creation has come down on earth to become his son in the form of Lord Ram. Besides this, Dasrath would now enjoy the company of the Lord as well as his divine Shakti in the form of Sita, a luck that Janak could not get.

Then again, Janak recalled how he was enthralled by the enchanting view of the divine form of Lord Ram when he had first seen him at the time of welcoming sage Vishwamitra (refer: Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 215—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 216). He mused over the fact that Dasrath had the rare opportunity of interacting with the Lord at all times of the day, and as much as he wished, because the Lord was his son and he lived in close proximity of his father. So, Janak reveled at the joy king Dasrath derived everyday of his life and every moment of that day—Janak wondered how lucky and blessed Dasrath was!

That is why when Janak washed Dasrath's feet, he had done it with the greatest of respect and reverence as if he was washing the holy feet of a great soul—because Dasrath was not an ordinary king, but the most fortunate one in the entire human race as to have the Supreme Being as his son with whom he could play when the Lord was a child, and with whom he could share close moments of love and affection that naturally exists between a doting father and his loving son. Say, who else had this lovely opportunity and rare privilege!

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 320.]

बहुरि राम पद पंकज धोए । जे हर हृदय कमल महँ गोए ॥ ५ ॥
तीनिउ भाइ राम सम जानी । धोए चरन जनक निज पानी ॥ ६ ॥ bahuri rāma pada paṅkaja dhō'ē. jē hara hṛdaya kamala mahum̐ gō'ē. 5.

tīni'u bhā'i rāma sama jānī. dhō'ē carana janaka nija pānī. 6.

Then, Janak washed the holy lotus-like feet of Lord Ram that are enshrined in the lotus-like heart of Lord Shiva<sup>1</sup>. (5)

Janak then washed the feet of all the other three brothers of Lord Ram (i.e. of Laxman, Bharat and Shatrughan) with the same affection as he had washed the feet of the Lord himself because he treated all the three brothers alike and with the same affection and respect with which he had treated Lord Ram<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 318; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 8 along with Chanda line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 324, especially Chanda line no. 3 of this set of Chanda-verses which specifically refers to Lord Shiva and Lord Ram's holy feet being enshrined in his heart.

<sup>2</sup>It has been said earlier that when the three brothers were married, the same procedure that was followed for the wedding of Lord Ram and Sita was also followed for them—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 326.

This shows that Janak treated all the four sons-in-law equally.]

आसन उचित सबहि नृप दीन्हे । बोलि सूपकारी सब लीन्हे ॥ ७ ॥ सादर लगे परन पनवारे । कनक कील मनि पान सँवारे ॥ ८ ॥ āsana ucita sabahi nṛpa dīnhē. bōli sūpakārī saba līnhē. 7.

sādara lagē parana panavārē. kanaka kīla mani pāna sam̐vārē. 8.

The king (Janak) gave everyone an appropriate seat to sit upon. [“Appropriate” in the sense that everyone was seated according to his rank, position, status and standing in the social and royal hierarchy.]

Then he called all the servers to come and start serving meal to the guests. [These servers were the many attendants, the table-hands, the waiters etc. who would serve the guests and wait on them, and the cooks to take specialized orders and serve food according to the taste of the individual.] (7)

As soon as the orders were issued to start the service, all the attendants and servers started laying plates before the guests. These plates were made of leaves studded with precious gems and stitched together with golden pins.

[The plates themselves were made from broad leaves of the plantain plant which are universally used as plates to serve food to guests. These leaves were stitched together with pins made of gold, and were decorated with gems.] (8)

दो०. सूपोदन सुरभी सरपि सुंदर स्वादु पुनीत ।
छन महुँ सब कें परुसि गे चतुर सुआर बिनीत ॥ ३२८ ॥
dōhā.

sūpōdana surabhī sarapi sundara svādu punīta.
chana mahum̐ saba kēm̐ parusi gē catura su'āra binīta. 328.

Veteran cooks and servers who were experts and skilled in their respective fields quickly went around, politely serving the guests with food consisting of boiled rice, spiced curry made from pulses of varying kinds, and topped-up with dollops of clarified butter made from pure cow's milk. The food served was very delicious and prepared hygienically with the highest standards of purity in mind. The service was very efficient because it was done in a very short time. [None of the guests had to wait for food to be served, and as soon as the signal was given by Janak, the efficient servers served all the guests in a jiffy.] (Doha no. 328)

चौ०. पंच कवल करि जेवन लागे । गारि गान सुनि अति अनुरागे ॥ १ ॥
भाँति अनेक परे पकवाने । सुधा सरिस नहिं जाहिं बखाने ॥ २ ॥
caupāī.

pañca kavala kari jēvana lāgē. gāri gāna suni ati anurāgē. 1.
bhām̐ti anēka parē pakavānē. sudhā sarisa nahim̐ jāhim̐ bakhānē. 2.

The guests offered the first five morsels of food as symbolic offerings to the five vital winds known as the ‘Panch Pran’ that live inside the body and keep it alive<sup>1</sup>, and then they commenced to eat and relish the delectable meal.

Meanwhile, songs having lyrics of good-intentioned and good-humoured teasing (banter; jokes) were being sung to entertain the guests, and all of them enjoyed the songs as they continued eating<sup>2</sup>. (1)

Countless and endless varieties of delicious and dainty victuals and confectionaries, each as sweet and delectable as ambrosia, and each one of them more lip-smacking and tongue-tickling than the other, were served to the guests<sup>3</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The “Panch Prans” are the five vital winds that support life inside the body of the living being. Without these five winds, no creature can survive. These winds are regarded as subtle forms of Brahm, the Supreme Being who lives inside the body of the creature and controls all his functioning from within. These five winds control different functions of the body as briefly outlined below. If any of the five vital winds withdraw or refuse to carry on its duty, the body of the creature suffers to that extent. Hence, from the metaphysical point of view, the first five offerings of food are symbolically offered to these five vital winds so that they keep the ‘fire of life’ burning inside the body of the creature.

This is the proper and holistic way of eating food. When food is eaten with the idea that it is meant to support the body and keep it fully nourished, health, productive and active, it leads to all-round growth, prosperity and welfare of the creature. Otherwise, if the food is eaten to gratify the natural urges of the different gross organs of the body—such as the desire for tasty food to appease the tongue, food that is attractive to look at and is appealing for the organ of sight which is the eye, food that is nice to touch so that it gratifies the sense of touch residing in the skin, and enticing for the sense of smell that lives in the nose—then the same body becomes diseased and unable to cope with the stress and strain of existence.

This approach, this attitude of eating food as an offering to the sacred fire burning inside the body which is a symbolic abode of Brahm at the micro level of creation gives eating a holistic dimension, and prevents this basic requirement of life from degenerating into glutinous gorging of junk food that would ultimately douse the fire inside the body and snuff out life from it. This would obviously lead to ill-health, lack of vitality and stamina in the body, which would in turn make life a burden for the creature.

According to the philosophy of metaphysics as enunciated in the Upanishads, the body of the creature is like a sacred fire-pit of the sacrificial fire. Just like oblations are offered to the sacred fire during the ritual of doing a fire sacrifice with the idea that these oblations are accepted by the Fire God on behalf of all other Gods who control and preside over this creation, the first five morsels of food eaten are symbolic offerings to the fire burning inside the gross body of the creature so that the food is ‘burnt’ (digested) and its essential elements offered to the gods who live in the body of the creature in a subtle form known as the ‘five vital winds’, the “Panch Prans”. This philosophy envisions that the individual body of the living being is a microcosm of the entire creation when it is considered at the macrocosmic level.

If the sacred fire burning inside the body is kept alive and healthy with the patron gods who too live inside the body pleased and contented, the creature can lead a productive, happy and healthy life just like the case of the oblations made to the sacred fire of the fire sacrifice that keeps the gods in the heaven pleased and remain benevolent upon the creatures of this world, thereby ensuring all-round happiness and well-being for all in the world.

Now, let us see what this ‘five vital winds’ are, and what are their chief functions. This will help us to understand why it is so important to keep the five vital winds healthy and active by eating properly.

Dictionary defines ‘Pran’ as breath, inhaled and exhaled wind, the breath of life, life itself, one of the five chief vital winds or airs that sustain life, strength, valour, courage, energy, vitality, vigour. It is also synonymous with the fire element as well as with the supreme soul or Atma. It is the 'fire element' because both the fire as well as the Pran inject and infuse life into the otherwise lifeless and inane gross body of a creature, enabling it to get up and perform its functions and carry on with its activities. A dead body from which 'life' has exited becomes cold and lifeless, thereby indicating that the fire element that is inherently present in it has been extinguished—we then declare that the man is dead.

The word Pran literally means the life of all living beings, so called because the Pran injects life and consciousness in the otherwise lifeless body of the organism. It is the vital life-consciousness present in the body of an individual creature. It is represented by the vital winds and life impulses present in the body which keep the body alive, and distinguishes a living body from a dead one. The word 'Pran' is usually associated with the vital winds of the body as it is these winds that keep the body active and alive. The Pran is sometimes used synonymously with the Atma or soul of the creature because both are equally important for a creature's existence. Whereas Pran is a synonym of life and vitality, Atma stands for the consciousness present in the body. Hence both are like the two sides of the same coin called the living being.

Though technically Atma or soul is pure consciousness while Pran is a vital wind or air element, practically they are synonymous with each other. An illustration will clear this point. Suppose a man has lost senses in his limbs—they have been paralysed, or he is lying unconsciousness due to some serious disease. We regard such a man as alive and not as dead as long as he continues to breathe, and as long as he breathes, or as long as he is technically 'alive' his Atma is deemed to be inside his body, because the true identity or the true self of a man is not his physical body but his Atma. Therefore we do not regard the 'unconscious' body as dead. But when he actually dies, that is, when he stops to breathe, we say that 'his Pran' has left the body, and that 'he' has died. Now, who has died? It is the person whose Pran has left the body; and the person is the 'self' or the Atma which has left the body when the Pran made its exit from it at the time of death. This is because Pran and Atma depend on each other so much so that as soon as the Pran leaves the body, the Atma also leaves the body and we say that the person is no more. Why do we say that the 'person is no more' when the body is actually lying in front of us? It is because the 'person' is the Atma and not the body, and this Atma has left the body with the Pran at the time of death. When the proper time comes, the Atma leaves the body astride the Pran, riding piggy back on it.

The five main vital winds are Pran, Apaana, Vyan, Udaana and Samaana. Amongst them, the Pran refers to the breath which injects the vital spark of life in a body to keep it alive and active, thereby providing it with the necessary impetus, the energy, vitality and strength to perform its designated functions and duties as a living entity. All the other vital winds are of any relevance and significance only as long as there is Pran in the body for the simple reason that if the body stops breathing it would die, and the dead body has neither the need for the other winds nor are they competent enough to keep it alive relying on their own strength. At the same time, all these vital winds are collectively called Pran because they work in tandem with each other to enable the main Pran, the breath, to actually carry out its function. These vital winds do not exist in separate so-called water tight compartments, as this is an incredulous proposition because air is an element that cannot be compartmentalized into separate entities having distinct existences, but they are named as separate winds just for the academic purpose of studying the way the vital wind or air functions differently in the body to enable it to carry on with its functions. So these other 'Prans' or vital winds besides the breath, both inhaled and exhaled, are the following—Apaan, Vyan, Udaan and Samaan.

So we see that the term 'Pran' is usually applied to breath because it is the vital wind force that injects and sustains life and vitality in a creature. It is synonymous with life, Atma and soul of a living creature. The presence of Pran determines whether a creature is dead or alive; it is a distinguishing factor between the animate and inanimate world. Pran is the essential vibrations of life; it is the rhythm of life; it is the essential characteristic that defines life.

The inherent tendency of the Pran, which is the vital wind residing in the upper part of the body between the heart-lungs and the nose, is to lift the creature to a higher state of noble, righteous, virtuous, auspicious and spiritual existence, to become wise and enlightened. On the contrary, the Apaana winds live in the intestine and pass down through the anus. It symbolises the downward drag on the creature's spiritual upliftment, pulling it down towards the grosser aspects of creation and the materialistic world which is not only gross but also filthy and worthless like the excretory matters present in the intestine. It also symbolises passions, evils, vices, perversion and attachments to the worldly things at large, and their accompanying perplexities, bewilderments and hassles leading to restlessness and moral turpitude and degradation. This oscillation between the spiritual upliftment and moving upwards towards goodness, and spiritual degradation, moving downwards towards the gross world of sensual pleasures, leads a creature to a continuous cycle of birth and death—this oscillation is like the bouncing of a ball upwards and downwards from the surface of the earth. One must remember that a lot of symbolism, metaphors and allegories have been used in the Upanishad texts to explain things. One should be wise not to lose the spirit while getting bogged down by the literal meaning of the words; one should not lose the wood while searching for the tree. The 'Pran' wind here symbolises the upward drift which the pure consciousness is inherently inclined to, while the 'Apana' winds pull it down towards the attractions of the world. The creature remains trapped between the two forces.

This 'vital wind' called Pran is one of the five elements of creation, called the Panch Bhuts, the others being earth, water, fire and sky.

The Atharva Veda's Par Brahm Upanishad, verse no. 2 explicitly asserts that Pran is a synonym for 'consciousness', and therefore for the Atma which is also the pure consciousness residing in the gross body of the living being. Since the cosmic aspect of the 'consciousness' is known as Brahm, Pran is also synonym for Brahm.

The Atharva Veda's Gopal Uttar Tapini Upanishad, verse nos. 47/1, 3, 5, 7, 9 assert that the various vital winds are revelations of Brahm.

According to Subala-panishad, Canto 9, verse no. 1-5 of the Shukla Yajur Veda tradition, the main five vital winds are the following:--

(1) Pran—this controls eyes and the faculty of sight (verse 1); (2) Apaana—this controls ears and the faculty of hearing (verse 2); (3) Vyan—this controls nose and the faculty of smell (verse 3); (4) Udaan—this controls the tongue and the faculty of taste (verse 4); (5) Samaan—this controls the skin and the faculty of touch (verse 5).

The Shandilya Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition, in its Canto 1, section 4, verse no. 3 describes these winds, their locations and functions as follows:-- “Verse no. 13 = The Pran (i.e. the chief vital wind) moves or is located chiefly in the mouth, the nose, the throat, the navel, the big toes of the feet, and below and above the Kundalini.

The Vyaan moves or is located chiefly in the ears, the eyes, the waist region, the thighs, the nostrils, the throat, and the hip region.

The Apaana moves or is located chiefly in the anus, the genitals, the thighs, the stomach, the testicles, the hip area, the navel, and the midriff where the fire is present (refer verse no. 4 above).

The Udaan is present and moves about in all the joints of the body.

The Samaan is present and moves about in the hands and legs (limbs) and all other appendages of the body. It also helps in equal distribution of the nutrients of the food that has been digested inside the body by the help of the fire element to all parts of the body through the network of seventy-two thousand Naadis. Hence, the Samaan wind also moves in all the seventy-two thousand Naadis and works in close association with the fire element.

The vital winds that live in the stomach and middle part of the abdomen (i.e. the Apaana and the Samaan) help to separate the water (fluids, enzymes, digestive juices etc.) present in the stomach from the nutrients of the food eaten (after the food is digested), and then take the nutrients through the Naadis to all the parts of the body (while the fluid portion and the grosser aspect of the food left after digestion and extraction of nutrients are taken to the organs of excretion, i.e. to the kidneys and the rectum respectively).

The Apaana Vayu keeps the internal fire responsible for cooking and digesting of food eaten burning. The food eaten is literally placed on the top of the water, and the water is placed on the fire which is stoked from below so as to heat this water which in turn cooks or digests the food eaten. This is a simple kitchen of the body. The fire of the hearth represented by the abdomen is the triangular fire area mentioned in verse no. 4. The air needed to keep the fire burning and the grate of the oven ventilated is the Apaana wind. The stomach is the pot. The fluids present in it are the water. And the chewed or pulverized food that is put in the stomach is the raw material from which the nutrients are needed to be extracted. Once this is done, the Samaan wind would take these nutrients to the different parts of the body, while the waste matter is taken to the kidneys and the anus for excretion.

The fire element present in the body is protected by the Apaana wind as the latter helps to keep it lighted and prevents it from being extinguished. As in the instance of the cooking of the food cited above, the Apaana wind, which is predominantly present in the lower part of the abdomen, keeps the fire alive by fanning it from the below.

This fire when stoked by the Pran Vayu (the vital winds) gathers heat and brings to a boil the water element present in the middle part of the body (i.e. the stomach) so that the vegetables and cereals that enter the stomach are properly cooked by it—i.e. the food is properly digested and its nutrients separated from the grosser aspects of the food such as the sweat, the urine, the blood, the semen, the various juices and other fluids present in the body (viz. the bile, the pancreatic juices, the various digestive enzymes, the mucous, the hormones etc.).

Once the process of digestion and separation of the subtle aspect of the food (i.e. its life-sustaining nutrients) from the grosser aspects (e.g. the sweat, urine, blood etc.) is complete, the Samaan wind takes over. In association with the Pran wind (i.e. the breath), it takes the vital nutrients thus segregated to all the corners of the body via the medium of the Naadis. The Pran wind meanwhile moves in and out of the body in the form of the breath. It will be noticed here that the Pran wind, or the breath, acts like a pump that works from the surface and provides the other winds the necessary suction power to move against the forces of gravity and lift the nutrients as well as certain of the grosser parts of the food that are important for the body, such as the blood, the mucous, the bile and other juices, the hormones etc. to the upper parts of the body against the usual downward pull of gravity. This upward pull exerted by the Pran wind also helps the Apaana wind, whose natural inclination is to move downwards and out of the body, to remain inside the body and even move upwards to keep the fire element lighted, besides being able to activate the Kundalini during the process of Yoga.

The vital winds eliminate the wastes present inside the body, such as the stool, urine, sweat etc., through the nine openings of the body into the space outside it. The nine openings of the body are called its Doors, and they are the following—two nostrils, two ears, the hair follicles, the pores of the body, one mouth, one anus and one urinary organ which doubles up as the reproductive organ as well.

<sup>2</sup>Such songs are sung in a light-hearted manner as banter and joke to entertain the guests during marriage functions. Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 329 below.

<sup>3</sup>The first round of food that was served was essentially meant for offering to the five vital winds as noted in verse no. 1 above. Hence, it consisted of plain boiled rice, curry of pulses, and clarified butter—refer: Doha no. 328 herein above. When these three items are mixed together, they form a thick gruel or pudding-like heap that closely resembles the offerings that are made to the sacred fire during formal fire sacrifices. The offerings that are made at the fire sacrifice too consist basically of mixed cereals, pulses and clarified butter in addition to milk and curd.

That done, the time came to actually enjoy food and satisfy the taste buds—not to appease them or indulge in them but to celebrate the auspicious occasion and the happy event of the marriage of the four brothers. It is a well established custom in society that a grand feast is organised at the end of a marriage.]

परुसन लगे सुआर सुजाना । बिंजन बिबिध नाम को जाना ॥ ३ ॥
चारि भाँति भोजन बिधि गाई । एक एक बिधि बरनि न जाई ॥ ४ ॥ छरस रुचिर बिंजन बहु जाती । एक एक रस अगनित भाँती ॥ ५ ॥ parusana lagē su'āra sujānā. binjana bibidha nāma kō jānā. 3.

cāri bhāmṭi bhōjana bidhi gā'ī. ēka ēka bidhi barani na jā'ī. 4.
charasa rucira binjana bahu jā'tī. ēka ēka rasa aganita bhāmṭī. 5.

Efficient servers and expert cooks began serving the guests with countless varieties of tasteful dishes which were so numerous in number and varied in taste and form that no one knew either their names or their varieties. (3)

[Elaborating on verse no. 3, we now get a hint of the type of food served in that grand feast.]

Ancient culinary texts describe that there are four chief categories of food<sup>1</sup> that a person can partake of. The food served at the grand banquet had countless varieties of each category of dish so much so that it is not possible to narrate (or list) them. (4)

Similarly, there were numerous dishes of seasoned food prepared in a variety of ways that had all the six types of basic tastes<sup>2</sup> in different combinations.

In fact, the dishes were so numerous and varied that each single category of food and each single type of taste or flavour was represented in many forms and offered in different combinations. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The four basic categories of food that a living being eats are the following—(i) Bhakshya—that which is eaten by tearing and lacerating with the help of teeth, that which requires proper chewing and mastication before it can enter the food pipe, e.g. bread, fruits, vegetables, chewing of sugarcane; (ii) Bhojya—that which is cooked and eaten with fingers or spoons, requiring least chewing or masticating and can be easily swallowed down the gullet, e.g. rice, curry; (iii) Lehya—that which is licked with the tongue, e.g. eating pickles or honey; and (iv) Choshya—that which is sipped or sucked, e.g. water, milk, tea.

The Garbho-panishad of the Krishna Yajur Veda tradition, verse no. 5 however classifies the four basic types of foods as—(i) Lehya: that which is licked; (ii) Peya: that which is drunk; (iii) Khaadya: that which is chewed or masticated; and (iv) Choshya: that which is sucked.

<sup>2</sup>The six tastes are the following flavours that the tongue feels—sweet, acidic, bitter, pungent, sour and salty. They are compared to the six seasons in this world. Refer Bhavana Upanishad of the Atharva Veda tradition, verse no. 2, stanza no 10.

Sometimes, the six tastes are listed as being sweet, salty, sour, bitter, pungent or hot, and astringent. Sometimes acidic (vinegar) and bland are also regarded as separate category of tastes. Refer Garbho-panishad, verse no. 1 of Krishna Yajur Veda tradition.]

जेवँत देहिं मधुर धुनि गारी । लै लै नाम पुरुष अरु नारी ॥ ६ ॥
समय सुहावनि गारि बिराजा । हँसत राउ सुनि सहित समाजा ॥ ७ ॥ एहि बिधि सबहीं भोजनु कीन्हा । आदर सहित आचमनु दीन्हा ॥ ८ ॥ jēvamṭa dēhiṁ madhura dhuni gārī. lai lai nāma puruṣa aru nārī. 6.

samaya suhāvani gārī birājā. haṁṣata rā'u suni sahita samājā. 7.
ēhi bidhi sabahīṁ bhōjanu kīnhā. ādara sahita ācamanu dīnhā. 8.

*At the time the guests were eating, melodious songs having teasing lyrics that contained light-hearted banter targeting the males and females of the groom's side were sung by the members of the bride's side to lighten-up the atmosphere and induce laughter and mirth.

[*This verse can be read as follows also—“At the time the guests were enjoying their meal, men and women folk of Janakpur, representing the bride's side, sang melodious songs that contained teasing lyrics targeting individual members of the groom's side by their names, as a custom that is observed during marriage feasts to cheer everyone up and induce laughter and mirth so as to lighten up the atmosphere of the otherwise formal event of a grand feast.”] (6)

It was a happy occasion and so everyone enjoyed the songs and their taunting lyrics without feeling annoyed or taking offence at the teasing language used. On the contrary, the king (Dasrath) laughed along with other members of his entourage.<sup>1</sup> (7)

On this wise, everyone ate his meal in a cheerful and pleasant environment marked with abundance of joy, mirth and rejoicing. Then everyone was offered water to wash (rinse) their mouths<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that follows Doha no. 328 herein above.

Refer also to “Janki Mangal”, verse no. 160.

<sup>2</sup>It is customary for the host to offer water from a jug to all his guests after the meal is over so that they can wash their hands and rinse their mouths. Janak himself helped Dasrath and his close family members to clean their hands and mouths, while Janak’s chief ministers and courtiers attended other members of the marriage party.]

दो०. देइ पान पूजे जनक दसरथु सहित समाज । जनवासेहि गवने मुदित सकल भूप सिरताज ॥ ३२९ ॥

dōhā.

dē'i pāna pūjē janaka dasarathu sahita samāja.
janavāsēhi gavanē mudita sakala bhūpa siratāja. 329.

Then, Janak first offered betel leaves as mouth freshner to king Dasrath and other members of the marriage party, and then paid his obeisance to them.

After that, the chief amongst kings, i.e. king Dasrath, proceeded cheerfully to the place where he and other members of the marriage party had been lodged<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 329)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This Doha concludes the narration of the reception and feast hosted by Janak for the marriage party which commenced in Chaupai line no. 1 that preceded Doha no. 328.

Refer also to “Janki Mangal”, Chanda no. 20.]

चौ०. नित नूतन मंगल पुर माहीं । निमिष सरिस दिन जामिनि जाहीं ॥ १ ॥
बड़े भोर भूपतिमनि जागे । जाचक गुन गन गावन लागे ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

nita nūtana maṅgala pura māhīm. nimiṣa sarisa dina jāmini jāhīm. 1.
baṛē bhōra bhūpatimani jāgē. jācaka guna gana gāvana lāgē. 2.

[The groom’s party stayed in Janakpur for many more days after the wedding was over. The following verses describe the joy and merriment that pervaded the atmosphere of the city during those days.]

Everyday there was renewed celebration and festivity in the city of Janakpur. Time passed unnoticed as if days and nights were like moments. [To wit, many days passed after the end of the wedding ceremony and its accompanying feast, but no one was bothered about time and the number of days the marriage party stayed in Janakpur after that.]<sup>1</sup> (1)

The king, who was like a gem in the community of kings (i.e. Dasrath), woke up very early the next morning (i.e. the morning that followed the grand feast). Minstrels and alms-seekers began singing his glories in a loud chorus<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Happy days pass too fast and no one notices them flying away because of their excitement, exuberance, joy and happiness, as compared to bad days that seem like burden, and a single day of sadness and despondency seems to extend endlessly into the horizon till the end of life itself as if it was an eternal curse marked by gloom and despair.

A similar idea is expressed earlier when the birth of Lord Ram and his brothers is being narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 195 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8 which say that “the insects were confused because there was continuous daylight as the month was reduced to a single day, and the Sun God was stunned that though his chariot continued to move in the sky yet there was no night in Ayodhya”.

In other words, everybody thoroughly enjoyed the presence of king Dasrath and his royal retinue in Janakpur. No one wanted them to go away, and this will be clear when we read Chaupai line nos. 2-8 that precede Doha no. 332 below.

<sup>2</sup>This and other verses that follow below describe the events of the day following the marriage feast.]

देखि कुअँर बर बधुन्ह समेता । किमि कहि जात मोदु मन जेता ॥ ३ ॥
प्रातक्रिया करि गे गुरु पाहीं । महाप्रमोदु प्रेमु मन माहीं ॥ ४ ॥ dēkhi ku'amra bara badhunha samētā. kimi kahi jāta mōdu mana jētā. 3.

prātakriyā kari gē guru pāhīm. mahāpramōdu prēmu mana māhīm. 4.

Who can describe the extent of happiness and joy that prevailed in his (Dasrath's) heart when he watched the grooms with their respective brides? [To wit, no one can describe how happy and glad Dasrath felt watching his sons with their lovely brides. Like any father, it was the culmination of his desires and fruition of his dreams.]<sup>1</sup> (3)

The king finished his morning routine (praying, bathing etc.) and went to meet his Guru (sage Vasistha). His heart and mind (together called the “Mana”) were full of bliss and ecstasy<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The reason why Dasrath woke up very early the next morning is that he was exceptionally happy and excited, and so probably could not sleep the previous night. So, he woke up early.

Besides this aspect of his being happy and excited at the marriage of all his four sons and they getting pretty brides fully in accordance to their expectations, it was also a habit of Dasrath that he woke up early as ordained by the scriptures. He woke up before sunrise. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 37 along Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes it, and Chaupai line no. 1 that follows it.

<sup>2</sup>We find that on other occasions also, Dasrath had gone to meet his Guru to make special requests to him:--

(i) The first was when he was worried that he was growing old and still had no heirs—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 181.

(ii) The second occasion was when the news of Lord Ram's marriage with Sita arrived from Janakpur—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 293.

(iii) The third occasion was when Dasrath wished to anoint Lord Ram as the regent of the kingdom of Ayodhya—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 2.

However, presently he has gone to meet Vasistha to say thanks to him and request him to call all the elders and Brahmins so that gifts can be given to them and charities can be made as is clear in the following verses.]

करि प्रनामु पूजा कर जोरी । बोले गिरा अमिअँ जनु बोरी ॥ ५ ॥
तुहरी कृपाँ सुनुहु मुनिराजा । भयउँ आजु मैं पूरनकाजा ॥ ६ ॥
अब सब बिप्र बोलाइ गोसाईं । देहु धेनु सब भाँति बनाई ॥ ७ ॥
सुनि गुर करि महिपाल बड़ाई । पुनि पठए मुनि बृंद बोलाई ॥ ८ ॥ kari pranāmu pūjā kara jōrī. bōlē girā ami'am' janu bōrī. 5.

tumharī kṛpām' sunahu munirājā. bhaya'um' āju mai'm pūranakājā. 6.
aba saba bipra bōlā'i gōsā'īm. dēhu dhēnu saba bhām'ti banā'īm. 7.
suni gura kari mahipāla barā'ī. puni paṭha'e muni bṛnda bōlā'ī. 8.

The king reverentially bowed his head before his Guru (Vasistha) and duly worshipped him. Then he spoke so sweetly that his words appeared to be soaked in nectar<sup>1</sup>. (5)

The king said—‘Oh the king amongst great sage! It is due to your grace, benevolence and kindness that all my wishes have been fulfilled and I feel fully contented today. (6)

Now oh Lord, please oblige me by summoning all the Brahmins and elders (“Vipra”), and gift all of them cows that are fully decorated.<sup>2</sup> (7)

When the Guru heard this request from the king, he first praised him (for his courteousness and sweet words, and also for his charitable nature because he wished to make donations). Then he (Guru Vasistha) sent for (invited) all the elders and Brahmins<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This was a very happy day of Dasrath's life, and so he was exceptionally cheerful. This is why he “spoke so sweetly as if his words were soaked in nectar”.

<sup>2</sup>Decorating the cows meant decorating them with costly clothes, putting garlands made of precious gems and pearls around their necks, and adorning their horns and hooves with plated gold or silver.

<sup>3</sup>We have read earlier that when Dasrath had gone to convey the good news of Lord Ram's marriage to sage Vasistha, the sage had praised the king then also, giving reasons for his praises—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 294.]

दो०. बामदेउ अरु देवरिषि बालमीकि जाबालि ।

आए मुनिबर निकर तब कौसिकादि तपसालि ॥ ३३० ॥

dōhā.

bāmadē'u aru dēvariṣi bālamiki jābāli.

ā'ē munibara nikara taba kausikādi tapasāli. 330.

Sage Vamdeo, the celestial sage Narad, sage Valmiki and sage Jabal, as also sage Kaushik (Vishwamitra) who was endowed with a divine halo that comes with extensive Tapa (doing severe penances and observance of strict austerities)—all of them came there cheerfully (to accept gifts to mark the auspicious occasion of Lord Ram's marriage with Sita). (Doha no. 330)

[Note—Sages Vaamdeo etc. were present in Janakpur on the occasion of Lord Ram's marriage as is evident in Baal Kand, Doha no. 320 and its preceding Chanda line no. 4 herein above where it is said that at the time of the start of the wedding rites, king Janak had offered his worship to sages Kaushik (Vishwamitra), Vaamdeo etc.

Another important point to note here is that though king Dasrath had requested Vasistha to call 'Vipras', meaning Brahmins and elders of the society, but Vasistha called in 'great sages', and the wonder is that they did not hesitate in coming and accepting gifts. This is because this was not an ordinary marriage, and the gift was not from someone ordinary to celebrate something routine.

It was the marriage that marked the union of the visible form of the supreme Lord of the world in the form of Lord Ram with his cosmic Shakti in the form of Sita. It was a cosmic union of two great forces of creation that was played out at the micro level of creation in the form of the marriage of Lord Ram and Sita. So these great sages named above had no compunctions or reservations in coming and accepting gifts. It is a matter of honour and privilege when a person is invited to accept gifts from someone who occupies a very high stature in the society. Even in today's world people vie with each other to get themselves photographed with the high and the mighty, and if an invitation to attend some state function where dignitaries are present is received by someone he would frame it and hang it on his wall to show others how special he is, and thus boast of his newly discovered stature in society.

Vasistha decided to call these sages because he wisely thought that they must be given the honour to accept gifts to mark the auspicious occasion of Lord Ram's marriage. On the other hand, if they had not been invited, perhaps they could have felt neglected, let-down or even insulted.

Another reason for calling them was they would bless king Dasrath, and their blessings would stand in good stead for the king and his four sons as well as the kingdom of Ayodhya. This is exactly what happened—we shall read below that all the invited sages have profusely blessed king Dasrath and he would consider himself very fortunate—refer: Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 331 below.

And what about the Brahmins and other alms-seekers; did they not come? Yes, they also came—it will be clear below in Chaupai line nos. 5-7 that precede Doha no. 331.]

चौ०. दंड प्रनाम सबहि नृप कीन्हे । पूजि सप्रेम बरासन दीन्हे ॥ १ ॥
चारि लच्छ बर धेनु मगाई । कामसुरभि सम सील सुहाई ॥ २ ॥
सब बिधि सकल अलंकृत कीन्हीं । मुदित महिप महिदेवन्ह दीन्हीं ॥ ३ ॥

caupāī.

daṇḍa pranāma sabahi nṛpa kīnhē. pūji saprēma barāsana dīnhē. 1.
cāri laccha bara dhēnu magā'īm. kāmasurabhi sama sīla suhā'īm. 2.
saba bidhi sakala alaṅkṛta kīnhīm. mudita mahipa mahidēvanha dīnhīm. 3.

When they (i.e. the invited sages as well as Brahmins) arrived, the king (Dasrath) paid his obeisance to all of them by prostrating before them on the ground. Then he worshipped them and excellent seats to sit.<sup>1</sup> (1)

The king called for four lakh (1 lakh = 1,00,000) excellent cows<sup>2</sup> who were all like the legendary Kamdhenu cow (the all-wish fulfilling cow) in their gentle manners and beauty. (2)

The cows were fully decorated in every possible way<sup>3</sup>, and then the delighted king gave (donated) them cheerfully to the 'Mahi-devas'<sup>4</sup> (literally, the 'gods on earth'; meaning the sages as well as the Brahmins). (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Prostrating before sages and elders is the best way of showing respect to them. Another alternative method of equal importance is bowing before them and putting one's head on their feet. But the latter method suits when there are one, two or more sages and Brahmins of a limited number when a person can attend to each of them. But when there are a large number of such elders then the best option is to prostrate before all of them from a distance as they approach as a group. In the latter case, there would be no need for individually touching each sage's feet or bowing before him.

Prostrating before a group of sages and Brahmins also ensures that all the members of the group are shown equal respect and honour irrespective of the fact that the person showing such respect may not know the individual members of the group personally. Since the sages and Brahmins had similar external appearances, it was often difficult to distinguish one from the other unless one had the chance to look them up closely, or was well acquainted with a person because of frequent interaction with him, or when someone tells him who the guest was.

So, Dasrath took no chances and prostrated before the entire group of sages, Brahmins and other elders who came to him to accept gifts commemorating the auspicious marriage of Lord Ram and his other brothers.

<sup>2</sup>The cows were excellent in the sense that they were all healthy, of ripe age, gave abundant milk, looked attractive, and could grant wishes if one serves them faithfully. These are the salient characteristics of the Kamdhenu cow.

<sup>3</sup>Their horns and hooves were either gold or silver plated, garlands of pearls and other precious gems were put around their necks, their backs were draped with exquisitely embroidered garments, and their tails were manicured and scented oiled and decorated with strings of pearls and gems.

<sup>4</sup>We have read in Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 330 above that the king had requested sage Vasistha to call all the ‘Vipras’, which usually means Brahmins. But Vasistha summoned even the sages listed in Doha no. 330 along with the elderly Brahmins. So the word ‘Mahi-Deva’ is used here to cover all of them—the sages as well as the Brahmins because all of them are as revered on earth as the gods are in heaven.]

करत बिनय बहु बिधि नरनाहू । लहेउँ आजु जग जीवन लाहू ॥ ४ ॥

पाइ असीस महीसु अनंदा । लिए बोलि पुनि जाचक बृन्दा ॥ ५ ॥

कनक बसन मनि हय गय स्यंदन । दिए बूझि रुचि रबिकुलनंदन ॥ ६ ॥ karata binaya bahu bidhi naranāhū. lahē'um' āju jaga jīvana lāhū. 4.

pā'i asisa mahīsu anandā. li'ē bōli puni jācaka bṛndā. 5.

kanaka basana mani haya gaya syandana. di'ē būjhi ruci rabikulanandana. 6.

The great king offered his prayers to them in a variety of ways (i.e. he offered his respects to the invited sages and Brahmins in different ways, repeatedly using different words and different gestures), and said—‘I have got the reward (fruit) of taking birth and of all the good deeds that I have done in my life.’<sup>1</sup> (4)

The king (“mahīsu”; the lord of the earth)<sup>2</sup> was very delighted and felt exhilarated when he received blessings from them (the invited sages and Brahmins, the “Mahi-Devas”).

Then he summoned other alms-seekers and members of the laity (the “jācaka bṛndā”) who were waiting for their turn to receive gifts from the king to mark the marriage of his four sons. (5)

The ‘great son of the Solar Race’ (“rabikulanandana”—i.e. king Dasrath) liberally gave them gold, clothes, gems, horses, elephants and chariots according to their desires and needs.<sup>3</sup> (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The king was very humble and overjoyed as he praised his good fortune and the cumulative affect of all his good deeds that he has witnessed such a happy moment in his life today—all his dear sons were married to magnificent brides who belonged to one of the greatest kingdoms on earth, the kingdom of Janakpur that rivals the kingdom of Ayodhya in its riches, prosperity, power, strength and fame. Then the king praised his good luck that he has had the opportunity to pay his respects to such great sages as Vaamdeo, Narad, Valmiki, Jabal and Vishwamitra together at one place, and that too during the marriage of his sons. It was an excellent combination of stars and grace of the gods that had made this possible.

It is a polite way of showing respect to the sages and Brahmins when one says that he is so fortunate and blessed to meet them, to serve them, and to have them as his guest.

The guest sages and Brahmins accept gifts given and honours shown to them, and in their turn they feel obliged to reciprocate this gesture of respect by blessing the host. This is exactly what happens now—they collectively blessed king Dasrath as is clear in the next line no. 5.

<sup>2</sup>We must note the careful selection of words by Tulsidas, the author-poet of this classic book. He has addressed the sages and Brahmins with the epithet “Mahi-Devas”, the gods of the earth, and so he used the word “Mahisa”, meaning the lord of the earth, when referring to king Dasrath. A man of high stature such as the great sages and the exalted Brahmins referred to above would accept only if something is given to them by someone of an equally high stature in society. Remember: the sages and Brahmins were not ‘beggars’ or ‘alms-seekers’ who would queue to get anything that is doled out as charity. They were men of high respect and dignity, and were possessed with powers that would never let them face shortage of material things that they would spread their arms for anything. They accepted anything just to honour the wishes of the giver, and not because they needed the thing.

In other words, the ‘giver was the lord of the earth’, and the ‘receiver was the god of earth’—i.e. they were of equal stature.

When a senior person is given something as gift, it is merely as a ‘token’ of respect from the giver. The ‘cow’ was the standard gift that was given to sages and Brahmins in earlier times. The cow had its practical use also. The sages maintained hermitages where disciples lived, and so was also the case with elderly Brahmins who spent their time studying the scriptures and teaching them to others. This meant that a large number of ‘students’ lived with them, and the cow used to provide milk for their dietary needs, dung that was dried and baked to serve as fuel for the fire, and so on.

These cows were decorated with precious things such as gems and gold in an indirect method to give material wealth to the sages and Brahmins who could sell them off to meet their financial needs.

<sup>3</sup>When the word had gone out that king Dasrath has summoned Brahmins (the “Vipras”) because he wishes to give gifts to them to mark the marriage of his sons, all those who were expecting some reward on this occasion also collected voluntarily. No one actually needed anything, but it was a moment to rejoice the marriage in the royal household, and therefore accepting and giving gifts would not mean that a person was a beggar or was suffering financially. It is merely a gesture of joy and happiness that one gives gifts and another accepts them whenever there is an occasion to celebrate some great event.

At the time when Lord Ram and his brothers were born in Ayodhya, similar gifts were given liberally, and whatever one got as a gift he immediately gave it to others with a free spirit—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 194.

We also read that at that time, Dasrath had given liberally to alms-seekers whatever they wished—elephants, chariots, horses, gems, cows and diamonds: refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 196.

Another occasion is when the good news of Lord Ram's marriage arrived in Ayodhya. On that occasion the gifts were given to the Brahmins by the queen-mothers (Kaushalya, Sumitra and Kaikeyi together)—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 295 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 7-8.]

चले पढ़त गावत गुन गाथा । जय जय जय दिनकर कुल नाथा ॥ ७ ॥
एहि बिधि राम बिआह उछाहू । सकइ न बरनि सहस मुख जाहू ॥ ८ ॥

calē parhata gāvata guna gāthā. jaya jaya jaya dinakara kula nāthā. 7.
ēhi bidhi rāma bi'āha uchāhū. saka'i na barani sahasa mukha jāhū. 8.

After receiving gifts and honours, all of them (the sages, the Brahmins, the alms-seekers etc.) departed cheerfully and fully contented. They left the place singing and praising the glories of the noble king, repeatedly cheering at him and applauding him loudly—'Glory to the Lord of the Solar Race ("dinakara kula nāthā").'<sup>1</sup> (7)

In this way, the festivities and celebrations that accompanied the marriage of Lord Ram were so profound and glorious that they cannot be narrated even by someone who has a thousand mouths to describe them<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Similar instances of cheering crowd of gift-recipients are noticed earlier when gifts were given. (i) First, at the time of birth of Lord Ram and his brothers—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 196; and (ii) then at the time of arrival of news of the Lord's marriage—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 295 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 8.

<sup>2</sup>Similar idea is expressed elsewhere also: refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 361.

It is a poetic way of highlighting the glorious and divine moments when the Lord of the world, Lord Ram, got united with the cosmic Shakti in the form of Sita in a ceremony that the mundane world calls 'marriage'. It is like saying that words fall short of expectations, they are insufficient and incompetent to give even an iota of idea of the extent of happiness and joy, of the dimension of celebrations and festivities, of the intensity of rejoicing and exuberance, of the divine atmosphere and an environment of all-round welfare and well-being that was generated at the time of Lord Ram's marriage with Sita.

Verily, it was an event that can't be captured in words because the word has its own limitations. The word is like a bird that cannot measure the depth and length of the sky no matter how high and long it flies.]

दो०. बार बार कौंसिक चरन सीसु नाइ कह राउ ।

यह सबु सुखु मुनिराज तव कृपा कटाच्छ पसाउ ॥ ३३१ ॥

dōhā.

bāra bāra kausika carana sīsu nā'i kaha rā'u.
yaha sabu sukhu munerāja tava krpā kaṭāccha pasā'u. 331.

The king was overwhelmed with gratitude and thankfulness towards sage Kaushik (Vishwamitra), and so he repeatedly bowed his head at the feet of the sage and said most humbly, with an immense sense of gratefulness in his voice—‘Oh gracious sage! All this happiness and bliss that I have been fortunate enough to enjoy today are the result of you looking at me with favour, being kind upon me, and are the cumulative result of your blessings, benevolence, mercy and grace that you have shown to me.’ (Doha no. 331)

[Note—The king (Dasrath) felt highly obliged of sage Vishwamitra, and he could not contend himself and sufficiently express his gratitude to the sage because it was he who had been instrumental in getting Lord Ram married to Sita, it was he who brought the Lord to Janakpur and ordered him to break the bow, and it was he who had summoned the king to come and attend the marriage. When the king came, his other sons also accompanied him, and as it turned out all of them got married. The king felt he owed a lot of gratitude to sage Vishwamitra, and so he chose to pay special attention and reverence to the sage in this verse.]

चौ०. जनक सनेहु सीलु करतूती । नृपु सब भाँति सराह बिभूती ॥ १ ॥
दिन उठि बिदा अवधपति मागा । राखहिं जनकु सहित अनुरागा ॥ २ ॥
caupāī.

janaka sanēhu sīlu karatūtī. nṛpu saba bhāmṭi sarāha bibhūtī. 1.
dina uṭhi bidā avadhapati māgā. rākhahim janaku sahita anurāgā. 2.

The king (Dasrath) liberally praised his counterpart king Janak for his affectionate and courteous nature, his amiability and friendliness, his gracious deeds and actions, and the overall graceful way he had conducted himself and gone about to complete everything in an efficient and judicious manner<sup>1</sup>. (1)

The king of Ayodhya (Dasrath) got up everyday and requested king Janak to give him permission to go back to his kingdom, but the most gracious host (Janak) was reluctant to grant him leave, politely asking him to tarry at Janakpur for some more time<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Dasrath had witnessed the most dignified and courteous way king Janak had received the members of the marriage party in general and Dasrath himself at the wedding pavilion when they had gone to attend the marriage ceremony of Lord Ram—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 320—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 321.

Janak’s courteousness and polite ways are evident once again at the end of the wedding feast as described earlier in Chaupai line no. 8 and its following Chanda line nos. 1-12 that precede Doha no. 326; and in Doha no. 329.

<sup>2</sup>This showed that Janak was not getting fed-up with serving king Dasrath and the rest of the marriage party. When the host requests the guest to stay for some more time, it shows that the latter is thoroughly enjoying the former's stay. Otherwise, the host would seize on the chance when the guest asks his permission to go, and would immediately accept the request and let the guest leave.

Janak was therefore playing the role of a perfect, graceful and obliging host. Refer Chaupai line no. 5 below.

In the context of the narrative here, from Chaupai line nos. 2—7, the reader can also refer to Tulsidas' book "Janki Mangal", verse no. 161.]

नित नूतन आदरु अधिकाई । दिन प्रति सहस भँति पहुनाई ॥ ३ ॥

नित नव नगर अनंद उछाहू । दसरथ गवनु सोहाइ न काहू ॥ ४ ॥

nita nūтана ādaru adhikā'ī. dina prati sahasa bhām̐ti pahunā'ī. 3.

nita nava nagara ananda uchāhū. dasaratha gavanu sōhā'i na kāhū. 4.

The royal guest (king Dasrath) was shown newer forms of respect and honour during each of the days of his stay at Janakpur, and he was served most diligently and cheerfully in all possible manners to make him exceptionally comfortable and his stay extremely pleasant every day of the days of his stay even as he was entertained in thousands of ways with greater and enhanced attention with the passage of time, without any let-up or negligence<sup>1</sup>. (3)

There were newer festivities and celebrations every day in the city (of Janakpur), and the citizens thoroughly enjoyed the stay of the marriage party so much so that no one liked that the guests should go back (to Ayodhya). (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It is not clear whether this verse no. 3 refers only to king Dasrath or to all other members of the marriage party. In all probabilities, all the members of the marriage party were shown the same respect as king Dasrath, for otherwise it would seem odd and un-courteous on the part of Janak to neglect others in the same group of guests. Earlier also it has been said that Janak had shown the same respect to others in the marriage party as he had shown to Dasrath—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 321 which expressly makes this point.

So therefore, we can safely read this verse as follows also—"The guests (king Dasrath and other members of the marriage party) were shown newer forms of respect from day to day, and all of them were entertained in thousands of ways with greater and enhanced attention with the passage of time."]

बहुत दिवस बीते एहि भाँती । जनु सनेह रजु बँधे बराती ॥ ५ ॥

कौसिक सतानंद तब जाई । कहा बिदेह नृपहि समुझाई ॥ ६ ॥

अब दसरथ कहँ आयसु देहू । जद्यपि छाड़ि न सकहु सनेहू ॥ ७ ॥

भलेहिं नाथ कहि सचिव बोलाए । कहि जय जीव सीस तिन्ह नाए ॥ ८ ॥ bahuta divasa bītē ēhi bhām̐ti. janu sanēha raju bam̐dhē barātī. 5.

kausika satānanda taba jā'ī. kahā bidēha nṛpahi samujhā'ī. 6.

aba dasaratha kaham̐ āyasu dēhū. jadyapi chāḍi na sakahu sanēhū. 7.

bhalēhiṁ nātha kahi saciva bōlā'ē. kahi jaya jīva sīsa tinha nā'ē. 8.

Many happy days passed in the aforesaid way in an atmosphere of joyous merriment and abundant enjoyment, with king Dasrath repeatedly seeking permission to leave and king Janak asking him to stay for some more time. It appeared that the groom's party was tied in a strong thread of love and affection that prevented them from leaving the city of Janakpur, the bride's place. So they tarried there cheerfully and gladly for a time longer than expected.<sup>1</sup> (5)

Then, realising that there was an inordinate delay for the marriage party to leave Janakpur and proceed to its kingdom of Ayodhya, sages Kaushik (Vishwamitra) and Satanand, the royal priest of Janakpur, went to Janak and advised him thus—[6]

‘Now you must grant leave to Dasrath and allow him to proceed to his place<sup>2</sup> even though you don't like it and would prefer that he continues to stay here for some more days out of your affection for him and the bond of mutual respect and endearment that you have forged with him as well as the rest of the groom's party. [But oh king, this is not practical, for after all the groom's party cannot stay at the bride's place indefinitely. All guests, no matter how loving they may be, have to leave the host's place sooner or later, and every good thing has to come to an end one day. A sovereign of one kingdom feels very uneasy and odd if he has to stay at another sovereign's place for more time than it is absolutely necessary. Dasrath has to attend to the state affairs of his own kingdom of Ayodhya, and many important issues requiring his personal attention must be piling up there in his absence. So it is wise and prudent and advisable now that you must grant Dasrath permission to leave.]’ [7] (6-7)

Janak agreed reluctantly, saying, ‘Alright Lords, I will do as you say’.

Then he summoned his chief minister who came forthwith, saluted the king and bowed his head before him<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer Chaupai line no. 2 herein above.

<sup>2</sup>Surely it was sage Vishwamitra who said it. Satanand accompanied Vishwamitra because he was the kingdom's chief priest, but he would not have addressed king Dasrath by his name because it would be impolite for him to do so by the virtue of his being Janak's priest and on his payroll. If it was Satanand who spoke to Janak, then he would have used the title of a ‘king’ as a prefix to Dasrath, and not merely as ‘Dasrath’.

It is important to note here that out of the two sages, Vishwamitra was the senior one, and a senior person is the one who gives advice to the king.

Another reason for Vishwamitra speaking instead of Satanand was that they consulted each other before hand and decided that if Satanand spoke, the chances were that Janak would overlook his advice simply because Satanand, after all, was his employee, but Janak will certainly not disobey Vishwamitra for the latter was an independent sage. Besides this, both Janak and Dasrath were highly obliged to Vishwamitra and held him in high esteem, so they could never think of not doing what this sage asked.

The third reason was that Vishwamitra had easy access to king Dasrath as opposed to Satanand as the latter had to observe a lot of formal protocol because he was on the payroll of the kingdom of Janakpur and represented king Janak. Dasrath would confide with Vishwamitra and not with Satanand. So when Vishwamitra said that Dasrath wants to leave, Janak understood that the sage is speaking on behalf of king Dasrath who was so overwhelmed by Janak's affection, politeness and hospitality that he could not muster courage to insist on going back to Ayodhya on the face of Janak. So Janak would think that Dasrath had chosen sage Vishwamitra to act as his emissary and request the host king to grant him permission to leave.

<sup>3</sup>Whenever the chief minister came to his king, this was the standard way he showed his respect to the latter. This has similarities elsewhere also—for instance, when Dasrath's chief minister known as Sumantra came to him, he also followed the same procedure—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 5; (ii) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 38; and (ii) Doha no. 148.]

दो०. अवधनाथु चाहत चलन भीतर करहु जनाउ । भए प्रेमबस सचिव सुनि बिप्र सभासद राउ ॥ ३३२ ॥

dōhā.

avadhanāthu cāhata calana bhītara karahu janā'u.
bha'ē prēmabasa saciva suni bipra sabhāsada rā'u. 332.

King Janak instructed his chief minister—‘The lord of Ayodhya (king Dasrath) wishes to leave. So go to the interior of the palace (where the queens and other female members of the royal household live) and inform them of this.’

When the chief minister heard this, he was overcome with emotions, and so were the Brahmins and other courtiers present there, as well as the king himself. (Doha no. 332)

चौ०. पुरबासी सुनि चलिहि बराता । बूझत बिकल परस्पर बाता ॥ १ ॥
सत्य गवनु सुनि सब बिलखाने । मनहुँ साँझ सरसिज सकुचाने ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

purabāsī suni calihi barātā. būjhata bikala paraspara bātā. 1.
satya gavanu suni saba bilakhānē. manahūṁ sām̐jha sarasija sakucānē. 2.

As the word spread and the citizens of Janakpur came to know that the groom's party would be leaving shortly, they became sorrowful and anxiously asked each other if the news was indeed true. (1)

When they learnt that it was the truth, all of them lamented and felt very sad and regretful. They became sorrowful and depressed just like the lotus that shrivels up when dusk falls.

[As soon as the news spread in the city that Lord Ram's marriage party was preparing to leave, a pall of gloom descended upon Janakpur. The celebrations and rejoicing were cut short, and the atmosphere suddenly became frosty and heavy as if there was some great loss in the offing. All the singing, dancing, music and merriment ended, and they were replaced by a somber mood.] (2)

जहँ जहँ आवत बसे बराती । तहँ तहँ सिद्ध चला बहु भाँती ॥ ३ ॥
बिबिध भाँति मेवा पकवाना । भोजन साजु न जाइ बखाना ॥ ४ ॥ भरि भरि बसहँ अपार कहारा । पठई जनक अनेक सुसारा ॥ ५ ॥

jaham̃ jaham̃ āvata basē barātī. taham̃ taham̃ sid'dha calā bahu bhām̃tī. 3.
bibidha bhām̃tī mēvā pakavānā. bhōjana sāju na jā'i bakhānā. 4.
bhari bhari basaham̃ apāra kahārā. paṭha'īm janaka anēka susārā. 5.

Countless varieties of provisions and grocery items were sent by Janak to all those places where the marriage party had halted on its way from Ayodhya to Janakpur<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Janak ordered that seasoned food and sweets of countless varieties be prepared. It is not possible to describe either the food or the royal paraphernalia (i.e. the numerous items given as marriage gift to the newly married couple by the bride's father—such as robes, garments, ornaments, household items such as bedsteads, mattresses etc.) that were arranged to be sent with the marriage party. (4)

All these countless things were put on the back of oxen or were carried by porters who were sent by Janak to the in-law's (Dasrath's) place. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Janak understood the need for making arrangement for adequate supply of food, drinks, grocery items other things of daily need which the marriage party would need for the long-haul journey back from Janakpur to Ayodhya. So, as soon as it was decided that the marriage party would leave, Janak sent these provisions in advance so that the party does not face any inconvenience on the way back home.]

तुरग लाख रथ सहस पचीसा । सकल सँवारे नख अरु सीसा ॥ ६ ॥
मत्त सहस दस सिंधुर साजे । जिन्हहि देखि दिसिकुंजर लाजे ॥ ७ ॥ कनक बसन मनि भरि भरि जाना । महिषीं धेनु बस्तु बिधि नाना ॥ ८ ॥ turaga lākha ratha sahasa pacīsā. sakala sam̃vārē nakha aru sīsā. 6.

matta sahasa dasa sindhura sājē. jinhahi dēkhi disikuñjara lājē. 7.
kanaka basana mani bhari bhari jānā. mahiṣīm dhēnu bastu bidhi nānā. 8.

[Verse nos. 6-8 list some of the items that were gifted by Janak.]

One lakh horses (1 lakh = 1,00,000) and twenty-five thousand gilded chariots were fully decorated from bottom to top (nakha aru sīsā)<sup>1</sup>. (6)

Similarly, ten thousand robust, strong, rugged and healthy elephants were beautifully decorated. Even the elephants that support the eight quarters of the world<sup>2</sup> on their muscular backs felt abashed when they saw these fully adorned elephants (that were gifted by Janak to king Dasrath). (7)

Gold, clothes and precious gems were sent in huge containers loaded on carts. Then there were she-buffaloes, cows and countless other items of different kinds. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The horses' hooves were plated with foils of gold or silver; their girdles, harness, bridles and saddles etc. were too made of precious metals studded with priceless gems and pearls. Their backs were draped with costly embroidered cloth. The chariots were similarly decked up beautifully. All their parts were polished and oiled and gold or silver plated; the seats were upholstered with the finest of cloth; the royal standard was gold embroidered; and the wood-work was exquisitely carved, and inlaid with ivory and precious metals and stones.

The numbers of horses, chariots and elephants that Janak gifted to Dasrath as mentioned in this and other similar verses seem to be highly exaggerated. It is in all probability because poets and bards of ancient times had the habit of using hyperbolic and decorative language to lavish praises on their patrons, who were usually great kings and emperors, to show how grand and extensive their pomp and ceremony used to be, to bring to the fore their majesty and grandeur, to emphasise that Janak gifted Dasrath with an open heart and a most liberal mind, a way to show his host that he was overwhelmed with gratitude for his gracious acceptance of his service and hospitality. Janak literally piled Dasrath with so many gifts that the latter would always remember the warmth and affection that was offered to him by his brother-king, and it would go a long way in cementing mutual bond of friendship and brotherhood between two great kingdoms of that time, with each going out of its way to honour and praise the other.

Dasrath was the king of a very prosperous and wealthy kingdom of Ayodhya, and so Janak wished to give gifts befitting the stature of his guest as well as to show that he is not behind the former in prosperity and wealth.

Use of the terms 'millions or hundreds of thousands (lakhs and crores)' for any given entity or thing simply meant that they were in large numbers, or were so huge in numbers that it was difficult to actually count them and specify their numerical strength.

<sup>2</sup>These eight elephants are called "Diggajs". They support the heavy world on their backs at eight points—north, north-east, east, south-east, south, south-west, west, north-west, zenith and nadir.]

दो०. दाइज अमित न सकिअ कहि दीन्ह बिदेहँ बहोरि । जो अवलोकत लोकपति लोक संपदा थोरि ॥ ३३३ ॥
dōhā.

dā'ija amita na saki'a kahi dīnha bidēham' bahōri.
jō avalōkata lōkapati lōka sampadā thōri. 333.

Janak was not contented with what he had sent in advance, so he gave more marriage gifts which were so huge in quantity and varied in quality that it is not possible for anyone to say what they were, how many they were, or of what quality they were.

In fact, when the king of the world, i.e. Indra, the king of the gods, saw them he felt that the entire wealth of his kingdom (the world; the heaven) was only a trifle as compared to these gifts that Janak sent with the marriage party. (Doha no. 333)

चौ०. सबु समाजु एहि भाँति बनाई । जनक अवधपुर दीन्ह पठाई ॥ १ ॥
 चलिहि बरात सुनत सब रानी । बिकल मीनगन जनु लघु पानी ॥ २ ॥
 caupāī.

sabu samāju ēhi bhām̐ti banāī. janaka avadhapura dīnha paṭhāī. 1.
 calihi barāta sunata saba rānīm̐. bikala mīnagana janu laghu pānīm̐. 2.

In this above-mentioned way, Janak arranged for all the things at a grand scale and sent them to Ayodhya<sup>1</sup>. (1)

[This verse picks up the narration from the end of Doha no. 332.]

When the queens<sup>2</sup> heard that the grooms<sup>3</sup> party was preparing to leave, they became anxious and distressed like the fish that faces the prospect of having to live with scarcity of water<sup>4</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This verse clearly tells us that whatever gifts Janak arranged for king Dasrath as well as his son-in-laws and other members of the marriage party were sent by him directly to Ayodhya. These gifts were sent with an advance party that also took care of arrangements all along the way from the city of Janakpur till the outer fringes of the kingdom to ensure that when the marriage party arrived at these spots they will find all arrangements in place and will not face any inconvenience.

Though it is not mentioned here, contingents of Janakpur's army must have accompanied this advance party carrying costly gifts because of the fear of loot on the way. This sending of gifts ahead of the actual marriage party was a strategic move to ensure that the road was cleared and secured in advance to pre-empt any untoward incident when the marriage party passed through that way a little behind.

<sup>2</sup>The pleural term “queens” refers to the queen of Janak, named Sunayana, and the queen of his younger brother, Kushdhwaj. Besides them, Janak had other cousins and family relations, and all their wives were collectively treated as members of the royal household, and hence addressed as ‘queens’.

<sup>3</sup>Similarly, the pleural term “grooms” refers to Lord Ram and his other three brothers, i.e. Bharat, Shatrughan and Laxman, all of whom were married to cousin sisters in Janakpur.

<sup>4</sup>Tulsidas had chosen this example very cleverly. The fish would die if there was no water, but when it faces the prospect of living in a limited supply of water it is scared because it will have to lead a tormented life for as long as it lives. The fish would feel the agony of death only for an instant and for once if it had to die for complete lack of water, but when that water is in short-supply, say only a half-dry puddle as compared to a large pond or river, the fish is neither able to die and get rid of the torments, nor can it live happily and contentedly as it would do when the water is in abundance.

Thus, the queens would have to spend the rest of their lives suffering the pain of separation from their beloved daughters and their equally beloved sons-in-law whom they will not be able to meet quite often for the rest of their lives as they have been doing for the past many days while the marriage party had camped at Janakpur.

Their condition is like that fish which is forced to live in constrained conditions due to bad luck.

Refer also to “Janki Mangal”, verse no. 162.]

पुनि पुनि सीय गोद करि लेहीं । देइ असीस सिखावनु देहीं ॥ ३ ॥
 होएहु संतत पियहि पिआरी । चिरु अहिबात असीस हमारी ॥ ४ ॥
 सासु ससुर गुर सेवा करेहू । पति रुख लखि आयसु अनुसरेहू ॥ ५ ॥ puni puni sīya gōda kari lēhīm. dē'i asīsa sikhāvanu dēhīm. 3.

 hō'ēhu santata piyahi pi'ārī. ciru ahibāta asīsa hamārī. 4.
 sāsū sasura gura sēvā karēhū. pati rukha lakhi āyasu anusarēhū. 5.

They (the queen-mothers) repeatedly picked up Sita on to their laps, affectionately embracing her, blessing her and giving her motherly advice<sup>1</sup>. (3)

The mothers blessed Sita, saying, ‘May you enjoy the love and affection of your dear husband for a life-time, and may you live happily with him for an eternity. This is our blessing for you. (4)

Be diligent in serving your mother-and-father in-law, as well as your Guru<sup>2</sup>. Always pay attention to what your husband wants, and act accordingly<sup>3</sup>. [That is, always obey your husband and keep him pleased.]’ (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The loving mothers were overcome with emotions as the final hour of departure of the marriage party arrived. Sita was exceptionally dear to them. So they embraced her and consoled her in many ways, blessing her and teaching her what to do and how to behave in her new home with her in-laws. Refer also to “Janki Mangal”, verse no. 170.

These verses tell us what advice the queen-mothers gave Sita.

<sup>2</sup>The Guru of Sita after her marriage with Lord Ram would be sage Vasistha because he is the Guru of the royal family of Ayodhya.

<sup>3</sup>As we move on with this classical story, we read later on that when Sita met the wife of sage Atri named Anusuiya during her journey through the forest with her husband Lord Ram while he was spending fourteen years of time in forest exile, she was also advised by the learned hermitess that a woman who serves her husband faithfully and diligently is blessed with a long and happy life—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Doha no. 5 ‘ka’ along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 4-19.

In other words, serving the husband and being faithful to him is the sacrosanct rule for a married lady.]

अति सनेह बस सखीं सयानी । नारि धरम सिखवहिं मृदु बानी ॥ ६ ॥
 सादर सकल कुअँरि समुझाई । रानिन्ह बार बार उर लाई ॥ ७ ॥ बहुरि बहुरि भेटहिं महतारीं । कहहिं बिरंचि रचीं कत नारीं ॥ ८ ॥ ati sanēha basa sakhīm sayānī. nāri dharama sikhavahim mṛdu bānī. 6.

 sādara sakala ku'amṛi samujhā'īm. rāninha bāra bāra ura lā'īm. 7.
 bahuri bahuri bhēṭahim mahatārīm. kahahim birañci racīm kata nārīm. 8.

Sita's friends were also overwhelmed with emotions and affection for her. They also taught her sweetly the duties of a married woman and how she can be happy in her married life (like her mother had done earlier)<sup>1</sup>. (6)

All of them explained the various duties and norms of a married life to Sita as well as other princesses (i.e. Maandavi, Srutkirti and Urmila).

The queen-mothers repeatedly clasped the princesses (Sita and her other three sisters) to their bosoms as waves of love and emotions surged through their hearts for all of them (as this was the final time they were meeting their beloved daughters, and they did not know when this chance would come again in life). (7)

The mothers repeatedly met and embraced them (the four princesses) and lamented at the fate of a woman, exclaiming, 'Why did the creator Brahma ever create a woman (because one day she has to get married and leave her parental home and grieving parents for all times to come; she has to abandon her home and her acquaintances, leaving everyone in grief, to go and live with strangers in a new home to which she has to adjust herself against all odds)!'<sup>2</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A similar idea is expressed in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 102 while narrating the divine marriage of Lord Shiva with Parvati. At that time also, Parvati's mother and friends had taught her the customs of the society and family as well as norms of behaviour she should follow in her married life.

<sup>2</sup>A similar idea is expressed in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 102 while narrating the divine marriage of Lord Shiva with Parvati. At that time also, Parvati's mother had lamented at the fate of a woman who has leave her parent's home to go and live at her in-law's place which is quite alien to her.]

दो०. तेहि अवसर भाइन्ह सहित रामु भानु कुल केतु । चले जनक मंदिर मुदित बिदा करावन हेतु ॥ ३३४ ॥
 dōhā.

tēhi avasara bhā'inha sahita rāmu bhānu kula kētu.
 calē janaka mandira mudita bidā karāvana hētu. 334.

At that moment, Lord Ram, who is like the shining star of the solar race, accompanied by his brothers, cheerfully proceeded to the palace of king Janak to take permission from him to depart from Janakpur. (Doha no. 334)

चौ०. चारिउ भाइ सुभायँ सुहाए । नगर नारि नर देखन धाए ॥ १ ॥
 कोउ कह चलन चहत हहिं आजू । कीन्ह बिदेह बिदा कर साजू ॥ २ ॥
 लेहु नयन भरि रूप निहारी । प्रिय पाहुने भूप सुत चारी ॥ ३ ॥ को जानै केहिं सुकृत सयानी । नयन अतिथि कीन्हे बिधि आनी ॥ ४ ॥

caupāī.

cāri'u bhā'i subhāyam' suhā'ē. nagara nāri nara dēkhana dhā'ē. 1.
 kō'u kaha calana cahata hahim ājū. kīnha bidēha bidā kara sājū. 2.
 lēhu nayana bhari rūpa nihārī. priya pāhunē bhūpa suta cārī. 3.
 kō jānai kēhim sukr̥ta sayānī. nayana atithi kīnhē bidhi ānī. 4.

The people of the city of Janakpur, both the males as well as the females, ran out to see the four brothers who were naturally pleasing and charming to look at<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Someone in the crowd said—‘They want start on their return journey today, and this has become apparent because Janak has already prepared all the paraphernalia required to see the marriage party off and bid the four brothers good bye. [Besides this, he has already dispatched the advance party with marriage gifts etc. to Ayodhya.] (2)

So this is the ripe time for us to reap the rewards of seeing the beautiful image of the four brothers till our eyes are contented (because soon this chance would be lost forever). Indeed, these four noble sons of the great king (i.e. Lord Ram and his other brothers who were sons of king Dasrath) are like honoured guests for our eyes! (3)

Oh come to think of it dear friends, god knows what good deeds we have done that the creator Vidhi (who decides what rewards or punishments should be given to the creatures of this world) decided to bring them (the four brothers) to become the lovable guests-of-honour for our eyes.

[The citizens talked amongst themselves thus—“Just as one goes out of one’s way to serve an honourable guest, and no matter how good the service is the host always thinks that he could have done more to please the guest, let us show our greatest of affection, love and respect to these four noble brothers for the last time before their departure for their home by rushing out to meet them, exchanging pleasantries and greetings, and telling them to remember us forever. Let us have our eye-fill of their pleasant sight from up close, let’s get close and touch them and shake their hands to say good bye at the personal level, and if possible keep some souvenirs as token of our meeting them, to be kept as a cherished memorabilia for our own generation and for the next generations to come.”]<sup>2</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We have read in Doha no. 334 that the four brothers left the place where they were staying with their father Dasrath for the palace of king Janak to take formal permission from their in-laws to go back to their own kingdom of Ayodhya. Meanwhile, word had already spread that the marriage party was preparing to leave—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 333.

So when Lord Ram and his other three brothers came on the road leading to the royal palace of Janak, the citizens came out in hordes to have a look at them and if possible interact with them and say their good bye to them. The citizens knew by experience how obliging, kind, friendly and amiable Lord Ram and Laxman were, and also that their charismatic sight was exceedingly pleasing for the beholder's eyes because they had already met the two brothers when they had gone to visit the city when they arrived there with sage Vishwamitra—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 220—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 224.

The citizens also knew that the other two brothers, i.e. Bharat and Shatrughan, were similar to Lord Ram and Laxman in their charm and friendly nature—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-8 and Chanda line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 311.

The citizens therefore decided that when the four brothers were on their way to Janak's place, it was the most opportune moment and probably their last chance to meet them and say good bye—because later on there would be lot of royal formalities and observance of protocol which would prevent them from coming close to the brothers in an informal way and bid good bye to them at the personal level.

<sup>2</sup>As soon as the word was out that the marriage party was preparing to leave and Lord Ram and his brothers were going to take final leave from the royal household of Janak, the citizens poured out on the streets in hordes. The streets were literally flooded with them, a scene reminiscent of the time when Lord Ram and Laxman had gone to visit the city for the first time—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 220.

Lord Ram had won the heart and the mind of the entire citizenry of Janakpur with his charm-offensive so much so that he had become dearer to the citizens more than their own lives and families—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 221; and (ii) Doha no. 223.

At that time also the citizens had thanked their benevolent stars and the result of their good deeds that had made it possible for them to get an opportunity to have Lord Ram as the guest-of-honour for their eyes, for otherwise it was a distant dream for them—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 222.]

मरनसीलु जिमि पाव पिऊषा । सुरतरु लहै जनम कर भूखा ॥ ५ ॥

पाव नारकी हरिपदु जैसैं । इन्ह कर दरसनु हम कहँ तैसैं ॥ ६ ॥

निरखि राम सोभा उर धरहू । निज मन फनि मूरति मनि करहू ॥ ७ ॥

एहि बिधि सबहि नयन फलु देता । गए कुअँर सब राज निकेता ॥ ८ ॥ maranasīlu jimi pāva pi'ūṣā. surataru lahai janama kara bhūkhā. 5.

pāva nārakī haripadu jaisēm. inha kara darasanu hama kham' taisēm. 6.

nirakhi rāma sōbhā ura dharahū. nija mana phani mūrati mani karahū. 7.

ēhi bidhi sabahi nayana phalu dētā. da'ē ku'amra saba rāja nikētā. 8.

[These three verses give us an idea of the eagerness with which the citizens saw the charming image of Lord Ram, as well as the intensity of their longing for his image to be firmly enshrined in their hearts and etched in their memories for all times to come.]

Just as a dying person suddenly gets to drink the ambrosia of life; just as a person who has been hungry for a lifetime suddenly finds the evergreen tree of the gods that provides succulent fruits that fulfills all his desires [5];---

---Just as a sinful person destined to go to hell suddenly attains heaven and the exalted stature of the Lord's divine abode—similarly for us, the opportunity to have a divine sight of Lord Ram was unimaginable to have ever come true in this lifetime! [6] (5-6)

Therefore oh dear friends, watch Lord Ram closely and enshrine his beautiful image in your hearts, making it a 'Mani' (the serpent's gem) and your heart as a hooded serpent that closely guards this Mani.' (7)

On this wise, giving all the citizens the fruit (reward) of their eyes, the four princes went to the palace of the king (Janak—to seek permission from him to depart from the city of Janakpur and proceed to their own kingdom of Ayodhya). (8)

[Note—It is believed in mythology that there is a hooded serpent, and a luminescent sac, the size of a small gem or pearl, is present on its raised hood. This sac gives out light, and the serpent sees its way in the dark due to this light. This sac is filled with a gelly that is effervescent with light, and hence it is known as a 'Mani' because it is shaped like a precious gem, is self-illuminated like a gem, and is so precious for the serpent that it guards it with its life because it would be blind without it.

The citizens invoke this metaphor to emphasise that just as the Mani is very dear for the serpent who bears it, Lord Ram's divine image is also very dear for them, and just as the serpent would die if the Mani is stolen, they too would die if for some cause they happen to forget the divine Lord Ram.

The view of Lord Ram evoked undiluted love and devotion in the hearts and minds of the citizens of Janakpur. Their emotions were all the more intense and their fire of their love for Lord Ram so intensively stoked because the time of departure had arrived, and they did not know when they would get another chance to meet Lord Ram and interact with him in their lives. So they encourage each other to see him intensively for the last time and firmly etch his magnificent image in their hearts and minds so much so that it becomes a part of their beings, a part of their inner-self without which they would be virtually dismembered.

Another idea is that when a man is scorched by the heat of the sun, it is only then that he realizes the comfort that is got under the shade of a tree—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 69.

When Lord Ram was going to the forest during his 14-year exile, the villagers on the way had also rushed out to have a glimpse of Lord Ram, Sita and Laxman like the citizens of Janakpur here have done. All those who saw the Lord on the way to the forest then also expressed similar emotions of their being extremely lucky to have had the chance to see the Lord which they could not have imagined in their lives. There are countless verses to this effect in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand. For instance—(i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 89; (ii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 111; (iii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 113; (iv) Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that precede Doha no. 114; (v) Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 116; (vi) Doha no. 118 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 6-8; and (vii) Doha no. 122 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8.

The great sage Bharadwaj has asserted that “to have a chance to see Lord Ram, Laxman and Sita is the best fruit for all spiritual endeavours”—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 210.

Lord Ram was very gracious and obliging by nature. So he did not deny anyone the chance to have an eye-contact with him, if it was not possible for all the citizens to personally meet him and have a word with him. For those who could not come close due to the huge crowd, he waved his hands as a gesture of saying farewell. The gracious Lord made eye-contact with each individual, giving each person the benefit of feeling that Lord Ram has given him his personal attention. This was a charming initiative of the Lord that bowled-over all the citizens of Janakpur, and they would all cherish these wonderful moments that would remain carved in their memories for their lifetime. This ‘charm-initiative’ began when Lord Ram and Laxman had gone to visit Janakpur for the first time after they arrived in the city with sage Vishwamitra and it continues till this day.

The hungry and eager eyes of the love-struck citizens of Janakpur devoured each moment of their viewing of Lord Ram just in the way that a dying man eyes a pot of ambrosia of life, a hungry man the fruits of the evergreen tree of the gods, and the sinful man who is being dragged to hell, the gates of heaven—refer: Chaupai line nos. 5-7 herein above.]

दो०. रूप सिंधु सब बंधु लखि हरषि उठा रनिवासु । करहिं निछावरि आरती महा मुदित मन सासु ॥ ३३५ ॥

dōhā.

rūpa sindhu saba bandhu lakhi haraṣi uṭhā ranivāsu.
karahiṁ nichāvari āratī mahā mudita mana sāsu. 335.

As soon as the ladies of the royal household (of Janak) saw the four brothers, who were like oceans of beauty and charm, arrive, they got up excitedly, full of delight.

The mother-in-law (queen Sunayana) scattered gifts around the brothers and performed their Arti (i.e. she welcomed them by showering gifts and showing of lighted lamps which is a standard practice to welcome an honoured guest). (Doha no. 335)

चौ०. देखि राम छबि अति अनुरागीं । प्रेमबिबस पुनि पुनि पद लागीं ॥ १ ॥
रही न लाज प्रीति उर छाई । सहज सनेहु बरनि किमि जाई ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

dēkhi rāma chabi ati anurāgīṁ. prēmabibasa puni puni pada lāgīṁ. 1.
rahī na lāja prīti ura chāī. sahaja sanēhu barani kimi jāī. 2.

The more the mothers-in-law watched the beautiful image of Lord Ram, the more overwhelmed with love and affection they became, and were so much moved by their emotions that they repeatedly fell down at the holy feet of the Lord*. (1)

The love and affection for the Lord was so overpowering for them that this emotion clouded all their sense of protocol that they were expected to observe as queens in this mundane world, and the feeling of shyness virtually abandoned them. How is it possible to describe the natural affection and love for the Lord that surged in their inner-beings (which compelled them to shed all hesitation or inhibitions when they fell at Lord Ram's feet though they were his mothers-in-law and should have blessed him instead of touching his feet)? (2)

[Note—When one is overcome with love for anyone, all sense of rationality takes a back-seat. The queen-mothers knew that this was the last chance to meet Lord Ram, and they could not control their natural urge to fall at the Lord's feet as a mark of total surrender before the Lord, and hinting to the Lord that he should always be kind towards them and remember them as those who have sought his blessings.

There is another connotation in this gesture of falling at the feet of one's son-in-law. The mother-in-law, most humbly and pleadingly, requests her son-in-law by this gesture to be kind towards her daughter who is now the latter's wife but is unaccustomed to his ways of life. So he must be kind towards the innocent girl, and overlook as well as forgive all the mistakes that she may make in life. In effect, the mother-in-law pleads to the groom on behalf of her daughter to be kind towards the latter.

Now, another interesting thing to note is that though it is not specifically mentioned in the verses that the mothers-in-law were more charmed by Lord Ram as compared to his other brothers, but elsewhere in Ram Charit Manas it has been expressly affirmed that though the four brothers were equally lovable, but Lord Ram was more so, and he was like an ocean of bliss, beatitude, felicity and happiness—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 198.

When one is overcome with positive emotions for someone, and develops an immense sense of honour and respect for him, one would like to express his appreciation and sense of adoration by repeatedly undertaking gestures that would show how happy and joyous one feels by meeting the object of his admiration. Embracing, holding hands, or falling at the feet are some of the ways of expressing the sense of excessive happiness and joy. One 'repeats' the gestures again and again to tell the object of one's adoration that doing it once is not enough, and so one wishes to repeat it over and over again.

There are other instances in Ram Charit Manas where one has fallen repeatedly at the feet of Lord Ram to express the immensity of happiness and gratitude as well as the feeling of blessedness at meeting the Lord—refer: Ram Charit Manas—(i) Baal Kand, Chanda line no. 15 that precedes Doha no. 211 where Ahilya has repeatedly fallen at the holy feet of Lord Ram; (ii) Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 49 that tells us Vibhishan, the brother of Ravana, the demon king of Lanka, has fallen repeatedly at the feet of the Lord when the latter had granted him refuge.

Sometimes it has happened that the devotee has fallen at the feet of Lord Ram and clasped it so affectionately that in spite of repeated attempts the Lord could not lift him from the ground—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 33 which describes how Hanuman has clasped the Lord's feet, and the Lord repeatedly trying to lift him but Hanuman refuses to get up.

*We shall read later on the story that when Lord Ram had gone to his mother Kaushalya to seek her permission to go to the forest, she has also fallen at the Lord's feet and clasped it—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 57. But that was a time of sorrow and Kaushalya had fell at the Lord's feet in distress as compared to the Lord's mothers-in-law who fall at his feet out of joy in the present verse.

Refer also to: "Janki Mangal", verse no. 165.]

भाइन्ह सहित उबटि अन्हवाए । छरस असन अति हेतु जेवाँए ॥ ३ ॥
 बोले रामु सुअवसरु जानी । सील सनेह सकुचमय बानी ॥ ४ ॥
 राउ अवधपुर चहत सिधाए । बिदा होन हम इहाँ पठाए ॥ ५ ॥ मातु मुदित मन आयसु देहू । बालक जानि करब नित नेहू ॥ ६ ॥ bhā'inha sahita ubaṭi anhavā'ē. charasa asana ati hētu jēvāmē. 3.

 bōlē rāmu su'avasaru jānī. sīla sanēha sakucamaya bānī. 4.
 rā'u avadhapura cahata sidhā'ē. bidā hōna hama ihām' paṭhā'ē. 5.
 mātu mudita mana āyasu dēhū. bālaka jāni karaba nita nēhū. 6.

The four brothers were given ceremonial bath by first rubbing cosmetics on their bodies and then washing it off with scented water. Then they were affectionately entertained by serving them mouth-watering dishes having all the six types of tastes<sup>1</sup>. (3)

As soon as he got an opportunity, Lord Ram spoke sweetly, in a tone indicating extreme courteousness and affection but hesitant in nature, because the Lord was well aware that what he was about to say would not be something that his audience, i.e. his in-laws, would like to hear and welcome<sup>2</sup>. (4)

He requested his mothers-in-law—'The king (our father Dasrath) wishes to leave for his kingdom of Ayodhya, and he has sent us to take leave from you<sup>3</sup>. (5)

So oh mothers, please grant us permission with a cheerful mind to leave. Treat us like your own children<sup>4</sup>, and have an enduring affection for us.' (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer note of Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 329 herein above. This was the first time the four grooms have gone to meet their mothers-in-law. It is customary for the mother-in-law to feed her son-in-law when he comes to meet her for the first time after marriage.

As we shall note below in verse nos. 4-6, the mothers-in-law were not yet aware that the four brothers have come to seek permission to leave for Ayodhya. They thought that they have come to pay a routine courtesy call. So, the mothers-in-law asked to take their baths and get fresh, and then they fed the four grooms with the choicest of delectable dishes.

<sup>2</sup>This is proved in verse no. 7 that follow herein below.

Lord Ram was of a very decent, amiable and kind nature, as well as good mannered. So, whenever he had to speak he was careful to be sweet and courteous as much as possible. This is clear in the entire episode of sage Parashuram at the time of the breaking of the bow as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 271—to Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 283. Lord Ram had even admonished his younger brother Laxman and asked him to refrain from answering back to the sage when Laxman had shown his annoyance at the angry outburst of Parashuram—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 278.

Then later on in the story we shall read that when the Lord found that his step-mother Kaikeyi was fretting and fuming for sending him to forest exile and his father was overcome with sorrows and dilemma, he had shown exemplary self-control and spoke very politely to both of them, even comforting his own mother Kaushalya in most polite terms to bear with the circumstances for some time. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 40; (ii) from Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 41—to Doha no. 42; (iii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 43; (iv) from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 45—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 46; (v) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 53.

Still later on we read that Lord Ram was full of hesitation when he was faced with the prospect of having to resolutely refuse to go back to Ayodhya at the time when Bharat and the rest of the assembly had been insisting on the Lord's return from the forest during the conclave held at Chitrakoot—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 313.

<sup>3</sup>As noted in verse no. 3 above, this is the first time the queens came to know that the four brothers have come to seek permission to leave for their home, the kingdom of Ayodhya.

<sup>4</sup>A mother has natural love for her children, and she treats them equally. Lord Ram spoke on the behalf of all his brothers, and it was a polite way of saying that just as the queen mothers had been treating all the four princesses equally, they should also treat their four sons-in-law equally, with equal affection. This was a polite way of exchanging pleasantries before saying a final good bye to their mothers-in-law.]

सुनत बचन बिलखेउ रनिवासू । बोलि न सकहिं प्रेमबस सासू ॥ ७ ॥

हृदयँ लगाइ कुअँरि सब लीन्ही । पतिन्ह सौँपि बिनती अति कीन्ही ॥ ८ ॥ sunata bacana bilakhē'u ranivāsū. bōli na sakahim prēmabasa sāsū. 7.

hrdayam'lagā'i ku'am̐ri saba līnhī. patinha saumpi binatī ati kīnhī. 8.

As soon as they heard these words (that the beloved grooms were leaving), the ladies of the royal household were extremely distressed. The mothers-in-law were so overwhelmed with emotions of love and affection that they were dumb-founded, unable to speak a word.<sup>1</sup> (7)

They (the queen mothers) embraced all the four princesses, and while affectionately handing them over to their respective husbands they respectfully prayed to them (or made humble submission to the four brothers).<sup>2</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The ladies of the royal household of king Janak were distressed because they won't get a chance to see and interact with the four brothers, and especially with Lord Ram, again. It must be remembered that in olden times, communication was difficult, and once the bride went to her husband's place, she almost had to snap her contacts with her parents who lived far away. It was not common that the bridegroom would visit his in-laws place too often, and such a visit was usually a rare occurrence, taking place on some very special occasion. This separation of a girl from her parents was permanent, and obviously the moment when she would depart with her husband for his home was a moment of great sadness and grief on the part of her parents. This sadness and grief was more marked in the present case as Lord Ram had made himself very dear to one and all in Janakpur, so much so that the very thought of his going away pained the citizens and members of king Janak's family in a way similar to a dear son going away to a distant land from his father's place. The going away of Lord Ram was effectually more painful to all than was the grief of separation from Sita and her sisters.

The mothers-in-law however were overcome with emotions of love because they treated the four brothers as their 'sons'. We have already seen in the previous verse no. 6 that Lord Ram has asked the mothers-in-law, the queens, to treat him and his brothers as their children.

The ladies of the city as well as the royal household had a different attitude towards Lord Ram and his brothers as compared to the queen mothers: whereas the queen mothers treated the four brothers as their 'sons' because they were married to their daughters, the other ladies obviously would not do so. These ladies were charmed by the magnetic personality of the Lord and his brothers, and they now regretted that they would be denied the opportunity of frequent interaction with them once they leave Janakpur.

<sup>2</sup>Refer also to: "Janki Mangal", verse nos. 167-168, and Chanda no. 21 in this context. After the wedding ceremony was over, the grooms went to the place where the marriage party was lodged, and the brides came back to their palace. What the mother-in-law said is narrated below.]

छं०. करि बिनय सिय रामहि समरपी जोरि कर पुनि पुनि कहै । १ ।
बलि जाउँ तात सुजान तुह कहूँ बिदित गति सब की अहै ॥ २ ॥
परिवार पुरजन मोहि राजहि प्रानप्रिय सिय जानिबी । ३ ।
तुलसीस सीलु सनेहु लखि निज किंकरी करि मानिबी ॥ ४ ॥

chanda.

kari binaya siya rāmahī samarapī jōri kara puni puni kahai. 1.
bali jā'um̐ tāta sujāna tumha kahum̐ bidita gati saba kī ahai. 2.
parivāra purajana mōhi rājahi prānapriya siya jānibī. 3.
tulasīsa sīlu sanēhu lakhi nija kiṅkarī kari mānibī. 4.

The queen-mother Sunayana joined her palms as a token of submission and great respect for Lord Ram, submitted Sita to him and earnestly prayed to him repeatedly (i.e. she repeated her submission and request again and again) [Chanda line no. 1],---

--- ‘Oh my dear son (“tāta”), I submit myself before your honourable self (“bali jā’um’ sujāna”), and I understand that you know what I wish to speak and what is in my mind as you know the inner feelings and thoughts of all living beings (“bidita gati saba kī ahai”). [Chanda line no. 2]

You may know that Janki (Sita) is dearer than life for all of us—for our entire family, all the citizens of Janakpur, myself, as well as the king (Janak).

[In other words, Since you, oh my dear son-in-law Sri Ram, know the inner thoughts and feelings of all living beings because you are all-knowing and omniscient, it is sure that you are also aware of the amount of love and affection we all have for Sita; she is very dear to all of us.] [Chanda line no. 3]

Therefore, oh Lord of Tulsidas (tulasīsa)<sup>1</sup>, have love for her and be courteous to her, and treating her as your maid (kiṅkarī), you should forgive all her shortcomings and mistakes<sup>2</sup>.’ [Chanda line no. 4] (Chanda line nos. 1-4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>There is a clever play of words here, and this verse also clearly shows that the events that are being narrated here by poet-author of this classical story, Goswami Tulsidas, are in the way he visualised them on the canvas of his mind. It is obvious that Sunayana cannot refer to Lord Ram as the “lord of Tulsidas”—for the simple reason that Tulsidas wasn’t even born then!

Tulsidas uses this opportunity to stress that his Lord, Sri Ram, is very gracious and benevolent upon him; the Lord forgives all misdemeanours of Tulsidas and overlooks his mistakes. That is why the queen-mother refers to him to stress upon Lord Ram to be gracious and benevolent towards Sita just like he has been towards his ‘servant’ (“Daas”) named Tulsi (“Tulsi + Daas” = Tulsidas).

But the play on the word ‘Tulsi’ also has another connotation: ‘Tulsi’ is the Hindi word for the Basil plant which is very dear to Lord Vishnu, and there is a legendary story behind it which says that when Lord Vishnu had to cheat the chaste wife named Brinda of the demon named Jaalandhar so as to kill him, she had cursed the Lord to become a stone. So Lord Vishnu transformed into the Shaaligram stone which is like a rounded pebble. But instead of getting angry at Brinda for cursing him, he realised that she was right to be angry at him, and so the Lord blessed her that she would always accompany him in the form of a leave of the Basil plant. Thus, it is said that all forms of offerings to Lord Vishnu are sanctified only when leaves of Tulsi plant are added to them because Tulsi is dearer to Vishnu than anything else.

In other words, Lord Vishnu became the eternal ‘Lord of Tulsi’ ever since the event narrated above. And since Lord Ram is an incarnation of Lord Vishnu, mother Sunayana invokes this incident to remind him that he must love Sita with the same affection and eternal commitment with which Lord Vishnu had accepted Tulsi.

<sup>2</sup>We shall read later on in the story that Lord Ram has declared that he loves his ‘sevak’ more than anyone or anything else—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 16. The word “sevak” literally means a servant who selflessly serves the Lord, but for all practical purposes it refers to a devotee of the Lord and one who has submitted oneself before the Lord so much so that he or she has no other succour and refuge anywhere in this world.

Now, for a married woman her husband is the only Lord whom she should serve diligently and be loyal to. Sita was totally devoted and submitted to her dear husband Lord Ram, and therefore the Lord was obliged to shower all his affection and attention upon her.

The word “kiṅkarī” means a maid, but it’s a simple literal meaning. The idea is that Sita would serve her lord Sri Ram as faithfully, honestly, sincerely and diligently as a loyal maid serves her master. So therefore it would be obligatory for the Lord to reciprocate her emotions and reward her for services by being very kind, gracious, forgiving and compassionate towards her, overlooking her shortcomings and mistakes and giving her so much love and affection that she does not miss her parents and family members.

By saying that Sita is loved by all the citizens of Janakpur as much as she is loved by her close family members, mother Sunayana wishes to request Lord Ram that he should treat her with so much kindness and show public respect and affection for her so that the citizens of Ayodhya begin to respect her and treat her with her with the greatest of dignity and honour.

This request was essential—for it indirectly hinted to Lord Ram that there may arise some instances in life when unfortunately he may be annoyed with Sita for any reason whatsoever, but he should never publicly display his annoyance at her because the subjects of the kingdom would pick a wrong hint and begin to show disrespect to Sita. Instead, the Lord should politely tell her what he didn’t like about her so that she can mend her ways.

Refer also to: “Janki Mangal”, verse nos. 167-168, and Chanda no. 21 in this context.]

सो०. तुह परिपूरन काम जान सिरोमनि भावप्रिय ।

जन गुन गाहक राम दोष दलन करुनायतन ॥ ३३६ ॥

sōraṭhā.

tumha paripūrana kāma jāna sirōmani bhāvapriya.
jana guna gāhaka rāma dōṣa dalana karunāyatana. 336.

[Sunayana continues with her prayerful submission—]

‘You are eternally self-contented and fulfilled. [That is, even the smallest service that Sita would render to you would make you happy with her, I am sure of that. You do not have an un-ending train of desires that would be difficult for her to fulfill. In the broader perspective, even the smallest service your devotees render upon you is sufficient to please you.]

You are the most exalted amongst the wise and knowledgable. [I do not intend to preach you or give advice to you because you know more than I can ever advice. But still it is out of affection that I am saying all this. Being the Lord of creation you are also the lord of all knowledge that is present in this creation.]

You are only attracted by positive emotions of affection, love and devotion. [The best way to please you is to have love and devotion for you. You cannot be pleased by material wealth or external pretensions of any kind because you are all-knowing and omniscient, and therefore can’t be cheated. It is only the virtue of having positive emotions of affection, love and devotion that sprouts in one’s heart that can please you.]

You pay attention to and consider only the good points in your devotees and followers (“Jana”). [That is, you value the good qualities, characters, behaviour and deeds of your devotees, and neglect their shortcomings and faults. This nature of yours makes it possible for you to be always kind with your followers, and never be angry or annoyed with them because you don't pay attention to their shortcomings and misdemeanours.]

You eliminate or eradicate the negative qualities, the weaknesses and the shortcomings in your devotees and followers. [That is, you do not condone their negativities and misdemeanours, but instead of getting irritated and cruelly punishing them you endeavour to initiate measures to improve your devotees and followers so as to bring about a complete transformation in them and help them overcome evil to become noble souls. Therefore I am sure that even if my beloved daughter Sita has any shortcomings or faults, you will help her to overcome them and become perfect in life, instead of getting angry at her.]

Oh Lord, indeed you are an abode of mercy and compassion. [And therefore I am certain that you will be merciful and compassionate towards Sita.]' (Sortha/Doha no. 336)

[Note—Refer also to Tulsidas' book "Janki Mangal", verse nos. 167-168 and Chanda no. 21 which summarise what has been said in these verses.]

चौ०. अस कहि रही चरन गहि रानी । प्रेम पंक जनु गिरा समानी ॥ १ ॥

सुनि सनेहसानी बर बानी । बहुबिधि राम सासु सनमानी ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

asa kahi rahī carana gahi rānī. prēma pañka janū girā samānī. 1.
suni sanēhasānī bara bānī. bahubidhi rāma sāsū sanamānī. 2.

Saying so, the queen (i.e. the mother-in-law of Lord Ram, queen-mother Sunayana) remained clinging to the feet of Lord Ram (i.e. she did not get up but remained sitting on the floor, clasping the holy feet of the Lord)<sup>1</sup>. It appeared that her voice was lost in the quicksand of love and affection for the Lord<sup>2</sup>. (1)

Lord Ram realised that the queen had become overwhelmed with emotions when he heard her utter words that were soaked in love and affections. So he reassured her in many ways, honoured her and comforted her.<sup>3</sup> (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This verse concludes the narration that commenced in Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 336 which essentially says that the queen had fallen at the feet of Lord Ram because she was overwhelmed with love and affection for the Lord when she saw his bewitchingly beautiful form.

We have read in the previous verses, Chanda line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 336 herein above that the queen-mother had lovingly prayed to Lord Ram and handed over Sita to him. After saying one's prayer, the worshipper bows at the feet of the deity, or in more mundane terms, the petitioner bows before the master or lord to whom he has submitted his petition in order to express his humility and to impress upon the master or the lord that he, the petitioner, has surrendered himself before the latter and expects graceful consideration of his petition, that his request may please be accepted.

When the petitioner submits himself before the master or the lord by bowing before him or falling at his feet and clasping it, the master or the lord develops a soft feeling for the petitioner and feels morally obliged to reciprocate the gracious gestures of the petitioner by accommodating the latter and honouring his requests as far as it is possible and feasible to do so, at least on compassionate grounds, if nothing else.

In general terms, falling at the feet of someone, touching his feet or bowing before him are gestures of humility that not only express great respect on the part of the petitioner for the master or the lord, but also a high degree of earnestness and expectation with which one has made the request that accompanies these gestures so much so that it becomes difficult for the senior person, before whom the junior has submitted himself, to neglect the request and not oblige the petitioner, no matter what the petition is about.

Refer also to “Janki Mangal”, verse no. 165-166.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 336 herein above. Here also we find that the queen had become speechless when she learnt that the grooms and their marriage party were planning to return home to Ayodhya.

<sup>3</sup>The queen-mother’s throat was so choked with emotions that she could not perhaps say anything clearly and articulately, except to make some guttural words that may have been incoherent and incomprehensible. But Lord Ram was very wise and he realised what the situation was. He could fathom the pain and grief in the heart of the queen because the time for saying good-bye has arrived, and this meant that the queen-mother would have to suffer the agony of separation from her beloved daughter Sita.

In those days when there were no communication facilities such as the telephone or the mail service as they exist today, once the daughter went away after marriage it meant that her family members would lose contact with her for the rest of her life. So, the queen-mother’s heart felt very sad and heavy that the time for saying good-bye to her beloved daughter Sita has finally arrived. Therefore, the queen was overcome with grief and sorrow when she heard that Lord Ram and the rest of the marriage party were leaving—because that meant that Sita would have to go as well. As a mother, this very thought was very painful for her.

Lord Ram realised her dilemma and the sadness of her heart. She could not say “no, don’t go”, and at the same time she would have preferred that the Lord as well as Sita continued to stay at Janakpur. No clear, articulately spoken words were needed to explain the situation to him, to tell him how despondent and forlorn the queen-mother was feeling during those moments. So, Lord Ram spoke very affectionately with his mother-in-law, showed her his greatest respect as a reciprocating gesture for her own expression of love and respect for the Lord, and reassured her that her request that Sita be well looked after and given lots of love will be fully honoured and respected. Remember, this is what the queen had wished—refer: Baal Kand, Chanda line nos. 1-4 that precedes Doha no. 336 herein above.

So in essence Lord Ram reassured his mother-in-law that she need not worry at all for Sita and her welfare, and that Sita will be given full respect and honour in her in-law’s home as she was being given in her parent’s home.]

राम बिदा मागत कर जोरी । कीन्ह प्रनामु बहोरि बहोरी ॥ ३ ॥

पाइ असीस बहुरि सिरु नाई । भाइन्ह सहित चले रघुराई ॥ ४ ॥

rāma bidā māgata kara jōrī. kīnha pranāmu bahōri bahōrī. 3.
pā'i asīsa bahuri siru nā'ī. bhā'inha sahita calē raghurā'ī. 4.

Lord Ram joined his palms as a sign of showing respect and bowed repeatedly before his mother-in-law (the queen-mother Sunayana), requesting her to give him (and his other brothers) permission to leave for home (i.e. for Ayodhya). (3)

He received her blessings (as well as permission), and bowed once again before her as he, along with his brothers, finally took leave of her. (4)

[Note—Lord Ram was the eldest of the four brothers, so he spoke on their behalf. It is not that the other brothers did not show gestures of respect by bowing or joining their palms before their mothers-in-law, queen Sunayana and her sister-queen, the consort of Kushdhwaj, the younger brother of king Janak, but since Lord Ram was the eldest of them it is he who has been named here in these verses to represent all of them.

We have read earlier in Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes these verses that Lord Ram had shown his respect to queen Sunayana in various ways when she had brought and handed over Sita to him. Repetition of such gestures is done to lay stress on one's enduring respect and honour for the other person; it is a method to show great and sincere courteousness for the person being honoured.

We have also read in Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 336 that Lord Ram had requested the queen to treat him, and by inference all his other brothers, as her son, and therefore always have love for them in her heart. Now verse nos. 3-4 build-up on these emotions and say that not only did the four brothers showed their respects to the queen-mother, their mother-in-law, like they would have shown to their own mother, but she too reciprocated by blessing them abundantly.]

मंजु मधुर मूरति उर आनी । भई सनेह सिथिल सब रानी ॥ ५ ॥

पुनि धीरजु धरि कुअँरि हँकारी । बार बार भेटहिं महतारीं ॥ ६ ॥ manju madhura mūrati ura ānī. bha'īm sanēha sithila saba rānī. 5.

puni dhīraju dhari ku'amri hamkā'rīm. bāra bāra bhēṭahīm mahatārīm. 6.

All the queens (the chief queen-mother Sunayana, and her sister-queens such as the wife of Kushdhwaj, the younger brother of king Janak) watched the charming form of Lord Ram, and as they lovingly enshrined this image in their hearts, they became benumbed and overcome with emotion.<sup>1</sup> (5)

Then the queen-mothers recovered themselves and called the princesses (Sita and her sister as well as her cousins—i.e. Urmila, Mandavi and Sukriti respectively), and repeatedly embraced them affectionately (for the last time before their departure with their husbands for their in-law's place).<sup>2</sup> (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Ram was so charming and handsome to look at, with such a magnetic personality that anyone who once saw the Lord became mesmerised by him. Earlier we have read that when Sita and other friends of hers had seen Lord Ram in the royal garden of Janakpur, they too were enchanted by the Lord's beauty and charm so much so that Sita had closed her eyes as a subtle gesture of installing the Lord's image in the temple of her heart and closing the door shut so that this image remains present inside for all times to come. For outsiders it appeared that Sita was meditating upon the form of Lord Ram as she stood motionless with her eyes shut, oblivious of her surroundings and the passage of time so much so that the girls who accompanied her became alarmed at her behaviour, and had to cajole her to wake up and finish the worship of goddess Parvati for which she was sent by her mother to the garden temple. This entire episode is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 232—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 235.

So there is no wonder now that the queens too were fascinated by the Lord's exceptional charm.

Refer also to “Janki Mangal”, verse no. 165.

<sup>2</sup>Refer also to “Janki Mangal”, Chanda no. 21.

This verse reflects on the narration in Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede Doha no. 334 above that basically say that as soon as the news spread that the marriage party was making preparations to leave for Ayodhya, the queen-mothers called Sita and expressed their enduring love for her, teaching her the customs of the family and the basic norms of behaviour that she should follow at her in-law's place.

Now the time has come to bid the final good-bye, and so the queen-mothers repeatedly embrace Sita and her sisters for one last time. Their hearts were heavy from the pain of separation, but this pain had to be endured because the married princesses had to go away with their grooms.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4, 7-8 and Chanda line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 102 which tell us how Parvati, the newly wed bride of Lord Shiva, and her mother had repeatedly embraced each other at the time of departure of the marriage party of Lord Shiva.]

पहुँचावहिं फिरि मिलहिं बहोरी । बढी परस्पर प्रीति न थोरी ॥ ७ ॥

पुनि पुनि मिलत सखिन्ह बिलगाई । बाल बच्छ जिमि धेनु लवाई ॥ ८ ॥ pahumcāvahim phiri milahim bahōrī. barhī paraspara prīti na thōrī. 7.

puni puni milata sakhinha bilagāī. bāla baccha jimi dhēnu lavāī. 8.

The mothers escorted them (the grooms and their brides) for some distance, turned back to return, demurred and hesitated (because they could not bear with the pain of separation from their beloved daughters), went back to meet and embrace their daughters again and again, and this continued to happen repeatedly for quite some time. Mutual affection and love for each other went on increasing with each passing moment, and there was no measurement of it. (7)

When the lady friends (of Sita as well as of the queens) saw this happening repeatedly (and they discovered that the queens are finding it extremely difficult to turn back and bid good-bye to the princesses because they were overwhelmed with love and grief of separation), they intervened and politely separated the mothers from their daughters, which was like separating a cow from her young calf. [Just as the cow needs some force to be applied and a lot of cajoling if she is to be separated from her calf which is being taken away by someone to be kept and looked after at his own place, the lady friends used polite force as well as a lot of cajoling and persuasion to separate the grieving mothers from their daughters.] (8)

[Note—A similar situation prevailed when Parvati was married to Lord Shiva. At that time also Parvati's mother had repeatedly embraced her, and during the final moments of separation Parvati had repeatedly turned back to glance at her grieving mother—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4, 7-8 and Chanda line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 102.]

दो०. प्रेमबिबस नर नारि सब सखिन्ह सहित रनिवासु ।
मानहुँ कीन्ह बिदेहपुर करुनाँ बिरहँ निवासु ॥ ३३७ ॥

dōhā.

prēmabibasa nara nāri saba sakhinha sahita ranivāsu.
mānahum' kīnha bidēhapura karunām' biraham' nivāsu. 337.

During those moments of departure of the princesses with their grooms, all the men and women as well as the friends of the princesses and other members of the female quarters of the royal household became overcome with emotions of love and grief of separation. It appeared that the city of Videhapur (which was another name of Janakpur) was indeed an abode of grief, pain and agony that comes from being separated by one's beloved. (Doha no. 337)

[Note—Refer also to “Janki Mangal”, Chanda no. 22.

The word “Videha” literally means a situation when one becomes unaware of the senses of the body. This is a clever play with words by the author Tulsidas. He means that the entire city of Janakpur, the city of king Janak, was so overwhelmed with grief and sorrow of separation that came with the four princesses going away forever with their grooms after their marriage that all the city's inhabitants became numb and unable to think of anything. They moved around as if in a daze, forlorn, remorseful and heavy at heart, unconcerned about their surroundings and their own affairs. The overriding emotion now was one of intense sadness, gloom, despondency and despair which replaced the joyous atmosphere of a few hours back, prior to the declaration that the marriage party was packing up to leave, when the city was full of merriment and rejoicings.

Separation from Lord Ram was a prospect that made anyone who came in contact with him even once, sad, gloomy, distressed and despondent. The citizens of Janakpur had been enjoying interaction with the Lord for quite sometime now, and when the time came that the Lord will have to leave for Ayodhya, the citizens became very sad. Refer also to Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 333 above.

This situation was not limited to the citizens of Janakpur, for even the subjects of the Lord's own kingdom loved him so dearly that when the Lord had to go to forest to spend some of his days in exile, the people of the city of Ayodhya too had been dazed into numbness, and had spent their days gloomily, going about their daily chores like a puppet, not taking interest in anything and remaining submerged in the thoughts of the Lord on a perpetual basis—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, from Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 83—to Doha no. 86.

We find the same situation repeat itself once again in Chitrakoot when Lord Ram persuaded Bharat not to force the Lord to return to Ayodhya but wait patiently till the time of the Lord's forest exile ended in the next 14 years, and Bharat and his party took their leave of the Lord and started on their way back to Ayodhya. All the people were walking like a puppet and were in a state of utter distress and absolute despondency—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 320; (ii) Doha no. 322 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-2.]

चौ०. सुक सारिका जानकी ज्याए । कनक पिंजरन्हि राखि पढ़ाए ॥ १ ॥
 व्याकुल कहहिं कहाँ बैदेही । सुनि धीरजु परिहरइ न केही ॥ २ ॥
 भए बिकल खग मृग एहि भाँती । मनुज दसा कैसें कहि जाती ॥ ३ ॥
 caupāī.

suka sārīkā jānakī jyā'ē. kanaka pinjaranhi rākhi parhā'ē. 1.
 byākula kahahim kahām' baidēhī. suni dhīraju parihara'i na kēhī. 2.
 bha'ē bikala khaga mṛga ēhi bhām'tī. manuja dasā kaisēm kahi jā'tī. 3.

Sita had affectionately reared a pair of birds, a parrot and a maina bird, whom she had kept in a golden cage and had taught them to speak. When these two birds learnt that Sita was going away, they were extremely perturbed and agonised. [This is because, being caged, they could not do anything, they could fly out and accompany Sita on her journey away from home. The poor birds could only flutter madly inside their cage, utterly distressed and flabbergasted at having to see Sita going away and leaving them alone to forcefully face a bleak future without their patron princess. They did not understand what the reason was, but were hopping madly to be let off so that they can fly along with Sita to wherever she was going.] (1)

The two helpless and hapless birds cried out in dismay—‘Where is the daughter of Videha (i.e. Sita)?’ Their soulful cries were so sad and lamentful that whoever heard them felt extremely despondent and gloomy<sup>1</sup>. (2)

Why, when even the birds and animals became so distressed, sad and gloomy at the prospect of having to live without Sita, one cannot imagine the condition of human beings—the immensity of their sadness, distress and despondency, as well as their sense of helplessness. [They were all feeling an utter sense of ‘helplessness’ because a daughter is bound to go away to her husband's home after marriage, and this is an age-old tradition which cannot be avoided. The citizens and other inhabitants of Janakpur were ‘helpless’ that they cannot make Sita stay with them after marriage though they all wanted it to be so.] (3)

[Note—Refer also to “Janki Mangal”, Chanda no. 21, stanza line nos. 3-4.

When we move ahead in our reading of this epic story we shall read that when Lord Ram, Sita and Laxman had reached the banks of river Ganges on their to the forest and made their charioteer Sumant return back to Ayodhya, a similar situation prevailed because the horses of the chariot neighed agonisingly and cried in grave distress when they were forced to turn back with the chariot after leaving the Lord for his onwards journey into the wild forest—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 99 and Chaupai line no. 1 that follow it.

The main idea of these verses is that when animals and birds were so extremely distressed at being forced to separate themselves from Lord Ram and Sita, their loving patrons, one can imagine the pain in the hearts of human beings who are more sensitive and emotional by nature as compared to the birds and animals who are lowly creatures in the hierarchy of evolution.

<sup>1</sup>A question arises here—what happened to these birds; were they taken by Sita to her new home at Ayodhya or not? Though it is not expressly mentioned here, but in all probability the answer is ‘yes’, she did. This is because we read a little later that her father king Janak had sent all her favourite attendants, both males and females, along with her at the time of her departure for Ayodhya with the marriage party—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precede Doha no. 339. Hence it is easy to deduce that the king had also gifted these two birds to Sita because she had fondly raised them herself.]

बंधु समेत जनकु तब आए । प्रेम उमगि लोचन जल छाए ॥ ४ ॥
सीय बिलोकि धीरता भागी । रहे कहावत परम बिरागी ॥ ५ ॥
लीन्हि रायँ उर लाइ जानकी । मिटी महामरजाद ग्यान की ॥ ६ ॥ bandhu samēta janaku taba ā'ē. prēma umagi lōcana jala chā'ē. 4.

sīya bilōki dhīratā bhāgī. rahē kahāvata parama birāgī. 5.
līnhi rāyam'ura lā'i jānakī. mīṭī mahāmarajāda gyāna kī. 6.

Then (i.e. when the four brothers had left the female quarters of the royal palace, accompanied by their respective brides), king Janak came alongside his brother (Kushdhwaj).

When he saw them (Lord Ram and Sita especially), love and affection surged in his heart and tears filled his eyes.<sup>1</sup> (4)

[But the Lord's "Maya", or his powers of enchanting is so great and powerful that even the otherwise neutral and dispassionate king Janak became a victim of emotions of sadness and grief at the separation from his daughter Sita as narrated in these four verses, nos. 5-8. For some fleeting moments he forgot who he was, and who Sita really was—i.e. that he was a hermit-king immune to worldly relations, and that Sita was a personified form of goddess Laxmi who had simply come to his home to oblige him. No one is anyone's father, and no one is anybody's daughter!]

When Janak saw Sita, his famed patience abandoned him and he forgot about his reputation of being self-restrained and a controller of emotions. He forgot for once about his vows of renunciation, that he is renowned for his sense of detachment and dispassion, because at this moment (when he saw and met Sita) emotions held the better of him and took him virtually a hostage. (5)

Janak affectionately embraced Janki (Sita, his daughter), and for some moments his mind and wisdom took leave of him, leaving him sentimental and submerged in emotions of love and affections that in turn created a sense of agony of separation in his heart because his dearest daughter Sita would now go away far from him.<sup>2</sup> (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It is important to note that Janak was a highly enlightened and self-realised king of his time. Remember: When he had first seen Lord Ram at the time of sage Vishwamitra's arrival at Janakpur, at that time too Janak's heart had melted at the sight of the Lord and he had acknowledged this fact openly when he asked the sage the reason why this has happened because he was a hermit at heart and not easily moved by anyone's charm. So therefore he argued that there must be something special with Lord Ram and he was sure that the Lord was not a mere human prince as he appears to be for others—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 215—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 216.

Janak was not moved by worldly charms as he was immune to delusions and grosser aspects of the eclectic virtue of 'beauty'. It was the divinity of Lord Ram that evoked such strong emotions of love in him as to make his eyes get filled with tears and his body become thrilled—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 286.]

<sup>2</sup>Janak was a wise and enlightened king, and he knew very well that a daughter is bound to go away from her parent's home after marriage. He should be rather happy that she has found such a brilliant and glorious groom, and this was a happy occasion when the bride was being escorted to her husband's home, not a moment to lament or grieve. In other words, ideally speaking, there was no reason why Janak should weep and lament, but this is the irony of life and a showcase of the stupendity of the Lord's "Maya" that compels even the highly wise and enlightened of men, such as Janak in this case, to lose his patience, wisdom and powers of reasoning for sometime and act like an ordinary man who is indulgent in the gross world, who gets trapped in and jostled by its numerous tugs and pulls, is buffeted by its countless attractions and charms, its sorrows and joys, and so on.

So, for once, Janak behaved like an ordinary man—when he saw Sita, he lost control over himself, became emotional, and affectionately embraced her as grief of separation overtook him.

A similar situation has prevailed at Chitrakoot when Janak met Sita in the attire of a forest-dwelling hermitress—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that precede Doha no. 286.]

समुझावत सब सचिव सयाने । कीन्ह बिचारु न अवसर जाने ॥ ७ ॥
बारहिं बार सुता उर लाई । सजि सुंदर पालकीं मगाई ॥ ८ ॥ samujhāvata saba saciva sayānē. kīnha bicāru na avasara jānē. 7.

bārahim bāra sutā ura lā'īm. saji sundara pālakīm magā'īm. 8.

All the wise ministers and advisors of the king consoled him and gave him wise council. The king then realised that it was not the opportunity to wail and lament, and so he recovered himself and restrained his emotions<sup>1</sup>. (7)

He repeatedly embraced his daughter and clasped her to his heart. Then he called for a beautiful palanquins<sup>2</sup> that had been already well-equipped and decked up for the occasion. [It was in these palanquins that the four brides would be sent-off to their in-law's place.] (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>It is a duty of a king's ministers and senior advisors to give him wise council when he becomes emotionally upset, and is unable to apply his mind. People were watching Janak very closely, and his becoming sentimental beyond a reasonable limit was not consistent with his reputation as a self-controlled, prudent, dispassionate and wise king who is immune to personal emotions and sentiments. It will send a wrong signal to his subjects that he was a sentimental king who is prone to be driven by his emotions rather than being practical and objective in a given situation. He will be regarded as being weak and emotionally malleable rather than being strong-willed, objective and self-restrained. So it would be judicious now on his part to overcome his emotions and show exemplary neutrality and objectiveness that behoves of a great king who sits in judgement over the fate of others. Say, how would he react when he sits on the judgement throne in his royal court and a case involving family matters comes before him for decision?

Janak must realize that if he starts wailing and grieving himself, it would have an extremely negative effect on Sita who would also start to weep and lament. After all, she has to go away to her husband's home, and so it is wiser to see her off with a smile and laughter instead of in an atmosphere of gloom and grief. It is this last moment which Sita would remember for a long time to come, so it is prudent to make it joyful, cheerful, and worth remembering so that she leaves Janakpur and her parent's home with lovely memories of joy and happiness, with the faces of smiling parents etched in her memory rather than a picture of distressed and weeping parents which would add to her own distress and agony of separation from which she must be already suffering. It is the duty of her wise father to alleviate her emotional suffering instead of adding to it.

After all, this was an auspicious moment, a moment for which any father waits because it is the time his daughter is going away to her chosen groom's home with all the pomp and ceremony that accompany such occasions. It was not a moment to grieve but to celebrate.

<sup>2</sup>There are four brides—Sita, Mandavi, Sutkriti and Urmila. So, four palanquins were brought in, one for each bride.]

दो०. प्रेमबिबस परिवारु सबु जानि सुलगन नरेस ।

कुअँरि चढ़ाई पालकिन्ह सुमिरे सिद्धि गनेस ॥ ३३८ ॥

dōhā.

prēmabibasa parivāru sabu jāni sulagana narēsa.

ku'am̐ri caṛhā'īm̐ pālakinha sumirē sid'dhi ganēsa. 338.

The entire royal family was overcome with affection for the daughters (Sita and her sisters). When the king realized that the auspicious moment has arrived, when all the stars and signs of the zodiac were in the right place in the horoscope, he invoked Lord Ganesh and his divine consort named Siddhi as he helped the princesses to get on the palanquins. (Doha no. 338)

[Note—Lord Ganesh is invoked when one embarks on a long journey or starts a new venture. When Lord Ram started for the forest from Ayodhya, he too had done the same—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 81.

We shall read below that when the marriage party made its final departure from Janakpur, king Dasrath has invoked and worshipped Lord Ganesh—refer: Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 339.

Refer also to Chanda line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 1 of Baal Kand in Ram Charit Manas.]

चौ०. बहुबिधि भूप सुता समुझाई । नारिधरमु कुलरीति सिखाई ॥ १ ॥

दासीं दास दिए बहुतेरे । सुचिं सेवक जे प्रिय सिय केरे ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

bahubidhi bhūpa sutā samujhā'īm. nāridharamu kularīti sikhā'īm. 1.

dāsīm dāsa di'ē bahutērē. suci sēvaka jē priya siya kērē. 2.

At the final moments of farewell, the king advised his daughter(s) the basic principles of behaviour that govern a married woman's life as well as her duties as a housewife, the traditions of the family, and the customs of royalty<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Janak sent with Sita, as marriage gift to her, countless male and female aides, servants and attendants whom she had always liked and was fond of their company<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Earlier we have read that the queen-mother as well as the friends of Sita had also given such advice to her. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-7 that precede Doha no. 334.

<sup>2</sup>Refer also to Doha no. 333 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that describe the lavish marriage gifts which Janak sent in advance to Ayodhya. Now he sent Sita's close attendants and servants. This practice was to ensure that the bride did not feel lonely and homesick in an alien environment in her new home at the in-law's place which would be a foreign country with a new culture for her. When Sita was accompanied by her old trusted servants and maids she would have familiar faces all around her, and they would be at her beck and call to give her company and solace her should she ever feel homesick, forlorn and sad.

Besides this, the custom of sending local well-known people with the bride was to ensure that she was comfortable and safe in her new home, for god forbid if anything goes wrong then these close confidantes of the bride's parents would inform them by some means about the unhappy developments, and remedial steps can be forthwith initiated before the situation goes out of hand.]

सीय चलत ब्याकुल पुरबासी । होहिं सगुन सुभ मंगल रासी ॥ ३ ॥

भूसुर सचिव समेत समाजा । संग चले पहुँचावन राजा ॥ ४ ॥

समय बिलोकि बाजने बाजे । रथ गज बाजि बरातिन्ह साजे ॥ ५ ॥

sīya calata byākula purabāsī. hōhirṁ saguna subha maṅgala rāsī. 3.
bhūsura sacīva samēta samājā. saṅga calē pahumčāvana rājā. 4.
samaya bilōki bājanē bājē. ratha gaja bāji barātinha sājē. 5.

As Sita proceeded forward for her in-law's place, all the citizens of Janakpur were overwhelmed with grief and felt wretched and miserable.

Meanwhile, all the auspicious signs and good omens manifested themselves during those moments as if to shower their blessings upon her.<sup>1</sup> (3)

Accompanied by Brahmins ("bhūsura"), ministers and other senior members of the society and the royal court, the king followed his daughters to escort them for some distance.<sup>2</sup> (4)

The marriage party was ready for departure but was waiting for Lord Ram and his brothers, who had gone to meet their mothers-in-law and seek their permission to return home along with their respective brides, to come back.

So, as soon as the news arrived that the brides are coming, and Janak is accompanying them to finally see them off, musical instruments began playing at the place where the marriage party was lodged as the chariots, elephants and horses were readied for departure. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Compare the time when the marriage procession of Lord Ram had started from Ayodhya; at that time also all the good omens and auspicious signs had revealed themselves in great numbers—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 303 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8.

<sup>2</sup>When sage Vishwamitra had come to visit Janakpur, at that time too Janak had taken along Brahmins, ministers and other seniors of the society when he went to meet the sage—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 214.

Refer also to "Janki Mangal", verse no.170.]

दसरथ बिप्र बोलि सब लीन्हें । दान मान परिपूरन कीन्हें ॥ ६ ॥
चरन सरोज धूरि धरि सीसा । मुदित महीपति पाइ असीसा ॥ ७ ॥ सुमिरि गजाननु कीन्हें पयाना । मंगलमूल सगुन भए नाना ॥ ८ ॥ dasaratha bipra bōli saba līnhē. dāna māna paripūrana kīnhē. 6.

carana sarōja dhūri dhari sīsā. mudita mahīpati pā'i asīsā. 7.
sumiri gajānanu kīnha payānā. maṅgalamūla saguna bha'e nānā. 8.

King Dasrath summoned all the Brahmins of Janakpur, duly honoured them and gave them liberal largesse so much so that all of them were contented<sup>1</sup>. (6)

The king placed his head on the dust of their feet as a sign of showing great respect to them (the Brahmins), and he felt delighted when they all blessed him profusely. (7)

Invoking Lord Ganesh (“gajānanu”), the king finally proceeded for his kingdom of Ayodhya<sup>2</sup>. At that time, all the good omens and various types of auspicious signs appeared so as to mark this happy occasion<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This answers the question: What happened to the countless gifts that Janak had given to Dasrath on two occasions—once when Dasrath had arrived at Janakpur (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 304—to Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 306), and the second time after the marriage rituals were over (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-6 that precede Doha no. 326).

Though Dasrath had given away these gifts liberally on the spot to all those who came to bless him or seek gifts from him as mementos, but the quantity of gifts was so huge that much was left over. Hence, Dasrath gave everything back at the time of departure for Ayodhya by way of donating them to the Brahmins.

In other words, only those things that were directly sent by Janak to Ayodhya (as narrated from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 333—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 334) had reached Ayodhya, while all the rest were given away by Dasrath to local Brahmins and other seekers in Janakpur itself.]

<sup>2</sup>As has been said earlier in Doha no. 338 herein above, Lord Ganesh is worshipped when one embarks on a journey.

<sup>3</sup>We have read earlier that when the marriage party had started from Ayodhya, all the good omens had similarly appeared at that time also to celebrate the moment—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 303 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8.]

दो०. सुर प्रसून बरषहिं हरषि करहिं अपछरा गान ।

चले अवधपति अवधपुर मुदित बजाइ निसान ॥ ३३९ ॥

dōhā.

surā prasūna barāṣahim haraṣi karahim apacharā gāna.
calē avadhapati avadhapura mudita bajā'i nisāna. 339.

The ecstatic gods rained flowers cheerfully from the heaven even as the celestial nymphs danced in merriment as the king of Ayodhya delightfully proceeded towards his capital city to the accompaniment of music of the kettle-drums. (339)

[Note—The marriage procession was kept ready at the time Lord Ram and his brothers had gone to the royal palace of king Janak to seek permission to leave and bring their brides along. Then we read that king Janak had himself accompanied the brothers and their brides as they moved out of the palace. The group reached the place where king Dasrath had been lodged. Since everything was ready for departure and preparations were complete for the journey, so as soon as the palanquins carrying the brides arrived the marriage party started off on its return journey to Ayodhya.]

चौ०. नृप करि बिनय महाजन फेरे । सादर सकल मागने टेरे ॥ १ ॥

भूषन बसन बाजि गज दीन्हे । प्रेम पोषि ठाढ़े सब कीन्हे ॥ २ ॥
 बार बार बिरिदावलि भाषी । फिरे सकल रामहि उर राखी ॥ ३ ॥

caupāī.

nṛpa kari binaya mahājana phērē. sādara sakala māganē tērē. 1.
 bhūṣana basana bāji gaja dīnhē. prēma pōṣi ṭhāṛhē saba kīnhē. 2.
 bāra bāra biridāvali bhāṣī. phirē sakala rāmahi ura rākhī. 3.

The king (Dasrath) politely persuaded the respectable citizens of Janakpur (known as the “Mahaajans”, a term including the members of the aristocracy as well as the business families) to return home (because they had already come quite a distance to see the king off, and now they must go back).

Then he respectfully called all the alms-seekers [1], and when they had assembled and stood affectionately before him, the king bestowed upon them liberal largesse of ornaments, clothes, horses and elephants [2]. (1-2)

These alms-seekers were fully contented and they repeatedly praised the king and his royal lineage, lauding their glory and honour unanimously. Then they all returned homewards, enshrining Lord Ram in their hearts. (3)

[Note—King Janak and senior citizens of Janakpur such as the Brahmins and the members of the royalty and the aristocratic class, as well as the bards, the minstrels and the alms-seekers—all had gone a long distance to see-off the marriage party. Perhaps they had gone to the outskirts of the city, or even further on. This was a massive display of affection and courteousness on part of the people of Janakpur. But at a point of time, king Dasrath had to send them back, so he halted the procession and politely pleaded with them to return back to their city.

As for the gifts, such as ornaments, clothes, horses and elephants, these were the ones that were either left-overs from what Dasrath had given away before his departure from Janakpur (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 339), or the ones that Janak had sent as gifts in advance of Dasrath’s departure (refer: Doha no. 333 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 4-8).

Another point to note here is that Lord Ram is the focal point of attention and adoration for all the citizens, here as well as on all earlier occasions. The phrase “enshrining Lord Ram in their hearts” means that the Lord’s beautiful image got permanently etched in the hearts of the citizens and they would remember the Lord for the rest of their lives. For all practical purposes, they began worshipping the image of the Lord in a subtle manner inside the shrine of their hearts by remembering him and remaining submerged in his thoughts for the rest of their lives.]

बहुरि बहुरि कोसलपति कहहीं । जनकु प्रेमबस फिरै न चहहीं ॥ ४ ॥
 पुनि कह भूपति बचन सुहाए । फिरिअ महीस दूरि बड़ि आए ॥ ५ ॥ bahuri bahuri kōsalapati kahahīm. janaku prēmabasa phirai na cahahīm. 4.

 puni kaha bhūpati bacana suhāē. phiri'a mahīsa dūri baḍi ā'ē. 5.

The lord (king) of Kaushal (the kingdom of Ayodhya) repeatedly asked king Janak to return, but the latter did not want to go back out of his emotions of (brotherly; friendly) affection for the former.

[Just as two loving brothers or two dearest friends find it difficult to part with each other, Janak found it emotionally heavy on his part to bear with the burden of grief that accompanied the prospect of separation from Dasrath whom he had begun to respect and treat as a dear friend and a brotherly king by now. The two kings had forged an enduring bond of love and mutual respect for each other by this time.] (4)

The king (Dasrath) once again said to king Janak, ‘Oh revered king, please go back now for you have already come a very long distance.’ (5)

[Note—A while back we have read that Dasrath managed to persuade the senior citizens and other noble men to return home. But king Janak continued to move ahead with the marriage procession for a very long distance from the city of Janakpur as he was reluctant to return and wished to see-off the marriage party at the kingdom’s boarder. So in all probabilities, Janak had gone to the outer fringes of his kingdom when Dasrath insisted that it was enough and now he must go back.

Another interesting deduction is that Janak had come such a long distance not due to any formal obligation to do so, but due to his affection for and friendship with Dasrath—this is clear in verse no. 4 which says that Janak was reluctant to return out of his affection (“prēmabasa”) for Dasrath.]

राउ बहोरि उतरि भए ठाढ़े । प्रेम प्रबाह बिलोचन बाढ़े ॥ ६ ॥
तब बिदेह बोले कर जोरी । बचन सनेह सुधाँ जनु बोरी ॥ ७ ॥
करौं कवन बिधि बिनय बनाई । महाराज मोहि दीन्हि बड़ाई ॥ ८ ॥

rā'u bahōri utari bha'e ṭhārhē. prēma prabāha bilōcana bārhē. 6.
taba bidēha bōlē kara jōrī. bacana sanēha sudhām̐ janu bōrī. 7.
karaur̥ṇ kavana bidhi binaya banā'ī. mahārāja mōhi dīnhi baṛā'ī. 8.

When Dasrath found that Janak was very reluctant to return to the city of Janakpur and would continue to move ahead with the marriage procession if he was not stopped, he (Dasrath) stepped down from his chariot and stood on the ground. Mutual love and affection for each other surged in the hearts of both the kings as they became highly emotional and their eyes were filled with tears. (6)

Then Videha (king Janak) brought his palms together as a token of high respect for Dasrath as he politely spoke words that seemed to be soaked in the nectar of love and affection—(7)

‘Oh great king (Dasrath)! How can I pray to you or show my respect and thanks to you in adequate terms? You have graciously given me great honour, for which I am extremely obliged and grateful to you.

[Oh great king! Words fail to express my emotions and sense of gratefulness and thanks for you, but nevertheless I hope you understand what is in my heart irrespective of my inability to express myself properly. I don’t wish to part with you, but of course I understand as much as you do that this is not feasible. You have to go to your own kingdom, and so would I have to. But this moment of parting is a great burden on my heart, and I know it to be the same with you. But however, since we have to separate now and go our own ways in life, I wish to once again reiterate my deep respect and affection as well as allegiance for you. I am extremely grateful to you that you took the trouble to come all the way from Ayodhya to my humble kingdom to oblige me, and I feel highly honoured by this gesture of yours. You are a great king, and to have you as a family relation now that your honourable sons have married my daughters is a rare privilege that has enhanced my own stature in this world. I find myself lost for words to sufficiently express my gratitude and thanks for you.]’ (8)

दो०. कोसलपति समधी सजन सनमाने सब भाँति ।

मिलनि परसपर बिनय अति प्रीति न हृदयँ समाति ॥ ३४० ॥

dōhā.

kōsalapati samadhī sajana sanamānē saba bhām̐ti.

milani parasapara binaya ati prīti na hṛdayam̐ samāti. 340.

Moved by the humility and affection of the father of the bride and his new relative by the virtue of this relationship (i.e. king Janak), the king of Kaushal (i.e. king Dasrath) duly honoured and showed his respects to him in a variety of ways.

They embraced each other most endearingly, prayed to each other with the greatest of humility, and the mutual sense of love and affection between them was so great that their hearts could not contain this sentiment as they became overwhelmed with surging emotions. (Doha no. 340)

चौ०. मुनि मंडलिहि जनक सिरु नावा । आसिरबादु सबहि सन पावा ॥ १ ॥

सादर पुनि भेंटे जामाता । रूप सील गुन निधि सब भ्राता ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

muni maṇḍalihi janaka siru nāvā. āsirabādu sabahi sana pāvā. 1.

sādara puni bhēṇṭē jāmātā. rūpa sila guna nidhi saba bhrātā. 2.

King Janak bowed his head before the group of sages (who were accompanying king Dasrath, such as Vasistha, Vishwamitra and the rest), and received blessings from all of them<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Then Janak affectionately and respectfully met all his sons-in-law (Lord Ram and his other three brothers) who were all treasuries of such eclectic qualities as beauty, charm, good manners, courteousness, and all other excellent virtues. [That is, all the four brothers were equally charming, virtuous and glorious.]<sup>2</sup> (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This indicates that when both the kings, Janak as well as Dasrath, moved out of their places, they were always accompanied by elders, Brahmins and sages present in the kingdom. We have had many occasions to read about this. For instance, when Dasrath headed for the venue of the marriage ceremony of Lord Ram at Janakpur, he first sought permission from his guru sage Vasistha, and then moved out with a group of sages and saintly people accompanying him—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 313; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 315.

We also read that the honourable Brahmins of Ayodhya had come with the marriage party—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 300.

Though the word “Muni” technically does not refer to a Brahmin, but for all practical purposes here it covers all pious people who were accompanying Dasrath to whom Janak had paid his due respects.

Earlier we have read that when Janak had gone out to meet and welcome sage Vishwamitra when the latter arrived at his kingdom with Lord Ram and his younger brother Laxman, he too was accompanied by a large retinue of sages, Brahmins and elders of the kingdom—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 313.

To receive blessings from sages and elderly Brahmins is a good thing as reiterated elsewhere also. Whenever a chance came to pay obeisance to the Brahmins and sages, and the latter blessed the king, he felt delighted. For instance, refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 331; Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 339.

Refer: “Janki Mangal”, verse no. 174 also.

<sup>2</sup>This observation that Janak met “all his sons-in-law who were equally virtuous and charming” assumes importance in the context of the general way Lord Ram has been honoured throughout the narration as being exemplarily beautiful, charming and virtuous. It simply means that the Lord has been singled out for honour only for the purpose of narration, and he represented all his other brothers when he was praised by someone.

Refer: “Janki Mangal”, verse nos. 175--176 also.]

जोरि पंकरुह पानि सुहाए । बोले बचन प्रेम जनु जाए ॥ ३ ॥

राम करौं केहि भाँति प्रसंसा । मुनि महेस मन मानस हंसा ॥ ४ ॥ jōri paṅkaruha pāni suhā'ē. bōlē bacana prēma janu jā'ē. 3.

rāma karaun kēhi bhām̐ti prasansā. muni mahēsa mana mānasa hansā. 4.

[King Janak showed his spiritual trait when paying his homage to Lord Ram whom he did not praise as his son-in-law but as the Lord of the world who is adored even by great ascetics as well as their patron god, Lord Shiva who is the third god of the Trinity; the Lord who has a cosmic presence as Brahm, the all-pervading super Consciousness and the Supreme Being in creation.]

Janak joined his palms as a token of great respect and also as if he was offering two lotuses to honour Lord Ram, and then he said words that appeared to have been born out of his love for the Lord. [That is, when Janak spoke, his words were soaked in affection for Lord Ram, were sincerely imbued with love, and were spoken from his heart.]

Janak said—(3)

‘Oh Ram! Say, how can I sufficiently praise and honour you. You live like a majestic Swan in the lake-like hearts of sages and Lord Shiva. [That is, just like a swan lives in the placid and clean waters of a serene lake, floating on its surface and giving majesty and beauty to the charm of the lake, you constantly dwell in the hearts of sages and Lord Shiva who constantly meditate upon you and remain submerged in your thoughts.]<sup>1</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 11 where sage Sutikshan had offered his prayers to Lord Ram.

Lord Shiva has also reiterated this fact that Lord Ram lives like a majestic Swan in the lake-like heart of sages—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chanda line no. 17 that precedes Doha no. 14.]

करहिं जोग जोगी जेहि लागी । कोहु मोहु ममता महु त्यागी ॥ ५ ॥
व्यापकु ब्रह्म अलखु अबिनासी । चिदानंदु निरगुन गुनरासी ॥ ६ ॥ karahim jōga jōgī jēhi lāgī. kōhu mōhu mamatā madu tyāgī. 5.

byāpaku brahmu alakhu abināsī. cidānandu niraguna gunarāsī. 6.

You are the one for whose sake great ascetics undertake so many spiritual practices such as doing contemplation and meditation (“Yoga”) after having conquered all sorts of worldly taints such as anger and wrathfulness, attachments and infatuations, arrogance and ego (that are hurdles in one’s spiritual pursuit). [The ascetic meditates and contemplates on the ‘self’ which is pure conscious soul. Therefore, Janak means that Lord is the ‘soul’ and ‘life’ of creation; the Lord is a personified form of the supreme Consciousness that lives in the heart of all living beings as their true ‘self’].<sup>1</sup> (5)

Indeed, you are Brahm, the cosmic supreme Consciousness that is immanent, all-pervading, all-encompassing, omnipresent (‘Vyaapak’), invisible (‘Alakha’), imperishable (as it is eternal—‘Abinashi’), eternally blissful (‘Chidaanand’), without attributes and forms (‘Nirguna’), and a treasury of all the goodness and virtuousness that exist in this creation (‘Guna-raasi’).<sup>2</sup> (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Chanda line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 10 where the vulture Jatau has also reiterated the same thing.

Sage Sutikshan had told Lord Ram while offering his prayers to the Lord that vices such as anger, greed, desires, attachments, arrogance and ego cannot survive wherever Lord Ram lives, and his holy and divine name is chanted—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 13 and 15 that precede Doha no. 11.

A similar idea is expressed by Lord Shiva when he came to offer his obeisance to Lord Ram at the end of the war at Lanka—refer: Ram Charit Manas—(i) Lanka Kand, Chanda line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 115; and (ii) Uttar Kand, Chanda line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 14.

When mother Earth and the gods had prayed to Lord Vishnu to provide them protection against the tyranny of demons, they had said the same thing—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 186.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 11-12, and 17 that precede Doha no. 11 where sage Sutikshan has prayed to Lord Ram.

Refer also to the prayers of Lord Brahma, the creator, at the time when the war ends in Lanka and Lord stood victorious in the battle-field—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chanda line nos. 7, 9 and 15 that precede Doha no. 111.

Even the Vedas themselves have lauded Lord Ram as a personification of Brahm—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chanda line no. 11 that precedes Doha no. 13.

When mother Earth and the gods had prayed to Lord Vishnu to provide them protection against the tyranny of demons, they had said the same thing—that the Lord is all-pervading and immanent in creation. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 186.]

मन समेत जेहि जान न बानी । तरकि न सकहिं सकल अनुमानी ॥ ७ ॥

महिमा निगमु नेति कहि कहई । जो तिहुँ काल एकरस रहई ॥ ८ ॥

mana samēta jēhi jāna na bānī. taraki na sakahim sakala anumānī. 7.

mahimā nigamu nēti kahi kahaī. jō tihum̐ kāla ēkarasa rahaī. 8.

You are so mysterious and mystical that neither the Mana (mind and heart) nor the faculty of speech can ever know about you. You are beyond all logics and arguments that one can ever imagine of.

[That is, it is useless to try to debate about you and either attempt to prove your existence or disapprove of it based on worldly logic and arguments that one usually applies to other grosser things. Similarly, words are incapable and insufficient to describe even a fraction of truth about you no matter how hard one tries and how much learned he may be. That is why of course the wise ascetic prefers to keep aloof from such attempts of debating and arguing about you or trying to find the truth of you by listening to others and preaching it to others—for the best way to learn about you is by ‘self-realisation’ that comes with meditation and contemplation upon the truthful ‘self’ which is the Atma, the pure consciousness and the soul of all living beings.]<sup>1</sup> (7)

Verily, your glories and virtues are so immense and profound that the scriptures (‘Nigam’) only say a part of them, finally concluding that it is not enough<sup>2</sup>.

You maintain your evenness and equanimity, and remain the same (because you are eternal and unchanging) in all the three phases of time and eras<sup>3</sup>. [That is, though the world is ever changing, you remain constant and unchanging. You are the only factor that remains steady in the otherwise ever-changing face of the sand dune of time. In other words, you are the only ‘Absolute Truth’ that does not change with the passage of time.] (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>When mother Earth and the gods had prayed to Lord Vishnu to provide them protection against the tyranny of demons, they had said the same thing—that the Lord is beyond the reach of speech and understanding by words. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda line nos. 3 and 12 that precede Doha no. 186.]

<sup>2</sup>When mother Kaushalya had prayed to Lord Ram at the time of the Lord's manifestation as a human being, she has also said that even the Vedas and other scriptures are unable to know the Lord—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 192.

<sup>3</sup>The three phases of time and era are the past, the present and the future.

It ought to be noted carefully that the characteristics noted in these verses are unique for Brahm, a term used to refer to the Supreme Being.]

दो०. नयन बिषय मो कहूँ भयउ सो समस्त सुख मूल । सबइ लाभु जग जीव कहँ भएँ ईसु अनुकूल ॥ ३४१ ॥

dōhā.

nayana biṣaya mō kahum' bhaya'u sō samasta sukha mūla.
saba'i lābhu jaga jīva kham' bha'em' īsu anukūla. 341.

I am so extremely lucky that the same root of all bliss, joy and happiness has appeared before my eyes so that I can see these virtues personified right in front of me.

Every good thing and all the best of fruits become easily accessible for a creature when the gods become pleased with him and benevolent upon him. [That is, I feel that the gods have been very kind towards me because they have made it possible for me to see the Supreme Being who is otherwise 'invisible and beyond understanding'. This is the best 'fruit' or reward that a living being can ever hope to acquire or get by doing meritorious deeds in his life.] (Doha no. 341)

चौ०. सबहि भाँति मोहि दीन्ह बड़ाई । निज जन जानि लीन्ह अपनाई ॥ १ ॥
होहिं सहस दस सारद सेवा । करहिं कलप कोटिक भरि लेखा ॥ २ ॥ मोर भाग्य राउर गुन गाथा । कहि न सिराहिं सुनहु रघुनाथा ॥ ३ ॥

caupāī.

sabahi bhām̐ti mōhi dīnhi baṛā'ī. nija jana jāni līnha apanā'ī. 1.
hōhim̐ sahasa dasa sārada sēṣā. karahim̐ kalapa kōṭika bhari lēkhā. 2.
mōra bhāgya rā'ura guna gāthā. kahi na sirāhim̐ sunahu raghunāthā. 3.

You have honoured me and given me importance in all possible ways, and you have also accepted me as one of your own devotees<sup>1</sup>. [And for this I am very grateful to you.] (1)

If there were ten thousand Sardas (i.e. goddess Saraswati, the patron deity of speech and knowledge) and an equal number of Seshas (the thousand tongued celestial serpent), and they were to simultaneously count my luck as well as your glories and virtues for millions of Kalpas (eras; a long period of time) [2], verily I say to you oh Raghunath (the lord of king Raghu's race) that still they won't be able to do it. [That is, both my good luck as well as your glories and virtues are endless.] [3]<sup>2</sup> (2-3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We have to understand the text in the proper context and perspective. This is a devotional rendering of the story of Lord Ram, and not merely a historical narration. A word has many connotations and therefore should be interpreted according to the context in which it is used. The words “Nija Jana” literally mean “one’s kin and close associate; a person very close to someone; a member of an extended family”. King Janak meant was that since he has realised that Lord Ram is not an ordinary prince but a manifested form of Brahm, the cosmic Lord of creation and the Supreme Being in a personified form as is absolutely clear in the preceding verses, he regards himself as being very privileged and feels honoured that the Lord chose to become his son-in-law just like the case of the Lord obliging king Dasrath by becoming his son. It’s a rare privilege and the best of honours one can get in this world. Therefore, Janak requests the Lord to treat him at par with his own father Dasrath.

Janak treats himself as the Lord’s devotee and not merely as a father-in-law. This is in sharp contrast to Dasrath who had been so overcome by the Lord’s Maya (delusion creating powers) that he had forgotten who actually Lord Ram was, and hence had begun to regard the Lord as being merely as his ‘son’. Thus, Dasrath had fallen short of the high spiritual stature achieved by Janak as the former had failed to regard himself as the Lord’s “devotee” with the same fervour as had Janak. This is evident when Dasrath died from the grief of Lord Ram’s separation when the Lord was sent to exile due to family intrigue. We will read that at the time of his death, Dasrath had repeatedly uttered Lord Ram’s holy name “RAM” (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 155 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8)—a name that is the best and the most refined spiritual formula for one’s Moksha (emancipation and salvation, liberation and deliverance—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 19—to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 28)—but still he did not get salvation but became a ghost, and lived in a ‘spirit’ form. The proof lies in the fact that at the end of the war of Lanka, the spirit or ghost of Dasrath had come to the battle-field to bless Lord Ram—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 112.

Hence, we come to the conclusion that from the spiritual perspective, Janak was more enlightened and realised than was Dasrath. Nevertheless, Janak had shown great respect for Dasrath (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 340)—because Dasrath was more fortunate and had done more meritorious deeds in the past that the Lord had decided to oblige him and fulfill his wishes by becoming his son, while Janak had to be contented by being merely the Lord’s ‘father-in-law’, a relationship that is not as close as that of being one’s father.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 215 in this context which also cites these two—goddess Sarda and Seshnath—being unable to describe the beauty and glory of Lord Ram.]

मैं कछु कहउँ एक बल मोरें । तुझ रीझहु सनेह सुठि थोरें ॥ ४ ॥
बार बार मागउँ कर जोरें । मनु परिहरै चरन जनि भोरें ॥ ५ ॥ mair̥m kachu kaha'um̃ ēka bala mōrēm̃. tumha rīj̥hahu sanēha suṭhi thōrēm̃. 4.

bāra bāra māga'um̃ kara jōrēm̃. manu pariharai carana jani bhōrēm̃. 5.

Oh Lord, I have gathered courage to be bold enough to say what I have said because of my conviction that you are easily pleased with even the slightest expression of devotion and love that one has for you. [And that is why I have taken the liberty not only to praise you so much but also to praise my own good fortunes that I have been able to acquire by the virtue of my association with you.] (4)

Now therefore oh exalted Lord, I repeatedly beg of you and pray to you by joining both my palms as a token of my humble submission before you and also as a sign of earnestness of my words that let my Mana (mind and heart) never forget its devotion for your holy feet, let my Mana ever remain tied to your holy feet, let my Mana remember your holy feet for the rest of my life!' (5)

[Note—(i) The greatest compliment to the glory of Lord Ram's holy feet comes from the Lord's own guru, sage Vasistha, who was not only the Lord's moral preceptor and a priest of the royal family but also a son of the creator Brahma. In other words, Vasistha was exceptionally exalted and a very senior person. He had prayed to Lord Ram in the same way as Janak has done here: Vasistha requests Lord Ram that he bless the former that for all future generations he (Vasistha) may have unstinted devotion for the holy lotus-like feet of the Lord—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 48.

Even Sita has made the same request in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-6 that precede Doha no. 259.

All the devotees of Lord Ram have sought this blessing. For instance, Ahilya had done so in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda line nos. 11-14 that precede Doha no. 211; the vulture Jatayu had done so as narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 18 that precedes Doha no. 30.

When Lord Ram asked the learned sage Valmiki to list the places where he can live, the sage has said that "the Lord should live in the Mana (heart and mind; the inner-self) of anyone who worships the Lord's feet regularly and feels that he has undertaken a voyage to a holy pilgrim place when he worships the Lord's feet" (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 129); and "the Lord should live in the inner-self of those who request that they should have devotion for the holy feet of the Lord as a reward for all the good and meritorious deeds they do" (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 129).

We read at many places in this wonderful story of devotion for Lord Ram that whenever a devotee met the Lord, he or she has fallen at the Lord's feet as the best sign of submission and showing his respect for the Lord. For instance, when sage Sutikshan had met Lord Ram, this is exactly what he did—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 20-21 that precede Doha no. 10. Further on we find Sabari, the old lady hermit, falling at the feet of the Lord when he visited her—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 34.

Later on in the story we find that when Lord Ram had first met his monkey friends, Hanuman and Sugriv, they too had shown their respects to the Lord by falling at his holy feet, as does Vibhishan, the brother of the demon king Ravana, who had come to take refuge with the Lord upon being cast out of the kingdom by his brother. Refer: (i) Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 2 with respect to Hanuman; (ii) Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 4 with respect to Sugriv; and (iii) Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 46 with respect to Vibhishan.

(ii) Every devotee knows that the Lord will fulfill his wishes as this is the wont and natural habit of the Lord—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 28 Ka and its preceding Chaupai line no. 11.]

सुनि बर बचन प्रेम जनु पोषे । पूरनकाम रामु परितोषे ॥ ६ ॥
 करि बर बिनय ससुर सनमाने । पितु कौसिक बसिष्ठ सम जाने ॥ ७ ॥
 बिनती बहुरि भरत सन कीन्ही । मिलि सप्रेमु पुनि आसिष दीन्ही ॥ ८ ॥ sunī bara bacana prēma janu pōṣē. pūranakāma rāmu paritōṣē. 6.

 kari bara binaya sasura sanamānē. pitu kausika basiṣṭha sama jānē. 7.
 binatī bahuri bharata sana kīnhī. mili saprēmu puni āsiṣa dīnhī. 8.

When Lord Ram heard these pleasant, polite and courteous words of Janak, words that were soaked in emotions of love and sincere affection for the Lord, he (Lord Ram) who was always contented, felt obliged and happy.

[In other words, though Lord Ram did not need any praises from someone to make him happy by highlighting the Lord's glories and virtues because he was eternally fulfilled, contented and blissful, but still when king Janak praised him he felt obliged towards him by way of saying 'thank you very much'. Lord Ram was grateful to Janak for being so extremely courteous and polite to him.] (6)

Lord Ram reciprocated his father-in-law's (Janak's) polite gestures by showing the same respect to him, and expressing his gratitude to him by treating him at par with his own father (Dasrath), sage Kaushik (Vishwamitra) and sage Vasistha (the Lord's guru—moral preceptor and priest of the family).

[The three gentlemen named here were the senior most members present on the occasion. Lord Ram paid his sincere respects to king Janak in the same way as he would have paid to all of these three gentlemen.]<sup>1</sup> (7)

The king then approached Bharat and politely prayed to him (in the same way as he had prayed to Lord Ram). Then he affectionately embraced Bharat and blessed him.<sup>2</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Ram honoured his father-in-law Janak with the greatest of respect by bringing him to the same level as his own father Dasrath, as well as that of sage Vishwamitra whom the Lord also respected as his father as well as his guru, and sage Vasistha who was of course his family priest and guru since his childhood days.

To wit, Janak was made exceptionally privileged and honoured by the Lord by bestowing upon him the combined honour of his father Dasrath, and two of the greatest sages of the time, sage Vishwamitra and sage Vasistha.

There is a subtle message in this honour. Lord Ram honoured Janak for his love and affection for him by treating the latter at par with his own father Dasrath. Then, Lord Ram acknowledged the level of spiritual knowledge, enlightenment and erudition of Janak by treating him at par with two great sages, Vishwamitra and Vasistha.]

<sup>2</sup>The contrast is obvious: Janak had sought Lord Ram's blessings, but he blessed Bharat in this verse, and the other brothers too as we shall read below in Doha no. 342. This clearly indicates that though Janak had regarded all the brothers equally, he had had special respect and great devotion for Lord Ram as he knew that the real identity of the Lord was Brahm, the Supreme Being and Lord of creation—refer: Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 349 herein above. Hence, Lord Ram was worthy of such respect as one would show to one's deity whom one worships.]

दो०. मिले लखन रिपुसूदनहि दीन्हि असीस महीस । भए परसपर प्रेमबस फिरि फिरि नावहिं सीस ॥ ३४२ ॥

dōhā.

milē lakhana ripusūdanahi dīnhi asīsa mahīsa.
bha'e parasapara prēmabasa phiri phiri nāvahim sīsa. 342.

Next, the king met and embraced Laxman and Ripusudan (Shatrughan), and blessed them. All of them were overcome with emotions, bowing their heads repeatedly to one another as a sign of showing great respect for each other. (Doha no. 342)

[Note—We have read that a gesture is repeated to emphasise its earnestness and the depth of emotions. It's a polite way of making a request, showing honour and gratitude, or simply saying 'thank you'.

Refer: Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 342 when Janak has 'repeatedly' prayed to Lord Ram with joined palms. Prior to this, Dasrath had also 'repeatedly' asked Janak to return home as he had come very far from the city to bid farewell to the marriage party—refer: Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 340. Again we read that when Lord Ram and his brothers had gone to their mothers-in-law to take permission to leave for Ayodhya, then also the Lord had bowed before them 'repeatedly' to pay his respects—refer: Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 337.

When king Dasrath met sage Vishwamitra upon the former's arrival at Janakpur, he had also 'repeatedly' bowed his head before the sage to express his greatest of thanks to him for being instrumental in his son's (Lord Ram's) marriage and establishing his glory throughout the world motivating and enabling him (Lord Ram) to break the formidable bow which none of the other kings and princes could even move—refer: Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 308.]

चौ०. बार बार करि बिनय बड़ाई । रघुपति चले संग सब भाई ॥ १ ॥
जनक गहे कौसिक पद जाई । चरन रेनु सिर नयनन्ह लाई ॥ २ ॥
सुनु मुनीस बर दरसन तोरें । अगमु न कछु प्रतीति मन मोरें ॥ ३ ॥

caupāī.

bāra bāra kari binaya barāī. raghupati calē saṅga saba bhāī. 1.
janaka gahē kausika pada jāī. carana rēnu sira nayananha lāī. 2.
sunu munīsa bara darasana tōrēm. agamu na kachu pratīti mana mōrēm. 3.

After repeatedly paying his respects and honouring his father-in-law king Janak, Lord Ram (“Raghupati”) proceeded ahead, along with his brothers, on his onward journey<sup>1</sup>. (1)

[Verse nos. 2-6 narrate Janak paying his deep respects to sage Vishwamitra at the time of bidding him farewell, and receiving the sage’s blessings before returning back.]

Janak went to meet sage Kaushik (Vishwamitra), and falling at the latter’s feet, he grasped it reverentially. He showed his greatest respect to the sage by picking up the dust of the sage’s feet and putting it on his head as well as applying it on his eyes (eye-lids). (2)

Then he said to sage Vishwamitra, ‘Listen oh revered sage! It is a firm conviction of my Mana (mind and heart) that your divine sight is very auspicious and wish-fulfilling. Nothing is inaccessible when one is fortunate to have this sight. [That is, everything one expects can be realised and all his wishes are fulfilled if he is fortunate enough to meet you and have your ‘Darshan’ or holy sight. I have had a first-hand experience of this fact because my wish to have a glorious groom for my daughter Sita was fulfilled when I met you and paid my obeisance to you. What more can be said that let alone Sita, I have been able to marry all my daughters to equally noble grooms. Say, what more would a father want than to see all his daughters married to noble and glorious grooms who stand out in this world for their unique virtues and stupendous qualities. All this was made possible due to you and your blessings. Whatever happiness that I have today is the fruit of my having seen your divine feet and receiving your patronage and blessings.]’<sup>2</sup> (3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The four brothers were well-bonded with each other; they were fond of each other and preferred to stay together. There are many instances of this brotherly love between them. For instance, when the Lord had gone to bid farewell to his mother-in-law in the palace of king Janak, and later on when he returned from there after receiving blessings, he was accompanied by his other three brothers: refer Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Doha no. 334; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 337.

Earlier on, even during their childhood days, the four brothers had shown affinity, love and attachment for each other: refer Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 198.

Once again we read that whenever Lord Ram went to hunt in the royal forest, he was accompanied by his brothers and friends: refer Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 205. Similarly, when the Lord ate his meals, the four brothers sat together and were joined by their friends: refer Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 205.

When Lord Ram had gone with sage Vishwamitra to the latter’s hermitage to protect his fire sacrifice, he was accompanied by Laxman throughout the journey: refer Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 208 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 7-8, and similarly when the Lord had gone for his 14-year exile he was joined by Laxman: refer Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 73; Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 76; and Doha no. 79.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: “Janki Mangal”, verse no. 174 also.]

जो सुख सुजसु लोकपति चहहीं । करत मनोरथ सकुचत अहहीं ॥ ४ ॥

सो सुख सुजसु सुलभ मोहि स्वामी । सब सिधि तव दरसन अनुगामी ॥ ५ ॥ jō sukhu sujasu lōkapati cahahīm. karata manōratha sakucata ahahīm. 4.

sō sukhu sujasu sulabha mōhi svāmī. saba sidhi tava darasana anugāmī. 5.

That happiness and joy, that of fame, glory and honour which even the Lokpatis (the guardian of the world; the regional lords of the world; and even Indra, the king of gods and the world) yearn for, but are reluctant to express the desire for their fulfilment because these virtues are very difficult for them to access or realise in practical terms [4]—today, oh lord, the same eclectic happiness and joy, the same immensity of fame, glory and honour has been made accessible to me, they have been put within my reach. Verily, it has been made possible for me due to your divine sight, as all sorts of ‘Siddhis’ (fulfilments; acquisitions; achievements) follow in the wake of one being able to see you and have communion with you [5]. (4-5)

[Note—The happiness of Janak and the intensity of his joy have been narrated elsewhere also—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-6 that precede Doha no. 286.

Janak has given all credits for his happiness and sense of fulfilment to sage Vishwamitra to show his great respect for the sage as well as a token of his thanks-giving to him. Janak is overwhelmed with gratitude for the sage, because he realises that had the sage not come with Lord Ram and Laxman, and had he not ordered Lord Ram to go and break the bow, none of the dreams of Janak would have borne fruits. The chance to marry Sita and her other sisters to such noble princes as Lord Ram and his three brothers who belonged to a renowned royal family of Ayodhya, which was one of the most famous and glorious families of the time, and who were themselves excellent princes, being like treasuries of eclectic virtues and excellent qualities—was made possible because of sage Vishwamitra’s intervention and motivation. It was he who had brought Lord Ram and Laxman to Janakpur, it was he who had ordered Lord Ram to break the bow, it was he who had ordered that Dasrath be invited with his entourage to Janakpur so that all the four brothers could assemble at one place and get married. Refer respectively to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 9-10 that precede Doha no. 210; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 254; and (iii) from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 286—to Chaupai line no. 1 that follow it.

Refer: “Janki Mangal”, verse no. 174 also.]

कीन्हि बिनय पुनि पुनि सिरु नाई । फिरे महीसु आसिषा पाई ॥ ६ ॥

चली बरात निसान बजाई । मुदित छोट बड़ सब समुदाई ॥ ७ ॥

रामहि निरखि ग्राम नर नारी । पाइ नयन फलु होहिं सुखारी ॥ ८ ॥ kīnhi binaya puni puni siru nāī. phirē mahīsu āsiṣā pāī. 6.

calī barāta nisāna bajāī. mudita chōṭa barā saba samudāī. 7.
rāmahi nirakhi grāma nara nārī. pāī nayana phalu hōhīm sukhārī. 8.

The king (Janak) repeatedly bowed his head at the feet of sage Vishwamitra and prayed to him. Then, having received the sage's blessings, the king returned home<sup>1</sup>. (6)

Finally, the bridegrooms' party started earnestly on its return journey for Ayodhya to the accompaniment of sound of the kettle-drums. Everyone amongst its members, the young and the old, were delighted and euphoric, individually as well as in a group<sup>2</sup>. (7)

The men and the women who lived in the roadside villages enroute to Ayodhya were very delighted at the opportunity to see Lord Ram (decked up like a groom) as he strode ahead with the marriage party. They felt that they have got their reward of having an eyesight when they gazed at Lord Ram (because it is this faculty of sight that enabled them to enjoy the beauty of the Lord's magnificent and divine form)<sup>3</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Sage Vishwamitra was the last one whom king Janak met before the marriage party finally proceeded to Ayodhya with full speed.

Refer: "Janki Mangal", Chanda no. 22 also.

<sup>2</sup>Refer also to: (a) "Janki Mangal", verse no. 169 and Chanda no. 22; (b) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precede Doha no. 339; Chaupai line no. 7 that precede Doha no. 343; Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 263.

<sup>3</sup>When Lord Ram will go to the 14-year forest exile, we shall read about the same delight and sentiments of the wayside villagers—refer for instance, Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 114 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8.]

दो०. बीच बीच बर बास करि मग लोगन्ह सुख देत । अवध समीप पुनीत दिन पहुँची आइ जनेत ॥ ३४३ ॥

dōhā.

bīca bīca bara bāsa kari maga lōganha sukha dēta.
avadha samīpa punīta dina pahum̐cī ā'i janēta. 343.

Halting at convenient places on their way back, and in the process providing great delight and joy to the people who lived alongside the way (in the numerous villages and hamlets lying en-route), the marriage procession arrived near the city of Ayodhya on an auspicious day. (Doha no. 343)

[Note—We have read earlier that king Janak had already sent advance parties to prepare convenient spots on the road to Ayodhya, and make all arrangements for the basic comforts of the marriage party when it halted at these locations. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 333—to Chaupai line no. 1 that follows this Doha.]

चौ०. हने निसान पनव बर बाजे । भेरि संख धुनि हय गय गाजे ॥ १ ॥

झाँझि बिरव डिंडिमीं सुहाई । सरस राग बाजहिं सहनाई ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

hanē nisāna panava bara bājē. bhēri saṅkha dhuni haya gaya gājē. 1.
jhām̃jhi birava ḍiṇḍimīm̃ suhāī. sarasa rāga bājahim̃ sahanāī. 2.

As the marriage procession moved ahead on its onward journey to Ayodhya, it was accompanied by a constant playing of various musical instruments. Different varieties of kettle-drums known as Nishan, Panav and Bheri were played all along the way, and so were the conchs that accompanied the loud neighing of horses, the trumpeting of elephants [1], the clash of cymbals and tabors, and pleasant music from the clarionet [2]. (1-2)

[Note—The marriage procession did not move silently and in a disciplined manner like a marching army, but it wend its way back to Ayodhya in an atmosphere of merriment and revelry, enjoying every mile of the way of the long journey back home, with music and dance and celebrations galore. This is the way it had come from Ayodhya to Janakpur, and it is the same way it went back. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Doha no. 302 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 5-8; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 304.]

पुर जन आवत अकनि बराता । मुदित सकल पुलकावलि गाता ॥ ३ ॥

निज निज सुंदर सदन सँवारे । हाट बाट चौहट पुर द्वारे ॥ ४ ॥

गलीं सकल अरगजाँ सिंचाई । जहँ तहँ चौकें चारु पुराई ॥ ५ ॥

pura jana āvata akani barātā. mudita sakala pulakāvali gātā. 3.
nija nija sundara sadana sam̃vārē. hāṭa bāṭa cauhaṭa pura dvārē. 4.
galīm̃ sakala aragajām̃ siñcāīm̃. jaham̃ taham̃ caukēm̃ cāru purāīm̃. 5.

When the inhabitants of Ayodhya heard the sound of this music from a distance, they concluded that the marriage procession has arrived. Everyone was delighted and euphoric with joy, and their bodies were thrilled with excitement.<sup>1</sup> (3)

The citizens of Ayodhya decorated their own homes beautifully and colourfully, as also were the market places, the streets, the squares and the gates of the city were all decked up with the best of décor and finery<sup>2</sup>. (4)

All the lanes and by-lanes of the city were washed with scented water, and ceremonial squares<sup>3</sup> were made and filled with auspicious things all over the city. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The musical instruments that were played were so loud that the arrival of the party was heralded by this sound from a great distance. The people were waiting for this sound, and as soon as they heard it there was an immediate celebration in the city of Ayodhya.

A similar thing has happened when the marriage party had gone to Janakpur: its arrival was announced by the sound of musical instruments from a great distance, and it was reciprocated by similar playing of musical instruments in the city of Janakpur—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 304, and Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes it.

<sup>2</sup>There are references of similar decorations being made in the cities of Janakpur and Ayodhya on earlier occasions also. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 287 where it is said that Janak had ordered that the entire city of Janakpur be decorated to celebrate the marriage of Sita with Lord Ram; (ii) Doha no. 296 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 4, 7-8 that narrate how the city of Ayodhya was decorated when the news of Lord Ram's marriage arrived there.

<sup>3</sup>These squares were made, or rather drawn on the ground by using a mixture of coloured powder and flour of wheat and rice, and such things as lighted lamps, stems of the banana trees, canopies, festoons and hangings were placed around them for the purpose of decoration.

Such squares are made on auspicious occasions even today in India, both at public places as well as in the front and the inside of private properties.

Refer also to: "Janki Mangal", verse nos. 1181—184, and Chanda no. 23 with respect to the decoration and celebrations in Ayodhya when the marriage party returned.]

बना बजारु न जाइ बखाना । तोरन केतु पताक बिताना ॥ ६ ॥
सफल पूगफल कदलि रसाला । रोपे बकुल कदंब तमाला ॥ ७ ॥ लगे सुभग तरु परसत धरनी । मनिमय आलबाल कल करनी ॥ ८ ॥ banā bajāru na jā'i bakhānā. tōrana kētu patāka bitānā. 6.

saphala pūgaphala kadali rasālā. rōpē bakula kadamba tamālā. 7.
lagē subhaga taru parasata dharanī. manimaya ālabāla kala karani. 8.

The markets were so wonderfully decorated that one cannot describe their beauty and attractiveness. They were adorned with ceremonial arches, flags, banners, festoons, parasols and canopies of varying shapes and forms.<sup>1</sup> (6)

Fruit laden trees of the areca-nut (or the betel-nut; "Poogphal"), the plantain ("Kadali"), the mango ("Rasaal"), the Bakul ("mimusops slengi" plant), the Kadamba ("neulea orientalis" plant), and the black catechu ("Tamaal"; the evergreen "xanthocymus epictorius" plant) were transplanted at different places in the city, all along its avenues, squares and other public places. (7)

These beautiful trees were so abundantly laden with their respective fruits that their branches seemed to touch the ground. The bowl-shaped fences that were made at the place where these trees were transplanted on the ground were expertly crafted by artisans and were magnificently decorated with precious gems embedded on their sides.<sup>2</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to other instances of such decorations in Ram Charit Manas: (a) Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 296; (ii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 289; (iii) Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 213;

(iv) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 194; and (b) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 6 which say that king Dasrath had ordered that the city of Ayodhya should be beautifully decked up for the coronation ceremony of Lord Ram which was however aborted due to the tantrums created by Kaikeyi, the step-mother of Lord Ram who wanted her own son Bharat to be put on the throne.

Later on in this epic story we read that when Lord Ram came back to Ayodhya at the end of his 14-years forest exile and the successful Lanka campaign, the city of Ayodhya was decorated in the same manner as it is being done now when the Lord's marriage procession has reached it. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 9.

<sup>2</sup>An exactly similar narration is found in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand when the city was being decorated for the coronation ceremony of Lord Ram, which was however aborted due to intrigue created by his step-mother Kaikeyi. Refer: Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 6.

The beauty of a tree lies in its ability to produce abundant fruits, flowers and leaves so much so that its branches bend by their weight. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 227 where the royal garden of king Janak is being described.

A similar idea is expressed when the beauty of the forest through which Lord Ram passed is being described in Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 38, and once again in Doha no. 40 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 5-7.]

दो०. बिबिध भाँति मंगल कलस गृह गृह रचे सँवारि ।
सुर ब्रह्मादि सिहाहिं सब रघुबर पुरी निहारि ॥ ३४४ ॥

dōhā.

bibidha bhāmṭi maṅgala kalasa gr̥ha gr̥ha racē samvāri.
sura brahmādi sihāhiṁ saba raghubara purī nihāri. 344.

Each home of the city was beautifully decorated with auspicious pitchers of various kinds (i.e. of different colours, shapes and sizes as well as materials such as clay, brass, gold, silver, platinum etc.).

The city of Lord Ram ("Raghubar", literally meaning the most exalted member of king Raghu's lineage) was so astoundingly and stunningly beautiful that even the gods, including Brahma the creator and other senior gods, praised it abundantly. (Doha no. 344)

[Note—This idea has been expressed elsewhere also. For instance, when Lord Ram was born, the city of Ayodhya was so fascinating and wonderful to look at that the gods were not only charmed, but stunned as well, with its magnificence and grandeur—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 195; and Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 296.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 296, and Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 9 where it is said that golden pitchers were put up by the citizens which refer to putting up auspicious pitchers for the purpose of decoration.

Tulsidas' another book titled "Janaki Mangal" which exclusively deals with the marriage of Lord Ram with Sita also describes the wonderful beauty of Ayodhya at the time the marriage party arrived with the four grooms and their respective brides in its verse nos. 181—184 and Chanda no. 23.

Later on in the story we will read that after Lord Ram ascended the throne of Ayodhya, the city and the kingdom as a whole were so wonderfully looked after that even the goddess of speech known as Sarda, and the thousand tongued serpent named Seshnath could not describe their magnificence and beauty—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 22.]

चौ०. भूप भवनु तेहि अवसर सोहा । रचना देखि मदन मनु मोहा ॥ १ ॥
मंगल सगुन मनोहरताई । रिधि सिधि सुख संपदा सुहाई ॥ २ ॥ जनु उछाह सब सहज सुहाए । तनु धरि धरि दसरथ गृहँ छाए ॥ ३ ॥
caupāī.

bhūpa bhavanu tēhi avasara sōhā. racanā dēkhi madana manu mōhā. 1.
maṅgala saguna manōharatā'ī. ridhi sidhi sukha sampadā suhā'ī. 2.
janu uchāha saba sahaja suhā'ē. tanu dhari dhari dasaratha gr̥ham' chā'ē. 3.

The king's (i.e. Dasrath's) palace looked most charming on that occasion. Its magnificence was such that it captivated the Mana (mind and heart) of even Kamdeo (cupid).<sup>1</sup> (1)

[Why was the king's palace so fabulous to look at? This question is answered now:-]

It appeared that all forms of auspiciousness, all sorts of good omens, all types of beauty and magnificence, along with all the Riddhis and Siddhis symbolising prosperity, affluence, well-being, happiness, joys and mystical achievements, as well as all festivities and celebrations have collectively assumed a personified, physical form, and taken up their residence in the palace of Dasrath.<sup>2</sup> (2-3)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A similar idea is expressed when the news of Lord Ram's marriage arrived at Ayodhya—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 297 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 4.

<sup>2</sup>A similar idea is expressed when the news of Lord Ram's marriage arrived at Ayodhya—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 297 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 5-8.]

देखन हेतु राम बैदेही । कहहु लालसा होहि न केही ॥ ४ ॥
जूथ जूथ मिलि चलीं सुआसिनि । निज छबि निदरहिं मदन बिलासिनि ॥ ५ ॥ सकल सुमंगल सजें आरती । गावहिं जनु बहु बेष भारती ॥ ६ ॥ dēkhana hētu rāma baidēhī. kahahu lālasā hōhi na kēhī. 4.

jūtha jūtha mili calīṁ su'āsini. nija chabi nidarahiṁ madana bilāsini. 5.

sakala sumaṅgala sajēṁ āratī. gāvahiṁ janu bahu bēṣa bhāratī. 6.

Say, who will not have a desire to closely watch Lord Ram and Sita?<sup>1</sup> [This verse answers the question why all the good and auspicious things in this world, as listed herein above, felt it was their golden opportunity to have a close interaction and viewing of the divine couple, Lord Ram and Sita. So they decided to assume some physical form and enter the royal palace.] (4)

Women of noble character formed large groups and moved forward<sup>2</sup> (to welcome the marriage party and to have the first chance to see Lord Ram with Sita). These women-folk were so beautiful to look at that they put to shame the pride of Rati (the consort of Kamdeo/cupid) with respect to her own beauty and charm.<sup>3</sup>

[That is, the women were all exceptionally charming and beautiful to look at, and their magnificence was much more than the charm of Rati who thought that she was the most attractive and beautiful woman in creation. Her pride was trounced when she saw the women of Ayodhya.] (5)

They arranged the necessary items for doing the ‘Aarti’<sup>4</sup> (of Lord Ram and his bride Sita, as also of all other members of the marriage party such as the king himself and the Lord’s other three brothers). All of them sang melodious songs of felicitation as if goddess Bharti (i.e. goddess Saraswati, the patron goddess of voice and arts) has herself personified in the form of these ladies to sing such sweet and auspicious songs.<sup>5</sup> (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, everyone wished to avail of the opportunity to be in close proximity of the divine couple, Lord Ram and Sita, so that a close-up view of the Lord and his divine consort can be had. Therefore, all the virtues listed here assumed some form or the other and entered the royal palace so as to see Lord Ram and Sita from close quarters.

We have already read that at the time of marriage of Lord Ram and Sita, as well as all the other three brothers of the Lord at Janakpur, the gods and goddesses too had assumed human forms and entered the royal palace of king Janak precisely for this reason—that they will have a golden chance to see the Lord and Sita from up close and also to mark their presence and participate in this eventful historical occasion that is not to come again in their lifetimes. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 318, and Chaupai line nos. 6-8 that precede Doha no. 321.

<sup>2</sup>Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 297 which describes the same thing happening in Ayodhya when the news of Lord Ram’s marriage arrived; (ii) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 194 which describes how the women-folk cheerfully proceeded towards the palace of king Dasrath when the news of the birth of Lord Ram and his other three brothers spread in the city of Ayodhya; (iii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 286 which tells us how groups of charming ladies began singing like the cuckoo when sage Parashuram had asked for forgiveness from Lord Ram and went to the forest, thereby ending the stalemate and allowing the resumption of celebrations.

<sup>3</sup>This observation is based on the fact that the news of the marriage of Lord Ram’s other three brothers hadn’t reached Ayodhya till this point of time.

<sup>4</sup>“Aarti” is showing of lighted earthen lamps as a gesture of warm and ceremonial welcome of an honoured person. These lamps are placed on a decorated platter which also contains other auspicious items considered auspicious, such as rice grains, blades of grass, scented water, coloured powder of herbs, etc. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 297; and (ii) Doha no. 346 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 4-8 that tell us how the Aarti is arranged.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 194 which describes how the women-folk cheerfully performed the “Aarti” of the newly born four divine brothers, Lord Ram, Laxman, Bharat and Shatrughan. At the time of departure of the marriage party from Ayodhya for Janakpur, the ladies of the city had gone on the roof-tops of their homes to perform the Aarti of the procession as it passed through the streets of Ayodhya—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 301.

Then we read that when Lord Ram had broken the bow and Sita had put the victory garland on the Lord, all the ladies and the men of Janakpur had performed their Aarti at the venue of the bow-breaking ceremony itself—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 265.

<sup>5</sup>Refer also to the following instance where songs were sung by the charming ladies in honour of Lord Ram and Sita: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 297 which is very specific on this subject.

Besides the above, the women-folk had sung songs when they were going to the palace of king Dasrath to perform the Aarti of the newly born four brothers—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 194.

Even at the time of the departure of the marriage party for Janakpur, the ladies of Ayodhya had gathered on their roof-tops to sing songs—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 301.]

भूपति भवन कोलाहलु होई । जाइ न बरनि समउ सुखु सोई ॥ ७ ॥ कौसल्यादि राम महतारीं । प्रेमबिबस तन दसा बिसारीं ॥ ८ ॥ bhūpati bhavana kōlāhalu hō'ī. jā'i na barani sama'u sukhu sō'ī. 7.

kausalyādi rāma mahatārīm. prēmabibasa tana dasā bisārīm. 8.

There was a lot of rejoicing, revelry and celebrations in the royal palace so much so that the whole place was filled with rapturous sound of joy and merry-making as the entire household erupted in an outburst of cheer, exhilaration and ecstasy.

Verily indeed, it is not possible to describe the level of happiness and joy, of ecstasy and exhilaration, and the atmosphere of revelry and celebrations that prevailed at that time.<sup>1</sup> (7)

Mother Kaushalya (the eldest queen-mother) and the other mothers of Lord Ram (i.e. Sumitra and Kaikeyi) were overwhelmed with love and affection so much so that they lost awareness of the condition of their bodies (because they were highly thrilled and ecstatic with joy so as to lose awareness of their surroundings).<sup>2</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to similar rapturous sounds of joy and celebrations that erupted emotions as narrated elsewhere in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 302 that describe the situation at the time of the departure of Lord Ram's marriage party for Janakpur.

Once again we read that when Sita arrives at the venue where the marriage rituals were to be performed, there was an eruption of joy and a thunderous that accompanied the playing of musical instruments, singing of songs, chanting of scriptural hymns and cheering by the citizens—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 323.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 295 which describe the mothers' happiness when king Dasrath read aloud the invitation letter that had come from Janakpur with the announcement that Lord Ram had married Sita by breaking the bow.

Refer also to Chaupai line no. 1 that follows Doha no. 345 below which expressly states that the mothers were numbed with emotions and their legs refused to move.]

दो०. दिए दान बिप्रन्ह बिपुल पूजि गनेस पुरारि । प्रमुदित परम दरिद्र जनु पाइ पदारथ चारि ॥ ३४५ ॥
dōhā.

di'ē dāna bipranha bipula pūji ganēsa purāri.
pramudita parama daridra janu pā'i padāratha cāri. 345.

The mothers liberally gave away abundant quantities of donations and gifts to the Brahmins<sup>1</sup>, and they also prayed to Lord Ganesh and Lord Shiva<sup>2</sup>.

The mothers were so exceptionally happy as if a highly impoverished person is able to lay his hands on the four excellent fruits that are regarded as the best of rewards for one's meritorious deeds, fulfilling all his desires and leaving him fully contented<sup>3</sup>. (Doha no. 345)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 295 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 7-8 and Chaupai line no. 1 that follows it. They describe the same thing, when the queens had liberally given away alms and gifts to Brahmins and other seekers when they learnt about the marriage of Lord Ram with Sita.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Ganesh and Lord Shiva, as well as goddess Parvati who is the mother of Ganesh and the divine consort of Lord Shiva are always worshipped when any good event happens or at the time of starting some auspicious deed. There are many instances supporting this. Some of the instances are the following: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Doha no. 301 that says that king Dasrath had offered his prayers to Lord Ganesh and Gauri (Parvati) at the time of departure of the marriage procession for Janakpur; (ii) Chanda line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 323 which describes how Gauri and Ganesh were offered worship by the priests at the commencement of the marriage rituals of Lord Ram and Sita.

We shall be reading shortly that when Lord Ram enters the city of Ayodhya, he has invoked and offered his respects to Lord Shiva, Parvati and Ganesh to seek their blessings: refer—Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 347 herein below.

Similarly, when the Lord had started on his journey for the forest later on in the story, he has once again offered similar prayers to these deities: refer—Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 81.

<sup>3</sup>Refer Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 309; and (ii) Doha no. 325 along with notes appended to them.]

चौ०. मोद प्रमोद बिबस सब माता । चलहिं न चरन सिथिल भए गाता ॥ १ ॥

राम दरस हित अति अनुरागीं । परिछनि साजु सजन सब लागीं ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

mōda pramōda bibasa saba mātā. calahim na carana sithila bha'e gātā. 1.
rāma darasa hita ati anurāgīm. parichani sāju sajana saba lāgīm. 2.

All the mothers (Kaushalya, Sumitra and Kaikeyi) were overwhelmed with emotions of joy and ecstasy so much so that their legs felt heavy and refused to move<sup>1</sup> as their bodies became numbed out of surging emotions<sup>2</sup>. (1)

All the mothers were very eager to have 'Darshan' (holy viewing; to see someone who is revered) of Lord Ram, and in order to warmly welcome him as well as to honour the Lord and pay their obeisance to him, they began to make preparations by collecting and arranging auspicious things needed for such occasions<sup>3</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 263 that tells us that king Janak's legs also felt as heavy like a man who was tired of swimming but fortunately finds land.

Similarly, we shall read later on in the story that when Lord Ram met sage Sutikshan in the forest, the sage was so dumbstruck that he became immobile with disbelief that the Lord of the world is standing right in his front, before his eyes. The sage stood motionless like in a portrait. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 21-24 that precede Doha no. 10.

Further on we read that when the Lord went to meet the old hermitess named Sabari, she too was dumbstruck and unable to speak a word for sometime—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 8-9 that precede Doha no. 34.

<sup>2</sup>Refer Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 345 herein above which states that the mothers were so overcome with emotions that they lost awareness of their bodies, i.e. their bodies became numbed from surging emotions.

A person loses awareness of his own self and his surroundings on two occasions—either when he is overcome with extreme grief, or from extreme happiness. In the present case, it is 'extreme happiness'.

When the crow saint Kaagbhusund had accompanied Lord Shiva, both having assumed human forms, to go and visit Ayodhya to participate in the celebrations at the time of birth of Lord Ram and his other brothers there, they too had become so ecstatic that they lost awareness of themselves and their surroundings. This is clearly narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that preceds Doha no. 196.

Similarly we read that when Sita first saw Lord Ram in the royal garden where he had gone to pluck flowers for his guru's worship rituals, she had been overwhelmed by the most enchanting sight of the Lord so much so that she also lost awareness of her body and her surroundings, and even that she must not become infatuated with a stranger but perform her worshipping of goddess Parvati for which she had come to the garden in the first place, and return home. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 232.

At the time Sita was brought to the venue of the marriage rituals, he sight also filled all those who saw here with so much joy that all of them lost senses of their own self and their surroundings—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 323.

As observed herein above, one loses the sense of the existence of his physical body and its feelings either when one is exceedingly happy as in all the cases referred to herein above, or when one is struck by extreme sorrow or grief as it happened to Dasrath when Kaikeyi asked him to send Lord Ram to 14 years of forest exile—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 35. Similarly we see Lord Ram's mother Kaushalya was struck with grief and her body shook with shock when she came to know about her beloved son going to the forest—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 54.

<sup>3</sup>These things are described below in Doha no. 346 and its preceding verse nos. 4-8.]

बिबिध बिधान बाजने बाजे । मंगल मुदित सुमित्राँ साजे ॥ ३ ॥
 हरद दूब दधि पल्लव फूला । पान पूगफल मंगल मूला ॥ ४ ॥
 अच्छत अंकुर लोचन लाजा । मंजुल मंजरि तुलसि बिराजा ॥ ५ ॥ bibidha bidhāna bājanē bājē. maṅgala mudita sumitrām̐ sājē. 3.

 harada dūba dadhi pallava phūlā. pāna pūgaphala maṅgala mūlā. 4.
 acchata aṅkura lōcana lājā. maṅjula maṅjari tulasī birājā. 5.

Musical instruments of different kinds began playing melodious music of all notes. Meanwhile, Sumitra cheerfully collected all the auspicious items of good omen (needed to welcome the arriving marriage party). [What these items were are described in the verses that follow below.] (3)

[Verse nos. 4-7 tell us the auspicious items of good omen that Sumitra, Lord Ram's step-mother and the mother of Laxman, had collected and arranged on a plate with which she and other mothers would perform the "Aarti ritual", mentioned in verse no. 8, of the four grooms and their brides.]

Things that are considered as harbingers of good omen and used for auspicious ceremonies that were collected by Sumitra were the following—Harada (literally meaning "yellow", a reference to turmeric because it is deep yellow), blades of Durba grass (a special family of grass that is dark in colour), Dadhi (curd), Pallav (leaves, especially of the mango tree), Phool (flowers of various kinds), Paan (betel leaves),

Poog-phal (betel-nuts), Mangal Mool (roots of certain plants that are regarded as auspicious) [4]----

-----Akshat (unbroken rice grains), Ankur (sprouts of barley and other grains), Gorochan (a yellow pigment extracted from the bile of cows), Lava (parched and dried flakes of paddy), and Manjul Manjari (lovely blossoms) of the Tulsi (Basil) plant, [5]<sup>1</sup> (4-5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos 2 that precedes Doha no. 313.]

छुहे पुरट घट सहज सुहाए । मदन सकुन जनु नीड़ बनाए ॥ ६ ॥

सगुन सुगंध न जाहिं बखानी । मंगल सकल सजहिं सब रानी ॥ ७ ॥

रचीं आरतीं बहुत बिधाना । मुदित करहिं कल मंगल गाना ॥ ८ ॥

chuhē puraṭa ghaṭa sahaja suhā'ē. madana sakuna janu nīra banā'ē. 6.
saguna sugandha na jāhiṁ bakhānī. maṅgala sakala sajahīṁ saba rānī. 7.
racīṁ āratīṁ bahuta bidhānā. mudita karahīṁ kala maṅgala gānā. 8.

[Besides the above things, Sumitra also arranged for the following items—] Golden pitchers were coloured so beautifully and looked so captivating as if birds symbolising Kamdeo (cupid) had decided to make them their nests.<sup>1</sup> (6)

In addition to the items mentioned above, there were different perfumes of so many varieties that they cannot be described.

In this way, the queens collected various auspicious things indicating good omens as they prepared themselves to formally welcome the marriage party when it would arrive shortly at the gates of the royal palace. (7)

Having thus made diverse and all possible arrangements for doing the Aarti (at the time of arrival of the marriage procession at the gates of the royal palace by showing of lighted lamps and sprinkling other auspicious items enumerated above), the queens joyfully sang auspicious songs befitting the festive atmosphere and the happy occasion (as they waited for the arrival of the procession at the palace).<sup>2</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>To wit, amidst the other paraphernalia collected for the formal welcoming ceremony of the marriage party, there were small coloured golden pots which looked as if small beautiful birds representing the god of beauty and charm, known as Kamdeo, have come to sit down amongst the other items so as to mingle with them and get an opportunity to worship and see Lord Ram and Sita, as well as the other brothers and their brides, from close quarters when these auspicious items would be used by the mothers to welcome the Lord and do his Aarti.

Whenever the magnificence, charm, attractiveness and beauty of something are to be emphasised, Tulsidas invokes Kamdeo as he is the patron deity of these virtues. In this context, refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 350 which describes that the four thrones upon which the four grooms (Lord Ram and his three brothers) and their respective brides (Sita and her sisters) were seated were so magnificent to behold that it appeared that these thrones were made by Kamdeo himself with his own hands.

<sup>2</sup>Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 317 which describe the similar performance of Aarti when Lord Ram arrived at the venue of the marriage ceremony dressed as a groom.

Similarly, in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 345 we read about the women-folk of Ayodhya preparing to perform the Aarti of the four brothers and their brides when they returned home.]

दो०. कनक थार भरि मंगलन्हि कमल करन्हि लिऐँ मात ।

चलीं मुदित परिछनि करन पुलक पल्लवित गात ॥ ३४६ ॥

dōhā.

kanaka thāra bhari maṅgalanhi kamala karanhi li'ēm̐ māta.
calīm mudita parichani karana pulaka pallavita gāta. 346.

Holding golden plates filled with all the items of good omen that they had collected (and enumerated in the above verses), the queen-mothers proceeded ahead cheerfully, with their bodies thrilled with pleasant emotions, to welcome their sons and the marriage party upon their arrival at the gates of the royal palace. (Doha no. 346)

[Note—The queen-mothers were very eager to see Lord Ram return home with his bride. In fact, it was a universal refrain with everyone that they were all eager to have a divine sight of the Lord—refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 300.]

चौ०. धूप धूम नभु मेचक भयऊ । सावन घन घमंडु जनु ठयऊ ॥ १ ॥

सुरतरु सुमन माल सुर बरषहिं । मनहुँ बलाक अवलि मनु करषहिं ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

dhūpa dhūma nabhu mēcaka bhaya'ū. sāvana ghana ghamanḍu janu ṭhaya'ū.

1.

surataru sumana māla sura baraṣahim̐. manahum̐ balāka avalī manu karaṣahim̐. 2.

[In the following verses, the celebrations and festivities of Ayodhya at the time of the arrival of the marriage procession are being described. A great resemblance is to be found between this description and the one that follows the birth of the four brothers in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 195 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 3-8.

It ought to be noted here that these verses have liberally employed wonderful metaphors to describe the festive atmosphere in Ayodhya at that time—that of the rainy season with its dark rain-bearing clouds, rainbows, lightening and rows of birds flying across the sky against the backdrop of the clouds, the thunder and clap, the falling of rain and the scent that is created when it falls on the ground, the loud sound of croaking frogs, singing larks, screaming peacocks, and the citizens feeling happy just like the farmer feels when it rains to save his crops and when he has had a rich harvest—all these have been employed here.]

The whole sky was covered with a thick veil formed by smoke arising from burning of incense and by the spraying of perfumes as if dark rain-bearing clouds of the rainy season have arisen from the horizon and spread all across the canopy of the sky.<sup>1</sup> (1)

The gods rained down garlands made of flowers from the evergreen tree of heaven, known as the ‘Surtaru’ (literally meaning the “tree of gods”)<sup>2</sup>. They looked like rows of herons flying in the sky, a sight that captivates the ‘Mana’ (mind and heart) of the beholder<sup>3</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 195 which refers to the sky being filled with flying coloured powder and smoke from burning incense at the time of birth of Lord Ram and his three brothers in Ayodhya.

<sup>2</sup>We have read on many earlier occasions that the gods have showered flowers from the heaven. Some of the instances are the following: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 297; (ii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 323; (iii) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 324; (iv) Doha no. 324 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 7; and (v) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 323.

The only difference is that at all the above places the gods have showered ‘flowers’, but here they have showered ‘garlands’.

<sup>3</sup>When Sita had raised her arms to put the victory garland around the neck of Lord Ram, a similar metaphor of rows of birds has been used, but with a little variance. There the garland in the hands of Sita is compared to a lotus flower with its stalk, but here the comparison is made to the row of herons. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 264.

However, in ‘Geetawali Ramayan’ (one of the other wonderful books of Tulsidas), Baal Kand, verse no. 96, stanza no. 4, the metaphor that is used to describe the beautiful sight of Lord Ram wearing the victory garland around his neck is that of a row of swans coming down to settle down on the branches of the Tamaal tree (the black catechu plant).]

मंजुल मनिमय बंदनिवारे । मनहुँ पाकरिपु चाप सँवारे ॥ ३ ॥

प्रगटहिं दुरहिं अटन्ह पर भामिनि । चारु चपल जनु दमकहिं दामिनि ॥ ४ ॥ mañjula manimaya bandanivārē. manahum̐ pākaripu cāpa sam̐vārē. 3.

pragaṭahiṁ durahiṁ aṭan̐ha para bhāmini. cāru capala janu damakahiṁ dāmini. 4.

Colourful and beautifully decorated festoons and buntings, richly embroidered with precious stones and priceless gems, were hung up everywhere as if many rainbows had appeared in the sky simultaneously.<sup>1</sup> (3)

The sight of lovely ladies appearing and disappearing repeatedly on the roof-tops of houses (as they excitedly peered over from the roof-top balconies and railings to look at the crowd and celebrations down on the streets) resembled a dazzle of lightening that appears and disappears quickly in the sky (when rain-bearing clouds appear during the rainy season).<sup>2</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The metaphor of the rainbow implies that the entire city was decorated with countless festive banners put up high above the ground so that they were visible from all the corners of the city. Against the dark cloud formed by the smoke of burning incense, these colourful banners and festoons simmered in the reflected light of the city so as to resemble many rainbows appearing simultaneously.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 289; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 296.

The use of the metaphor of the ‘rainbow’ indicates that the houses of Ayodhya were reasonably high-rise because some of the banners may have been strung across the breadth of the streets, tied to two rooftops on either side of the street. This observation finds proof in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 27.

Another place where the “rainbow” has been used as a metaphor is in Ram Charit Manas, Lanka Kand, Chanda line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 100 when the war scene is being described in the battle-field of Lanka. But here, the rainbow refers to the numerous bent tails of countless illusionary Hanumans that Ravana, the demon king of Lanka, had created using his magical powers to create confusion in the army of Lord Ram.

The book “Janki Mangal” of Tulsidas also refers to the colourful festoons and buntings in its verse no. 184.

<sup>2</sup>Not all the ladies were able to join the celebrations on the streets. Some stayed back home, and these ladies climbed to the terraces of their homes to crane their necks to get a glimpse of the celebrations in the city. The roof-tops were jam-packed with excited women even as they jostled with each other to have a better view of the happenings. All these ladies wore sparkling ornaments and clothes, and therefore from the streets below their quick appearance and disappearance over the edges of the terraces and balconies of their homes reminded one of the scene of appearance and disappearance of quick and rapid flashes of lightening in the cloud during the rainy season.

Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 297 that compares the beauty of the fully adorned ladies of Ayodhya with dazzle of lightening.]

दुंदुभि धुनि घन गरजनि घोरा । जाचक चातक दादुर मोरा ॥ ५ ॥

सुर सुगंध सुचि बरषहिं बारी । सुखी सकल ससि पुर नर नारी ॥ ६ ॥ dundubhi dhuni ghana garajani ghōrā. jācaka cātaka dādura mōrā. 5.

sura sugandha suci baraṣahiṁ bārī. sukhī sakala sasi pura nara nārī. 6.

The clamour of the sound produced by enthusiastic beating of the kettle-drums resembled the reverberation created by the clap of thunder and its echoing sound.

Similarly, the babble of sounds created by alms-seekers was like the cacophony created by croaking frogs, sighing Chatak bird (sparrow hawk), and the screaming of peacocks (during the rainy season).<sup>1</sup> (5)

The gods showered scented perfumes from the sky that resembled rain water filled with a pleasant and exotic scent. [When the rain falls on the ground, a pleasant scent emanates from the soil, and the whole environment is filled with its earthen fragrance.]

All the men and the women of the city (Ayodhya) were happy like the crop that blooms when the rain falls. [Here, the citizens are like the crop, and when the gods showered perfumes on the city, these citizens felt exhilarated and rejuvenated like the crop does when rain falls on the ground. In other words, all the citizens of Ayodhya were very happy and joyous at the news that Lord Ram and his marriage party have arrived.] (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 296; and Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 38.

During the rainy season, these three creatures are usually heard when the cloud appears in the sky. The frog croaks, the peacock screams, and the sparrow hawk begins to ‘sigh’ because it is very much in love with the rain and hopes the cloud will oblige it by putting a drop of rain-water into its beak directly to finally quench its thirst.

The sound of the kettle-drum is very loud, and it resembles the rumbling and thundering of the clouds. The kettle-drum was the standard instrument used in those days to announce some important moment or event precisely because of its quality to produce a loud reverberating sound, louder and deeper than the conventional drum. When the kettle-drum was beaten, its sound could be heard for long distances. Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 262; (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 286; (iii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 301; (iv) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 304; (v) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 313; (vi) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 343; (vii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 344.]

समउ जानि गुर आयसु दीन्हा । पुर प्रबेसु रघुकुलमनि कीन्हा ॥ ७ ॥

सुमिरि संभु गिरिजा गनराजा । मुदित महीपति सहित समाजा ॥ ८ ॥

sama'u jāni gura āyasu dīnhā. pura prabēsu raghukulamani kīnhā. 7.
sumiri sambhu girijā ganarājā. mudita mahīpati sahita samājā. 8.

When the right time arrived (i.e. when the time was auspicious), the guru (sage Vasistha) ordered the king to enter the city. At his commands, the king (Dasrath) who was like a gem in the dynasty of king Raghu (“Raghu-kul-mani”) entered the city.<sup>1</sup> (7)

[At the time of entering the city of Ayodhya—] The king invoked (reverentially remembered) Lord Shiva, goddess Girija (Parvati, the divine consort of Shiva) and

Ganaraaj (Lord Ganesh, the chief of the attendants of Shiva)<sup>2</sup> and felt very euphoric and happy along with the rest of the members of the marriage party. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The Guru's orders were always taken before doing anything, and the guru gave his consent only when the time was right and opportune. There are many instances supporting this. For example: Refer to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 218 when Lord Ram has sought the permission of sage Vishwamitra before going to visit the city of Janakpur for sight-seeing; (ii) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 227 where we read that when the time came, Lord Ram took permission from his guru, sage Vishwamitra, to go and bring flowers for the worship rituals of the sage; (iii) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 237 which narrates that Lord Ram took orders from his to do his evening prayers; (iv) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 262; (v) Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 254 when sage Vishwamitra found that the opportune moment had arrived and he ordered Lord Ram to go and break the bow.

Further we read that Janak has called Sita to the venue of the bow-breaking ceremony when the right moment arrived—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 246. Similarly, even at the time of the final marriage rituals, Sita was called only when the two gurus, sages Vasistha and Satanand, had decided that the right moment had arrived and had ordered king Janak to call Sita to the venue—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precedes Doha no. 322.

Janak had sought and obtained the permission of guru sage Vasistha when he decided to marry all the princesses of Janakpur to the four princes of Ayodhya—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 325.

<sup>2</sup>Once again we see here that invoking Lord Shiva, Lord Ganesh and goddess Parvati was a standard practice before leaving or entering any place.

For instance, when king Dasrath boarded his chariot to leave for Janakpur with the marriage party of Lord Ram, he had prayed to these deities—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 301.

Later on in the story we shall read that at the time of departure for the forest, Lord Ram had too offered his obeisance to these deities in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precede Doha no. 81.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chanda line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 323, and (ii) Doha no. 345.]

दो०. होहिं सगुन बरषहिं सुमन सुर दुंदुभीं बजाइ ।

बिबुध बधू नाचहिं मुदित मंजुल मंगल गाइ ॥ ३४७ ॥

dōhā.

hōhiṁ saguna baraṣahiṁ sumana sura dundubhīṁ bajā'i.
bibudha badhū nācahiṁ mudita maṅjula maṅgala gā'i. 347.

Many auspicious and good omens occurred at those moments. The gods showered flowers from the sky and played the kettle-drums to celebrate the occasion (of the marriage procession entering the city of Ayodhya).

The consort of the gods as well as other celestial nymphs danced merrily in gay abundance as they sang melodious songs befitting the happy moments. (347)

[Note—Similar narration of gods showering flowers and playing their kettle-drums, as well as their consorts and celestial nymphs dancing and singing appear elsewhere also. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Doha no. 285; (ii) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 262; (iii) Doha no. 264 and its following Chaupai line no. 1; (iv) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 314; (v) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 319; (vi) Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 323; (vii) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 262.]

चौ०. मागध सूत बंदि नट नागर । गावहिं जसु तिहु लोक उजागर ॥ १ ॥
जय धुनि बिमल बेद बर बानी । दस दिसि सुनिअ सुमंगल सानी ॥ २ ॥
caupāī.

māgadha sūta bandi naṭa nāgara. gāvahiṃ jasu tiḥu lōka ujāgara. 1.
jaya dhuni bimala bēda bara bānī. dasa disi suni'a sumaṅgala sānī. 2.

The city's bards, minstrels, singers and dancers sang the glories of the family (i.e. of king Dasrath and his four sons, Lord Ram, Laxman, Bharat and Shatrughan) that was well-established and renowned in all the three divisions of the world (i.e. in the heaven, the earth and the nether world)<sup>1</sup>. (1)

The cacophonous sound of enthusiastic applause and joyful cheering, as well as of the chanting of the hymns of the Vedas (the scriptures) could be heard in all the ten directions of the world<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>These bards, minstrels, singers and dancers had joined the marriage party when it left Ayodhya for Janakpur—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 300.

Refer to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 4-5 that precede Doha no. 265, and Doha no. 262 which say that when Lord Ram broke the bow and married Sita, the minstrels and bards began praising the Lord's glory and fame that had spread to all the three divisions of the world—i.e. all over the earth, in the nether world (the subterranean world) and the heaven—by the virtue of this remarkable feat.

They also praised Dasrath because there was no one more praise-worthy than him in the three worlds because he was fortunate to have the supreme Lord as his son in the form of Lord Ram—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 294; and Ayodhya Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 2; (ii) from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 173—to Chaupai line no. 1 that follows this Doha; and (iii) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 209.

<sup>2</sup>The ten directions are the following—north, north-east, east, south-east, south, south-west, west, north-west, zenith and nadir.]

बिपुल बाजने बाजन लागे । नभ सुर नगर लोग अनुरागे ॥ ३ ॥
बने बराती बरनि न जाहीं । महा मुदित मन सुख न समाहीं ॥ ४ ॥ पुरबासिन्ह तब राय जोहारे । देखत रामहि भए सुखारे ॥ ५ ॥ bipula bājanē bājana lāgē. nabha sura nagara lōga anurāgē. 3.

 banē barātī barani na jāhīm. mahā mudita mana sukha na samāhīm. 4.
 purabāsinha taba rāya jōhārē. dēkhata rāmahi bha'ē sukhārē. 5.

Multiple types of musical instruments of different denominations began playing in large numbers simultaneously, while the gods in the heaven and the citizens in the city were all equally euphoric with joy and happiness<sup>1</sup>. (3)

The members of the bridegroom's party were looking very smart and handsome. All of them were exceedingly cheerful and were so happy that their happiness could not be contained in their hearts. [The demeanours, the facial expressions and the bodily gestures indicated that all the members of the marriage party were exceptionally happy and euphoric. Happiness and joy had overwhelmed them.]<sup>2</sup> (4)

Then (when the marriage procession had entered the city filled with exuberant and excited citizens who had lined the city's thoroughfare to welcome the groom and the bride, the king, and the rest of the marriage party), when the citizens saw the king (Dasrath), they paid their obeisance to him, and when they saw Lord Ram they felt exceptionally happy, elated and excited<sup>3</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 344; and Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 346.

<sup>2</sup>We have read earlier that when the marriage function of all the brothers was over and Janak had shown his warm respects to the members of the marriage party, all of them were very happy and delighted—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 and Chanda line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 326.

The enthusiasm of the members of the marriage party and the remarkable sense of happiness and joy that they exhibited is vividly depicted in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 298—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 304 which deal with the assembly and departure of the groom's party from Ayodhya.

<sup>3</sup>The king was leading the procession, and it was customary for the citizens to first pay their respect to their king before they showed respect to others. Then their eyes turned to their favourite prince, Lord Ram, who looked wonderful dressed as a groom. He was the cynosure of all eyes; everyone was gazing at him. But it should be remembered here that it does not mean that they neglected the other brothers: they loved all of them equally, but still Lord Ram was dearest to their hearts amongst the four brothers. It is just like the case of a parent having four children. He or she will love all the children equally, but out of the four siblings one is his or her favourite.

It is to be noted here that the marriage party which had gone to Janakpur to attend the wedding ceremony of Lord Ram consisted of selected senior citizens and elders of the kingdom, royal family members, ministers, courtiers, commanders of various army units, as well as elderly Brahmins. This is obvious, because it is impractical and impossible that everyone could go to Janakpur. So in the city of Ayodhya, everyone was eagerly watching for the news of the arrival of the marriage party with the groom and the bride. Herald's who reached the city ahead of the main procession informed the people that all the four brothers have been married, and they are coming back with their brides. This news spread like wildfire, and the city erupted in joy. The citizens waited eagerly for the actual arrival of the marriage procession, and as soon as sound of musical instruments, playing at the vanguard of the fast approaching procession, was heard from a distance, the whole city poured out on the streets, filling it chock-a-block with exuberant citizens. Ladies and old gentlemen who could not come out onto the streets went to the terraces and balconies of their homes. Children, babbling and shouting excitedly, joined the crowd on the streets or elbowed their way between their mothers and elderly ladies who had jam-packed the terraces and balconies.

Remember: Preparations were in full swing in the city of Ayodhya ever since the marriage party had left the city for Janakpur. So at the time of arrival, every manner of welcome sign was ready, and the citizens lost no time to fill the streets. The whole atmosphere in Ayodhya was electrifying, and it looked that this day was the best day for the citizens in their lives.

One thing more is to be noted here: As the story unfolds, we will see how the same city was plunged in a dark well of gloom, despondency, dismay and helplessness when, due to the dictates of Providence, Lord Ram, Sita and Laxman had to go to the forest, which is the subject matter of the next Canto called 'Ayodhya Kand'*. Later on we shall read that a day would come when they returned back home. That day was another day written in golden letters and time for mass celebrations, and the citizens found themselves once again celebrating, but this time it was the return of Lord Ram, Sita and Laxman from the forest, in almost the same way and with the same enthusiasm and exuberance as they displayed today when Lord Ram and his brothers came to Ayodhya with their respective brides. The celebrations marking the return of the Lord from the forest has been described in the beginning of the last Canto of this Book, and it is called 'Uttar Kand'#. {Refer: *(i) Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 81—to Doha no. 86; #(ii) Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 3 along with Chaupai line nos. 1-10 that precede it; Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 11; Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 15.}

When we compare the mass celebrations and exhilaration of the two events, arrival of Lord Ram's marriage party now, and the Lord's return from the forest, we will notice a striking similarity.

This Book "Ram Charit Manas" is dedicated to Lord Ram, and he is the central figure in the story, the hero of the story, the protagonist. Therefore, all attention revolves around him. But nevertheless, they were equally charmed by the sight of the four brothers, and they had shown equal respect and warm welcome to all the four as would be clear in verse no. 7 herein below.]

करहिं निछावरि मनिगन चीरा । बारि बिलोचन पुलक सरीरा ॥ ६ ॥
 आरति करहिं मुदित पुर नारी । हरषहिं निरखि कुअँर बर चारी ॥ ७ ॥ सिबिका सुभग ओहार उघारी । देखि दुलहिनिन्ह होहिं सुखारी ॥ ८ ॥ karahim nichāvari manigana cīrā. bāri bilōcana pulaka sarīrā. 6.

 āratī karahim mudita pura nārī. haraṣahim nirakhi ku'amra bara cārī. 7.
 sibikā subhaga ōhāra ughārī. dēkhi dulahininha hōhim sukhārī. 8.

The citizens warmly and enthusiastically welcomed the grooms (the four princes) and the king (Dasrath) by liberally scattering gifts consisting of gems, clothes etc. around them (to show their happiness and delight). Their eyes were filled with tears of joy and happiness, and their bodies were thrilled with exhilaration. (6)

The men and the women folk of the city performed the “Aarti” of the four princes (Lord Ram, Bharat, Laxman and Shatrughan) with a delighted heart, and they felt exhilarated when they gazed at the magnificent sight of the four princes (dressed in all their finery as four noble grooms). (7)

Besides feeling delighted at seeing the four grooms, they (the women folk) felt very happy when they courteously lifted or moved aside the curtains covering the windows of the palanquins in which the brides were seated<sup>1</sup>, and beheld the latter. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>An important deduction can be made here, and it is very obvious from verse no. 8: it is that the ordinary people could get close to the members of the royalty without fear of punishment or rebuke. Though formal protocol was maintained, but the king always ensured that he does not alienate his subjects. Formalities were observed in formal situations such as attendance in the royal court or royal processions, but on other occasions, such as festivals and ceremonies or any other especial occasion in the kingdom and the royal family, the ordinary people were free to mingle with the members of the royal family of the king. This was a great system that created a voluntary sense of loyalty, faithfulness and belonging amongst the subjects of a king. The people felt that their king was very easily accessible, and he was one of them. The king was like the head of a large extended family, and allegiance and loyalty to him was spontaneous and voluntary, not something that was forced upon the citizens by threat of punishment or coercion of any kind. The king was not to be feared but loved and respected.

On earlier occasions too we read that the citizens of Ayodhya had free access to the palace of the king during celebratory times—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 194 at the time of Lord Ram’s birth; and Doha no. 297 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 1-8 that describes how the citizens continuously flowed in and out of the royal palace of Ayodhya in jubilant mood to celebrate and congratulate the royal family when the news of Lord Ram’s marriage arrived in the city.

In spite of the general atmosphere of merriment and informal nature of the interaction between the king’s family and the ordinary citizens at the time when the marriage procession entered the city of Ayodhya, the basic requirements of good manners and customs of the society were observed. So, while the “Aarti” of the four grooms were performed by the men and the women alike, it was only the women-folk who were allowed to come close to the palanquins carrying the four brides, lift the curtains, and see them.]

दे०। एहि बिधि सबही देत सुखु आए राजदुआर ।

मुदित मातु परिछनि करहिं बधुन्ह समेत कुमार ॥ ३४८ ॥

dōhā.

ēhi bidhi sabahī dēta sukhu ā'ē rājadu'āra.
mudita mātu parichani karahim badhunha samēta kumāra. 348.

On this wise, the four princes came to the gates of the royal palace all the while bestowing happiness and joy to all the citizens who had assembled on either side of the road to welcome them.

As soon as they reached the gates of the palace, the euphoric mothers (Kaushalya, Sumitra and Kaikeyi) welcomed the four princes and their respective brides<sup>1</sup> most warmly and very affectionately. (Doha no. 348)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>How were they welcomed? Well, the answer is in the next verse nos. 1-2 that follow below: by doing their Aarti repeatedly, and giving away different kinds of valuable gifts to whosoever came to receive them.]

चौ०. करहिं आरती बारहिं बारा । प्रेमु प्रमोदु कहै को पारा ॥ १ ॥
भूषन मनि पट नाना जाती । करहिं निछावरि अगनित भाँती ॥ २ ॥
caupāī.

karahim āratī bārahim bārā. prēmu pramōdu kahai kō pārā. 1.
bhūṣana mani paṭa nānā jāṭī. karahim nichāvari aganita bhāmṭī. 2.

The mothers performed the Aarti of the grooms repeatedly. Who can completely describe the extent of their happiness and joy? [To wit, the mothers were not contented by doing the Aarti, waving of lighted lamps in the front of the grooms as a good omen, once. So they did it again and again. They felt so happy and delighted that it is impossible to properly describe their emotions in words.]<sup>1</sup> (1)

They (the jubilant mothers) offered countless varieties of ornaments, gems, clothes and robes as gifts<sup>2</sup> (to celebrate the home-coming of the four brothers accompanied with their brides). (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 1/109, stanza no. 5 also.

When Lord Ram returned to Ayodhya after his 14-year forest exile, the mother (Kaushalya) was thrilled when she saw him and had then performed his Aarti in the same way—repeatedly, and filled with joy. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 12.

Earlier in our present narration it has been said that when the bridegrooms' party arrived at Ayodhya, the mothers were so exuberant with joy that they lost awareness of the senses of the physical body so much so that their legs gave way and refused to move though they had wanted to rush forward to embrace their beloved sons—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 345—to Chaupai line no. 1 that follows this Doha.

<sup>2</sup>The exact word used in the verse is “Nichaawari”. It is a custom where gifts are waved in the front of the person who is shown respect and honour, just like doing his Aarti, and then these gifts are scattered all around him. Friends, attendants, and even guests pick these gifts and keep them as memorabilia. Sometimes the people who collect these gifts give them to others or share them amongst themselves. Some of the gifts are scattered on the ground to be picked up at random by alms-seekers, servants and other attendants lower down in the rung of the hierarchy.

Giving of gifts consisting of ornaments and clothes was a standard practice at that time. We have read that Janak had given such gifts at the end of the marriage ceremony—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 326, and Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 333.

Earlier, such gifts were given and shared by the citizens of Janakpur at the time when Lord Ram had broken the bow to marry Sita—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, line no. 2 of Doha no. 262.

More often than not, such gifts were immediately shared by the recipient of the gift with others who could not come at the time when the gift was being given, or because the recipient wishes to share this gift as a token of rejoicing the happy and auspicious moment—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 194.]

बधुन्ह समेत देखि सुत चारी । परमानंद मगन महतारी ॥ ३ ॥

पुनि पुनि सीय राम छबि देखी । मुदित सफल जग जीवन लेखी ॥ ४ ॥ badhunha samēta dēkhi suta cārī. paramānanda magana mahatārī. 3.

puni puni sīya rāma chabi dēkhī. mudita saphala jaga jīvana lēkhī. 4.

Seeing the four sons with their respective brides, the mothers were euphoric with joy so much so that they became overwhelmed with emotions of happiness and ecstasy<sup>1</sup>. (3)

They repeatedly glanced at the lovely face of Lord Ram and the pretty face of Sita, and this view made them so delighted that they felt that they were seeing the fruits of all their meritorious deeds in life in a personified form as Lord Ram and Sita<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to: (a) Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 109; and (b) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 345—to Chaupai line no. 1 that follows this Doha. These latter verses also describe how greatly the mothers were happy and delighted—they had lost awareness of the senses of their bodies and their legs froze because their bodies were exceedingly thrilled.

It ought to be noted that these three things mentioned in these verse nos. 1-3 here—i.e. doing of Aarti, offering of gifts and then scattering them around the four grooms and their brides, and the happiness of the mothers—have happened when the couples had reached the gates of the palace. We shall read below that the same process is repeated once again when the mothers escort them inside the palace and make them sit on thrones for formal offering of respect and worship—refer: Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 350 herein below.

<sup>2</sup>Refer also to: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 109.

When the marriage party had arrived in Ayodhya, the women-folk of the city had similarly gazed at the charming face of Lord Ram and of Sita by lifting the curtain of the palanquin in which she was sitting—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 348.

Refer also to Chaupai line no. 5 herein below.]

सखीं सीय मुख पुनि पुनि चाही । गान करहिं निज सुकृत सराही ॥ ५ ॥ बरषहिं सुमन छनहिं छन देवा । नाचहिं गावहिं लावहिं सेवा ॥ ६ ॥ sakhīm sīya mukha puni puni cāhī. gāna karahīm nija sukr̥ta sarāhī. 5.

baraṣahīm sumana chanahīm chana dēvā. nācahīm gāvahīm lāvahīm sēvā. 6.

Not only the mothers, their friends and companions too felt delighted and loved to see the pretty face of Sita repeatedly even as they sang felicitous songs and thanked their good luck as well as the meritorious deeds they may have done in their lives that bestowed them with this reward or privilege<sup>1</sup>. (5)

The gods in the heaven celebrated the occasion by showering flowers every other moment. They and the other celestial damsels danced and sang in the sky to render their service to the Lord in their own unique way<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer Chaupai line no. 4 above.

<sup>2</sup>The people on earth danced and sang to celebrate the occasion, so the gods did their bit by dancing and singing in the heaven.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 319 which says that the gods showered flowers from the sky whenever they found a chance.

All throughout the time the marriage rituals were being performed, the gods had been showering flowers. On many an occasion they had played their musical instruments, especially the kettle-drum—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 347.

This was their way of expressing their happiness to see Lord Ram getting married to Sita.]

देखि मनोहर चारिउ जोरीं । सारद उपमा सकल ढँढोरीं ॥ ७ ॥
देत न बनहिं निपट लघु लागीं । एकटक रहीं रूप अनुरागीं ॥ ८ ॥ dēkhi manōhara cāri'u jōrīm. sārada upamā sakala ḍhamḍhōrīm. 7.

dēta na banahīm nipaṭa laghu lāgīm. ēkaṭaka rahīm rūpa anurāgīm. 8.

Watching the four pairs of brides and their grooms, goddess Sarada (i.e. goddess Saraswati, the patron deity of knowledge and spoken word) searched everywhere in the world to find a suitable comparison [7], but she failed miserably as she could not find a single example with which to compare the magnificent view she beheld in her front (of the four couples). So finally she gave up and decided to abandon her scholarship, and instead concentrate upon enjoying the sight of the beautiful image before her. So she fixed her gaze on the pretty image of the four pairs of brides and their grooms [8]. (7-8)

[Note—Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 318 that reiterates that Sarda had failed to describe the delight in the heart of the mother-in-law of Lord Ram when she saw the Lord dressed as a groom.]

दो०. निगम नीति कुल रीति करि अरघ पाँवड़े देत ।
 बधुन्ह सहित सुत परिछि सब चलीं लवाइ निकेत ॥ ३४९ ॥
 dōhā.

nigama nīti kula rīti kari aragha pām̐varē dēta.
 badhunha sahita suta parichi saba calīṁ lavā'i nikēta. 349.

After doing all the rituals as prescribed in the Vedas and traditionally observed in the family, the mothers escorted the princes and their brides inside the royal palace, offering oblations of water in their front as they walked, and spreading carpets before them as a mark of warm welcome and respect. (Doha no. 349)

[Note—Similar welcome and respect was shown to Lord Ram at the time he had entered the venue of the marriage ceremony—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1-4 that precede Doha no. 319. However, it was the Lord's mother-in-law who had done it at that time.]

चौ०. चारि सिंघासन सहज सुहाए । जनु मनोज निज हाथ बनाए ॥ १ ॥
 तिन्ह पर कुअँरि कुअँर बैठारे । सादर पाय पुनीत पखारे ॥ २ ॥
 caupāī.

cāri siṅghāsana sahaja suhā'ē. janu manōja nija hātha banā'ē. 1.
 tinha para ku'am̐ri ku'am̐ra baiṭhārē. sādara pāya punīta pakhārē. 2.

There were four exquisitely crafted thrones that appeared as if they were made by Kamdeo (cupid) with his own hands. (1)

The four princes and princesses were made to sit on them. Then their holy feet were respectfully washed (by the mothers). (2)

[Note—This is a custom in every household that when the son comes home after marriage, his mother and other female relatives wash his feet as well as that of his bride as a sign of their respect for them.

Kamdeo is the patron deity of beauty and glamour, and so when he designs and makes any thing with his own hands he takes care that the product matches his own reputation. He makes sure that whatever he crafts is excellent and the best product as far as its beauty, charm and attractiveness are concerned. In this context, refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 346.]

धूप दीप नैबेद बेद बिधि । पूजे बर दुलहिनि मंगलनिधि ॥ ३ ॥
 बारहिं बार आरती करहीं । ब्यजन चारु चामर सिर ढरहीं ॥ ४ ॥

बस्तु अनेक निछावरि होहीं । भरीं प्रमोद मातु सब सोहीं ॥ ५ ॥ dhūpa dīpa naibēda bēda bidhi. pūjē bara dulaḥini maṅgalanidhi. 3.

bārahiṁ bāra āratī karahiṁ. byajana cāru cāmara sira ḍharahiṁ. 4.
bastu anēka nichāvari hōhīṁ. bharīṁ pramōda mātu saba sōhīṁ. 5.

The four grooms and their respective brides, who were treasuries of all the good virtues and excellent qualities, were duly worshipped in accordance with the method prescribed by the Vedas by offering incense, showing lighted lamps, and oblations consisting of sweets and fruits. (3)

The mothers did their Aarti (waved lighted lamps at them) repeatedly. Hand-held fans and whisks were simultaneously waved near their heads. (4)

A wide variety of things (gifts) were ceremonially offered to the four couples and then scattered around them (so that those present on the occasion could pick these things up as token gifts to celebrate the auspicious occasion). The mothers were overwhelmed with exultation, happiness and joy. (5)

[Note—The same ceremonial welcome by doing Aarti and offering of gifts, and the same happiness of the mothers, has been described a little earlier when the four couples had reached the gates of the royal palace—refer: Doha no. 348 and its following Chaupai line nos. 1-3 herein above.]

पावा परम तत्व जनु जोगीं । अमृतु लहेउ जनु संतत रोगीं ॥ ६ ॥

जनम रंक जनु पारस पावा । अंधहि लोचन लाभु सुहावा ॥ ७ ॥

मूक बदन जनु सारद छाई । मानहुँ समर सूर जय पाई ॥ ८ ॥

pāvā parama tatva janu jōgīṁ. amṛtu lahē'u janu santata rōgīṁ. 6.
janama raṅka janu pārasa pāvā. andhahi lōcana lābhu suhāvā. 7.
mūka badana janu sārada chāī. mānahuṁ samara sūra jaya pāī. 8.

[These three verses describe the extent of happiness and joy of the mothers by making comparisons with other instances which gives immense sense of satisfaction, ecstasy and bliss to the concerned person.]

The mothers were so exceptionally happy and joyous as if an ascetic has attained the ultimate Truth and Essence of all spiritual endeavours (i.e. the ascetic feels ecstatic and exhilarated at having attained the goal of his spiritual pursuit)<sup>1</sup>, or as if a chronically ill patient lays his hands on Amrit, the ambrosia of healthy life [6],---

---Or as if a person who is impoverished since birth suddenly finds the magical stone that can convert base metal into gold (the 'Paaras Mani' or the philosopher's stone)<sup>2</sup>, or as if a blind person gets the reward of eyesight<sup>3</sup> [7],---

---Or as if a born-dumb person is blessed by the goddess of fine speech so that he can speak excellently<sup>4</sup>, or as if a warrior becomes victorious in a battle [8]. (6-8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Tulsidas has used metaphors extensively to stress any point. An abundance of metaphors and similes are found in Ram Charit Manas, Kishkindha Kand, from Doha no. 13—to Doha no. 17 which describe the natural beauty of the mountain where Lord Ram and Laxman lived during the four months of the rainy season in the kingdom of Kishkindha before the monkey messengers were sent in all the directions to search for Sita.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 69 that says that the cooling effect of the shadow of a tree is experienced and enjoyed only by a person who is scorched and tormented by the heat of the sun.

<sup>1</sup>Earlier, when Lord Ram had stepped inside the arena where the bow-breaking ceremony was to be held, Tulsidas has said that some of the invited kings who were wise and spiritually inclined had drawn the same kind of immense bliss and joy when they saw the Lord that an ascetic finds upon the realization of the ultimate spiritual Truth. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 69

Another reference is in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 239 which describes how Bharat felt exceedingly contented and happy when he entered the hermitage of Lord Ram in Chitrakoot as if a hermit or an ascetic has found the ultimate goal of his spiritual pursuit.

<sup>2</sup>Some of the other instances where attainment of immense happiness is compared to a pauper getting rich are: (i) Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 102 that says Kewat, the boatman, told Lord Ram when the latter tried to pay the boatman the charges of ferrying him across river Ganges that he (the boatman) has found such immense wealth of happiness that day as if all his poverty down the ages has vanished in an instant, and therefore he does not want anything more. (ii) Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 238 which says that when Bharat saw the footprints of Lord Ram on the ground as he was going in search of the Lord in the forest, Bharat felt as happy as if a pauper has found the “Paaras Mani”.

<sup>3</sup>When Laxman was given permission by Lord Ram to accompany the latter to the forest, he (Laxman) felt as happy as a blind man getting vision—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 73.

<sup>4</sup>When Bharat found that Lord Ram was pleased with him, the former felt as happy as a dumb man who is blessed with the ability to speak—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 307.]

दो०. एहि सुख ते सत कोटि गुन पावहिं मातु अनंदु।
 भाइन्ह सहित बिआहि घर आए रघुकुलचंदु ॥ ३५० ( क ) ॥
 लोक रीति जननीं करहिं बर दुलहिनि सकुचाहिं। मोदु बिनोदु बिलोकि बड़ रामु मनहिं मुसुकाहिं ॥ ३५० ( ख ) ॥

dōhā.

ēhi sukha tē sata kōṭi guna pāvahim mātu anandu.
 bhā'inha sahita bi'āhi ghara ā'ē raghukulacandu. 350 (a).

lōka rīti jananiṁ karahiṁ bara dulaḥini sakucāhiṁ.
mōdu binōdu bilōki baṛa rāmu manahiṁ musukāhiṁ. 350 (b).

The mothers derived happiness that was thousands of times more than the joys described above (in verse nos. 6-8). The reason for this exclusive happiness of the mothers, however, was of course that Lord Ram—who was like a moon (i.e. most glorious and eminent member) in the family of king Raghu (i.e. the royal dynasty of Ayodhya)—had come home with his brothers after all of them had been married. (Doha no. 350 a)

The mothers were doing all the customary rites that were to be done according to established traditions even as the grooms and the brides felt abashed and shyful during the proceedings. [These rites were intended to create an informal friendly atmosphere, and remove shyness and inhibitions between the groom and the bride. This helped the newly arrived girl to integrate easily with the groom's family, to feel at home and become friendly with all the members of her in-law's family.]

Meanwhile, Lord Ram subtly smiled to himself wryly as he watched the merriment and ecstasy of the occasion. (Doha no. 350 b.)

[Note—Lord Ram was a personified form of the Supreme Being. He was actually above such worldly emotions of being happy and ecstatic, for the Lord remained dispassionate, detached and neutral. He smiled wryly because he marveled at the power of his Maya (delusion creating powers of the Lord) that had made the mothers think that their sons have 'married'. In fact, Lord Ram, who was an incarnation of Lord Vishnu, had never separated from his divine consort goddess Laxmi who had revealed herself as Sita when the Lord decided to come down to earth to serve the cause of the gods, which was to eliminate the demons and to end their cruelty. It was simply a "re-union", and not a "new relationship".

Another reason for Lord Ram smiling wryly is that he knew that all this happiness and merriment was short-lived because shortly the developments would take a turn when he would have to go to the forest when all this happiness would turn into grief and sorrow.

The happiness of the mothers was superficial and not deep-seated. It was limited to the happenings of the gross world. This is because when the Lord would go to the forest, the same mother Kaushalya would start grieving and lamenting—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 57. On the other hand, the news that king Dasrath was compelled to send Lord Ram to the forest for 14 years due to some earlier promise he had made to his queen Kaikeyi had had no effect on the Lord—the reason being that the Lord was naturally blissful and happy, he was internally neutral to all emotions of either joy or sorrow—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 41, and Doha no. 51. Lord Ram had subtly smiled on this occasion also—refer specifically to Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precede Doha no. 41.]

चौ०. देव पितर पूजे बिधि नीकी । पूजिं सकल बासना जी की ॥ १ ॥

सबहि बंदि मागहिं बरदाना । भाइन्ह सहित राम कल्याना ॥ २ ॥

अंतरहित सुर आसिष देहीं । मुदित मातु अंचल भरि लेहीं ॥ ३ ॥

caupāī.

dēva pitara pūjē bidhi nīkī. pūjīm sakala bāsanā jī kī. 1.
 sabahi bandi māgahīm baradānā. bhā'inha sahita rāma kalyānā. 2.
 antarahita sura āsiṣa dēhīm. mudita mātu anācala bhari lēhīm. 3.

The mothers affectionately offered their worship and respect to the gods and spirits of ancestors by whose blessings all the desires of their hearts were fulfilled<sup>1</sup>. (1)

They prayed to all of them (i.e. all the gods and ancestors) to seek their blessings, requesting them to be benevolent, kind and munificent towards Lord Ram and his brothers (Laxman, Bharat and Shatrughan). (2)

The gods and holy spirits obliged the mothers by sincerely blessings the four brothers profusely even as the mothers accepted these blessings in a symbolic manner by spreading the ends of their garments<sup>2</sup>. (3)

[Note—Refer also to “Janki Mangal”, verse no. 190.

<sup>1</sup>A mother's most cherished dream is to see her beloved son married to a suitable girl. In this case, by the grace of the gods and the blessings of the spirits of ancestors, not only Lord Ram but all his other three brothers too were married to the most beautiful princesses of that time. It was like a boon multiplied many times over. This filled the heart of the three mothers, Kaushalya, Sumitra and Kaikeyi, with exultation and euphoria of the highest kind. They wished to profusely thank and express their heart-felt gratitude to the gods and the ancestors by worshipping them and praying to them.

<sup>2</sup>When someone begs for something he spreads his hands before the giver. Similarly, when the mothers sought blessings from the gods and spirits of ancestors for their four sons they spread the end of their garments as a symbolic gesture of accepting these blessings.]

भूपति बोलि बराती लीन्हे । जान बसन मनि भूषन दीन्हे ॥ ४ ॥ आयसु पाड़ राखि उर रामहि । मुदित गए सब निज निज धामहि ॥ ५ ॥ bhūpati bōli barātī līnhē. jāna basana mani bhūṣana dīnhē. 4.

 āyasu pā'i rākhi ura rāmahi. mudita ga'e saba nija nija dhāmahi. 5.

Meanwhile, the king (Dasrath) invited all the members of the marriage party to thank them and honouring them with gifts of vehicles, clothes, ceremonial robes, gems and ornaments<sup>1</sup>. (4)

After that (i.e. after receiving gifts and honours from the king as a token of formal farewell) all of them enshrined the beautiful image of Lord Ram in their hearts and went back to their homes joyfully. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to: Janki Mangal, verse no. 191.

It was, and still is, customary to say good-bye to guests by giving them gifts. We see the same procedure in Uttar Kand when Lord Ram had bid good-bye to his friends, the senior monkeys such as Angad and Sugriv, the bear king Jamvant, the demon king Vibhishan, and the head of the boatmen community called Nishad, who all had come to Ayodhya with the Lord when he returned at the end of his 14 years of forest exile and his successful campaign at Lanka. We also see that at the time of their departure for their homes, Lord Ram had requested all of them to keep him in their hearts as a token of remembrance and a bond of eternal friendship. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, from Doha no. 16—to Doha no. 17 Ka; and Doha no. 18 Kha.]

पुर नर नारि सकल पहिराए । घर घर बाजन लगे बधाए ॥ ६ ॥
 जाचक जन जाचहिं जोड़ जोड़ । प्रमुदित राउ देहिं सोड़ सोड़ ॥ ७ ॥ सेवक सकल बजनिआ नाना । पूरन किए दान सनमाना ॥ ८ ॥

pura nara nāri sakala pahirā'ē. ghara ghara bājana lagē badhā'ē. 6.
 jācaka jana jācahiṁ jō'i jō'i. pramudita rā'u dēhiṁ sō'i sō'i. 7.
 sēvaka sakala bajani'ā nānā. pūrana ki'ē dāna sanamānā. 8.

Not only were the invited guests who had gone with the marriage party (to Janakpur) honoured by gifting of robes and clothes, the kings had also honoured the men and the women of the city by giving them robes of honour<sup>1</sup>.

Musical instruments were played and felicitous songs were sung in each household of the city to celebrate<sup>2</sup> the occasion of the marriage of Lord Ram and his three brothers. (6)

Whatever was desired by those who came to accept gifts from the king were cheerfully and liberally given whatever they had wanted. The king did not hesitate in satisfying any of them<sup>3</sup>. (7)

The king satiated all the servants, attendants and musicians by giving away whatever gifts they wanted and bestowing upon them honours in accordance to their ranks and services so much so that all of them were fully contented and happy. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The king was very generous and magnanimous because whenever he decided to give gifts, he did it liberally with an open heart and without distinction. He ensured that his subjects were kept happy and contented, and they never felt discriminated against or alienated from the higher echelons of the society or from the royal family. There are ample instances of the citizens receiving gifts from the king or the queens directly and personally—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Doha no. 196 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 7-8 at the time of birth of Lord Ram and his brothers; and (ii) from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 295—to Chaupai line no. 1 that follows this Doha at the time when the news of Lord Ram's marriage arrived at Ayodhya.

<sup>2</sup>Playing of musical instruments and singing of auspicious songs in every household whenever there was any good development is narrated on many other occasions also. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Doha no. 194 at the time of birth of Lord Ram and his brothers; and (ii) from Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 296 at the time when the news of Lord Ram's marriage arrived at Ayodhya.

This showed that all the citizens of the kingdom shared the joys of the royal family equally, and there was a sort of community feeling and bonhomies amongst the people. After all, the happiness of the people was what a good king wanted, and the subjects of a noble king loved him so much and reciprocated the king's love for them by sharing the king's sorrow and happiness as if it was their own affair. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 100; Doha no. 37 and Chaupai line no. 1 that follow it; from Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 46—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 49; and Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 156 (at the time of Dasrath's death).

<sup>3</sup>A similar idea is expressed in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 326 which says that king Dasrath had liberally given away whatever was sought as gifts by all those who came to seek them from him at the end of the marriage rituals of the four brothers at Janakpur.

Refer also to Baal Kand, Doha no. 196 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 7-8 where a similar idea is expressed, and the occasion was the birth of Lord Ram at Ayodhya.]

दो०. देहिं असीस जोहारि सब गावहिं गुन गन गाथ ।
तब गुर भूसुर सहित गृहं गवनु कीन्ह नरनाथ ॥ ३५१ ॥

dōhā.

dēhiṁ asīsa jōhāri saba gāvahiṁ guna gana gātha.
taba gura bhūsura sahita gr̥ham̐ gavanu kīnha naranātha. 351.

All those who received gifts and honours saluted the king, blessed him and praised his glories with a loud chorus.

After that, the king proceeded to the palace, accompanied by his guru (sage Vasistha) and other Brahmins<sup>1</sup>. (Doha no. 351.)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The gifts and other honours were given by the king to the guests, the alms-seekers, the servants, the attendants and the musicians etc. outside the gates of the royal palace. When the king entered the palace, he was accompanied by his guru and many other Brahmins. Though it is not specifically mentioned here, one of them was sage Vishwamitra. It will be clear later on when the sage is singled out for special thanks and honours by the king as well as Lord Ram personally in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precedes Doha no. 359; and Chaupai line nos. 3-10 that precede Doha no. 360.]

चौ०. जो बसिष्ठ अनुसासन दीन्ही । लोक बेद बिधि सादर कीन्ही ॥ १ ॥
भूसुर भीर देखि सब रानी । सादर उठीं भाग्य बड़ जानी ॥ २ ॥
पाय पखारि सकल अन्हवाए । पूजि भली बिधि भूप जेवाँए ॥ ३ ॥ आदर दान प्रेम परिपोषे । देत असीस चले मन तोषे ॥ ४ ॥

caupāī.

jō basiṣṭa anusāsana dīnhī. lōka bēda bidhi sādara kīnhī. 1.
bhūsura bhīra dēkhi saba rānī. sādara uṭhīm bhāgya baṛa jānī. 2.
pāya pakhāri sakala anhavā'ē. pūji bhalī bidhi bhūpa jēvām'ē. 3.

ādara dāna prēma paripōṣē. dēta asīsa calē mana tōṣē. 4.

Whatever instructions were given by sage Vasistha, all were diligently and respectfully followed (by the king, Dasrath) in accordance with the laid-down procedure established by tradition in the society and prescribed by the Vedas (scriptures)<sup>1</sup>. (1)

When the queens saw the crowd of Brahmins, literally the “honourable gods of earth” (who had accompanied the king when he had entered the inner part of the palace as narrated in Doha no. 351), they got up to greet these Brahmins and to show their respects to them, regarding their (Brahmin’s) visit as their (queens’) good fortune. (2)

Then they (the queens as well as the king) duly washed the feet of these respected Brahmins (as a gesture of showing respect to them), and helped them to do their ablutions. After that, the king duly worshipped them (the Brahmins) in all possible ways, and then served them food so that they could be fully satisfied with their meal. (3)

The Brahmins were fully satisfied with the respect and honour, the gifts and donations, as well as the love and affections that was shown to them (by the king and the queens), and thus contented and happy, they profusely blessed the royals and went their ways.<sup>2</sup> (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>King Dasrath had consulted his guru, sage Vasistha, on every important occasion. Since the sage was the royal priest of the kingdom of Ayodhya, he had presided over all the rituals of marriage at Janakpur on behalf of the royal family of Ayodhya, and oversaw the rites when the grooms returned home. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precedes Doha no. 359; and Chaupai line no. 10 that precede Doha no. 325.

All the rituals were done in accordance with the established norms and traditions of the society as well as in the way prescribed in the Veda—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 349.

Earlier, during the actual marriage ceremony of Lord Ram and his brothers, the same system of obeying the edicts of the Vedas and following established traditions was observed—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 319; (ii) Chaupai line no. 8 and Chanda line no. 5 that precede Doha no. 323; (iii) Chanda line no. 12 that precedes Doha no. 324; and (iv) Chanda line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 327.

<sup>2</sup>Refer also to Tulsidas’ book “Janki Mangal”, verse no. 189.

We have read earlier in Doha no. 351 that after seeing off the rest of the guests who had accompanied the marriage party of Lord Ram, as well as the citizens of Ayodhya at the gates of the palace, the king had entered the palace along with the Brahmins and his guru. When the queens saw the king coming inside the palace with the honourable Brahmins, they immediately got up and paid their obeisance to the Brahmins. It is customary to first honour the Brahmins by washing their feet with the idea that they represent the gods of heaven on earth. Worshipping them is regarded as being equivalent to worshipping the gods. This is done by washing the feet of the Brahmins, and then helping them in their ritualistic ablutions. This usually involves a symbolic sprinkling of water on the body and changing into new or washed clothes.

After this is done, the Brahmins are fed properly with the best of food that the host can offer. Finally, the Brahmins are given gifts before they are seen off. The Brahmins, on their part, bless the host.

Another important point is that usually these Brahmins came to the king in groups and were accompanied by their chief, sage Vasistha—for instance, refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 193.

Whenever the Brahmins were invited by the king, they were duly worshipped—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-3 that precede Doha no. 197 where we read that when king Dasrath invited sage Vasistha to baptise and give names to the four sons, the king had duly worshipped the sage.

This worship included “washing of the feet” and “feeding the guest”. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 207 when king Dasrath had washed the feet of sage Vishwamitra and fed him excellent meal at the time when the great sage had gone to the king with a request that Lord Ram and Laxman be sent with him to his hermitage so that the demons who were defiling his fire sacrifice could be eliminated.

Washing of feet of an honoured guest, repeatedly bowing the head before him to show one’s respect, and offering something to eat as a means of refreshment is an old tradition and method of hospitality since time immemorial. When Lord Ram had visited the old woman devotee Sabari in the forest, she too had brought water and washed the Lord’s feet, and then offered fruits for refreshment—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Doha no. 34 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 9-10.

Another tradition was to call a large group of Brahmins whenever there was some good event or news, and give liberal gifts to them. The satisfied Brahmins on their part profusely blessed the giver of gifts. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 295 which describes that at the time the news of Lord Ram’s marriage arrived in Ayodhya, the queens summoned all the Brahmins and gave them abundant gifts.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 330—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 331.

This practice of a king moving with a group of Brahmins was followed in Janakpur also as we read that when king Janak had gone to meet sage Vishwamitra when the latter arrived at Janakpur, the king was accompanied by a large delegation of Brahmins—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 214.

We also read in this context that king Janak had showed his respects to all the sages who accompanied sage Vishwamitra by bowing his head to them, and the sages had blessed him, which made the king feel exceptionally blessed—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 215.]

बहु बिधि कीन्हि गाधिसुत पूजा । नाथ मोहि सम धन्य न दूजा ॥ ५ ॥

कीन्हि प्रसंसा भूपति भूरी । रानिन्ह सहित लीन्हि पग धूरी ॥ ६ ॥ bahu bidhi kīnhi gādhisuta pūjā. nātha mōhi sama dhan'ya na dūjā. 5.

kīnhi prasansā bhūpati bhūrī. rāninha sahita līnhi paga dhūrī. 6.

[The king felt especially obliged and grateful to sage Vishwamitra because all the happiness and joy associated with the marriage of the four princes was due to this sage. Had Vishwamitra not taken Lord Ram and Laxman to Janakpur to attend the bow-breaking ceremony, had he not given permission to Lord Ram to go to the royal garden where the Lord met Sita for the first time, had he not blessed Lord Ram that his internal desire to marry Sita would be fulfilled, had he not ordered Lord Ram to break the bow when all other kings and princes had failed, and once the bow was broken and the marriage of Lord Ram and Sita finalised, had he not ordered that king Dasrath be invited with his other sons, the wave of happiness that has today submerged the city of Ayodhya and overwhelmed the royal family would not have come to happen.

Therefore, the king wished to show his special regards for sage Vishwamitra and offer his personal obeisance to him separately as narrated in these three verses.]

The obliged king offered his special regards and thanks to sage Vishwamitra (known as “Gaadhi-sut” as he was the son of sage Gaadhi) by worshipping him in many different ways. [To wit, the king repeatedly worshipped the sage as he did not feel satisfied by a single formal worship. It was done to express the king’s heart-felt emotions of thanks and a sense of profound obligations towards the sage.]

The king then politely submitted—‘Oh revered sage! No one else is as lucky and privileged in the world as I am today. [It is because for two primary reasons: one, I am able to personally worship you today, and secondly, all my sons have been married not due to any efforts made by me or their own efforts, but as a blessing of a sage of your repute and mystical powers. Who else in this world is so lucky that you would be so kind upon him? I had not even invited you to come to Ayodhya, but you came to me voluntarily to take Ram away to your hermitage. The events that followed—liberation of Ahilya, and the killing of Tadka and other demons named Marich and Subahu who were defiling your fire sacrifice, and finally the breaking of the formidable bow which put to shame the strength and valour of all the mighty kings and princes of the world—helped establish the fame and reputation of my son Ram in the world, and all this happened due to your mercy and graciousness. Besides this, you have taught my sons, Sri Ram and Laxman, certain martial skills that are only known by you, and how could my sons have learnt them if you hadn’t taught these to them?

Oh respected sage, to be frank, these marvelous achievements wouldn’t have been possible at all had you not been exceptionally gracious upon me and my sons. How can I not recognise this blessing of yours? Who else has got this blessing anywhere else in this creation? So, am I not exceptionally blessed and lucky?

A sage of your reputation and mystical powers first took the trouble to come down walking all the way from your far-away hermitage to my kingdom, then you had showered fatherly love upon my two beloved sons, Sri Ram and Laxman, and then you had taught them excellent skills of warfare and use of weapons as well as how to conquer hunger and thirst during the long ordeal of the battle-field, and then got my sons married, and finally took time off from your spiritual pursuits to come to Ayodhya instead of going back to your hermitage directly from Janakpur. How can I not acknowledge all this?]<sup>1</sup> (5)

The king profusely praised the sage in manifold ways, and then he, along with his queens, accepted the dust of the revered sage’s feet (to show his greatest respect and reverence for the great sage)<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 32 where king Janak had too worshipped sage Vishwamitra with special attention.

<sup>2</sup>Accepting the dust of a sage's feet, especially if the sage happened to be one's guru, is a great way of achieving all sorts of successes in this world. King Dasrath has acknowledged this clearly in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 3.]

भीतर भवन दीन्ह बर बासू । मन जोगवत रह नृपु रनिवासू ॥ ७ ॥

पूजे गुर पद कमल बहोरी । कीन्हि बिनय उर प्रीति न थोरी ॥ ८ ॥ bhītara bhavana dīnha bara bāsū. mana jōgavata raha nrpu ranivāsū. 7.

pūjē gura pada kamala bahōrī. kīnhi binaya ura prīti na thōrī. 8.

The king lodged the sage (Vishwamitra) in an excellent quarter inside his own palace, and all the members of the king's family, including his queens and other relatives, were on their toes to take care of the wishes and comforts of the revered guest-sage (for as long as he wished to stay there)<sup>1</sup>. (7)

The king then worshipped the lotus-like (i.e. revered) feet of his guru, sage Vasistha, and prayed to him with affection that was no less than the affection that the king had for sage Vishwamitra<sup>2</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>As we have observed above in the note accompanying verse nos. 4-6 herin above, the king was highly obliged to sage Vishwamitra, and the sage was his special guest-of-honour. So it is natural that all the best of royal care and services were extended for the comfort of the sage.

Another important point to note is that king Dasrath had first worshipped sage Vishwamitra, and only after that did he worship his own guru sage Vasistha as will be clear in the next verse no. 8. This clearly shows that the king wished to say a special “thanks” to sage Vishwamitra.

The sage was given residence inside the royal palace of the king to stress that he was a special guest-of-honour whom the king and the queens wanted to serve personally, and not leave this service to other royal attendants. When a close friend or relative or someone who is very close and dear comes to visit, the guest is accommodated in one's own house and not in a hotel. Hence, sage Vishwamitra was given residence in the king's personal home, the palace, instead of the royal guest-house.

Besides this consideration, another reason to lodge the sage inside the palace was that he was an outsider who lived in a far-away hermitage, and was not a resident of Ayodhya like sage Vasistha. Perhaps the official royal guest-house's rooms were occupied by other sages, Brahmins and elders who were invited by the king on the occasion of the marriage of his sons, which is quite probable and practical. Hence, the king decided to lodge sage Vishwamitra inside his own palace to show special respect to him and to tell the sage that he is a distinguished guest.

<sup>2</sup>It was very vital for the king to emphasise upon his guru, sage Vasistha, that he has great respect for the latter, and that the guru should not take umbrage at the king first worshipping sage Vishwamitra. The king and his family had the greatest of regards for sage Vasistha—this is clear in Doha no. 352 below.

Sage Vasistha was a ‘resident’ guru whom the king could meet as many times as he wanted, while sage Vishwamitra was a ‘visiting’ guru who would go away soon and the king would not be able to meet him for a long time again. So therefore, the ‘guest guru’ needed to be shown special privileges, but this does not mean that the king has any lesser regard for guru Vasistha.

Sage Vasistha was a wise man, and so he fully understood the stand of the king. This will be clear when he blessed the entire royal family—refer Doha no. 352, and Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that follow it herein below.]

दो०. बधुन्ह समेत कुमार सब रानिन्ह सहित महीसु ।

पुनि पुनि बंदत गुर चरन देत असीस मुनीसु ॥ ३५२ ॥

dōhā.

badhunha samēta kumāra saba rāninha sahita mahīsu.
puni puni bandata gura carana dēta asīsa munīsu. 352.

All the princes (Lord Ram and his brothers, Bharat, Laxman and Shatrughan) and their respective brides (Sita, Maandavi, Urmila and Srutkirti respectively), as well as the king (Dasrath) along with all his queens (Kaushaly, Sumitra and Kaikeyi) repeatedly offered their respects at the feet of the guru (sage Vasistha) even as the sage liberally blessed all of them in return. (Doha no. 352)

[Note—As has been observed in a note appended to verse no. 8 herein above, the king ensured that his guru, sage Vasistha, did not feel offended by the king first worshipping the guest sage Vishwamitra. So, while it is not mentioned that the four princes and their brides had offered their worship to sage Vishwamitra, when the turn of worshipping sage Vasistha came, the entire royal family took part. This pleased Vasistha and he reciprocated by blessing the royal family. Refer also verse nos. 1-2 below.

The importance of honouring one’s guru and holding him in high regards is emphasised by sage Valmiki when he told Lord Ram that the Lord should live in the heart of a person who respects his guru more than anyone else—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chanda line nos. 3 and 8 that precede Doha no. 129.

Even king Janak had the greatest of respect for sage Vasistha, and revered him like a family deity—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chanda line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 320.

Repeatedly bowing the head before the guru or any senior person is a sign of showing the highest respect to him and expecting blessings in return—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Chaupai line no. 9 that precedes Doha no. 34.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 359 below in this narrative where we shall read that when the two sages Vasistha and Vishwamitra arrived in the court of king Dasrath, he had worshipped their feet and paid his obeisance to them along with his four sons, Lord Ram and his three brothers.]

चौ०. बिनय कीन्हि उर अति अनुरागें । सुत संपदा रखि सब आगें ॥ १ ॥

नेगु मागि मुनिनायक लीन्हा । आसिरबादु बहुत बिधि दीन्हा ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

binaya kīnhi ura ati anurāgēm. suta sampadā rākhi saba āgēm. 1.
nēgu māgi munināyaka līnhā. āsirabādu bahuta bidhi dīnhā. 2.

The king prayed to sage Vasistha with a lot of affection overflowing in his heart, and symbolically submitted himself to the grace of the great sage by placing all his sons and the wealth of the kingdom (in a token manner) before him<sup>1</sup>. (1)

The chief amongst the sages (“munināyaka”; i.e. sage Vasistha) however asked for and accepted only his formal share of gifts that are traditionally given to celebrate and commemorate an auspicious occasion (which in this case is the marriage of the four princes).

Having received these gifts, the gracious sage blessed them (the king, the queens, and their four sons with their brides) in many a ways. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The king has shown the same gesture for sage Vishwamitra at the time of the latter’s departure for his hermitage—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 360.

The king wished to give many things as gift, but both these sages, i.e. Vishwamitra and Vasistha, only accepted token gifts because they were not greedy.]

उर धरि रामहि सीय समेता । हरषि कीन्ह गुर गवनु निकेता ॥ ३ ॥

बिप्रबधू सब भूप बोलाई । चैल चारु भूषन पहिराई ॥ ४ ॥

ura dhari rāmahi sīya samētā. haraṣi kīnha gura gavanu nikētā. 3.
biprabadhū saba bhūpa bōlāī. caila cāru bhūṣana pahirāī. 4.

The guru (sage Vasistha) enshrined the image of Lord Ram along with Sita in his heart, and then cheerfully went home<sup>1</sup>. (3)

The king next called all the wives of the Brahmins, and duly honoured them by giving them wonderful robes and wearing apparels. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>There is a remarkable angle to this verse when viewed from the perspective of devotion and spiritualism. When the two verse nos. 2-3 are read together, the meaning that comes out clearly is that sage Vasistha was cheerful only when he enshrined the image of Lord Ram and Sita in his heart, and not because the king had shown him great respect by placing his wealth before him. The reason is that sage Vasistha was the son of Brahma, the creator, and he knew that Lord Ram was in fact Lord Vishnu in a human form, and Sita was goddess Laxmi. Vasistha was not at all interested in material wealth, but his sole pursuit was spiritual bliss. He has clearly told Lord Ram that initially he had declined to become a priest, but when his father, Brahma the creator, told him that if he did so he will have the rarest of rare privilege to serve the Supreme Being incarnated as Lord Ram, he had gladly accepted this job—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 48 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 6-8.

That is why the enlightened sage Vasistha felt delighted when he enshrined the image of Lord Ram and Sita in his heart.]

बहुरि बोलाइ सुआसिनि लीन्हीं । रुचि बिचारि पहिरावनि दीन्हीं ॥ ५ ॥ नेगी नेग जोग सब लेहीं । रुचि अनुरूप भूपमनि देहीं ॥ ६ ॥ bahuri bōlā'i su'āsini līnhīm. ruci bicāri pahirāvani dīnhīm. 5.

nēgī nēga jōga saba lēhīm. ruci anurūpa bhūpamani dēhīm. 6.

After them, the king summoned all other honourable ladies of the city and gave them clothes according to their choices and wishes. (5)

All of them requested the king to give them gifts that are traditionally given on the occasion of ceremonies, and the king gladly gave them whatever they wished<sup>1</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We have read earlier that the king gave away gold, clothes, gems, horses, elephants and chariots according to the desire of the recipient—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 331.]

प्रिय पाहुने पूज्य जे जाने । भूपति भली भाँति सनमाने ॥ ७ ॥
देव देखि रघुबीर बिबाहू । बरषि प्रसून प्रसंसि उछाहू ॥ ८ ॥ priya pāhunē pūjya jē jānē. bhūpati bhalī bhāmṭi sanamānē. 7.

dēva dēkhi raghubīra bibāhū. baraṣi prasūna prasansi uchāhū. 8.

Then the king properly honoured the rest of the guests whom he thought were qualified for special respect. [Who were they? These guests were the junior Brahmins or sages who had come from all the corners of the great kingdom, from far and near, when they had heard that the marriage party has arrived at Ayodhya. So the king honoured all of them.]<sup>1</sup> (7)

The gods watched the marriage ceremony of Lord Ram and rained flowers (from the heaven), praising the celebrations, the happiness and the ecstasy that accompanied it. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Thus we see that king Dasrath honoured everyone who came to meet him and bless the newly married princes.

Refer also to “Janki Mangal”, verse nos. 189—192.]

दो०. चले निसान बजाइ सुर निज निज पुर सुख पाइ । कहत परसपर राम जसु प्रेम न हृदयँ समाइ ॥ ३५३ ॥

dōhā.

calē nisāna bajā'i sura nija nija pura sukha pā'i.
kahata parasapara rāma jasu prēma na hṛdayam̐ samā'i. 353.

The gods played their kettle-drums and went to their respective heavenly abodes. All along the way they animatedly talked about and lauded the glories of Lord Ram with an immense amount of love and affection in their hearts so much so that this emotion could not be contained in and it virtually overflowed from their hearts. (Doha no. 353)

[Note—The gods were the last ones to take leave and return home. They were all overwhelmed with emotions, were ecstatic with joy, and felt nostalgic all the way back to their heavenly abodes. They could not refrain themselves from praising the glories of Lord Ram, animatedly discussing amongst themselves the fine qualities of the Lord, and were lost in the memory of the great events that they had witnessed and would cherish for the rest of their lives in heaven.]

चौ०. सब बिधि सबहि समदि नरनाहू । रहा हृदयँ भरि पूरि उछाहू ॥ १ ॥
जहँ रनिवासु तहाँ पगु धारे । सहित बहूटिन्ह कुअँर निहारे ॥ २ ॥
लिए गोद करि मोद समेता । को कहि सकइ भयउ सुखु जेता ॥ ३ ॥
बधू सप्रेम गोद बैठारीं । बार बार हियँ हरषि दुलारीं ॥ ४ ॥

caupā'i.

saba bidhi sabahi samadi naranāhū. rahā hṛdayam̐ bhari pūri uchāhū. 1.
jaham̐ ranivāsu tahām̐ pagu dhārē. sahita bahūṭinha ku'am̐ra nihārē. 2.
li'ē gōda kari mōda samētā. kō kahi saka'i bhaya'u sukhu jētā. 3.
badhū saprēma gōda baiṭhārīm̐. bāra bāra hiyam̐ haraṣi dulārīm̐. 4.

Having shown everyone all possible respects and honours, the king's heart felt contented and overjoyed<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Then the king stepped inside the private quarters of his palace (where the queens and the newly arrived brides lived)<sup>2</sup>. There he beheld the four princes (his sons) alongside their respective brides. (2)

Feeling blessed and exhilarated, he sat the four young princes affectionately on his lap<sup>3</sup>. Say, who can ever narrate the degree of satisfaction and joys the king experienced at that time. [That is, when the king showed his love and affection for his newly married sons by making them sit on his lap, there was no limit of his happiness, joy and contentedness, and it is not possible to assign any measurement to it.] (3)

The king also made his daughters-in-law<sup>4</sup> sit with their respective grooms on his lap (to show equal affection and love for them). Feeling exhilarated in his heart, the overjoyed king (the father of the sons and the father-in-law of the brides) expressed his affection for all of them by various gestures of endearment. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We shall read below that till this point of time, the king was engaged in formalities that were to be done—receiving and honouring guests, the ordinary citizens as well as the sages and Brahmins. Once this was over, he retired to his private quarters of the palace to sit with his family and enjoy some private moments of peace and relaxation. The following verse nos. 2-8 and Doha no. 354 that follow them narrate these moments.

<sup>2</sup>This shows that the residential quarters of the queens were separate from the rest of the royal palace. All formal functions and receptions were done in the front part of the palace or a separate palace where the king lived, while the female members lived in a separate or adjacent part of the sprawling complex. The newly married brides were lodged under the care of their mothers-in-law, the three queens (Kaushalya, Sumitra and Kaikeyi). This is why the king saw his “daughters-in-law” here, and not earlier when the queens had worshipped the Brahmins etc. as narrated in Chaupai line nos. 2-4 that precede Doha no. 352.

This deduction—that the king’s personal residential quarter was separate from that of his queens—is also based on Baal Kand’s Doha no. 355 below where it is said that after giving instructions that the children be allowed to retire and go to bed as they are feeling sleepy (because they must be tired), the king went away to his “own” palace.

<sup>2-3</sup>A father sits his son and daughter on his lap as a gesture of great love and affection for his children, and there is nothing wrong in it. For Dasrath, the brides were like his daughters, and since he did not have any daughter of his own (because he had only four sons, Lord Ram and his three brothers, Bharat, Laxman and Shatrughan), the four young brides filled this gap in his life and he got a god-sent opportunity to shower his love on them to fulfill his heart’s desire that longed for a daughter.

Dasrath felt very blessed as now he has four loving sons and four equally loving daughters. He doted upon them with diligence, and “sitting on the lap” is a gesture of extreme affection that a parent exhibits for his or her child.]

देखि समाजु मुदित रनिवासू । सब कें उर अनंद कियो बासू ॥ ५ ॥
 कहेउ भूप जिमि भयउ बिबाहू । सुनि सुनि हरषु होत सब काहू ॥ ६ ॥
 जनक राज गुन सीलु बड़ाई । प्रीति रीति संपदा सुहाई ॥ ७ ॥ बहुबिधि भूप भाट जिमि बरनी । रानीं सब प्रमुदित सुनि करनी ॥ ८ ॥ dēkhi samāju mudita ranivāsū. saba kēm ura ananda kiyō bāsū. 5.

 kahē'u bhūpa jimi bhaya'u bibāhū. suni suni haraṣu hōta saba kāhū. 6.
 janaka rāja guna sīlu baṛā'ī. prīti rīti sampadā suhā'ī. 7.
 bahubidhi bhūpa bhāṭa jimi baranī. rānīm saba pramudita suni karanī. 8.

The ladies of the palace were delighted to behold this spectacle (of the king sitting on a throne with his four sons and four daughters-in-law seated affectionately on his lap, and he fondly expressing his affection for the four couples). Everyone’s heart became an abode of happiness and joy. (5)

The overwhelmed and overjoyed king described to the queens and other female members of the royal household (who had stayed back at Ayodhya and were eager to hear how the marriage function was held at Janakpur) the details of the way the marriage ceremony was organised. All of them (the queens and other members) became thrilled and exhilarated as they heard the detailed narration. (6)

King Dasrath was so overwhelmed by the intensity of affection shown by king Janak as well as by the friendly, amiable and courteous nature of the latter that he paid rich tributes to Janak by enthusiastically describing his excellent qualities, his fine virtues, his good manners, his magnificence and glories, his expression of affection and friendliness, his wealth, prosperity and opulence, and everything that was beautiful about him (as a gesture of expressing his own gratitude, respect and honour for king Janak, and simultaneously narrating the events at Janakpur for the benefit of the queens and other members of the royal household who did not accompany the marriage party to Janakpur, but were nevertheless very eager to hear what had happened there). (7)

The glowing tributes that Dasrath enthusiastically paid to honour Janak and laud his noble virtues and great glories in flowering terms made it appear as the former was a bard and a minstrel of Janak, and was on the pay-roll of the latter!

The queens felt delighted when they heard all that had happened in the course of the marriage ceremony of the four brothers, as well as of the glorious deeds of king Janak. (8)

[Note—It is certainly a sincere and honest praise when one praises another person behind his back. King Dasrath did not praise Janak in public because it would seem merely a formal expression of honour from one king for another. This was a private moment, and his lauding Janak and his excellent qualities before the members of his family showed that Dasrath was indeed overwhelmed by Janak's lovable nature and excellent qualities. This also shows that Dasrath did not regret this relationship with Janak.

Other aspects of this praise are these:-

(a) The four daughters-in-law were seated very near to Dasrath (refer: Chaupai line no. 4 herein above), and they were hearing all that Dasrath said. Praising Janak profusely and expressing great satisfaction at the reception accorded to the marriage party at Janakpur as well as the conduct of the entire marriage ceremony signalled to the brides that they are warmly welcome in their new homes, and that their in-laws were very happy and satisfied with this new relationship. This was essential to build self-confidence in the four young brides who had stepped out of their homes for the first time in their lives, and who longed for love and affection that their own father, king Janak and his bother Kushdhwaj, had shown them all along. Praising Janak in great abundance not only instilled a sense of confidence in the brides and made them feel that they are amongst friendly people who cherish the new relationship and are satisfied with it, but also that their adopted family is honourable and knows how to show respect to others. They aren't selfish, rude or snobbish by nature—criticising others behind their backs and sneering at things that are done and finished.

(b) The wise king subtly hinted to all the members of the royal household, the queens as well as the rest of them that he was extremely happy with this alliance, and that king Janak was a reputed and well-established king. Therefore, the four brides should be treated with great respect and dignity that they deserve as princesses of a great kingdom, and they should never be allowed to feel insulted or home-sick. This will be clear below in Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 355.]

दो०. सुतन्ह समेत नहाइ नृप बोलि बिप्र गुर ग्याति । भोजन कीन्ह अनेक बिधि घरी पंच गइ राति ॥ ३५४ ॥

dōhā.

sutanha samēta nahā'i nrpa bōli bipra gura gyāti.
bhōjana kīnha anēka bidhi gharī pañca ga'i rāti. 354.

After this narration (as described in the forgoing verses), the king and his sons bathed. Then the king summoned the Brahmins, his guru (sage Vasistha), and elders of the society. He sat down together with them and ate a sumptuous meal consisting of a large variety of delectable dishes till 'five Gharis' of the night passed. [Technically, 1 Ghari = approximately 24 minutes; but generally the word means "a suitable time". Hence, "five Gharis" means 5 x 24 minutes = 120 minutes = 2 hours. Or that a suitable time of the night passed in feasting.] (Doha no. 354)

[Noted—The "five Gharis of the night" indicates that roughly 2 hours were spent by the king and his four sons in eating their first meal after returning from Janakpur, and that the feast was held late in the night, and not in the evening hours. This conclusion is based on the fact that soon we shall read that the king had ordered that proper arrangements must be made to let the "children" go to bed and sleep as they were sleepy, and therefore must be tired—refer: Doha no. 355. Then the king himself went away to his palace.

It ought to be noted here that this meal is the only one mentioned after the marriage party returned from Janakpur. It was therefore a formal feast that the king organized for the Brahmins, his guru and other elders of the kingdom. The proof of this meal being a formal feast organized by the king to celebrate the occasion of the return of the marriage party with the brides and the grooms lies in the fact that felicitous songs were sung by female members of the royal household as the feast was underway—refer Chaupai line no. 1 herein below.]

चौ०. मंगलगान करहिं बर भामिनि । भै सुखमूल मनोहर जामिनि ॥ १ ॥
अँचइ पान सब काहूँ पाए । स्रग सुगंध भूषित छबि छाए ॥ २ ॥
रामहि देखि रजायसु पाई । निज निज भवन चले सिर नाई ॥ ३ ॥

caupāī.

maṅgalagāna karahim̐ bara bhāmini. bhai sukhāmūla manōhara jāmini. 1.
am̐ca'i pāna saba kāhūṁ pā'ē. sraga sugandha bhūṣita chabi chā'ē. 2.
rāmahi dēkhi rajāyasu pā'ī. nija nija bhavana calē sira nā'ī. 3.

As the feast was underway, the lovely female members of the royal household sang auspicious songs of felicitation. This gave the night an aura of enchantment and merriment as if it was a receptacle of happiness and joy. (1)

Everyone (i.e. the king, his four sons, and the invited guests—the Brahmins, the guru and the elders of the society) was offered water to wash their hands and rinse their mouths. Betel-leaves were then served as mouth-freshner. Then they were all adorned with garlands and honoured by offering perfumes such as sandalwood and other types of scents. (2)

The invited guest at the meal once again looked at their beloved Lord Ram and taking permission from the king all of them went away to their respective homes. (3)

[Note—This was a private feast and not a public banquet as the one that was held at Janakpur where all the members of the marriage party were invited and fed a sumptuous meal—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 328—to Doha no. 329.

Excepting this, the rest was the same—the variety of dishes served and the singing of songs.]

प्रेम प्रमोदु बिनोदु बड़ाई । समउ समाजु मनोहरताई ॥ ४ ॥

कहि न सकहिं सत सारद सेसू । बेद बिरंचि महेस गनेसू ॥ ५ ॥

सो मैं कहौं कवन बिधि बरनी । भूमिनागु सिर धरइ कि धरनी ॥ ६ ॥ prēmu pramōdu binōdu barā'ī. sama'u samāju manōharatā'ī. 4.

kahi na sakahim sata sārada sēsū. bēda biranči mahēsa ganēsū. 5.

sō maiṁ kahauṁ kavana bidhi baranī. bhūmināgu sira dhara'i ki dharanī. 6.

The flow of love and affection, the intensity of happiness and joy, the atmosphere of merriment and informal bonhomie, the praises that were sung (of the king, his sons, their glories, and the general conduct of the entire marriage ceremony), the auspiciousness of the time and the grandeur of the assembly, as well as the general environment of cheerfulness and exhilaration that prevailed at that time [4] was so profound and infectious that hundreds of Saradas (goddess of speech), Seshnaths (the thousand-tongued serpent), the Vedas (scriptures), the Creator known as Biranchi (Brahma), Lord Mahesh (Shiva) and Lord Ganesh (who is an expert in language and grammar) cannot describe them independently and even if they try it together<sup>1</sup> [5]. (4-5)

Well then say, how can I (the author of this book Ram Charit Manas, the great poet-saint Goswami Tulsidas) even imagine doing it in any possible way? How can it be expected that a terrestrial serpent or a tortoise can hold the earth from below on its hood or on its back respectively<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 12 where all these entities have been cited in the same context but with a different use of language when Tulsidas says that how can he ever narrate the divine story of Lord Ram which defies being described even by Sarada, Seshnath, Lord Shiva, Brahma, the Vedas and Purans so much so that they threw up their hands in failure and incompetence to declare that the Lord's story is "Neti-Neti", i.e. 'not this not this'. That is, the story cannot be subjected to any limits of words and their connotations and interpretations. In other words, this timeless story is both "this that has been said", as well as "that which has not been said"! It is infinite and unlimited in its meaning and interpretations.

This is a standard method adopted by Tulsidas to basically say that the thing or situation he wants to describe is so astoundingly wonderful and so immensely great that it is beyond his means to sufficiently describe it in its entirety or find words that would convey the exact meaning of what he wants to say with perfect fineness. He can only give a general idea of what happened at the cited moment or the magnificence and grandeur of the occasion.

<sup>2</sup>‘Seshnath’ is a celestial serpent who is supposed to hold the earth on its thousand hoods; he is the favourite of Lord Vishnu and helps the Lord recline blissfully on his coiled body as he floats on the surface of the celestial ocean of milk known as “Kshir-saagar”. But this does not mean that an ordinary serpent can hold the earth on its hood.

Similarly, Lord Kurma, the “tortoise” incarnation of Lord Vishnu, had held the earth on his back to prevent it from sinking into the nether-world and the void of the cosmos when the gods and the demons had used a huge mountain as a churning-rod to churn the celestial ocean in search of Amrit, the elixir of eternity and bliss. But that does not mean that any ordinary tortoise would be able to hold the earth on its back.

This shows the humbleness and modesty of Tulsidas because it is not that he was not competent to write an excellent prose or poetry as is proved by the magnificent books that he wrote as masterpieces of Hindi literature that has not seen their parallel ever since his time, but still he did not wish to seem pretentious and boastful.

Remember: more than writing a classic story he was actually journeying on his spiritual pursuit by narrating the divine story of the Lord of his soul, Lord Ram. He was not writing to show-off his talent or skills, but for the peace of his own self and as a token of his service for his beloved and dearest Lord Ram. Tulsidas has made this abundantly clear himself in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, in extensive verses extending from (i) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 8—right upto to Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 14; (ii) from Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 28—right upto Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 31; and (iii) finally Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precedes Doha no. 34.]

नृप सब भाँति सबहि सनमानी । कहि मृदु बचन बोलाई रानी ॥ ७ ॥
बधू लरिकनीं पर घर आई । राखेहु नयन पलक की नाई ॥ ८ ॥

nṛpa saba bhām̐ti sabahi sanamānī. kahi mṛdu bacana bōlā'īm rānī. 7.
badhū larikanīm para ghara ā'īm. rākhēhu nayana palaka kī nā'īm. 8.

In this way, the king duly honoured all those who were invited for the meal. [Refer: Doha no. 354 and its following Chaupai line nos. 1-2 herein above.]

After the guest departed, he called the queens and told them in a sweet voice (politely)—(7)

‘The brides are still young (and inexperienced) girls, and they have come to another (person’s) home. Therefore be careful to take proper care of them just like the eyelids diligently protect the eyes<sup>1</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The eyelids cover the delicate eyes and protect them from all harm at all times. Even when there is no apparent harmful situation, the eyelids constantly flap open and shut to tell the eyes that they are on alert and ever vigilant to extend their shield of protection to the eyes at all times of the day and night. The same metaphor of the eyelids protecting the eyes has been cited in Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 59 where mother Kaushalya says that she has been loving Sita and taking care of her like the eyelids do for the eyes, and that she should stay back in Ayodhya instead of going to the forest with Lord Ram so that she (Kaushalya) can survive by showering her love on Sita and embracing her whenever she remembered her son Lord Ram; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 142 which says that Lord Ram took extra care of Laxman in the forest just like the eyelids protect the eye.

Presently, the king asks the queen-mothers to be extra vigilant for the happiness and comfort of the four princesses, and to take all necessary steps so that they feel at home.

We shall read below in Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 358 below that the mothers slept with their daughters-in-law clasped in their arms (as if they were infants) just like a serpent sleeps clasping the gem that emerges from its hood.

This verse is remarkable in the sense that it shows how sensitive, practical and wise Dasrath was, for he did not want to leave anything to chance. He realized that the four girls were feeling uneasy in an alien home, and so specifically mentions this to ensure that all-out efforts are made to integrate them in their new homes and they are made comfortable.]

दो०. लरिका श्रमित उनीद बस सयन करावहु जाइ ।

अस कहि गे बिश्रामगृहँ राम चरन चितु लाइ ॥ ३५५ ॥

dōhā.

larikā śramita unīda basa sayana karāvahu jā'i.

asa kahi gē biśrāmagṛham' rāma carana citu lā'i. 355.

The children are tired and sleepy, so put them to bed (i.e. let them go and sleep).'

Saying this, the king went to his own palace's bedroom to retire for the night, enshrining the holy feet of Lord Ram in his sub-conscious mind. [To wit, the king had his mind fixed on the holy feet of Lord Ram, and even as he slept his sub-conscious mind remembered the Lord and his divine form as well as his holy lotus-like feet.] (Doha no. 355)

[Note—In his previous life, king Dasrath was Manu, the first male on earth. He had done severe Tapa (penance) to have a divine glimpse of Lord Vishnu. When the Lord revealed himself before Manu, the latter told the Lord that he feels fully contented by seeing the Lord's holy feet—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 149. In other words, though Manu saw the entire divine form of Lord Vishnu, his mind was focused on the Lord's divine feet. It is this holy feet that every devotee of the Lord wishes to serve. Hence, when Dasrath left to retire for the night, and even as he slept, his attention was fixed on Lord Ram's holy feet because the Lord was none else but Lord Vishnu himself in this form.]

चौ०. भूप बचन सुनि सहज सुहाए । जरित कनक मनि पलंग डसाए ॥ १ ॥

सुभग सुरभि पय फेन समाना । कोमल कलित सुपेतीं नाना ॥ २ ॥
 उपबरहन बर बरनि न जाहीं । स्रग सुगंध मनिमंदिर माहीं ॥ ३ ॥ रतनदीप सुठि चारु चँदोवा । कहत न बनइ जान जेहिं जोवा ॥ ४ ॥

caupāī.

bhūpa bacana suni sahaja suhā'ē. jarita kanaka mani palamṅga ḍasā'ē. 1.
 subhaga surabhi paya phēna samānā. kōmala kalita supētīm nānā. 2.
 upabarahana bara barani na jāhīm. sraga sugandha manimandira māhīm. 3.
 ratanadīpa suṭhi cāru camḍōvā. kahata na bana'i jāna jēhīm jōvā. 4.

[Verse nos. 1-4 describe the beds that were prepared for the grooms.]

Hearing the naturally pleasant and sweet words of the king, the mothers arranged beds (on which the four sons would retire for the night). The bedsteads were made of gold and studded with precious gems. (1)

On these bedsteads were spread beautiful soft mattresses which had magnificent covers that were as soft and fluffy-white as the froth of a cow's milk. (2)

On top of them were the pillows so wonderful that they defied description. The 'Mandir'<sup>1</sup> (the decorated bedroom) which was especially prepared for the purpose was adorned with jewels, and was full of fragrance emanating from the garlands made of fresh blooming flowers that were hung all around this room, as well as from the different scents that were either sprayed in the room or kept there (in containers). (3)

There were lamps made out of gems, and the canopy was most marvelous to behold. Taken all-in-all, the sight was so fabulously beautiful that even those who saw it were unable to describe it. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The word "Mandir" has many connotation, such as a temple, a home, a residence, a room etc., depending upon the context in which it is used. The devotee's heart where he enshrines an image of his revered deity is also called a "Mandir" because it is here that the Lord's image lives in the same way as it is consecrated externally in a temple made of brick and mortar. The room where Lord Ram would sleep was also a "Mandir" because Ram was not an ordinary prince but Lord Vishnu himself in a personified form.

Remember: Mother Kaushalya was well aware of who her 'son' actually was, that he was not an ordinary human but an incarnation of the Viraat Purush, one of the many names of Lord Vishnu—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 201, and Doha no. 202 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 7-8.

So therefore, when Kaushalya arranged for a room where Lord Ram would retire and take rest, she had the concept of a "temple" in her mind rather than a 'bedroom'.

There is a clever use of this word "Mandir" here by the author Tulsidas because it can be interpreted in the way a reader wishes to read it, and at the same time it covers all the other three bedrooms that were simultaneously prepared for the other brothers also.

It is also possible that there were four beds arranged independently for the four brothers to sleep upon in the same "Mandir" or room. This last interpretation seems most plausible as we shall find out below in verse nos. 5-6 where a reading would give a clear idea that all the brothers had slept on independent beds that were placed in the same room.]

सेज रुचिर रचि रामु उठाए । प्रेम समेत पलँग पौढ़ाए ॥ ५ ॥

अग्या पुनि पुनि भाइन्ह दीन्ही । निज निज सेज सयन तिन्ह कीन्ही ॥ ६ ॥ sēja rucira raci rāmu uṭhā'ē. prēma samēta palamṅga pauṛhā'ē. 5.

agyā puni puni bhā'inha dīnhī. nija nija sēja sayana tinha kīnhī. 6.

The mothers lifted Lord Ram and lovingly escorted him to the bed prepared for him, and made him lie down on it. (5)

Then the Lord repeatedly instructed (in a polite manner; or rather “requested”) his brothers<sup>1</sup> to go and lie down to sleep on their respective beds. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Ram had to “repeatedly” tell his younger brothers to go and sleep because they had kept standing before him as a mark of great respect.

We have read earlier also that Laxman had to be told repeatedly by Lord Ram to go and sleep when the two brothers had retired after serving their guru sage Vishwamitra in Janakpur during the first night of their stay—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 226.

Similarly, sage Vishwamitra had to repeatedly tell Lord Ram and Laxman to go and sleep when the two brothers were massaging the feet of the sage as he lied down to rest for the night—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-6 that precede Doha no. 226.]

देखि स्याम मृदु मंजुल गाता । कहहिं सप्रेम बचन सब माता ॥ ७ ॥

मारग जात भयावनि भारी । केहि बिधि तात ताड़का मारी ॥ ८ ॥

dēkhi syāma mṛdu maṅjula gātā. kahahim saprēma bacana saba mātā. 7.
māraga jāta bhayāvani bhārī. kēhi bidhi tāta tāṛakā mārī. 8.

As the mothers watched Lord Ram with his dark-complexioned body that looked so fine and delicate, they were all amazed and awe-struck by the astounding deeds that the Lord had done<sup>1</sup>. (7)

Wondering how the Lord could achieve all this, the mothers lovingly asked him—‘Oh dear son! Say, how did (or could) you kill Tadka<sup>2</sup>, the fierce and colossus demoness, with your delicate frame? (8)

[Note—Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 109 also.

<sup>1</sup>The mothers were dazed and amazed as to how Lord Ram could achieve such astounding feats as fighting with and killing of ferocious and blood-thirsty demons. They had thought that Lord Ram was very young, with a delicate and tender body, and being a pampered prince who had never faced hardships or had never been taught to engage in war, it was simply nigh impossible for him to do what he actually did—such as killing the demoness Tadaka and the demon Subahu, as well as the huge blood-thirsty demon army, and that too single-handedly! They wondered in astonishment how the Lord did it; how he managed it?

The question is: how did the mothers come to know about these feats of Lord Ram? Well, we have read a little earlier that king Dasrath had narrated all the developments and events while he sat with his queens to tell them everything from the beginning to end—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 354.

So surely, the king must have told the mothers about these events—the killing of Tadaka and Subahu, the banishment of Marich to the island in the far-away ocean, the elimination of the demon army, the protection of the fire sacrifice of sage Vishwamitra, the liberation of Ahilya, and of course, the breaking of the bow and its resultant marriage of Sita with Lord Ram.

We will also recall that when the messengers had arrived from Janakpur with the news of Lord Ram's marriage with Sita, they had narrated to king Dasrath all the great deeds done by Lord Ram that had made the Lord famous throughout the world. Though it is not mentioned that these messengers had specifically said anything about the slaying of the demons or liberation of Ahilya or the protection of the sage's fire sacrifice, but it is a common-sense assumption that they must have surely done it. This deduction is also based on the fact that Dasrath told them that “ever since Lord Ram had gone from Ayodhya with sage Vishwamitra, it was the first time that a true account of the Lord had arrived”—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-8 that precede Doha no. 291.

The way the messengers had answered the king in Doha no. 291 and its following Chaupai line nos. 1-3 clearly indicate that they must have told the king of these developments besides narrating how Lord Ram and Sita were married and how the Lord overcame the anger of sage Parashuram—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 292—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 293.

<sup>2</sup>This incident is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 209. It relates to the time when Lord Ram and Laxman were going with sage Vishwamitra to his hermitage in the forest to protect the sage's fire sacrifice from being defiled by the demons.]

दो०. घोर निसाचर बिकट भट समर गनहिं नहिं काहु ।

मारे सहित सहाय किमि खल मारीच सुबाहु ॥ ३५६ ॥

dōhā.

ghōra nisācara bikaṭa bhaṭa samara ganahim nahim kāhu.
mārē sahita sahāya kimi khala mārīca subāhu. 356.

The demons were ferocious and cruel to the extreme; they were formidable warriors who counted no one as worthy of obstruction in their path. Say, how could you (Lord Ram) kill such fierce and wicked demons as Marich and Subahu along with their companions? (Doha no. 356)

[Note—This incident is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 210. It relates to the time when Lord Ram had protected the fire sacrifice of sage Vishwamitra.

Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 109, stanza no. 2 also.]

चौ०. मुनि प्रसाद बलि तात तुझारी । ईस अनेक करवरें टारी ॥ १ ॥
मख रखवारी करि दुहुँ भाई । गुरु प्रसाद सब बिद्या पाई ॥ २ ॥
caupāī.

muni prasāda bali tāta tumhārī. īsa anēka karavarēm tārī. 1.
makha rakhavārī kari duhum̐ bhā'īm. guru prasāda saba bidyā pā'īm. 2.

Oh my dear son! I offer all my good deeds as a sacrifice for your sake and your well-being. Indeed it was due to the blessing of the sage (Vishwamitra) and the grace of the Lord God (or Lord Shiva—"īsa") that all the adversities and obstacles were swept aside for your benefit<sup>1</sup>. (1)

Well, the two brothers had protected the fire sacrifice of the sage<sup>2</sup>, and had obtained "Vidya" (esoteric knowledge and rare skills)<sup>3</sup> due to the blessing of the guru (sage Vishwamitra)<sup>4</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>There were so many unforeseen and unpredictable difficulties that may have arisen and caused so many problems for Lord Ram that were avoided because of the blessing of the powerful sage Vishwamitra who possessed great mystical powers, as well as by the grace of Lord God. The word used in the text is "Eesh" (§üâ) which has two basic meanings—one is the God worshipped by a person as his favourite deity, and the other is Lord Shiva. Both these meanings fit in well here.

In this context, refer to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 240. It was the time when sage Satanand, the royal priest of Janak, had come to sage Vishwamitra to invite him, along with the two brothers Lord Ram and Laxman, to come with him to attend the bow-breaking ceremony which will decide who marries Sita. Sage Vishwamitra told the brothers that they should come along and see whom the "Eesh" chooses to be the lucky one who will break the bow and marry Sita. Then Laxman had replied that the Eesh would favour that person upon whom he, i.e. sage Vishwamitra, is favourable and gracious. And as it happened, this 'chosen one' favoured by the Ish (Lord Shiva) was Lord Ram because the sage had already blessed the Lord that his wishes would be fulfilled—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 237.

Presently, the mothers are reiterating the same sentiment—saying in effect that since sage Vishwamitra was kind and gracious upon Lord Ram and had blessed him, the Lord God also favoured the Lord by removing all hurdles from his path and help him attain glory and fame.

<sup>2</sup>This event is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-6 that precede Doha no. 210.

<sup>3</sup>This event is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 209 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 7-8.

<sup>4</sup>A person from whom one learns anything, any skill or knowledge of any kind whatsoever, is a “guru” for that person. The word means a ‘teacher’. Since sage Viswamitra had taught the two brothers the esoteric knowledge pertaining to secret use of powerful mystical weapons and how to conquer thirst and hunger, he was a ‘guru’ of Lord Ram and Laxman. It is to be noted that since the time this knowledge was imparted by the sage to the two brothers, he was constantly addressed as a “guru”. There are umpteen numbers of instances for this: for example, refer Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 218; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1, 6 that precede Doha no. 237; (iii) Doha no. 239; (iv) Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 254; (v) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 261; (vi) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 267; (v) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 307.

It is interesting to note here that in the entire story of Ramayan, Lord Ram has addressed only two sages as his “guru”—one was of course sage Vasistha, the royal priest and preceptor of the ruling family of Ayodhya, and the other was sage Vishwamitra. Both had taught Lord Ram—sage Vasistha was the first guru because the four brothers were sent to his hermitage to study when they were old enough for education—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 204. Sage Vishwamitra was the second guru as narrated above.]

मुनितिय तरी लगत पग धूरी । कीरति रही भुवन भरि पूरी ॥ ३ ॥
 कमठ पीठि पबि कूट कठोरा । नृप समाज महँ सिव धनु तोरा ॥ ४ ॥
 बिस्व बिजय जसु जानकि पाई । आए भवन ब्याहि सब भाई ॥ ५ ॥ munitiya tarī lagata paga dhūrī. kīrati rahī bhuvana bhari pūrī. 3.

 kamāṭha pīṭhi pabi kūṭa kaṭhōrā. nrpa samāja mahum̐ siva dhanu tōrā. 4.
 bisva bijaya jasu jānaki pā'ī. ā'ē bhavana byāhi saba bhā'ī. 5.

The wife of the sage (i.e. Ahilya) was liberated from her curse as soon as the dust of your (Lord Ram's) feet touched her<sup>1</sup>.

Indeed, your fame and glories have filled all the directions of the world<sup>2</sup>. (3)

In the middle of a society of great warriors<sup>3</sup>, you (Lord Ram) had easily broken the bow of Lord Shiva which was sturdier and stronger than the hardest entities in this world<sup>4</sup>, such as the shell of the tortoise, the Vajra (the strong weapon of Indra, the king of gods, which is said to be made of the hardest material in existence), and the mightiest of mountains. (4)

This achievement gave you the honour of attaining world-wide fame and glory as well as the hand of Sita in marriage. It is so fortunate for all of us and glorifying for the whole family that all the four brothers have got married simultaneously and returned home with their respective brides<sup>5</sup>. (5)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This event is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 11-12, and Chanda line nos. 1-16 that precede Doha no. 211.

<sup>2</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 262 that proclaim the Lord's glory at the time the Lord had broken the formidable bow; and (ii) from Doha no. 291—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 293 that narrate the praises heaped upon Lord Ram by the messengers of king Janak while they were describing the achievements of the Lord to king Dasrath.

Refer also to Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 109, stanza no. 3.

<sup>3</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 292 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 4-8.

<sup>4</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 249—to Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 250; and from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 251—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 252.

<sup>5</sup>Refer: Geetawali Ramayan, Baal Kand, verse no. 1/109, stanza no. 3 also.]

सकल अमानुष करम तुझारे । केवल कौसिक कृपाँ सुधारे ॥ ६ ॥
आजु सुफल जग जनमु हमारा । देखि तात बिधुबदन तुझारा ॥ ७ ॥
जे दिन गए तुझहि बिनु देखें । ते बिरंचि जनि पारहिं लेखें ॥ ८ ॥ sakala amānuṣa karama tumhārē. kēvala kausika kṛpām̐ sudhārē. 6.

āju suphala jaga janamu hamārā. dēkhi tāta bidhubadana tumhārā. 7.
jē dina ga'e tumhahi binu dēkhēm. tē biran̄ci jani pārahim̐ lēkhēm. 8.

Indeed, all your deeds are essentially super-human by nature, and not possible to be replicated by anyone else. It is only that sage Vishwamitra's grace have made these astounding and super-human deeds of yours appear to be more human by nature because the world thinks that they were made possible by the grace and blessing of the sage. [To wit, the sage's blessings and grace have camouflaged the reality of the super-human nature of your mystical deeds.]<sup>1</sup> (6)

Oh dear son. Today we regard our lives as being fruitful and rewarded as we watch your divine form with our own eyes<sup>2</sup>. [To wit, how lucky are we that we are able to see so closely the Supreme Lord of creation with our own eyes. Not only this, we are also able to shower our personal care and love upon him. Say, who else has this good fortune?] (7)

Let the Creator (biran̄ci) not count those days of ours which had gone by without seeing you. [To wit, let us be able to see you every day of our lives; let not even one day pass when we are not able to see your divine form.]<sup>3</sup> (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>This observation has wider ramifications. It means that though Lord Ram's worldly life seemed to be like that of any other human being—he was born like an ordinary human child, studied and played like a child, grew up to become a warrior prince who would fight and kill enemies represented by the demons, who would marry and get sucked in family intrigue which made him go to the forest and suffer its travails, have his wife stolen and then woefully lament her loss, but determined to retrieve her he waged a fierce war at Lanka and finally won it, returned home to ascend the throne of the kingdom of Ayodhya, and ruled for thousand of years like a noble king, produced two sons, named Lav and Kush, and finally exited from the earth grieving for his beloved wife Sita whom he had to abandon due to aspersions cast on her character by someone of his subject—he nevertheless was above all this gross form of worldly drama, and did everything he did to hide his real identity from the demons. This was to ensure that the demons did not run away from him upon realising Lord Vishnu has finally come down to earth to eliminate them, but on the other hand take the Lord as an ordinary human prince and battle with him so that the Lord gets an opportunity to finish them off.

Hence, the camouflage that the Lord adopted was to hide his real intentions and the secret job on earth, which was to eliminate the demons. This conceit helped him to succeed in his mission.

His form was like any other human being, but his deeds were beyond the abilities of a human. This had created doubts even in the mind of the demon king Ravana too as is evident in Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Doha no. 22 and its following Chaupai line nos. 1-6. Here we shall read that Ravana was stunned and dumbfounded when he came to know of the marvelous deeds and the unparalleled valour of Lord Ram that led to the killing of so many of the greatest demons of his race. He wondered how it was ever possible for any human to do this. In any case, Ravana thought that if Lord Ram was indeed the Supreme Being who had come to earth as prophesised by the scriptures, then this was a golden chance for him to find salvation and emancipation, and if he was an ordinary prince then Ravana would kidnap and enslave the Lord's wife Sita as this was the wont and the natural habit of the demon race to take away other people's women by force.

A little later we read in this context that Marich had tried to convince Ravana about the divinity of Lord Ram by arguing that all the stupendous deeds that the Lord had done—such as the killing of the demons Subahu and Tadaka—was impossible for any human to do. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Aranya Kand, Doha no. 25.

<sup>2</sup>The same sentiment was expressed by the crow saint Kaagbhusund in Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand—(i) Doha no. 75 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 2-8; and (ii) Chaupai line no. 14 that precedes Doha no. 110.

Earlier in the story we read that when Vibhishan, the younger brother of Ravana, had decided to take refuge with Lord Ram, the same emotions were expressed by him. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Sundar Kand, Doha no. 42 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 4-8.

<sup>3</sup>Lord Ram was very dear to all living beings—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 56.

This loving assertion of the mothers, including of course Kaikeyi, that “let not a single day pass without them not seeing Lord Ram's divine form”, would come to a naught in a few days' time when Kaikeyi's stubbornness would force Lord Ram to go to the forest for 14 years of exile—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 29; and (ii) Doha no. 33.

This is the way the Lord's “Maya”, his delusion-creating powers, holds the world in its sway. This is the very reason why the Lord had smiled wryly in line no. 2 of Doha no. 350 Kha of this present chapter known as Baal Kand. He smirked because he knew that all this expression of love and affection by the mothers and his father would vanish in a few days' time when he would be asked to go to the forest with his wife and his younger brother Laxman.]

दो०. राम प्रतोषीं मातु सब कहि बिनीत बर बैन ।

सुमिरि संभु गुर बिप्र पद किए नीदबस नैन ॥ ३५७ ॥

dōhā.

rāma pratōṣīm mātu saba kahi binīta bara baina.

sumiri sambhu gura bipra pada ki'ē nīdabasa naina. 357.

Lord Ram most politely gratified his mothers and said 'thank you' to them. Then he fixed his attention on Lord Shiva, his guru and Brahmins in general as he gradually fell asleep. (Doha no. 357)

[Note—The mothers were babbling excitedly and preventing the Lord from falling asleep by their constant chatter. The Lord was feeling distracted, so after a while he politely told them 'thank you and good night'. Then in order to calm his senses and fall asleep he concentrated his attention on Lord Shiva etc. so that his mind becomes calm.]

चौ०. नीदउँ बदन सोह सुठि लोना । मनहुँ साँझ सरसीरुह सोना ॥ १ ॥

घर घर करहिं जागरन नारीं । देहिं परसपर मंगल गारीं ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

nīda'um̐ badana sōha suṭhi lōnā. manahum̐ sām̐jha sarasīruha sōnā. 1.

ghara ghara karahim̐ jāgarana nārīm̐. dēhim̐ parasapara maṅgala gārīm̐. 2.

The countenance and form of Lord Ram looked magnificent even while he slept just like the case of the red-tinged lotus flower that retains its beauty even during the twilight hours<sup>1</sup>. (1)

In every household of the city, the women-folk kept awake (or kept vigil) throughout the night, merrily singing songs that are usually sung during such occasions; these songs had lyrics that were laced with words that seemed to be teasing, but it was purposely done to tickle the senses and make everyone laugh, enjoy their time, and celebrate the happy occasion<sup>2</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The lotus flower usually shrivels up, losing its beauty and sheen when the sun sets in the evening. This applies to the lotus with a blue colour. But, the lotus flower with red petals retains its beauty even during the twilight hours, perhaps because of an abundance of infra-red rays in the light of the setting sun. The light of the setting sun enhances the beauty of the red-coloured lotus rather than subduing it.

During the twilight hours, the infra-red colour of the setting sun's light adds to the natural red colour of the petals of the lotus flower to produce a cumulative effect of enhanced glow and charm of the lotus. On the other hand, this infra-red colour neutralizes the colour of the lotus flower with blue petals, making them look lusterless and shrunk.

Tulsidas has used this metaphor from Nature to emphasise that the glow and charm of Lord Ram's face was the same when the Lord slept as when he was awake. This special mention was necessary because when a person sleeps he is unable to smile or show any sort of other emotions. So, if Lord Ram looked attractive to others just because he always sported a pleasing smile on his face, or made friendly eye-contact with everyone around, or even slightly nodded to acknowledge their presence and politely exchanged greetings with them, no such gesture was possible when the Lord slept. But it did not mean that the prettiness of his face, the charm of his countenance and the divinity of him was diminished even a bit.

<sup>2</sup>At the time of the marriage ceremony at Janakpur, similar songs laced with taunts were sung by the women-folk of the city to add a lot of fun and jest to the occasion—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 329.

It is a custom that the women keep awake during the first night of the arrival of the groom with his bride in their home. There is a lot of excitement, singing, celebration and rejoicing so much so that no one finds time to go to sleep. This practice also has its origin in the ancient belief that keeping awake during the first night helps to ward-off any evil spirit which may want to sneak in and harm the newly arrived couple.

It ought to be noted also that the celebrations in the royal household were shared by each and every citizen of the capital—whether it was singing, playing of musical instruments, decorating the homes, etc. Abundant instances of this are available in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand. For instance—(i) Doha no. 194; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 263; (iii) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 287; (iv) Doha no. 296 and its preceding Chaupai line no. 2; (v) Doha no. 344 and its preceding Chaupai line no. 4; (vi) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 351.]

पुरी बिराजति राजति रजनी । रानीं कहहिं बिलोकहु सजनी ॥ ३ ॥
सुंदर बधुन्ह सासु लै सोई । फनिकन्ह जनु सिरमनि उर गोई ॥ ४ ॥ purī birājati rājati rajanī. rānīm kahahim bilōkahu sajanī. 3.

sundara badhunha sāsū lai sō'īm. phanikanha janū siramani ura gō'īm. 4.

In fact, the night looked so alive and vibrant with celebrations and rejoicings that it left the queens spell-bound. They exclaimed—‘Look friend, how wonderful the night appears to be! Not only our homes, but even the entire city appear to be decked up like a bride.’<sup>1</sup> (3)

The mothers-in-law clasped their beautiful daughters-in-laws to their bosoms when they went to bed to sleep just like the serpent, from whose hood a sac of luminescent sap issues, coils around it when it goes to sleep<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>At the time of birth of Lord Ram, the same situation prevailed in Ayodhya—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 195 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 2-8.

It was repeated once again when the news of Lord Ram's marriage arrived in the city—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 296—to Doha no. 297.

<sup>2</sup>A special category of serpents produces a sap-like substance from the top of its hood. This sap is viscous like thick jelly, effuses a glow, and is contained in a membranous sac. It is called a “Mani”, a gem. According to mythology, this type of serpent remains inside its hole in the daytime, and emerges only during the darkness of the night in search of its prey. But it can see only in the light emanating from this ‘Mani’ which the serpent always carries on its hood wherever it goes. If someone removes this Mani by deceit, the serpent is believed to go blind, and severely curses the stealer. This allegory is cited here to stress that the three mothers-in-law began to love their daughters-in-law with the same intensity of attachment and care that this category of serpent has for its Mani.

We have read earlier that king Dasrath had instructed the queens to take extra care of the four brides because they have come to an alien home, to a new culture, and may be feeling very uneasy, homesick, hesitant and shy. The queen mothers were obliged and expected to make them feel comfortable, relaxed, and at home—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 355.

Besides the orders of the king, the mothers themselves had taken likeness for the four brides and had become fond of them since the first moment they saw them—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 349; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 3-5 that precede Doha no. 349.

So, when the time came to go to bed, the queen mothers took the brides with them so that the young princesses did not feel lonely and homesick. It was a gesture to make the brides feel that they will get the same love and affection from their mothers-in-law as their own mothers had given them at Janakpur.]

प्रात पुनीत काल प्रभु जागे । अरुनचूड़ बर बोलन लागे ॥ ५ ॥

बंदि मागधन्हि गुनगन गाए । पुरजन द्वार जोहारन आए ॥ ६ ॥ prāta punīta kāla prabhu jāgē. arunacūṛa bara bōlana lāgē. 5.

bandi māgadhanhi gunagana gā'ē. purajana dvāra jōhārana ā'ē. 6.

The Lord (Sri Ram) woke up at dawn at an auspicious time when the cock began to crow<sup>1</sup>. (5)

The royal bards and minstrels began singing laudatory verses even as the citizens collected at the gates of the palace calling out for Lord Ram to come to meet them<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The same time of Lord Ram's waking up has been mentioned at Janakpur—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 226.

<sup>2</sup>It was a standard practice during those days that bards and minstrels gathered at the gates of the palace to sing the glories of the royal family at dawn. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 194 where it is mentioned that bards, minstrels and other singers sang the glories of the great royal family of king Raghu in laudatory verses.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 37 where it is stated that the bards and minstrels had gathered at the gates of king Dasrath's palace at dawn, but were surprised to see that the king hadn't woken up by then though it was his practice—Ayodhya Kand, Doha no. 37 along with its following verse nos. 1-2.]

बंदि बिप्र सुर गुर पितु माता । पाइ असीस मुदित सब भ्राता ॥ ७ ॥
जननिन्ह सादर बदन निहारे । भूपति संग द्वार पगु धारे ॥ ८ ॥

bandi bipra sura gura pitu mātā. pā'i asīsa mudita saba bhrātā. 7.
jananinha sādara badana nihārē. bhūpati saṅga dvāra pagu dhārē. 8.

The four brothers offered their respects to the Brahmins, the gods, the guru, and their parents. Having received their blessings, the brothers felt exhilarated<sup>1</sup>. (7)

The queens reverentially gazed at his (Lord Ram's) countenance<sup>2</sup>. Then he accompanied the king (his father, Dasrath) to the gate of the palace. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Lord Ram and his brothers were very diligent in obeying the noble traditions established by the scriptures and the society, and one of these traditions was to pay one's respects to the elders the first thing in the morning. Then the Lord carried out his duties as per instructions of his parents and guru. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 205.

<sup>2</sup>Lord Ram is the hero of this epic story, is the eldest of the four brothers, and is the central figure in the narrative. Hence, all eyes are fixed on him, and he is the reference point for all discussions. He is the pivot upon which the entire story revolves and the acts of the epic drama unfold.

The mothers have thanked their good fortune earlier also when they had said that their life has been rewarded when they could see the divine form of the Lord—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 357 herein above.

The word “reverentially or respectfully” (“sādara”) implies that the queen-mothers held Lord Ram in high esteem, and treated him with the same honour that they had for their family deity. There is no surprise in this because mother Kaushalya had witnessed the Lord's mystical powers and his true form as the Viraat Purush when he was still a child—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 201—to Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 202.]

दो०. कीन्हि सौच सब सहज सुचि सरित पुनीत नहाइ । प्रातक्रिया करि तात पहिं आए चारिउ भाइ ॥ ३५८ ॥

dōhā.

kīnhi sauca saba sahaja suci sarita punīta nahā'i.
prātakriyā kari tāta pahim ā'ē cāri'u bhā'i. 358.

The four brothers performed all the purification acts and did their ablutions by bathing<sup>1</sup> in the holy river Saryu though they were inherently clean and pure.

Having done with their daily routine of cleaning themselves, they came to their beloved father (king Dasrath)<sup>2</sup>. (Doha no. 358)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 227 where we read that Lord Ram and Laxman have cleaned themselves the first thing in the morning before they went to serve their guru, sage Vishwamitra, in the first morning after their arrival at Janakpur.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 26.

<sup>2</sup>The same idea is expressed in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 205 that say Lord Ram first cleaned himself and then went to his father to take instructions from him to carry on with his assigned duties.]

चौ०. भूप बिलोकि लिए उर लाई । बैठे हरषि रजायसु पाई ॥ १ ॥
देखि रामु सब सभा जुड़ानी । लोचन लाभ अवधि अनुमानी ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

bhūpa bilōki li'ē ura lā'ī. baiṭhē haraṣi rajāyasu pā'ī. 1.
dēkhi rāmu saba sabhā juṛānī. lōcana lābha avadhi anumānī. 2.

When the king saw the brothers, he embraced them affectionately<sup>1</sup>. The brothers sat down cheerfully when they got instructions from their father to do so<sup>2</sup>. (1)

When the members of the assembly (royal court) saw Lord Ram, all of them felt extremely blessed as if they have got the full reward of possessing their eyesight<sup>3</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-4 that precede Doha no. 308 that describe the exhilaration of king Dasrath when he met Lord Ram and Laxman at Janakpur.

<sup>2</sup>An extra-ordinary level of decorum and dignified behaviour were practiced in those times. The princes did not just come in and sat down near their father; they remained standing till the king ordered them to take their seats. Being obedient to the father and doing as told by him is the best form of fulfilling the edicts of Dharma (righteous behaviour)—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 35; and Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 205.

When Lord Ram and Laxman had returned from their visit to the city of Janakpur, they had bowed before their guru, sage Vishwamitra, and then sat down only when ordered by the sage—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 225.

Even after Lord Ram ascended the throne of Ayodhya, this decorum was maintained inasmuch as the three brothers always watched the face of Lord Ram and waited for any instructions that the Lord may issue to them—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-2 that precede Doha no. 25.

<sup>3</sup>The same idea is expressed when the marriage party had seen Lord Ram when it arrived at Janakpur—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 309.

Seeing the Lord was extremely satisfying even for the great sages, such as Sarbhanga—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 8.]

पुनि बसिष्ठु मुनि कौसिकु आए । सुभग आसनन्हि मुनि बैठाए ॥ ३ ॥
सुतन्ह समेत पूजि पद लागे । निरखि रामु दोउ गुर अनुरागे ॥ ४ ॥ puni basiṣṭu muni kausiku ā'ē. subhaga āsanānhi muni baiṭhā'ē. 3.

sutanha samēta pūji pada lāgē. nirakhi rāmu dō'u gura anurāgē. 4.

Then sages Vasistha and Kushik (Vishwamitra) arrived in the court, and the king respectfully gave them beautiful thrones to sit upon. (3)

The king paid his obeisance to the two gurus by duly worshipping their feet along with his four sons<sup>1</sup>. The two gurus meanwhile were enchanted when they saw Lord Ram (and a surge of affection for the Lord flowed through their inner-being)<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Worshipping the feet of the guru was a standard practice—refer, for instance, Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 352 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 5-8 which are explicit on this point.

Earlier we read that the king had done the same thing on different occasions when he met the two great sages. For instance, with respect to sage Vishwamitra, we have two outstanding examples, one is when the sage had gone to Ayodhya to request for Lord Ram being sent to his hermitage to eliminate the demons (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 207), and the second instance is when the king met this great sage when he came to Janakpur with the marriage party (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 307 and its following Chaupai line no. 1).

As for sage Vasistha, we have the following instances: one is when the king had gone to him to request him to advise a way by which he can have sons as his heirs (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 189), and the other instance is when the king approached him to find out the auspicious time to anoint Lord Ram on the throne of Ayodhya (refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 3).

<sup>2</sup>Lord Ram had enchanted everyone who saw the Lord, and the two gurus were no exception. For example, (a) refer to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 207 when sage Vishwamitra saw Lord Ram and his brothers for the first time, and (b) Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 1 that precedes Doha no. 10 when sage Vasistha meets Lord Ram in connection with the latter coronation, and once again when the sage met the Lord in Chitrakoot as narrated in Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 243.]

कहहिं बसिष्ठु धरम इतिहासा । सुनहिं महीसु सहित रनिवासा ॥ ५ ॥
मुनि मन अगम गाधिसुत करनी । मुदित बसिष्ठ बिपुल बिधि बरनी ॥ ६ ॥ kahahim basiṣṭu dharama itihāsā. sunahim mahīsu sahita ranivāsā. 5.

muni mana agama gādhisuta karanī. mudita basiṣṭa bipula bidhi baranī. 6.

Sage Vasistha narrated many an episodes from the scriptures such as the Itihas (ancient mythological history pertaining to the gods). The king attentively listened to them along with the members of his family<sup>1</sup>. (5)

The marvelous deeds and achievements of sage Vishwamitra (son of Gaadhi) that were of an astounding nature and even incomprehensible for other sages, were narrated with great aplomb by sage Vasistha<sup>2</sup>. (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Again, this was a standard practice that when sages sat anywhere, they would narrate stories from the scriptures bearing a moral and spiritual message—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 26 where the same thing has been said about sage Vasistha, but here the Vedas and the Purans have been mentioned instead of the Itihas.

We have read earlier that sage Vishwamitra had done the same thing—that is, he had narrated the stories from the Itihas and Purans—when he sat down to relax with the junior sages accompanying him to Janakpur during the first evening of his stay there: refer—Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 226.

Not only the sages, even Lord Ram had narrated extracts from the scriptures to entertain Laxman and Sita in the forest when they felt forlorn and sad, in order to keep their mind engaged and diverted from the travails of forest life—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Ayodhya Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 141.

<sup>2</sup>The story of sage Vishwamitra has been narrated as a note appended to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 206 at the beginning of this episode of Lord Ram's marriage.

Sages Vasistha and Vishwamitra had been arch enemies in some ancient time, but they had made up patched up later on. This praise of Vishwamitra by Vasistha was to cement their ties and bury whatever vestiges of ill-will that may have survived. It was also done to indicate to king Dasrath why Vasistha had prevailed upon him to let Lord Ram and Laxman go with sage Vishwamitra as no harm could ever come to the two brothers when they were under the protection of this great and mystically empowered sage.]

बोले बामदेउ सब साँची । कीरति कलित लोक तिहुँ माची ॥ ७ ॥
सुनि आनंदु भयउ सब काहू । राम लखन उर अधिक उछाहू ॥ ८ ॥ bōlē bāmadē'u saba sām̐cī. kīrati kalita lōka tihum̐ mācī. 7.

 suni ānandu bhaya'u saba kāhū. rāma lakhana ura adhika uchāhū. 8.

Whatever sage Vasistha said about Vishwamitra was endorsed by sage Vamdeo who said, 'Everything is true. Indeed, the glories of sage Vishwamitra are well established in all the three levels or areas of the world.' [These three levels are—the heaven, the earth, and the nether world.] (7)

Hearing these words and listening to the magnificent glories of sage Vishwamitra, everyone present there felt delighted, but Lord Ram and Laxman were more delighted than others<sup>1</sup>. (8)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The reason for the two brothers feeling “more delighted than others” is that by this time they had developed a strong bond of affection and endearment with the great sage. They had experienced the depth and intensity of Vishwamitra's love and affection for them, and had by then begun to see the sage fulfilling two roles simultaneously—one of their father king Dasrath, and the other of their guru Vasistha. For instance, (i) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 10 that precedes Doha no. 208 tells us that sage Vishwamitra assumed the role of their father; (ii) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 7-8 that precede Doha no. 209 which tell us how the sage taught the two brothers certain esoteric skills, thereby becoming their guru; (iii) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 3-6 that precede Doha no. 226 tell us how affectionately the two brothers had served the sage by insisting upon massaging his legs even when the sage kept on telling them to go and sleep during their first night at Janakpur; (iv) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 237, and Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 240 where we read that the sage had blessed the brothers that their wishes would be fulfilled; and finally (v) Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5 that precedes Doha no. 254 where we read that sage Vishwamitra had spoken very lovingly when he had ordered Lord Ram to go and break the bow.

To wit, Lord Ram and Laxman had begun to love sage Vishwamitra more than anyone else. They had become informal with him, had developed a special affection and affinity for him because the sage had shared with them some of the happiest moments of their lives—the time when they got married. The loving sage had played a stellar role in bringing this about.

Lord Ram and Laxman had been more informal and friendly with sage Vishwamitra than they had been with either their father king Dasrath or their guru sage Vasistha.]

दो०. मंगल मोद उछाह नित जाहिं दिवस एहि भाँति ।

उमगी अवध अनंद भरि अधिक अधिक अधिकाति ॥ ३५९ ॥

dōhā.

maṅgala mōda uchāha nita jāhir̐m divasa ēhi bhām̐ti.
 umagī avadha ananda bhari adhika adhika adhikāti. 359.

Days passed away merrily with constant rejoicing and celebrations. It appeared that happiness and joy were sweeping across Ayodhya in wave after wave, each swelling higher and still higher than the previous one. (Doha no. 359)

[Note—Similar celebrations were witnessed in Ayodhya at the time of birth of Lord Ram and his three brothers—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 195—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 196.

Refer also to: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 345.]

चौ०. सुदिन सोधि कल कंकन छोरे । मंगल मोद बिनोद न थोरे ॥ १ ॥
नित नव सुखु सुर देखि सिहाहीं । अवध जन्म जाचहिं बिधि पाहीं ॥ २ ॥
caupāī.

sudina sōdhi kala kaṅkana chōrē. maṅgala mōda binōda na thōrē. 1.
nita nava sukhu sura dēkhi sihāhīm. avadha janma jācahīm bidhi pāhīm. 2.

Deciding upon an auspicious day, the sacred strings (that were tied around the wrist and waist of the grooms and the brides as part of the marriage ritual to ward-off evil spirits and bad omens if any) were untied (removed) from the bodies (of the grooms and their respective brides) amid a lot of celebrations and fanfare. (1)

Observing that there were constant celebrations in Ayodhya and the atmosphere was rich in happiness and joy; the gods praised the city and prayed to the creator Brahma that they should be allowed to take birth in Ayodhya<sup>1</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The gods have praised the city of Ayodhya elsewhere also. For example, refer: Ram Charit Manas—(i) Baal Kand, (a) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 195; (b) Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 196; as well as (ii) Uttar Kand, Doha no. 26. All these verses are explicit on this point that the gods were enchanted by the fabulous beauty and charm of Ayodhya.]

बिस्वामित्रु चलन नित चहहीं । राम सप्रेम बिनय बस रहहीं ॥ ३ ॥
दिन दिन सयगुन भूपति भाऊ । देखि सराह महामुनिराऊ ॥ ४ ॥ bisvāmitru calana nita cahāhīm. rāma saprēma binaya basa rahāhīm. 3.

dina dina sayaguna bhūpati bhā'ū. dēkhi sarāha mahāmunirā'ū. 4.

Sage Vishwamitra wanted to leave for his hermitage and expressed his intention daily, but he had to keep deferring it in deference to the requests of Lord Ram who wanted the sage to stay for some more time. (3)

The great sage who was like a king among sages (i.e. sage Vishwamitra) appreciated the ever-increasing respect for him that was expressed by the king (Dasrath)<sup>1</sup>.

[So, despite his strong desire to leave for his hermitage as it was already very long since he left it with Lord Ram and Laxman when they went to Janakpur, he had to keep postponing his departure because of Lord Ram's insistence and the respect that king Dasrath showed to him.] (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>We have read that when Dasrath had wanted to leave Janakpur for his own city of Ayodhya after the marriage ceremony was finished, Janak had similarly prevailed upon Dasrath to stay for some more time. Janak's warmth of affection and hospitality was also so great that Dasrath could not muster enough courage to leave against Janak's wishes to avoid being impolite and making the latter feel insulted and offended. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 332.]

मागत बिदा राउ अनुरागे । सुतन्ह समेत ठाढ़ भे आगे ॥ ५ ॥
नाथ सकल संपदा तुहारी । मैं सेवकु समेत सुत नारी ॥ ६ ॥ करब सदा लरिकन्ह पर छोहू । दरसन देत रहब मुनि मोहू ॥ ७ ॥ māgata bidā rā'u anurāgē. sutanha samēta ṭhārha bhē āgē. 5.

nātha sakala sampadā tumhārī. mair̥m sēvaku samēta suta nārī. 6.
karaba sadā larikanha para chōhū. darasanu dēta rahaba muni mōhū. 7.

Finally, when many days had passed, one day the sage politely requested the king to let him leave. Hearing this, the king was overwhelmed with affections and stood reverentially before the sage accompanied by his sons. (5)

The king said affectionately and reverentially, 'Oh Lord! All my wealth and realm are yours. I too am your servant together with my sons and wives (i.e. my queens and daughters-in-law)<sup>1</sup>. (6)

Be always kind, compassionate and loving upon your children (me and my family). Oh Lord, please be kind to let me have your Darshan (holy sight) time and again in the future also. [That is, kindly visit my kingdom often, and whenever you please. You are most welcome, and I will feel glad to worship you again and again in the future.]<sup>2</sup>, (7)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A similar situation prevailed at the time of departure of the marriage party from Janakpur—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line nos. 5 that precedes Doha no. 340—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 343.

<sup>2</sup>Later on in the story we shall read that Lord Ram had also requested his friends, the monkeys led by Sugriv, the friendly demons led by Vibhishan, and the boatman named Nishad, at the time of their going back to their respective homes from Ayodhya where they had all come with Lord Ram when he returned from Lanka after the end of his 14 years of forest exile, that they should always remember the Lord affectionately, and keep coming back to Ayodhya whenever they wish—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, from Doha no. 15—to Doha no. 16; and Chaupai line nos. 1-3 that precede Doha no. 20.]

अस कहि राउ सहित सुत रानी । परेउ चरन मुख आव न बानी ॥ ८ ॥
 दीन्हि असीस बिप्र बहु भाँती । चले न प्रीति रीति कहि जाती ॥ ९ ॥ रामु सप्रेम संग सब भाई । आयसु पाइ फिरे पहुँचाई ॥ १० ॥

asa kahi rā'u sahita suta rānī. parē'u carana mukha āva na bānī. 8.
 dīnhi asīsa bipra bahu bhāmṭī. calē na prīti rīti kahi jāṭī. 9.
 rāmu saprēma saṅga saba bhāī. āyasu pā'i phirē pahumcāī. 10.

Saying this, the king fell at the feet of the sage together with his queens and his sons. He was so overwhelmed with emotions that words failed him and he could not say anything else. (8)

The Brahmin (i.e. sage Vishwamitra) in his turn blessed all of them profusely. Then the sage departed from there for his hermitage, but on the way he was himself overcome with emotions of love and affection for the whole royal family. This mutual affection and respect for each other were so profound and sincere that one cannot describe them.<sup>1</sup> (9)

Lord Ram, accompanied by his brothers, affectionately escorted the sage (to the outskirts of the city) and returned back only after he ordered them to do so<sup>2</sup>. (10)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>A similar situation prevailed when Lord Ram had to send his friends, the monkeys, the bears, the demons and the boatman, back to their homes from Ayodhya—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, from Chaupai line nos. 1 that precedes Doha no. 17—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 20.

Similarly, Janak and his queen Sunayana were also overwhelmed with surging emotions when the marriage party finally left Janakpur for Ayodhya—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, (i) from Chaupai line nos. 5 that precedes Doha no. 336—to Doha no. 337; and (ii) Doha no. 338 along with its preceding Chaupai line nos. 4-8.

<sup>2</sup>There are two other instances where we read that the host has escorted the guest when the latter was going away to his place.

One is when king Janak had gone a long distance with Dasrath to see him off when the marriage party was returning to Ayodhya. After paying his obeisance to all the Brahmins, sages and elders of the marriage party, as well as showing his respects to king Dasrath and love for all the four brothers, king Janak had finally returned home. This is narrated in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 340—to Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 343.

The other instance is when the friends of Lord Ram—the monkeys led by Sugriv, the bears led by Jamvant, the demons led by Vibhishan, and the head of the boatman community named Nishad who had come to Ayodhya aboard the air-plane in which Lord Ram had returned to Ayodhya after his 14 year forest exile—were requested by the Lord to go back to their respective homes. The Lord and his brothers had gone out to escort them from Ayodhya—refer specifically to Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand—(i) Chaupai line nos. 1-5 that precede Doha no. 19; (ii) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 20. This entire episode however is narrated in Uttar Kand, from Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 16—to Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 20.]

दो०. राम रूपु भूपति भगति व्याहु उछाहु अनंदु ।
जात सराहत मनहिं मन मुदित गाधिकुलचंदु ॥ ३६० ॥

dōhā.

rāma rūpu bhūpati bhagati byāhu uchāhu anandu.
jāta sarāhata manahim mana mudita gādhikulacandu. 360.

As the sage, who was like a moon in the family of king Gaadhi<sup>1</sup> (i.e. sage Vishwamitra), went on his way to his hermitage (which was located far away in the forest), he kept on praising in his Mana (mind and heart), all along the way, the beauty and the charm of the countenance and form of Lord Ram<sup>2</sup>, the devotion and piety of king Dasrath, and the festivities, the joys and rejoicings of the events of the marriage ceremony. (Doha no. 360)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The metaphor of the moon is used to say that sage Vishwamitra was a prominent member of the family of Gaadhi, and that his glories shone brilliantly like that of the full moon in the night sky.

<sup>2</sup>When Lord Ram had sent-off his monkey, bear and demon friends back to their respective homes from Ayodhya, they had also remembered the Lord and his glories all along their way back—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Uttar Kand, Doha no. 17 Ka.]

चौ०. बामदेव रघुकुल गुर ग्यानी । बहुरि गाधिसुत कथा बखानी ॥ १ ॥
सुनि मुनि सुजसु मनहिं मन राऊ । बरनत आपन पुन्य प्रभाऊ ॥ २ ॥

caupāī.

bāmadēva raghukula gura gyānī. bahuri gādhisuta kathā bakhānī. 1.
suni muni sujasu manahim mana rā'ū. baranata āpana pun'ya prabhā'ū. 2.

Sage Vamdeo and the wise<sup>1</sup> preceptor of the family of king Raghu, i.e. sage Vasistha, once again<sup>2</sup> narrated the glorious story of the son of the family of king Gaadhi, i.e. sage Vishwamitra. (1)

Hearing the famed glories of the sage (Vishwamitra), the king praised to himself his own good fortune and meritorious deeds (that had enabled him and his sons Lord Ram and Laxman to serve the great sage, and be lucky to have received his patronage and blessings)<sup>3</sup>. (2)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The use of the word “gyānī”, which means one who is wise and knowledgeable, implies here that whatever had been said about Vishwamitra by the wise sage (Vasistha) was genuine and truthful, and nothing by way of flattery.

Another important point is that this word “gyani” has been so strategically put that it applies equally to Vasistha as well as Vamdeo. In other words, it implies that both these sages who had narrated the glories of Vishwamitra, i.e. Vasistha and Vamdeo, were equally wise, learned and knowledgeable.

<sup>2</sup>This is the second time that sage Vishwamitra's immense achievements and mystical powers have been described by sage Vasistha. The first occasion was when the sages had assembled in the court of king Dasrath as narrated earlier in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 6-7 that precede Doha no. 359. At that time when sage Vasistha had lauded the stupendous glories of sage Vishwamitra, sage Vamdeo had endorsed them, saying that whatever Vasistha had said about Vishwamitra was indeed the truth.

On this second occasion, however, both the sages, i.e. Vasistha and Vamdeo, have together spoken highly of Vishwamitra. To speak highly of someone and praise him behind his back is the sincerest form of praise.

<sup>3</sup>The king felt extremely happy that he had been able to serve such a great sage even without having to make any special effort to do so. Normally one had to make a lot of effort to first find who a great and realized sage is, and then it takes a lot more effort to be able to serve such a sage so that he gets sufficiently pleased. In the case of Dasrath the tables were turned in as much as the sage himself had come to the king to seek his favour—which was to lend his two sons, Lord Ram and Laxman, to the sage so that the latter's fire sacrifice could be saved. In return, the sage rewarded king Dasrath by getting all his sons married to noble princesses belonging to the royal family of king Janak who was equal in stature to king Dasrath.]

बहुरे लोग रजायसु भयऊ । सुतन्ह समेत नृपति गृहँ गयऊ ॥ ३ ॥
जहँ तहँ राम ब्याहु सबु गावा । सुजसु पुनीत लोक तिहँ छावा ॥ ४ ॥ bahurē lōga rajāyasu bhaya'ū. sutanha samēta nṛpati grham' gaya'ū. 3.

jaham' taham' rāma byāhu sabu gāvā. sujasu punīta lōka tihum' chāvā. 4.

All the rest of the people who had assembled to see-off sage Vishwamitra were given instructions to go their way. Then the king, accompanied by his sons, went to his palace<sup>1</sup>. (3)

Everyone (i.e. the citizens of the city of Ayodhya and the subjects of the extended kingdom, the gods in heaven, the people of the world at large, in all its corners) fondly sang (i.e. narrated and discussed) about the marriage ceremony (of Lord Ram and his brothers) so much so that its magnificent events and cheerful moments had spread in all the three spheres of the world (the heaven, the earth and the subterranean or nether world)<sup>2</sup>. (4)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>The king was always accompanied by his sons. There are many instances of this mentioned in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand. For instance, (i) Chaupai line no. 3 that precedes Doha no. 309; (ii) Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 315; (iii) line no. 1 of Doha no. 354; (iv) Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 358; (v) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 359; (vi) Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 360.

In other words, king Dasrath was so fond of Lord Ram and his brothers that he tried to keep them with him as much as possible and practical. This is clear when he had declined to oblige sage Vishwamitra when the sage asked for Lord Ram to be sent with him to the forest for protecting his fire sacrifice. The king had told the sage that all the four sons were equally dear to him, and in fact were dearer to him than his own life. Refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-5 that precede Doha no. 208.

This was in line with what Dasrath had himself sought as a boon from Lord Vishnu in his previous life as Manu when he had done severe Tapa (penance) to have a divine vision of the Lord. Manu had asked Lord Vishnu to bless him so that “his life depended upon the love of the Lord just like the life of a serpent depends upon the Mani (gem) on its hood”—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 6 that precedes Doha no. 151.

<sup>2</sup>The messengers of king Janak had also endorsed this fact that the glory of Lord Ram has been established in all the three worlds when they were describing the events leading upto the breaking of Lord Shiva’s bow by Lord Ram and the subsequent marriage of the Lord with Sita—refer: Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Doha no. 291.

Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 5 that precedes Doha no. 265 which also reiterates that the news of Lord Ram marrying Sita after breaking the bow of Lord Shiva had spread to all the corners of the world—i.e. in the heaven where the gods live, on the earth where the mortal creatures live, and in the subterranean world where the serpents live.]

आए ब्याहि रामु घर जब तें । बसइ अनंद अवध सब तब तें ॥ ५ ॥

प्रभु बिबाहँ जस भयउ उछाहू । सकहिं न बरनि गिरा अहिनाहू ॥ ६ ॥

ā'ē byāhi rāmu ghara jaba tēm. basa'i ananda avadha saba taba tēm. 5.
prabhu bibāham' jasa bhaya'u uchāhū. sakahim na barani girā ahināhū. 6.

Ever since the time Lord Ram had arrived home after his marriage, all sorts of happiness and joys took up residence in Ayodhya<sup>1</sup>. (5)

Even the goddess of speech (“Gira”; goddess Saraswati or Sarada) and the lord of serpents (i.e. Lord Seshnath with a thousand tongues) were not able to describe the immensity and intensity of celebrations and festivities that attended the marriage ceremony of the Lord (i.e. Sri Ram, and by inference all the brothers—because all of them were married simultaneously under the same canopy that was erected for the wedding rituals, and married to the princesses of the same family, the royal family of king Janak).

[To wit, it was beyond the abilities of Saraswati and Seshnath to describe the celebrations and festivities associated with the marriage of Lord Ram and his brothers.]<sup>2</sup> (6)

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Though Ayodhya was always an abode of happiness, joy and prosperity, on special occasions it looked more wonderful with all the extra decorations and festivities. This is clearly mentioned in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 296.

This time around the glory of Ayodhya was enhanced because now Sita, who was actually goddess Laxmi personified, has come to live here. Laxmi is the goddess of all-round prosperity and well-being, so all sorts of happiness and joy, the sense of contentedness and fulfillment that are associated with this goddess being pleased upon a person, came and blessed Ayodhya so much so that the city appeared to be an abode of prosperity, happiness, abundance and well-being.

The intensity of happiness and joy that prevailed in Ayodhya was compounded with the arrival of Sita, though of course all aspects of well-being and cheerfulness were always associated with the city by virtue of it being the home of Lord Ram who himself was an incarnation of Lord Vishnu. Refer specially to: Ram Charit Manas, (a) Baal Kand, Chaupai line nos. 2-8 that precede Doha no. 195; and (b) Uttar Kand, (i) from Chaupai line no. 7 that precedes Doha no. 20—to Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 24; and (ii) from Chaupai line no. 2 that precedes Doha no. 27—to Doha no. 30.

<sup>2</sup>Refer also to Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, Chaupai line no. 8 that precedes Doha no. 331 which say the same thing.]

कबिकुल जीवनु पावन जानी । राम सीय जसु मंगल खानी ॥ ७ ॥
तेहि ते मैं कछु कहा बखानी । करन पुनीत हेतु निज बानी ॥ ८ ॥ kabikula jīvanu pāvana jānī. rāma sīya jasu maṅgala khānī. 7.

tēhi tē mair̥ kachu kahā bakhānī. karana punīta hētu nija bānī. 8.

[Now, Tulsidas talks about his own good luck that he has had the rare opportunity to sing the divine glories of Lord Ram and Sita by way of narrating their divine marriage, when even Saraswati and Seshnath were unable to do so. In other words, Tulsidas says that he has tried his best to narrate the story of Lord Ram's wedding with Sita, but his narration is not enough or sufficient because even divine Beings such as goddess Saraswati and Lord Seshnath had failed to do so.]

I regard my life as a poet worthwhile and rewarded because I have been able to narrate, as much and as best as I could, the divine glories and famed deeds of Lord Ram and Sita. (7)

I (Tulsidas) have attempted to narrate a bit of it just to purify my words and speech. [To wit, though I am absolutely incompetent to narrate the divine story of Lord Ram's marriage with Sita, I still took the plunge because I wished to purify and wash clean my own faculty of speech and polish my words. I did not narrate this story to boast of my writing prowess or poetic skills, but to take a dip, as it were, in this holy pond of nectar in order to purify my mind and its faculty of thought and speech.] (8)

[Note—An exactly similar emotion has been expressed by Tulsidas in the beginning of the narration, by way of a preamble, in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 8; (ii) Doha no. 10 along with its preceding Chaupai line no. 7-10 and Chanda line nos. 1-4; (iii) Doha no. 12 and its preceding Chaupai line nos. 9-12; and (iv) Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 355.]

छं०. निज गिरा पावनि करन कारन राम जसु तुलसीं कह्यो । १ ।
रघुबीर चरित अपार बारिधि पारु कबि कौनें लह्यो ॥ २ ॥

उपबीत ब्याह उछाह मंगल सुनि जे सादर गावहीं । ३ ।
 बैदेहि राम प्रसाद ते जन सर्वदा सुखु पावहीं ॥ ४ ॥

chanda.

nija girā pāvani karana kārana rāma jasu tulasīm kahyaō. 1.
 raghubīra carita apāra bāridhi pāru kabi kaunēm lahyaō. 2.
 upabīta byāha uchāha maṅgala suni jē sādara gāvahīm. 3.
 baidēhi rāma prasāda tē jana sarbadā sukhu pāvahīm. 4.

Tulsidas says that he has narrated the magnificent tale of Lord Ram's hallowed life and divine deeds just to purify and sanctify his own tongue and its faculty of speech. (Chanda line no. 1)

Otherwise, since Lord Rajubhir's (i.e. Lord Ram's) story is like a limitless ocean, which poet (in his right senses) would even ever think of attempting to narrate it?<sup>1</sup> (Chanda line no. 2)

Indeed, those who reverentially hear and devotionally sing the auspicious events and celebrations associated with Lord Ram's sacred-thread ceremony (i.e. his childhood days) and his marriage ceremony (i.e. his adulthood days)<sup>2</sup> on a daily basis (i.e. regularly; whenever they wish to purify their mind and heart, as well as to free themselves from worldly taints and tensions), [Chanda line no. 3]----

---Such persons are always blessed with great happiness and well-being by the grace of Lord Ram and Vaidehi (Sita) [Chanda line no. 4].

[Note—<sup>1</sup>Tulsidas says in effect—‘In spite of knowing the impossibility of ever accomplishing the formidable task of fully and correctly depicting the glorious life and time of Lord Ram successfully by narrating his divine story, I (Tulsidas) still went ahead with this formidable task just to purify my inner self, my mind and heart, my faculty of speech and my whole being.

Despite being fully aware that it is not possible to ever describe the life and times of Lord Ram, who was a personified form of the Supreme Being himself, in its entirety, and even if one tries then to do justice with this narration, and though I was fully aware of my own inadequacies, my limitations and incompetencies, I nevertheless still chose to go ahead with this narration, singing and glorifying the Lord, narrating various events of his hallowed life and the divine deeds done by him just because I wanted to sanctify my own words by using them in honour of Lord Ram.

I simply wished to worship my Lord God, Sri Ram, by sacrificing all the skills I had to serve him. And since by vocation I am a poet and writer, the best form of service I could think of was to spend my time and life singing the divine glories of the Lord to the best of my abilities, and in the best way my mind and heart guided me to do. It is my humble way of serving my Lord God and put myself in his service.

I wished to cleanse all the impurities that had been clinging to my inner-self, my heart and my mind, by devoting them exclusively in the thoughts of Lord Ram, and writing of the Lord was a natural outcome of this emotion; narrating the story of Lord Ram is my way of venting my emotion of devotion and love for Lord Ram, and it is completely free from pretensions or boast.

I just wanted to sacrifice my self, both the grosser aspect of the body consisting of such organs as that of speech, sight, touch and hearing, as well as its subtler aspect consisting of the mind and heart, in the service of Lord Ram whom I hold dear to my inner-being.

Let it be clear from my side that I do not want anyone to think that I am showing-off my prowess as an expert writer and word-smith. I am neither of them. I have already made these points very clear repeatedly in the very beginning of my narration of Ram Charit Manas. Refer, Baal Kand—(i) Chaupai line no. 4 that precedes Doha no. 8; (ii) Chaupai line nos. 9-12 that precede Doha no. 12; and (iii) Chaupai line nos. 5-6 that precede Doha no. 355.’

<sup>2</sup>The “childhood days of Lord Ram” have been described in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from the Chanda that precedes Doha no. 192—to Doha no. 205.

The “adulthood days of Lord Ram” have been described in Ram Charit Manas, Baal Kand, from the Chaupai line no. 1 precedes Doha no. 206—to the end of Baal Kand in Sortha no. 361 herein below.]

सो०. सिय रघुबीर बिबाहु जे सप्रेम गावहिं सुनहिं ।

तिन्ह कहूँ सदा उछाहु मंगलायतन राम जसु ॥ ३६१ ॥

sōraṭhā.

siya raghubīra bibāhu jē saprēma gāvahim sunahim.

tinha kahum̐ sadā uchāhu maṅgalāyatana rāma jasu. 361.

Those who listen carefully, with great devotion and affection, the story narrating the marriage of Lord Ram with Sita, they will always enjoy all round auspiciousness and well-being by the grace and blessing of the Lord. Such is the glory of Lord Ram!! (Sortha/Doha no. 361)

इति श्रीमद्रामचरितमानसे सकलकलिकलुषविध्वंसने

प्रथमः सोपानः समाप्तः

(बालकाण्ड समाप्त)

iti śrīmadrāmacaritamānasē sakalakalikaluṣavidhvansanē prathamah̐ sōpānah̐ samāptah̐.

[PAUSE 12 FOR A THIRTY-DAY RECITATION]

Thus ends Baal Kand (Canto no. 1) of this divine nectar-like auspicious story of Lord Ram that is known as “Ram Charit Manas”.

-----*****-----

Appendix

(1) Other Volumes in this series are as follows:

Volume 2: Chapter 5.2 / Canto 2: Ayodhya Kand

Volume 3: Chapter 5.3 / Canto 3: Aranya Kand

Volume 4: Chapter 5.4 / Canto 4: Kishkindha Kand

Volume 5: Chapter 5.5 / Canto 5: Sundar Kand

Volume 6: Chapter 5.6 / Canto 6: Lanka Kand

Volume 7: Chapter 5.7 / Canto 7: Uttar Kand

-----*****-----

(2)

About the Author

Ajai Kumar Chhawchharia left home when he was approximately 29 years of age due to an inner call of his heart that told him to devote his life in the service of his beloved Lord God, Sri Ram. Worldly attractions did not enchant him at all. So, he didn't marry, and after his father's death he came and settled permanently in Ayodhya, the holy town in India associated with Lord Ram.

Presently he works as an honorary manager of a world famous Kanak Bhavan Temple at Ayodhya, and spends his time writing in English so that the world can access the wonderful nectar of metaphysical, spiritual and devotional philosophy that is contained in Indian scriptures for which they are so renowned.

His English Books published separately by a reputed publisher of India, the details of whom can be had by contacting the author on his email given below, include: (i) The series on '108 Upanishads' in five volumes having eighteen parts, (ii) Veda Vyas' 'Adhyatma Ramayan' in two parts, (iii) 'Devi Puran Ramayan', (iv) Valmiki's 'Adbhut Ramayan', and (v) 'Biography of Lord Ram' based on Tulsidas' books.

Genre of Writing: Spiritualism, Philosophy, Metaphysics, Religious, Devotional and Theological.

The author's Books are available for order online both in 'e-book' format and 'paper-back book' format at following websites—

(a) www.amazon.com (in their 'kindle' + 'paper-back book' versions),

(b) www.pothi.com (in 'paper-back book' + 'e-book' versions),

(c) www.draft2digital.com (in 'e-book' version) through the following platforms: (i) Apple (ibooks), (ii) Barnes & Noble (nook), (iii) Kobo, (iv) Page Foundry, (v) Scribd, (vi) Tolino etc.:-

(A) List of Books that are currently available as mentioned above :-

(A-1) (1) The Chariot of God: Dharma Rath; (2) OM and Naad; (3) YOGA—Its Practice and Philosophy according to the Upanishads; (4) Ram Geeta; (5) The Revelation of Creation—as envisioned in the Upanishads; (6) The Pentagon of Creation: As Expounded in the Upanishads; (7) The Triumvirate of Creation; (8) Maya: The Whirlpool of Delusions in Creation; (9) Surdas-Ram Charitawali; (10-a) The legend of Lord Shiva: Book 1 'Lord Shiva's marriage with Parvati'; (10-b) Book 2 'Lord Shiva's Sacred Hymns'; (10-c) Book 3 'Shiva's different names & their significance, Shiva Puran, Upanishads'; (11) the Mahavakyas of the Upanishads; (13) Lord Ram's marriage with Sita (based on Tulsidas' books "Ram Charit Manas", "Janki Mangal", "Ram Lala Nahachu" & "Geetawali", and sage Veda Vyas' book "Adhyatma Ramayan"; (14) "Anthology of Sacred Hymns, Stotras & Mantras of Lord Ram"; (15) "Vairagya Shatkam" of king-sage Bhartrihari; (16) An Anthology of the Sanyas Upanishads-Parts 1 and 2; (17) "Kaag-Bhusund Ramayan" or the "Aadi Ramayan" based on Tulsidas' Ram Charit Manas; (18) The Legendary Glory of Hanuman; (19) "Narad Bhakti Sutra"—Aphorisms for Devotion for God and the Principles of Love for the Lord; (20) "Shandilya Bhakti Sutra"—Aphorisms for Devotion for God and the Principles of Love for the Lord according to the illustrious sage Shandilya; (21) "Bhakti Sutra Mala"—A Garland of Spiritual Wisdom in the form of an Anthology of Aphorisms pertaining to Bhakti or devotion, love and affection for Lord God; (22) Glory of Lord Ram's Holy Name, Sacred Mantras, Stotras & Hymns; (23) Saints and Non-Saints: Their Distinguishing Characters and Qualities; (24) A True Guru (Qualities, Importance and Need of a True Teacher, Preceptor, Guide and Advisor); (25) "Sundar Kand" of Ram Charit Manas; (26) The Story of Ravana and the Epic War of Lanka—Told in Slow Motion (based on, and will have the full relevant Text of, Ram Charit Manas, Adhyatma Ramayan, Anand Ramayan, Geetawali Ramayan, and Kavitaawali Ramayan); (27) The Great Ancient Sages, Seers, Saints and Enlightened Kings of India; (28) The Metaphor of the Hansa in the Upanishads: The symbolism of a Grand Swan used to explain the wisdom of spiritual and metaphysical principles by the Upanishads.

(A-2) Goswami Tulsidas Series: (1) 'Dohawali'; (2) 'Parvati Mangal'; (3) 'Kavitawali'; (4) 'Janki Mangal'; (5) 'Ram Lala Nahachu'; (6) 'Geetawali Ramayan'; (7) 'Vairagya Sandipani'; (8) 'Vinai Patrika'; (9) 'Barvai Ramayan'.

(A-3) A full-blown English rendering of Tulsidas' epic 'Ram Charit Manas', otherwise also known as the "Ramayana" according to Goswami Tulsidas. My English version of this Book is comprehensive and an elaborate one, as it runs into many thousands of pages that endeavour to explain each single verse of the Book 'Ram Charit Manas' in fine detail from different perspectives, with the aid of explanatory notes and references.

(B) The Author's Books listed under (A-1) are available as e-books and printed books on the internet at the following websites: (a) www.amazon.com; (b) www.draft2digital.com; and (c) www.pothi.com.

Books listed under (A-2 and A-3) have been published in 'Printed-Book Editions' by the following two reputed Indian Publishers (details given below) :

(B-1)

Tulsidas Books (Vinay Patrika, Geetawali Ramayan, Kavitaawali Ramayan, Dohawali, Parvati Mangal, Janki Mangal, Vairagya Sandipani, Barvai Ramayan, Ram Lala Nahachu).

Pratibha Prakashan, prop. Sri Radheyshyam Shukla, Delhi.

Address: 7259/23, Ajindra Market, Prem Nagar, Shakti Nagar, Delhi 110007

Mobile: +91-93508 84227;

Landline phone: +91-114708 4852.

Email: pratibhabooks1@gmail.com

(B-2)

1. Detailed English renderings, with explanatory notes and commentaries of the 108 Upanishads classified according to the Vedic tradition = 6 volumes; 18 parts. [Vol. 1=Rig Veda Upanishads; Vol. 2= Sam Veda Upanishads; Vol. 3= Shukla Yajur Veda Upanishads; Vol. 4= Krishna Yajur Veda Upanishads; Vol. 5= Atharva Veda Upanishads; Vol. 6= Vedanta Concepts explained with specific references to the relevant Upanishads.]

2. English rendering of Adbhut Ramayan by sage Valmiki.

3. English rendering of Adhyatma Ramayan by sage Veda Vyas.

4. English rendering of Devi Puran's Ramayan by sage Veda Vyas.

5. A Divine Biography of Lord Ram & Glory of Lord's Holy Name.

6. Ram Charit Manas of Goswami Tulsidas—An analytical English version with detailed commentary, explanatory notes and references.

Name and contact of Publisher of above Printed Books listed under (B-2):

Chaukhamba Publishing House, Delhi. [Sri Neeraj Gupta.]

Postal Address: 4697/2, Street no. 21-A, (HDFC Bank wali Gali), Ansari Road, Darayaganj, Delhi—110002.

Phone: Mobile (Neeraj Gupta)—+919811133683

Office: 011-23286537; 011-32996391

Email: chaukhambapublishinghouse@gmail.com

chaukhamba\_neerj@yahoo.com

Contact details of Ajai Kumar Chhawchharia—

Postal address:-36-A, Rajghat Colony, Parikrama Marg, P.O.—Ayodhya, Pin—224123, Distt. Ayodhya (Faizabad), U.P. India.

Phone:—(India) +919451290400; +919935613060.

Website: < www.tulsidas-ram-books.weebly.com >

Email of Author: (i) < ajaichhawchharia@gmail.com >

(ii) < ajaikumarbooks@gmail.com >

Archive.org: < https://archive.org/details/@ajai\_kumar\_chhawchharia >

Facebook ID < www.facebook.com/ajaikumarchhawchharia8 >

Linkedin: < www.linkedin.com/AjaiKumarChhawchharia >

Goodreads:

https://www.goodreads.com/author/show/991710.Ajai\_Kumar\_Chhawchharia